'Surely nothing is more pleasant than, when some name crosses one, to go and get acquainted with the owner of the name; and this Biographie really has found places for people whom one would have thought almost too small for so comprehensive a work.'—EDWARD FITZGERALD'S Letters, April 1838.

LIKE its companion volume, our Gazetteer of the World, this Biographical Dictionary is based upon articles in Chambers's Encyclopædia. Hundreds, however, of little articles have been added: the total number of persons treated of must a good deal exceed ten thousand. The world's Upper Ten Thousand these mainly; still, the lower, even the lowest, have not been wholly neglected. For we include assassins like Abd-ul-Hamid and Ravachol, knaves like Arthur Orton and Jabez Balfour, madmen like Herostratus and Gilles de Retz, impostors like Joseph Smith and Madame Blavatsky, traitors like Pickle the Spy and Benedict Arnold, tagrag and bobtail—every other page offers examples. Whilst including many more names than any encyclopædia that ever has been or ever is likely to be published, the Biographical Dictionary does not, of course, pretend to vie in their several departments with such monumental works as the 'Dictionary of National Biography' or 'Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography,' which each to the Smiths alone devote nearly two hundred articles, against our fifty. Still, it has been our endeavour to take in all who may reasonably be looked for, and to admit none who will never be wanted—to give all the little Somebodies and many of the great Nobodies, as well as Homer and Dante, Shakespeare and Tennyson, Raphael and Beethoven, Nelson and Napoleon, Washington and Wellington, Newton and Darwin, Joan of Arc and Jane Austen, Dickens and Thackeray, and a few more their compeers. Omissions there must be (the omitted will readily detect them); and there will of course be errata, which we shall be sorry and glad to get notice of, with a view to future revision.

Some features of our Dictionary may be glanced at. First, though in only one volume, it is not so short after all: it contains as much letterpress, roughly, as three whole volumes of the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' Next, alone of works of its size, it furnishes ample references to biographies, autobiographies, criticisms, and such-like; so that the reader who wants to know more about (say)

PREFACE.

Lord Roberts than we could contrive to tell in some forty lines may proceed to Lord Roberts's 'Forty-one Years in India.' Under Mary Queen of Scots there are cited over thirty authorities, under Raleigh a dozen, under Shakespeare nearly fifty, under Tennyson above thirty. Thirdly, the Dictionary gives the approximate pronunciation of difficult or un-English names, so that readers will have no excuse for speaking of the 'Madonna' of Simmabew (Cimabue), of the novels of Mickywicks and Sinkywicks, of the achievements of Tadeema and Kroodjer; they will understand how Germans pronounce such names as Beust, Euler, and Goethe; and if they still prefer to talk of Loyola and Bollycahr, they will at least know that Spaniards do not so call Loyola and Bolivar. Fourthly, it has been written on parallel lines to the Gazetteer, and topographically is much more precise than biographical dictionaries are wont to be. Fifthly, it gives as an appendix a useful index of pseudonyms and nicknames, so that the reader may know where to look for the 'Stagirite,' the 'Child of Miracle,' 'Delta,' 'Lucas Malet,' 'Lavengro,' the 'Corn-law Rhymer,' the 'victor of Barossa,' the author of 'Mark Rutherford,' 'Fiona Macleod.' Lastly, we have attempted to bring the work well 'up to date.' At the re-printing in 1912 alterations were made, mainly by Mr William Geddie, on all the sixty-three sheets of which the work consists—in some single sheets on as many as thirteen or fourteen pages. Space has been found for Francis Thompson, René Bazin, and 'Mr Dooley;' for Schiaparelli, Silvanus P. Thompson, and Julius Thomsen; for Glinka, Glazunov, Max Reger, and Puccini; for Mr Bonar Law, Mr Borden, and Dr Woodrow Wilson; for Rudolf Eucken, Henri Bergson, and F. C. S. Schiller; for Max Klinger, F. W. Maitland, and Aurel Stein. Among older articles corrected or enriched by new discoveries are those on Gerontius, Botticelli, Alexander Montgomerie, the Admirable Crichton, Shakespeare, and Agnes Sorel. Among the hundreds of new facts incorporated were notes on the deaths of Josef Israels and Edward Whymper, Sir George White and Sir W. S. Gilbert, Fogazzaro and W. T. Stead, Strindberg and Père Hyacinthe, Lord Lister and Van t' Hoff, Lady Halle and Labouhere; new particulars as to Lord Haldane, Mr Balfour and Mr Lloyd George, Richard Strauss and Porfirio Diaz, Lord Kitchener, Marconi, and Echegaray; and new books about Liszt and Wagner, Ruskin and Peacock, Cavour and Garibaldi, Metternich and St Francis, Tintoretto and Tolstoi, Claverhouse and Karl Marx. Voysey and Andrew Lang died while the sheets were passing through the press. Any possessor of the Dictionary may for himself advantageously keep it up to date by entering on the margin the death of such-and-such a person, the publication of this or that new book, and any important occurrence connected with the subject of an article.

CHAMBERS'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

AALI PASHA

ALI PASHA (1815-71), Turkish statesman and reformer, rose steadily from one diplomatic post to another at home and abroad, until in 1842-45 he was ambassador at London. Afterwards he was Grand-vizier more than once, though never for long at a time.

Aasen, IVAR ANDREAS (1803-96), Norwegian poet, lived and died at Christiania.

Abancourt, CHARLES XAVIER JOSEPH D' (1758-92), minister to Louis XVI., and a nephew of Calonne, was murdered by the mob at Versailles.

Abarbanel, ISAAC BEN JEHUDAH (1437-1508), a Jewish writer, was born at Lisbon and died at Venice. His works comprise commentaries on the Bible and philosophical treatises.—His eldest son, JUDA LEON (LEO HEBREUS), a doctor and philosopher, wrote Dialoghi di Amore (1535).

Abati. See ABBATE.

Abauzit, FIRMIN (1679-1767), born of Protestant parentage at Uzès in Languedoc, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) was despatched by his mother to Geneva, where he became versed in almost all the sciences. He travelled in Holland and England in 1698, attracting the notice of Bayle and Sir Isaac Newton, who corresponded with him. He died at Geneva, having published many theological and archæological treatises (2 vols. Amst. 1773). Rousseau, who hated to praise a contemporary, penned his solitary panegyric on Abauzit in the Nouvelle Héloïse. [Ah-bo-zee'.]

Abb, Sr. See EBBA.

Abbadie, ANTOINE THOMPSON D' (1810-97), and MICHEL ARNAUD D' (1815-93), born in Dublin of French family, were educated in France, and both travelled in Abyssinia during 1837-48. To the elder brother we owe Géodésie d'Éthiopie (1860-73) and Géographie de l'Éthiopie (1890); to the younger, Douze Ans dans la Haute-Éthiopie (1868).

Abbas (566-652 A.D.), the uncle of Mohammed, at first hostile to him, but ultimately the chief promoter of his religion. He was the founder of the Abbasides, who ruled as califs of Bagdad from 750 till the Mongol conquest in 946.

Abbas Hilmi, born 14th July 1874, was educated at Vienna, and in 1892 succeeded his father, Tewfik, as khedive of Egypt.

Abbas-Mirza (c. 1783-1833), the favourite son of Shah Feth-Ali, led the Persian armies with great bravery, but with little success, in the wars with Russia (1811-13 and 1826-28).

Abbas Pasha (1813-54), viceroy of Egypt, in 1841 took an active part in the Syrian war of his grandfather, Mehemet Ali. The death of his uncle, Ibrahim Pasha, in 1848, called him to the throne; bigoted and sensual, he did much to undo the progress made under Mehemet Ali.

Abbate, NICCOLO DELL' (1512-71), a fresco-painter of Modena, who died in Paris. [Ab'ba-teh.]

Abbe, CLEVELAND, American meteorologist, born in New York, 3d December 1838. [Ab'beh.]

Abbey, EDWIN AUSTIN (1852-1911), A.R.A. (1896), R.A. (1898), subject-painter, was born at Philadelphia, U.S., but settled in England in 1878.

Abbot, EZRA (1819-84), an American scholar and biblical critic, who in 1856 became assistant-librarian at Harvard University, and in 1872 professor of New Testament Criticism.

Abbot, GEORGE, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born, the son of a Guildford cloth-worker, 29th October 1562. In his seventeenth year he entered Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship (1583); and through Lord Buckhurst's influence he rose to be Master of University College (1597), Dean of Winchester (1600), and thrice Vice-chancellor of Oxford University (1600-5). To a new patron, the Earl of Dunbar, with whom he visited Scotland (1608), he owed his promotion to the sees of Lichfield (1609), London (1610), and finally Canterbury (1611). A sincere but narrow-minded Calvinist, he was equally opposed to Catholics and to heretics. He fined two recusants, he burnt two Arians, he consented that a clergyman should be put to the torture; but, withal, he was charitable, and far less obsequious to the kingly will than most of his compeers. His closing years were clouded by an accident, the shooting of a gamekeeper (1621); and during the last six he was almost superseded by Laud. He died at Croydon, 4th August 1633, and was buried at Guildford, where in 1619 he had founded a hospital.—His brother, ROBERT (1560-1617), from 1615 Bishop of Salisbury, was a learned theologian.

Abbot. See COLCHESTER, LORD.

Abbott, CHARLES. See TENTERDEN, LORD.

Abbott, EDWIN ABBOTT, D.D., Broadchurch theologian and Shakespearian scholar, was born in London, 20th Dec. 1838, and from the City of London School passed in 1857 to St John's College, Cambridge. Senior classic and chancellor's medallist (1861), he became a fellow, master at King Edward's School, Birmingham, and at Clifton College, and head-master (1865-89) of the City of London School. His works include the well-known Shakespearian Grammar (1870); Through Nature to Christ (1877); Bacon and Essex (1877); Philochristus (1878) and Onesimus (1882), two anonymous romances of the first age of the church; Francis Bacon (1885); The Kernel and the Husk (1887); Philomythus (1891); Anglican Career of Newman (1892); Silanus the Christian (1906); and works on N. T. criticism (1900-9).

Abbott, JACOB (1803-79), author of The Young Christian and innumerable other works, was born at Hallowell, Me., and died at Farmington, Me.—His son, LYMAN ABBOTT, D.D., Congregational minister and author, was born at Roxbury, Mass., 18th December 1835, and in 1887 succeeded Henry Ward Beecher.—A younger brother of Jacob's, JOHN STEPHENS CABOT, was born in 1805 at Brunswick, Me., studied at Bowdoin and Andover, was minister in Worcester and Roxbury, and died at Fair Haven, Conn., 17th June 1877. He published many historical works.

Abbott, SIR JAMES (1807-96), born at Blackheath, at sixteen joined the Bengal Artillery; in 1839-40 rode from Herat to Khiva—the first Englishman there—and the Caspian; served splendidly in Hazara 1846-53; came home a major-general in 1867; and was made a K.C.B. in 1894.

Abd-al-Rahman. See ABD-ER-RAHMAN.

Abd-el-Kader, Algerian hero, was born at Mascara in 1807, and, the scion of a priestly house that traced back to the Fatimide califs, was carefully educated. His public career dates from the conquest of Algiers by the French. No sooner was the power of the Turks broken than the Arab tribes of Oran elected him as their emir; and with marvellous perseverance and strategic skill he waged his long struggle with the French 1832-47. In 1834 he forced Gen. Desmichels to a treaty; and in June 1835 he severely defeated a large French army at Makta. Spite of his heroism, he was crushed by overpowering force, and compelled to take refuge in Morocco. Here he got up a crusade against the enemies of Islam; but Bugeaud's decisive victory at Isly in 1844 obliged the sultan of Morocco to give up the cause of Abd-el-Kader, who had at length to retreat into Algeria, and surrender to General Lamoricière, Dec. 22, 1847. He was sent with his family to France, where he lived in honourable captivity, until liberated in 1852 by Louis Napoleon. He afterwards resided at Broussa in Asia Minor, Constantinople, and finally Damascus, where, enjoying a French pension of 100,000 francs, and composing religious and philosophical works, he died 26th May 1833. See Life by Churchill (Lond. 1867).

Abd-er-Rahman, (1) leader of the Saracens in their defeat at Tours (where he fell) by Charles Martel in 732.—(2) The first Omniad calif of Cordova (755-788).—(3) Grandson of Dost Mohammed, born in 1830, who had for ten years been a pensioner of Russia, when, in 1880, he was made by British influence Ameer of Afghanistan. He proved friendly to Britain, had additional territory secured to him, and died in 1901.—(4) Sultan of Fez and Morocco, succeeded his uncle in 1822. Abd-el-Kader's war against the French in Algeria involved the sultan in its movements, but was concluded by the battle of Isly (1844) and the mediation of England. His subjects' piracy brought risk of war with more than one European state. He died 1859.

Abd-ul-Aziz (1830-76), Sultan of Turkey, succeeded his brother, Abd-ul-Medjid, in 1861. At first he showed himself liberal-minded and open to western ideas; but presently his misgovernment alienated the provinces, and led, in 1875, to risings in Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Bulgaria. At last a conspiracy forced him to abdicate; and five days later he was found dead.

Abd-ul-Hamid II., Sultan of Turkey, born 22d September 1842, second son of Sultan Abd-ul-Medjid, succeeded in 1876, on the deposition of his brother, Murad V. The chief events of his reign were the unsuccessful war with Russia (1877-78); the Armenian atrocities (1894-96), which earned him the title of the 'Great Assassin'; the rising in Crete (1895-96); the successful war with Greece (1897); financial embarrassments; Macedonian troubles (1902-3); grant of constitutions in 1876 (withdrawn) and 1908; and deposition and exile to Salonica, 1909.

Abd-ul-Latif (1162-1231), an Arabian writer, who was born and died at Bagdad, but taught medicine and philosophy at Cairo and Damascus. His best-known book is a work on Egypt.

Abd-ul-Medjid (1823-61), Sultan of Turkey, succeeded his father, Mahmud II., in 1839. He continued the reforms of the previous reign; was saved from Egyptian aggression by the Christian powers; in 1850 refused chivalrously to give up Kossuth; and played a difficult part well during the Crimean war (1854-56); but thereafter allowed affairs to drift into financial ruin.

Abd-ur-Rahman. See ABD-ER-RAHMAN.

A Becket, THOMAS. See BECKET.

A Beckett, GILBERT ABBOTT, born in London, 9th January 1811, and educated at Westminster, in 1841 was called to the bar, in 1849 became a metropolitan police-magistrate, and died at Boulogne, 30th August 1856. Besides writing for Punch, the Times, &c., he was author of Quizziology of the British Drama, The Comic Blackstone, and Comic Histories of England and Rome, the second illustrated by Cruikshank, the last two by Leech.—One son, GILBERT (1837-91), was a playwright; another, ARTHUR WILLIAM (1844-1909), journalist, playwright, and barrister, wrote The A Becketts of Punch (1903).

Abel, SIR FREDERICK AUGUSTUS (1826-1902), chemist, was born in London, and devoted himself to the science of explosives, expounding his discoveries in Gun-cotton (1866), Electricity applied to Explosive Purposes (1884), &c. He has been chemist to the War Department and Ordnance Committees, and was made C.B. 1877, K.C.B. and D.C.L. 1883, and a baronet 1893. He became secretary to the Imperial Institute in 1887, and was president of the British Association in 1890.

Abel, KARL FRIEDRICH (1725-87), a German player on the viol-da-gamba and composer. In 1758 he came to England, where he was appointed chamber-musician to Queen Charlotte.

Abel, NIELS HENRIK (1802-29), a Norwegian mathematician, occupied mainly with the theory of elliptical functions. See Life by Bjerknes (Fr. trans. 1885).

Abel, Otto (1824-54), German historian.

Ab'elard, or Aballard, PETER, the keenest thinker and boldest theologian of the 12th century, was born at Le Pallet, 10 miles S.E. of Nantes, in 1079, the eldest son of a noble Breton house. He studied under Roscellin, in 1115 became a lecturer in the cathedral school of Notre-Dame; and for a few years he enjoyed extraordinary repute and influence. Among his pupils were Peter Lombard, Berengar, and Arnold of Brescia. But within the precincts of Notre-Dame lived the beautiful Héloïse, niece of the canon Fulbert, then seventeen years of age; and with her Abelard, thirty-eight years of age and acting as her tutor, fell passionately in love. The lovers fled together to Brittany, where Héloïse bore a son, and was privately married to Abelard. When shortly after Héloïse, denying the marriage (lest it should stand in Abelard's way), left her uncle's house for the convent of Argenteuil, Fulbert caused Abelard to be mutilated so as to be incapable of ecclesiastical preferment. Abelard entered the abbey of St Denis as monk; Héloïse took the veil at Argenteuil. Ere long a synod at Soissons (1121) condemned his teaching on the Trinity as heretical. In the hermit's hut at Nogent-sur-Seine to which he retired, Abelard was soon again besieged by importunate disciples; the hermitage became a monastic school known as Paraclete, which, when Abelard was invited to become abbot of St Gildas-de-Rhuys in Brittany, was given to Héloïse and a sisterhood. In his abbey Abelard maintained for ten years a struggle with disorderly and unfriendly monks, and at last fled to Clugny, where he lived, a model of asceticism and theological labour, and recanted some of the doctrines that had given most offence. Again, however, his adversaries, headed by Bernard of Clairvaux (q.v.), accused him of numerous heresies, of which he was found guilty by a council at Sens and by the pope. On his way to Rome to defend himself he died at the priory of St Marcel, near Châlon, 21st April 1142. His remains were buried by Héloïse at Paraclete, where hers were afterwards laid beside them; and thence the ashes of both were taken to Paris in 1800, and in 1817 were buried in one sepulchre at Père la Chaise, where still they lie. Abelard was a conceptualist rather than a nominalist, and in theology was held to be rationalistic. His ethical system he set down in the work Nosce teipsum. Sic et Non is a curious collection of contradictions from the works of the Fathers. His Historia Calamitatum Mearum forms the subject of a remarkable drama by Rémusat; and the still extant correspondence between Abelard and Héloïse suggested to Pope his Epistle of Eloisa to Abelard. The best edition of Abelard's works is by Cousin (2 vols. 1849-59). His work on the Trinity, long lost, was published by Stölzle in 1891. See monographs by Rémusat (Paris, 1845), Wilkens (Göttingen, 1855), Carrière (Giessen, 1853), Deutsch (Leip. 1883), Compayré (Eng. trans. 1893), and M'Cabe (1901).

Abencerrages, a noble Moorish family which came to Spain in the 8th century, and is said to have suffered tragical destruction in the Alhambra under Abu Hassan (1466-84).

Aben-Ezra (1093-1168), born at Toledo, was one of the most learned Jews of his time, distinguished in philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, and medicine. He visited France, Egypt, and England, and passed his later years in Rome.

Abercorn. See HAMILTON.

Abercrombie, JOHN, born in 1780 at Aberdeen, took his M.D. in Edinburgh (1803), and, establishing a practice there, after Dr Gregory's death (1821) was recognised as the first consulting physician in Scotland. He is best known by his superficial works on The Intellectual Powers (1830) and The Moral Feelings (1833). He died suddenly, November 14, 1844.

Abercromby, SIR RALPH, was born at Menstrie, Clackmannanshire, 7th October 1734. Educated at Rugby, from 1752 to 1755 he studied law at Edinburgh and Leipzig, but in 1756 obtained a cornetcy in the Dragoons, and two years later served in the Seven Years' War. From 1774 to 1780 he was M.P. for Clackmannanshire; in 1793 he accompanied the Duke of York to Holland. His conduct throughout that disastrous campaign won him the admiration of the whole army. Made a Knight of the Bath, he was appointed to the chief command of the West Indies Expedition, which he conducted with distinguished success. In 1797 he was sent to command the forces in Ireland; but his remonstrances against the policy of government towards that country occasioned his removal to a similar command in Scotland. In 1799 he was second in command to the Duke of York in the other unhappy expedition to Holland. On his return, he received the command of the expedition to the Mediterranean. The fleet anchored in Aboukir Bay on 2d March 1801; and before mid-day of the 8th, the British troops were in possession of the sandhills which command the shore, having landed in the face of a storm of shot. On the 21st, Menou, the French commander, attempted vainly to surprise the British camp. In the glorious action that ensued, Abercromby was struck by a musket-ball in the thigh; and on the 28th he died on board the flagship. He was buried at Malta, and a monument was erected to him in St Paul's. The peerage conferred on his widow was afterwards enjoyed by his eldest son, with the title of Baron Abercromby.—His second son, General SIR JOHN ABERCROMBY (1772-1817), captured Mauritius in 1809.—His third son, JAMES (1776-1858), entered parliament in 1807, held the office of Speaker (1855-59), and was then created Baron Dunfermline. He wrote a Memoir of his father's last eight years (1861).

Aberdare, HENRY AUSTIN BRUCE, LORD, born at Duffryn, Glamorganshire, 16th April 1815, was called to the bar in 1837, and in 1852 was returned by Merthyr-Tydvil as a Liberal. Home Secretary under Gladstone in 1868, he was raised to the peerage in 1873, and was Lord President of the Council in 1873-74. He died 25th February 1895.

Aberdeen, GEORGE HAMILTON GORDON, EARL OF, born at Edinburgh, 28th January 1784, was educated at Harrow; in 1801 succeeded to the earldom; made a tour through Greece; and took his M.A. from St John's College, Cambridge (1804). In 1806 he was elected a Scotch representative peer; in 1813-14 was ambassador to Vienna; and in 1828 became Foreign Secretary in the new Wellington ministry. The general principle which guided his policy was that of non-intervention, which, joined to his well-known sympathy with Metternich, exposed him to the suspicion of hostility to popular liberty. His gradual abandonment of high Tory principles was evinced by his support of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and of the Catholic Emancipation Act. In 1841 he again became Foreign Secretary, his chief services as such being the conclusion of the Chinese war, the Ashburton Treaty, and the Oregon Treaty. His Non-intrusion Act (1843) could not heal the Disruption of the Scottish Church, and was virtually repealed by the Act for the Abolition of Patronage, 1874. Like Peel, he was honestly converted to free-trade principles, and with Peel he resigned in 1846, immediately after the repeal of the Corn Laws. In 1852, on Lord Derby's resignation, he was selected as the fittest man to head a coalition ministry, which for some time was extremely popular. The vacillating policy displayed in the conduct of the Crimean war undermined its stability, and the gross mismanagement of the commissariat in the winter of 1854 filled up the measure of the popular discontent. Roebuck's motion, calling for inquiry, was carried by a strong majority; and on 1st February 1855, Lord Aberdeen resigned office. He died in London, December 13, 1860. See Life by his son, the Hon. Sir A. Gordon (1893).—His grandson, GEORGE (1841-70), the sixth and 'Sailor Earl' of Aberdeen, was drowned on the voyage from Boston to Melbourne, when he was succeeded by his brother, JOHN CAMPBELL HAMILTON GORDON (b. 1847), who was viceroy of Ireland in 1886 and from 1905; and from 1893 to 1898 was governor of Canada. In 1877 he married Ishbel-Maria Marjoribanks, youngest daughter of the first Lord Tweedmouth, who takes a deep interest in women-questions and the Irish peasantry. She has written on Canada (1894) and tuberculosis (1908).

Abernethy, JOHN, surgeon, was born in London, 3d April 1764, the grandson of the Rev. John Abernethy (1680-1740), an Irish Presbyterian clergyman and controversialist. He was educated at Wolverhampton grammar-school, and in 1779 was appointed to the assistant-surgeon at St Bartholomew's Hospital. In 1787 he was himself elected assistant-surgeon to St Bartholomew's, and soon after began to lecture. At first, he manifested extraordinary diffidence, but his power soon developed itself; and his lectures at last attracted crowds. In 1813 he was appointed surgeon to Christ's Hospital, in 1814 professor of Anatomy and Surgery to the College of Surgeons, and in 1815 full surgeon to St Bartholomew's, a post which he resigned in 1829. His practice increased with his celebrity, which the eccentricity and rudeness of his manners contributed to heighten. He died at Enfield, 28th April 1831. Of his Works (4 vols. 1830) the most important is his Constitutional Origin and Treatment of Local Diseases (1809). See Life by George Macilwain (3d ed. 2 vols. 1857).

Abershaw, JERRY (1773-95), a highwayman who haunted Wimbledon Common, and was hanged at last for shooting a constable.

Abgar, the name or title of twenty-eight princes of Edessa in Mesopotamia (136 B.C.-638 A.D.).

Abich, WILHELM HERMANN (1806-86), a German geologist and traveller in the Caucasus, Armenia, and Northern Persia.

Abinger, BARON. See SCARLETT.

Abington. See HABINGTON.

Abington, FRANCES (née Barton, 1737-1815), from 1755 to 1799 was a popular actress, having previously been a flower-girl, street-singer, milliner, and kitchen-maid.

Abney, SIR WILLIAM DE WIVELESIE (cf. 1000), born at Derby in 1844, and educated at Rossall and Woolwich, became captain in the Royal Engineers in 1861, assistant-secretary in 1899, and adviser, in 1903, to the Board of Education. He has written much on photography, and made important researches in spectrum-analysis.

About, EDMOND FRANÇOIS VALENTIN, French author, was born at Diez, in Lorraine, February 14, 1828. After a brilliant course at the Lycée Charlemagne and École Normale in Paris, he studied archaeology at Athens; and then returning to Paris, devoted himself to a literary career. He received the Cross of the Legion of Honour in 1868, and was elected to the Academy in 1884, but died just before his formal reception, January 17, 1885. His works include La Grèce contemporaine (1854), Le Roi des Montagnes (1856; Eng. trans. 1897), Madelon (1863), Trente et Quarante (1865), Alsace (1872), which cost him a week's imprisonment at the hands of the Germans, and Le Roman d'un Brave Homme (1880). [Ah-boo'.]

Aboyno. See GORDON.

Abraham, the father of the Hebrew people, came from the Chaldean town of Ur, near the Persian Gulf, into Canaan at a date variously estimated from about 2866 B.C. to 1700 B.C. See Gen. xi.-xxv.

Abraham-a-Santa-Clara, the monastic name of Ulrich Megerle, a very eccentric but popular Augustinian monk, who was born near Messkirch, in Swabia, in 1644, and died court-preacher in Vienna in 1709.

Abravanel. See ABARBANEL.

Abruzzi, LUIGI AMEDEO, DUKE OF THE, mountaineer and Arctic explorer, born 1873, cousin of Victor Emmanuel III. of Italy, is noted for his Alaskan, Himalayan, and African climbs, and his expedition to 86° 33' N.

Abсалon, Archbishop of Lund. See AXEL.

Absolon, JOHN (1815-95), water-colour painter, was born at Lambeth.

Abt, FRANZ, composer of song-music, was born 22d December 1819 at Eilenburg, Prussian Saxony, and died at Wiesbaden, 31st March 1885.

Abu-bekr, the father of Mohammed's wife, Ayesha, was born at Mecca in 573 A.D., became the Prophet's most trusted follower, and in 632 succeeded him as the first calif. He died in 634, and was buried near Mohammed, at Medina.

Abulfaraj, called also Barhebraeus—as being of Jewish descent—was born in Armenia in 1226. A master of Syriac, Arabic, and Greek, he was equally learned in philosophy, theology, and medicine. At the age of twenty, he was made a bishop, and as Bishop of Aleppo rose to the second highest dignity among the Jacobite Christians. Of his numerous writings, the best known is a Syriac universal history. See Noldeke's Sketches from Eastern History (Eng. trans. 1892).

Abulfeda, ISMAIL-IBN-ALI (1273-1331), a Moslem prince and historian, born at Damascus, ruled from 1310 over Hamat in Syria. A generous patron of literature and science, in his Arabic Annals he has left one of our most valuable sources of Saracen history. It has been edited and translated into Latin (5 vols. 1789-94) by Reiske; the earlier part, Historia antislamica, by Fleischer (1831). His other great work is his Geography.

Accius, LUCIUS (170-90 B.C.), a Roman tragic poet, of whose work only a few fragments survive.

Accum, FRIEDRICH (1769-1838), a Westphalian chemist who during 1810-20 greatly promoted the introduction of gas-lighting in England.

Achæmenides, a dynasty in ancient Persia, from which sprang Cyrus (q.v.).

Achard, FRANZ KARL (1754-1821), of Berlin, improved the manufacture of beetroot-sugar.

Achates, the proverbially faithful companion of Aeneas (q.v.) on his wanderings from Troy.

Achilles, mythical hero of the Iliad and of the siege of Troy.

Achmet. See AHMED.

Ackermann, RUDOLPH (1764-1834), a native of Saxony, in 1795 opened a print-shop in London. He introduced lithography as a fine art into England, and originated the 'Annuals' with his Forget-me-not (1823).

Acland, SIR HENRY WENTWORTH, K.C.B. (1884), Oxford regius professor of Medicine 1857-94, was born 23d August 1815, from Harrow proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, held an All Souls fellowship, and in 1848 took M.D. In 1890 he was made a baronet, and he died in 1900.—His eldest brother, SIR THOMAS DYKE ACLAND, born at Killerton, Devon, 25th May 1809, was educated at Harrow and Christ Church, entered parliament in 1837 as a Conservative, but by 1865 had turned a decided Liberal; he sat until 1886. In 1871 he succeeded as eleventh baronet, in 1896 published Knowledge, Duty, and Faith. He died 29th May 1898. His second son, ARTHUR HERBERT DYKE ACLAND, born in 1847, and educated at Rugby and Christ Church, in 1886 became Liberal M.P. for the Rotherham division of Yorkshire, in 1892-95 was Vice-president of the Council (Education).

Acconzio, JACOPO, or JACOBUS ACONTIUS (c. 1500-66), was a native of Trent in the Tyrol, who came in 1557 to Basel, and in 1559 to England. His anti-dogmatic Stratagemata Satanae (1565) offers a very early advocacy of toleration; he was also a lawyer, courtier, and engineer.

Acosta, GABRIEL, or URIEL D', a Portuguese Jew, born at Oporto about 1591, was bred a Catholic, but early adopted the faith of his fathers, and fled to Amsterdam, only to find there how little modern Judaism accorded with the Mosaic Law. For his Examination of Pharisaic Traditions (in Spanish, 1624), a charge of atheism was brought against him by the Jews before a Christian magistracy; and having lost all his property, twice suffered excommunication, and submitted to humiliating penance, he at last shot himself (1647). His autobiography was published in Latin and German (Leip. 1847).

Acton, SIR JOHN FRANCIS EDWARD, minister of Ferdinand IV. of Naples, was born at Besancon, an English doctor's son, in 1736. Passing in 1779 from the naval service of Tuscany to that of Naples, he became successively admiral and generalissimo, and soon managed the entire administration. His measures, able but arbitrary, ultimately caused a reaction in favour of the French party; and he fell from power in 1806, and died at Palermo, August 12, 1811, having twenty years before succeeded to a Shropshire baronetcy.—His grandson, JOHN, LORD ACTON, was born at Naples, 10th January 1834, and succeeded his father as baronet in 1837. He was educated at Oscott under Wiseman, and at Munich by Döllinger, opposed the dogma of papal infallibility, and as leader of the Liberal Catholics in England edited a review and a paper in their interest. He sat for five years in parliament, and Gladstone made him Baron Acton. He had written on Wolsey, the Vatican decrees, German history, &c., when in 1895 he became professor of History at Cambridge. He planned the Cambridge Modern History, but died 19th June 1902. After his death his lectures on modern history and on the French Revolution appeared, as well as collections of his historical papers and essays. See Abbot Gasquet, Lord Acton and his Circle (1906).

Adalbert, Sr., the apostle of the Prussians, was chosen Bishop of Prague, his birthplace, in 982, but went off to carry the gospel to the Hungarians, to the Poles, and then to the Prussians, by whom he was murdered in 997.

Adalbert (c. 1000-72), Archbishop of Bremen and Hamburg, and papal legate to the north, extended his spiritual sway over Scandinavia, and carried Christianity to the Wends. In 1063 he became tutor to the young Henry IV., and soon, spite of the opposition of the nobles, ruled over the whole kingdom.

Adam of BREMEN (d. 1075), the Latin historian of the archbishopric of Hamburg.

Adam, ADOLPHE CHARLES (1803-56), musical composer, who was born and died in Paris, the son of the pianist, Louis Adam (1758-1848). His comic opera, the Postillon de Longjumeau (1835), still keeps the stage.

Adam, ALEXANDER, LL.D., the author of Roman Antiquities (1791), was born near Forres, Elginshire, 24th June 1741. The son of a small farmer, in 1757 he came to Edinburgh University, and in 1761 obtained the head-mastership of Watson's Hospital, in 1768 the rectorship of the High School. Scott, Horner, and Jeffrey were among his pupils. He died, 18th December 1809, of apoplexy, his last words being: 'But it grows dark, boys; you may go.'

Adam, JEAN, a Scottish poetess, was born near Greenock in 1710, and died in the Glasgow poorhouse in 1765, after a joyless life, first as schoolmistress, then as hawker. Her Poems (1734), religious effusions in the Tate and Brady style, by no means support the claim advanced for her authorship of 'There's nae Luck about the House,' which, with much more likelihood, is ascribed to Mickle (q.v.). See a long article in Athenæum for 27th January 1877.

Adam, LOUIS. See ADAM, ADOLPHE.

Adam, MME. (JULIETTE LAMBER, born at Verberie, Oise, 4th October 1836) journalist and author, wife of the Senator Edmond Adam (1816-77), assembled round her during the Empire a salon of wits, artists, and advanced politicians, produced stories and books on social and political questions, and in 1879 founded the Nouvelle Revue. In 1895-1905 she published her Mémoires.

Adam, ROBERT, architect, was born at Kirkcaldy in 1728. His father, William Adam of Maryburgh, Fife (1689-1748), was also an architect of no mean repute. After leaving Edinburgh University, Robert proceeded in 1754 to Italy, and thence to Dalmatia, where he made drawings of the ruins of Diocletian's palace at Spalato. On his return to Britain, in 1762, he was appointed architect to the king. In 1768 he was elected member for Kinross-shire. For over twenty-five years, his practice, in partnership with his brother James, was more extensive than that of any other architect. In 1773 the brothers commenced to publish a series of engravings of their chief designs. Robert died in London, 3d March 1792, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. In Edinburgh his principal works are the Register House and the University, which last completed only in 1887. Glasgow owes its Infirmary to him; and London, the Adelphi buildings (so called after the two brothers) and the screen to the Admiralty. See Life by Fitzgerald (1905).—His nephew, the Right Hon. WILLIAM ADAM of Blair-Adam (1751-1839), sat in parliament as a Whig from 1774 till 1811, and in 1816 was appointed chief-commissioner of the Scottish jury court. He was father of JOHN ADAM (1779-1825), Anglo-Indian statesman, of Admiral Sir CHARLES ADAM (1780-1853), and of General Sir FREDERICK ADAM (1781-1853); whilst Sir Charles was father of WILLIAM PATRICK ADAM (1823-81), for six years Liberal 'whip,' and then governor of Madras for the last few months of his life. His son, CHARLES ELPHINSTONE ADAM (b. 1859), was in 1882 made a baronet.

Adamnan, Columba's biographer, was born about 625, of the race of Hy-Neill, in that part of Ulster which now forms Donegal. Educated at the monastic seminary of Clonard, in his 28th year he joined the Columban brotherhood of Iona, of which, in 679, he was chosen abbot, the ninth in succession to his great kinsman, the founder. In 686 he paid a visit to his friend and pupil, Aldrid, king of Northumbria, to procure the release of some Irish captives; and during this visit, and another one two years later, he was converted to the Roman views as to the holding of Easter and the shape of the tonsure. Those views he endeavoured to inculcate in Iona, and also in Ireland, which he twice revisited, in 692 and 697; but he failed, at least in Iona, and it is said that mortification at the failure caused his death, 23d September 704. He left behind him a Latin treatise 'On the Holy Places,' dictated, he says, by Arculfus, a Frankish bishop, who, returning from a pilgrimage, had been wrecked on the Western Isles. It is valuable as one of our earliest descriptions of Palestine. Adamnan's Vision, a professed account of his visit to heaven and hell, is preserved in an Irish MS. of the 12th century, and, with an English translation, was printed in 1870. Whether it was really by Adamnan is open to doubt; but a work that is certainly his, is the Vita Sancti Columbe, his Life of Columba, which, along with miracles and many stories palpably incredible, reveals a great deal of distinct and minute matter concerning the remarkable community of Iona. The standard edition, from an 8th-century codex discovered at Schaffhausen in 1845, is that by Dr Reeves in 1857, which (with an English trans.) forms vol. vi. (1874) of Scottish Historians; a later one is that by Dr Fowler (Oxf. 1895).

Adams, CHARLES FRANCIS, diplomatist (1807-86), the son of John Quincy Adams, was born in Boston, studied at Harvard, and was admitted to the bar in 1828. He served five years in the legislature of Massachusetts; and in 1853, and again in 1860, he was elected to congress for Massachusetts. In 1861-68 he was minister to England, and in 1871-72 was an arbitrator in the 'Alabama' tribunal at Geneva. He published his grandfather's Life and Works (see below).

Adams, FRANCIS (1796-1861), an Aberdeenshire doctor, who translated Paulus Ægineta, Hippocrates, &c.

Adams, JOHN, second president of the United States, was born in Braintree, 10 miles from Boston, 31st October 1735, the son of a farmer, and distinguished himself at Harvard. Admitted to the bar in 1758, he settled at Boston in 1768, and soon had a very large practice. Of strongly colonial sympathies, he declined the post of Advocate-general in the Court of Admiralty, and in 1765 led the protest against the Stamp Act. His health failing, he withdrew in 1771 to Braintree, but in 1774 was sent as a delegate from Massachusetts to the first Continental Congress. He proposed the election of Washington as commander-in-chief, and was the 'colossus of the debate' on the 'Declaration of Independence.' President of the Board of War, and a member of over ninety committees, of twenty-five of which he was chairman, he was kept constantly at work from 4 A.M. to 10 P.M.; but retired from congress in 1777, only to be sent to France and to Holland as commissioner from the new republic. He was one of the commissioners who in 1783 signed the treaty of peace, and in 1785-88 was minister to England. While in London, he published his Defence of the Constitution of the United States (3 vols. 1787). In 1789 he became vice-president of the United States under Washington. They were re-elected in 1792; and in 1796 Adams was chosen president by the Federalists. His administration was noted for fierce disensions among the leaders of that party, especially between Adams and Alexander Hamilton. Defeated on seeking re-election in 1800, Adams retired in chagrin to his home at Quincy, Massachusetts, where he died July 4, 1826. See his Life and Works, edited by C. F. Adams (10 vols. 1850-56), the Life by J. Q. and C. F. Adams (2 vols. 1871), and that by Morse ('American Statesmen' series, 1885).

Adams, JOHN, or ALEXANDER SMITH (c. 1760-1829), a ringleader in the mutiny of the Bounty (1789; see BLOCH), and the only mutineer not murdered in 1794 on Pitcairn Island by the Tahitians, who in return were murdered by the women. He died a most exemplary character.

Adams, JOHN COUCH, astronomer, was born at Laneast, near Lameston, 5th June 1819, from Devonport passed to St John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated as senior wrangler in 1843, and became fellow and mathematical tutor, and in 1858 Lowndean professor of Astronomy. He died 21st January 1892. Soon after taking his degree, he undertook to find out the cause of the irregularities in the motion of Uranus. In November 1845 Leverrier assigned to an unknown planet almost the same place as Adams had done in a paper left with the Astronomer Royal at Greenwich Observatory in October. The Astronomical Society awarded equal honours to both in 1848; and Neptune was actually observed by Galle at Berlin in September 1846. Adams also made important researches as to the secular acceleration of the moon's mean motion, and on the November meteors. See memoir by J. W. L. Glaisher prefixed to his Scientific Papers (1896).

Adams, JOHN QUINCY, son of President John Adams, and himself the sixth president of the United States, was born at Quincy, July 11, 1767, and at fourteen became private secretary to the American envoy at St Petersburg. He was secretary to the commission for peace between the colonies and the mother-country; but in 1785 began to study at Harvard, and was admitted to the bar in 1790. Successively minister to the Hague, London, Lisbon, and Berlin, in 1803 he was elected to the U.S. senate from Massachusetts, and in 1806, boldly denouncing the right of searching ships claimed by the British government, he lost favour with the Federal party and his seat. In 1809 he was minister to St Petersburg; in 1814, a member of a commission to negotiate peace between Great Britain and the United States; in 1815-17 minister at the court of St James's. As secretary of state under President Monroe, he negotiated with Spain the treaty for the acquisition of Florida, and was alleged to be the real author of the 'Monroe Doctrine.' In 1825 Adams was elected president by the House of Representatives—no election having been made by the people. Failing of re-election, he retired to his home at Quincy, depressed, and poor in purse. In 1830 he was elected to the lower house of congress, where he became noted as a promoter of anti-slavery views; and he was returned to each successive congress until his death in the Speaker's room, February 23, 1848. See his Diary (ed. by his son, C. F. Adams, 12 vols. 1874-77), and Lives by Morse (1882) and Stoddart (1887).

Adams, Mrs LEITH. See LAFFAN.

Adams, SAMUEL (1722-1803), American statesman, born at Boston, was lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts 1789-94, and then governor till 1797. His ignorance of military matters led him to think Washington's conduct of the war weak and dilatory. In 1776 he anticipated Napoleon by applying the term, 'a nation of shopkeepers,' to the English. See Life by Wells (3 vols. 1865) and Morse (1884), and his Works edited by H. A. Cushing (1897).

Adams, THOMAS, a Puritan preacher who from 1612 till about 1653 held charges in Bedfordshire, Buckingham, and London. His most notable works are his sermons and his commentary on 2d Peter. Southey called him 'the prose Shakespeare of Puritan theologians.'

Adams, WILLIAM, an English navigator, who was born in 1575 at Gillingham, near Chatham, and who from 1600 till his death in 1620 was resident in Japan, where he was 'in such favour with two emperors as never was any Christian in those parts of the world.' See his Letters in vol. i. of Purchas his Pilgrimes; also the Diary of Richard Cocks (Hakluyt Soc. 1883).

Adams, WILLIAM (1814-48), author of The Shadow of the Cross and other 'sacred allegories,' died at Bonchurch in the Isle of Wight, having been an Oxford tutor and clergyman (1837-42).

Adams, WILLIAM HENRY DAVENPORT (1829-91), compiler of over a hundred different works.

Adanson, MICHEL (1727-1806), botanist, having spent 1748-53 in Senegal, published Histoire Naturelle du Sénégal (1757) and Familles des Plantes (1763), and left an unfinished encyclopædia.

Addington. See SIDMOUTH.

Addison, JOSEPH, born 1st May 1672, was the eldest son of Lancelot Addison (1632-1703), then rector of Milston, in Wiltshire, and from 1683 dean of Lichfield, and was educated at Amesbury, Lichfield, the Charterhouse, and Queen's College and Magdalen, Oxford. In 1693 he began his literary career with a poetical address to Dryden. Next year appeared his Account of the Greatest English Poets, and a translation of the fourth book of the Georgics. Through Charles Montague, Earl of Halifax, he obtained in 1699 a pension of £300, and spent four years in France, Italy, Austria, Germany, and Holland, during which he wrote his Letter to Lord Halifax, and made notes for his Remarks on Italy, and his Dialogue on Medals. The Campaign, a poem celebrating the victory of Blenheim (1704), secured for him a commissionership of Excise. While secretary to the Earl of Sunderland, he produced his opera Rosamond (1706); in 1707 he attended Lord Halifax to Hanover. In 1708-11 he was secretary to Lord Wharton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and here he formed a warm friendship with Swift. Elected to parliament for Malmesbury, he kept the seat for life. He contributed largely to the Tatler, started by his friend Steele in 1709; 41 papers being wholly by Addison, and 34 by him and Steele conjointly. In March 1711 was founded the Spectator, 274 numbers of which (those signed with one of the letters C L I O), were the work of Addison. His fortune was now so much augmented, that in 1711 he was enabled to purchase for £10,000 the estate of Bilton, near Rugby. His tragedy Cato (1713) aroused such vehement party enthusiasm that it kept the stage for thirty-five nights. In the Whig interest, he attacked the Treaty of Utrecht in The Late Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff. After the accession of George I., he became once more, for about a year, secretary to the Earl of Sunderland as lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1715, a suspicion that he was the author of Tickell's translation of the first book of the Iliad, brought him into collision with Pope, who afterwards satirised him in the famous character of Atticus. He also wrote his comedy of The Drummer, which was acted without success at Drury Lane; and, in the Hanoverian cause, issued (1715-16) the Freeholder. He was made a commissioner for trade and the colonies, and in 1716 married Charlotte, Countess of Warwick. In 1717 he was appointed secretary of state, but resigned his post, owing to his failing health, in March 1718. Almost his last literary undertaking was unfortunately a paper-war, on the Peerage Bill of 1719, with his old friend Steele. A sufferer from asthma, and then from dropsy, he died at Holland House, 17th June 1719. As a light essayist, he has no equal in English literature. In the Spectator may be traced the foundations of all that is sound and healthy in modern English thought. Addison's criticism does not aim at being profound, but is distinguished for its sobriety and good sense. His prose style reflects the grace and subtlety of his humour. Cato, written with great elegance and correctness, is wanting in dramatic spirit. See the Life, by Lucy Aikin (1843), and Macaulay's review of it; also Courthope's Addison (1884).

Addison, THOMAS (1798-1860), physician, was born near Newcastle, and graduated in medicine at Edinburgh in 1815. He settled in London, and in 1837 became physician to Guy's Hospital. His chief researches were on pneumonia, phthisis, and especially on the disease of the supra-renal capsules, known as Addison's Disease.

Adelaer ('Eagle'), the honorific title of CORR SIVERTSEN (1622-75), a naval commander, born at Brevig, in Norway, who fought splendidly for Venice against the Turks, and in 1663 was recalled to the service of Denmark.

Adelaide, QUEEN (1792-1849), daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg Meiningen, in 1818 married the Duke of Clarence, who in 1830 succeeded to the English throne as William IV. She was much more worthy than popular. See Memoir by Doran (1861).

Ad'eler, MAX, pseudonym of Charles Heber Clark, a Philadelphia journalist, author of Out of the Hurly Burly (1874), Elbow-room, Random Shots, Fortunate Island, and Captain Bluit (1901).

Ad'elung, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (1732-1806), linguist and lexicographer, was born in Pomerania, and died at Dresden, where, since 1787, he had held the office of chief-librarian. His works include Wörterbuch der Hochdeutschen Mundart (5 vols. 1774-86), and Mithridates (1806), a work on general philology.

Adler, NATHAN MARCUS (1808-90), was born at Hanover in 1808, and educated at Göttingen, Erlangen, and Würzburg. He became chief-rabbi of Oldenburg in 1829, of Hanover in 1830, and of the united congregations of the British empire in 1845.—His son and successor, HERMANS, born in Havover in 1839, graduated B.A. at London in 1859, and Ph.D. at Leipzig two years later. A staunch defender of his co-religionists, he published The Jews in England; Ibn Gabirol, &c. He died 18th July 1911.

Adolphus, JOHN (1768–1845), born in London of German ancestry, was called to the bar in 1807, and became a successful Old Bailey practitioner. His works fill over 20 volumes, the chief a History of George III.'s Reign (1802; new ed. 1840–5). See Life (1871).—His son, JOHN LEYCESTER ADOLPHUS (1795–1862), barrister, inter alia published Letters to Richard Heber (1821), showing Scott to have written the Waverley novels.

Adrian, the name of six popes: Adrian I. (772–95); Adrian II. (867–72); Adrian III. (884–5); Adrian IV. (1154–59); Adrian V. (1276); and Adrian VI. (1522–23). Of these Adrian IV. was an Englishman, the only one that ever sat on the papal chair. Nicolas Breakspear by name, he was born at Langley, near St Albans, became first a lay-brother in the monastery of St Rufus, near Avignon, and in 1137 was elected its abbot. His zeal for strict discipline raised a combination to defame his character, and he had to appear before Eugenius III. at Rome. Here he not only cleared himself, but acquired the esteem of the pope, who appointed him cardinal-bishop of Albano in 1146. In 1154 he was raised to the papal see, one of his early acts being to grant Ireland to Henry II. Adrian was at first on friendly terms with the Emperor Frederick I.; but his high notions of the papal supremacy led to that long contest between popes and Hohenstaufens which ended in the destruction of the dynasty. See Life by Alfred Tarleton (1896).—For the Emperor Adrian, see HADRIAN.

Adye, GEN. SIR JOHN MILLER, G.C.B. (1819–1900), born at Sevenoaks, entered the Artillery in 1836, and served through the Crimean war, the Mutiny, the Egyptian campaign of 1882, &c. See his Recollections of a Military Life (1895).

Ælfred. See ALFRED.

Ælfric (c. 955–1022) called Grammaticus, a writer, was a pupil of Bishop Ethelwold of Winchester, most likely at the Benedictine monastery of Abingdon; and, after ruling the new monastery at Cerne Abbas, became abbot of Ensham. He has been confounded by Wright, Dean Hook, and Freeman with Ælfric, Archbishop of Canterbury (995–1005); and by Wharton and Thorpe with Ælfric, Archbishop of York (1032–1051). His Latin and English grammar and glossary, and his Colloquium, are less important than his eighty Homilies, edited by Thorpe for the Ælfric Society (1844–46).

Ælianus, CLAUDIUS, a native of Præneste, who taught rhetoric in Rome c. 220 A.D., and was styled the 'Sophist.' We have his Varia Historia and De Natura Animalium.

Æmilius Paulus was the consul who fell at Cannæ in 216 B.C. His son, Lucius Æmilius Paulus (or Paullus) Macedonicus, in 168 B.C. was re-elected consul and defeated Perseus, king of Macedon, at Pydna. His son, adopted by Scipio, was known as SCIPIO ÆMILIANUS.

Æneas, the hero of Virgil's Æneid, is represented as a Trojan hero who fled from Troy on its fall, and became the king of the Latins.

Æneas Silvius. See PIUS II.

Æschines, an Athenian orator, second only to Demosthenes, born 389 B.C. Demosthenes advocated strenuous opposition to Philip of Macedon, then pursuing his designs for the subjugation of the several Greek states; while Æschines, as head of the peace-party, was a member of more than one embassy sent by the Athenians to Philip. The result justified the sagacious fears of Demosthenes. But when it was proposed to reward him with a golden crown, Æschines indicted the proposer, Ctesiphon, for bringing forward an illegal proposition. Demosthenes replied in perhaps the greatest of his speeches; and Æschines, defeated, had to leave Athens. He established a school of eloquence in Rhodes, and died at Samos, 314 B.C. The oration against Ctesiphon and two others are all that have come down to us, and have been edited by Franke (Leip. 1860), Weidner (Berl. 1872), Richardson (Boston, 1889), and Gwatkin and Shuckburgh (1890). See Jebb's Attic Orators (2 vols. 1876–80).

Æschylus, the father of Greek tragedy, was born at Eleusis, the town of the Mysteries, near Athens, in 525 B.C. The first attempts at tragedy had been made by Thespis; and there were older contemporaries of Æschylus, with whom he contended successfully. He fought for Athens in the great Persian wars, and was wounded at Marathon. His first victory as a poet was gained in 485 B.C.; and, having won thirteen first prizes in tragic competitions, he was exceedingly hurt at being defeated by Sophocles in 468 B.C. This may have induced him to leave Athens and go to Sicily, where he produced a new edition of his extant Persæ. His trial before the Areopagus on the charge of divulging the Mysteries is also stated as a cause of his departure. His last great victory was won in 458 B.C., with the trilogy which we still possess, and three years later he died at Gela in Sicily. Out of some sixty plays ascribed to him, we have only seven extant, the Suppliants, the Persæ, the Seven against Thebes, the Prometheus Bound (in some ways the perfection of its author's art), and the trilogy of the Oresteia, three plays on the fate of Orestes, comprising the Agamemnon (perhaps the greatest Greek play that has survived), Choephori, and Eumenides. The genius of Æschylus is quite peculiar in Greek literature, and he has no equal. What distinguishes him most from great contemporaries like Pindar, or great successors like Sophocles, is the grandeur of his conceptions in theology, in the providential ruling of the world, the inheritance of sin, and the conflict of rude with purer religion. See Wecklein's text (Berl. 1885) and Sidgwick's (1900), Paley's commentary, and the translations by Potter, Blackie, Plumptre, Campbell, and Way (1906–7); and for special plays, Sidgwick's, R. Browning's, Fitz-Gerald's, and Lord Carnarvon's Agamemnon; Verrall's Septem and Choephori; and Mrs Browning's and Lord Carnarvon's Prometheus.

Æsop, the famous Greek fabulist, who lived in the later half of the 6th century B.C. He is supposed to have been a native of Phrygia and a slave, but to have been afterwards made free. He then visited the court of Croesus, and, gaining his confidence, was sent on several missions, in one of which, to Delphi, he was thrown over a precipice by the priests, infuriated at his witty blasphemies. The traditions of his ugliness and his buffoonery may be dismissed. We know from Aristophanes that fables bearing the name of Æsop were popular at his time; but the only Greek version of them preserved to us is that of Babrius (q.v.). See J. Jacobs' Fables of Æsop (2 vols. 1889).

Ætius, a great Roman general, born about 395 A.D., in Mœsia, in 433 became patrician, consul, and general-in-chief; and as such maintained the empire against the barbarians for twenty years, defeating West Goths, Burgundians, rebellious Gauls, and Franks. His crowning victory was that at Chalons over Attila (q.v.) in 451; three years later the Emperor Valentinian III., jealous of his greatness, stabbed him to death with his own hand.

Afanasief, ALEXANDER NIKOLAIEVITCH (1826-71), folklorist, held a post in a government office at Moscow. His works are on Slavonic mythology and Russian folk-tales.

Affre, DENIS AUGUSTE (1793-1848), from 1840 Archbishop of Paris, was shot in the June insurrection, while bearing a green branch on a barricade. See Life by Cruice (Paris, 1849).

Afzelius, ADAM (1750-1837), Swedish botanist, from 1812 Upsala professor of Materia Medica.

Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ, figures as one of the leaders of the Greeks at the siege of Troy.

Agardh, KARL ADOLF (1785-1859), a Swedish botanist and bishop, his speciality algae.—His son, JAKOB GEORG, born 1813, succeeded him in the chair of Botany (1854-79) at Lund.

Agar-Ellis. See ELLIS.

Agassiz, JEAN LOUIS RODOLPHE, naturalist, was born at Motier, in the Swiss canton of Fribourg, 28th May 1807, and studied at Bienne, Lausanne, Zurich, Heidelberg, and Munich. He graduated in medicine in 1830, his Latin description of the Fishes of Brazil having the year before elicited a warm encomium from Cuvier. In 1831-32 he worked in Paris, and in 1832 accepted a professorship at Neuchâtel. In 1833 he commenced the publication of his Researches on the Fossil Fishes, and in 1836 undertook those studies on the glacial phenomena of the Alps whose fruit was his Études sur les Glaciers (1840) and his Système Glaciaire (1847). In 1839 he published a Natural History of the Fresh-water Fishes of Central Europe. In 1840-44 he and his assistants spent the summers at a station on the Alps, and in the following autumn he visited the Scottish Highlands. In 1846-48 he lectured with success in the principal cities of the United States, and in 1848 was elected to the chair of Natural History at Harvard. He spent the winter of 1850-51 in an expedition to the Florida Reefs. In 1851-52 he taught at Charleston, S.C., and lectured at Washington, before the Smithsonian Institution. In 1855-63 he and his daughters conducted a young ladies' school at Cambridge; he declined chairs at Zurich and Paris, and received the Order of the Legion of Honour. Of his Contributions to the Natural History of the United States, he lived to issue only four of ten 4to vols. To a Museum of Comparative Zoology, established at Harvard in 1858, Agassiz gave all his collections; and four years of incessant work here so undermined his health that he decided upon a trip to Brazil, ultimately transformed into an important scientific expedition, described in A Journey in Brazil. He died at Cambridge, 14th Dec. 1873. See Life and Correspondence, edited by Mrs Agassiz (1886), the monograph by C. F. Holder (1892), and Life, Letters, and Works, by Jules Marcou (1896).—His son, ALEXANDER (1835-1910), born at Neuchâtel, became connected with the Harvard Museum in 1859, amassed a fortune in the copper-mines of Lake Superior, and was curator of the museum in 1873-85. He founded the zoological station at Newport, Rhode Island; and had written works on embryology, and various departments of zoology. [Ag'a-see.]

Ag'atha, Sr, a beautiful Sicilian lady, who rejected the love of the Prefect Quintilianus, and suffered a cruel martyrdom in 251 A.D.

Agath'ocles (361-280 B.C.), Tyrant of Syracuse from 317, for four years fought unsuccessfully with the Carthaginians in Africa. A favourite killed him with a poisoned toothpick. See German Life by R. Schubert (1887).

Agessila'us (444-360 B.C.), king of Sparta from 397, was one of the most brilliant soldiers of antiquity. Called on by the Ionians to assist them against Artaxerxes, he commenced a splendid campaign in Asia; but the Corinthian war recalled him to Greece. At Coronæ (394 B.C.) he defeated the allied forces, and peace was concluded in favour of Sparta (378). Afterwards, in the Theban war, though hard pressed by Pelopidas and Epaminondas, and defeated at Mantinea (362), he bravely defended his country.

Agis IV. of Sparta succeeded in 244 B.C., and, having proposed a redistribution of property, was strangled, 241 B.C.

Agnes, Sr, a beautiful Roman Christian who suffered martyrdom in her thirteenth year under Diocletian. Her symbol is a lamb.

Agnesi, MARIA GAETANA (1718-99), a native of Milan, remarkable alike as linguist, philosopher, mathematician, and theologian, who, when her father was disabled, took his place as professor of Mathematics at Bologna. [An-yay'zee.]

Agnew, SIR ANDREW WIGTOWNSHIRE, seventh baronet of Lochnav, Wigtownshire, was a zealous promoter of Sabbatarianism. His son, namesake, and successor (1818-92), wrote The Hereditary Sheriffs of Galloway (1864; new ed. 1893).

Agoult, MARIE DE FLAVIGNY, COMTESSE D', a French author known under the literary pseudonym of 'Daniel Stern,' was born at Frankfort, 31st December 1805, and educated at a convent in Paris. She married the Comte d'Agoult in 1827, but soon left him for Liszt. To him she bore three daughters, the eldest of whom married Émile Olivier; and the third, first Hans von Bülow, and afterwards Wagner. Her best work is Esquisses morales (1849). She died in Paris, 5th March 1876. [Ah-goo.]

Agri'cola, CNEUS JULIUS, a Roman statesman and soldier, was born at Forum Julii (now Fréjus in Provence), 37 A.D. Having served with distinction in Britain, Asia, and Aquitania, he was in 77 A.D. elected consul, and in 78 proceeded as governor to Britain. He was the first Roman general who effectually subdued the island, and the only one who displayed as much genius in civilising as in conquering the inhabitants. In his last campaign (c. 86 A.D.), his decisive victory over the Caledonians under Galgacus, in the battle of Mons Graupius, established the Roman dominion to some distance north of the Forth. After this campaign, his fleet circumnavigated the coast, for the first time discovering Britain to be an island. The news of Agricola's successes inflamed the jealousy of Domitian, and in 87 A.D. he was recalled. Thenceforth he lived in retirement. The jealousy of the emperor is supposed to have hastened his death (93 A.D.). His Life by his son-in-law Tacitus is one of the choicest specimens of biography in literature.

Agricola, JOHANN (1499-1566), originally called Schmitter or Schneider, also Magister Islebius from his birthplace, Eisleben, was one of the most zealous founders of Protestantism. Having studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, he was sent in 1525 by Luther to Frankfurt, to institute the Protestant worship there; then preached at Eisleben until in 1536 appointed to a chair at Wittenberg, which, however, he had to resign in 1540 for his opposition to Luther in the great Antinomian controversy. He died court-preacher at Berlin. He wrote many theological books, but it is his collection of German proverbs (1528-29) that has assured him a place in German literary history. See Kawerau, Johann Agricola (1881).

Agricola, RUDOLPHUS, the foremost scholar of the 'New Learning' in Germany, was born near Groningen, in Friesland, 23d August 1443. His real name, Roelof Huysmann ('husbandman'), he Latinised into Agricola. From Groningen he passed to Louvain, Paris, and Italy, where, during 1473-80, he attended the lectures of the most celebrated men of his age. In 1483 he established himself in the Palatinate, where he sojourned alternately at Heidelberg and Worms, dividing his time between private studies and public lectures, and enjoying high popularity. He distinguished himself also as a musician and painter. He revisited Italy (1484), and died at Heidelberg, 28th October 1485. Most of his works were collected by Alard of Amsterdam (2 vols. Cologne, 1539). See Tresling's Vita Agricolæ (Gron. 1830), and Bezold's German monograph (Mun. 1884).

Agrippa, CORNELIUS, a cabalistic philosopher, born at Cologne of the noble family of Nettesheim (14th September 1486), was educated at the university there, and early entered the service of the Emperor Maximilian. By him he was sent on a secret mission to Paris (1506), where he joined a theosophic society, and whence he engaged in a madcap expedition to Catalonia. In 1509 he was invited to teach theology at Dôle, in Burgundy. His lectures on Reuchlin's De Verbo Mirifico drew on him the bitter hatred of the monks, and he was obliged to resume a diplomatic career. He was sent, in 1510, by Maximilian to London, where he was Colet's guest. In 1511 he was summoned to join the imperial army in Italy; in 1515 he lectured at Pavia, and was made doctor both of law and medicine. In 1518 he became town-orator at Metz; but in 1520 he was back in Cologne, having roused the hostility of the Inquisition by his defence of a witch. Dominicans and ecclesiastical authorities persecuted him, so that he went to Fribourg in Switzerland, where he started a medical practice. In 1524 he removed to Lyons, as physician to the queen-mother of France; but here his character of occult philosopher, of semi-Lutheran even, soon furnished pretexts for neglect. He could get no salary; and at last, in 1528, he departed to Antwerp, where he was appointed historiographer to Charles V. He now began to publish his works, De Incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum (1530), De Occulta Philosophia (1531-33), and De Nobilitate Feminei Sexus (1532), the last two written more than twenty years earlier. The first displeased both emperor and monks; the second procured him the title of magician. Once more he could get no salary, and was thrown into gaol for debt. Then he retired to Mechlin, and married a third wife, who proved unfaithful; and then, again forced to flee, he set out on the way to Lyons. He had hardly crossed the French border when he was cast into prison for slandering the queen-mother; and though he was soon released, he reached Grenoble only to die (18th February 1535). The monkish fables—of Agrippa's black poodle, of his magic mirror, and of his over-curious pupil, who was rent in pieces by demons—have given place to a just estimate of his character as an earnest searcher after truth, who fain would have unlocked Nature's mysteries had he only held the right key. His complete works appeared at Lyons (2 vols. 1550). See his Life by Henry Morley (2 vols. 1856).

Agrippa, M. VIPSANIUS (63-12 B.C.), a Roman general who commanded Octavian's fleet at Actium (31 B.C.), and did good service in Gaul, Spain, Syria, and Pannonia.

Agrippa I. and II. See HEROD.

Agrippina. (1) The daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of Augustus, married Germanicus, and on his sudden and suspicious death in Asia, carried his ashes with dutiful affection to Rome. The esteem in which she was held by the people made her hateful to Tiberius, and in 30 A.D. he banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she died by voluntary starvation three years later.—(2) Her daughter, AGRIPPINA, one of the vilest of women, was born at Cologne, hence called Colonia Agrippina. She first married Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had a son, afterwards the Emperor Nero. Her third husband was the Emperor Claudius, though her own uncle. She soon persuaded him to adopt as his successor Nero, to the exclusion of Britannicus, his own son by his former wife, Messalina. She then proceeded to poison all his rivals and enemies, and finally the emperor himself. Her ascendancy proving intolerable, Nero put her to death in 59 A.D.

Agüado, ALEXANDER MARIA (1784-1842), a Seville Jew, from 1815 a banker in Paris, who left a fortune of above 60 million francs.

Aguesseau, HENRI FRANÇOIS D' (1668-1751), pronounced by Voltaire the most learned magistrate that France ever possessed, was born at Limoges. A steady defender of the rights of the people and of the Gallican Church, he was three times chancellor of France, in 1717-18, 1720-22, and 1737-50. His works fill 13 vols. 1759-89 (2 vols. 1865). See Lives by Boullée (1849) and Monier (1864). [Ah-ges-so'.]

Agullar, GRACE, was born of Jewish parentage at Hackney, near London, 2d June 1816, and from 1828 lived mostly in Devonshire. She was always delicate, and died 16th September 1847, at Frankfurt, on her way to the baths of Schwalbach. During her lifetime she published The Magic Wreath (1835), Spirit of Judaism (1841), The Jewish Faith (1846), &c.; Home Influence, A Mother's Recompense, The Vale of Cedars, and three other graceful fictions, appeared posthumously. [Properly Ah-gee-lar'.]

Ahab, king of Israel from about 860 to 838 B.C., married Jezebel, a Sidonian princess, and introduced Phœnician elements into Hebrew life and religion.

Ahasuerus. See XERXES.

Ahlquist, AUGUST ENGELBERT (1826-89), Finnish philologist, from 1863 professor of Finnish in the university of Helsingfors.

Ahmed, the name of four sultans of Turkey, of whom Ahmed III. (1703-30) fought with credit against Russia.

Ahmed Shah (c. 1724-73), the first monarch of Afghanistan, served in the bodyguard of Nadir Shah (q.v.), and on his assassination, retired to Afghanistan, whose tribes he induced to revolt and to choose him sovereign. His wealth and military talents made him popular, and he extended his conquests from Khorassan to Sirhind, and from the Oxus to the Indian Sea.

Ahn, JOHANN FRANZ (1796-1865), a German educationist, whose French Grammar for Germans (1834) has gone through more than 200 editions, and was succeeded by similar works on English, Italian, and Dutch.

Aidan, St., the founder of the Northumbrian Church, was sent from Iona in 635, in answer to King Oswald's summons, to become Bishop of Northumbria. He established himself on Lindisfarne, and, making missionary journeys to the mainland, achieved a great work, in spite of the ravages of Penda, the heathen ruler of Mercia. He died at Bamborough, 31st August 651.

Aidé, HAMILTON (1830-1906), English poet and novelist, was born at Paris, the son of an Armenian and of a daughter of Admiral Sir George Collier. He studied at Bonn, served in the British army (1845-52), and then settling down in the New Forest, devoted himself to literature. His poems include Eleonore (1856), and Songs without Music (1882); his novels, Rita (1859), The Marston (1868), Passages in the Life of a Lady (1887), and A Voyage of Discovery (1892). Aikenhead, THOMAS, a student, eighteen years old, who was hanged for blasphemy at Edinburgh, 8th January 1697.

Aikin, JOHN, born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, 15th January 1747, was the son of John Aikin, D.D. (1713-80), tutor from 1757 of Warrington Unitarian Academy. After studying at Edinburgh and London, he took his M.D. at Leyden (1780), and practised in Chester, Warrington, Yarmouth, and London; but in 1798 retired to Stoke-Newington, where he died 7th December 1822. A friend of Priestley, E. Darwin, John Howard, and Southey, he was a voluminous author; his works including Lives of Howard, Selden, and Usher; the General Biography (10 vols. 1799-1815); and the well-known Evenings at Home (6 vols. 1792-95), written in conjunction with his sister, Mrs Barbauld (q.v.).—His daughter, Lucy AIKIN, was born at Warrington, 6th November 1781, and died at Hampstead, 29th January 1864. She was author of Epistles on Women (1810); Memoir of John Aikin, M.D. (1823); Memoirs of the Courts of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. (6 vols. 1818-33); and Life of Addison (1843). See her Memoirs (1864).

Aikman, WILLIAM (1682-1731), portrait-painter, was born at Cairnie, Arbroath. After studying art in Edinburgh and Rome, in 1712 he settled in Edinburgh, and practised portrait-painting with success till 1723, when he was persuaded by the Duke of Argyll to remove to London.

Ailly, PIERRE D', or PETRUS DE ALLIACO (1350-1419), a theologian and Nominalist philosopher, who became Chancellor of the university of Paris, Bishop of Compiègne, cardinal (1411), and papal legate in Germany. At the Council of Constance he headed the reform party, but agreed to the sentence on Huss and Jerome of Prague.

Aimard, GUSTAVE, the French Fenimore Cooper, was born in Paris, 13th September 1818, and shipping as a cabin-boy to America, spent ten years of adventure in Arkansas and Mexico. He travelled also in Spain, Turkey, and the Caucasus; in Paris, served as an officer of the Garde Mobile (1848); organised the Francs-tireurs de la Presse (1870-71); died 20th June 1883. 'Gustave Aimard' was a pen-name, Olivier Gloux his real name.

Ainger, ALFRED (1837-1904), born in London, graduated from Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1860, and in 1866 became reader at the Temple Church, in 1887 a canon of Bristol, and in 1894 Master of the Temple. He is best known as the biographer and editor of Lamb and Hood; he wrote also on Crabbe. See Life and Letters by E. Sichel (1906).

Ainmiller, or AINMÜLLER, MAX EMANUEL (1807-70), a Munich glass-painter.

Ainslie, HEW (1792-1878), poet, was a native of Ayrshire, who in 1809 became clerk in the Register House at Edinburgh, and in 1822 emigrated to America, where he managed breweries. He wrote three or four very fair lyrics and more than a hundred very indifferent ones, and a Pilgrimage to the Land of Burns (1822; new ed. 1892).

Ainsworth, ROBERT (1660-1743), was born at Woodvale, near Manchester, and died in London. His Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary was published in 1736.

Ainsworth, WILLIAM FRANCIS (1807-96), an English physician, geologist, and Eastern traveller, was born at Exeter.

Ainsworth, WILLIAM HARRISON, was born in Manchester, February 4, 1805, and educated at the grammar-school. A solicitor's son, in his seventeenth year he was articled to a solicitor; and on his father's death in 1824, went up to London to complete his legal studies. Two years later, however, he married a publisher's daughter, and himself turned publisher for eighteen months. He had contributed some articles to magazines prior to 1822, so that his first-born was not Sir John Chiverton (1826), an anonymous novel, praised by Scott, but partly, it seems now, the work of a Mr Aston. Anyhow, his earliest hit was Rookwood (1834), with its vivid description of Dick Turpin's ride to York. By 1881 he had published no fewer than thirty-nine novels. Several of these appeared originally in Bentley's Miscellany, Ainsworth's Magazine (1842-54), and the New Monthly, of which he was successively editor; and seven of them were illustrated by Cruikshank—viz. Rookwood, Jack Sheppard (1839), Tower of London (1840), Guy Fawkes (1841), Miser's Daughter (1842), Windsor Castle (1843), and St James's (1844). To these may be added his Crichton (1837), Old St Paul's (1841), and Lancashire Witches (1848), as possessing some intrinsic claim to literary merit. He died at Reigate, January 3, 1882. See Life by Ellis (1910).

Aird, THOMAS, minor poet, was born at Bowden, Roxburghshire, in 1802. In 1816, entering the university of Edinburgh, he there made Carlyle's acquaintance; whilst, as a tutor in Selkirkshire, he often met Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd. He was destined for the church, but, devoting himself to letters, published in 1826 Martouffe, a Tragedy, with other Poems. From 1835 till 1863 Aird edited the Conservative Dumfries Herald; and at Dumfries he died, 25th April 1876. 'The Devil's Dream' is the best known of his Poems, to the fifth edition (1878) of which a Life by J. Wallace is prefixed.

Airy, SIR GEORGE BIDDELL, K.C.B. (1872), Astronomer Royal from 1836 till his retirement in 1881, was born at Alnwick, 27th July 1801. Educated at Hereford, Colchester, and Manchester grammar-school, in 1819 he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected scholar (1822) and fellow (1824), having the year before come out senior wrangler. In 1826 he was appointed Lucasian professor of Mathematics, in 1828 professor of Astronomy. He died 2d Jan. 1892. See Autobiography (1896).

Akbar (i.e. 'the great,' his proper name being Jelal-ed-din-Mohammed), Mogul emperor of India, was born 14th October 1542 at Amarkot during the flight of his father, Humayun, to Persia. Humayun recovered the throne of Delhi in 1555, but died within a year. The young prince at first committed the administration to a regent, Beiram, but in 1560 took the power into his own hands. At this time only a few of the many provinces once subdued by the Mongol invaders were actually subject to the throne of Delhi; in ten or twelve years, Akbar's empire embraced the whole of India north of the Vindhya Mountains. His wisdom, vigour, and humanity are unexampled in the East. He promoted commerce by constructing roads, establishing a uniform system of weights and measures, organising a vigorous police, and adjusting taxation. For a born Mohammedan, his tolerance was wonderful; and Portuguese missionaries from Goa were sent at his request to give him an account of the Christian faith. He even attempted to promulgate a new religion of his own, an eclectic kind of deism or natural religion. Literature received great encouragement. Abul-Fazl, the able minister of Akbar, has left a valuable history of his master's reign, entitled Akbar-nameh. Akbar died 18th October 1605 at Agra, and was buried in a noble mausoleum at Sikandra. See works by Malletson (1890) and Noer (trans. 2 vols. 1890).

À Kempis, THOMAS. See KEMPIS.

Akenside, MARK, poet and physician, was born at Newcastle, 9th November 1721. The son of a butcher, at the age of seven he was accidentally lamed for life in his father's shop. He was destined for the Presbyterian ministry, and in 1739 was sent to study theology at Edinburgh, but soon abandoned it for medicine. He took his M.D. at Leyden in 1744, and practised at Northampton, then at Hampstead, and finally in London. His success as a practitioner was never very great, owing to his haughty and pedantic manner, which Smollett sketches to the life in Peregrine Pickle; but at Leyden he had formed an intimacy with Jeremiah Dyson, and this rich and generous friend allowed him £300 a year. He died in London, June 23, 1770, having nine years earlier been appointed one of the physicians to the queen. He contributed verses to the Gentleman's Magazine as early as 1737; and in 1744 appeared his Pleasures of the Imagination, a didactic poem, begun in his eighteenth year, to which is owing whatever celebrity attaches to his name. In 1772 Dyson published his poems (best ed. by Dyce, with Life, 1834).

Akers, BENJAMIN PAUL, an American sculptor, born near Portland, Maine, 10th July 1825; died at Philadelphia, 21st May 1861.

Aki'ba, BEN JOSEPH, a very influential Jewish rabbi, who studied under Rabbi Eliezer, and had a great share in redacting the oral law or Mishna. He entered heartily into the revolt of Bar-Cochba (q.v.), and, on his overthrow, was put to death with great tortures by the Romans (135 A.D.).

Aksakof, IVAN SERGEYEVITCH (1823-86), a Russian lyricist and publicist, best known as the representative of Pan Slavism.

Alacoque, MARGUERITE MARIE (1647-90), a French nun at Paray-le-Monial, the founder of the devotion of the Sacred Heart. See Lives by Bongaud (7th ed., Paris, 1886), Barry (1859), and Tickell (1890).

Alamanni, LUIGI (1495-1556), an Italian poet, who was born at Florence and died at Amboise, having been employed as a diplomatist by Francis I. and Henry II. of France.

Alarcon, PEDRO ANTONIO DE (1833-91), a Spanish poet, novelist, and Liberal politician.

Alarcon y Mendoza, JUAN RUIZ DE (c. 1580-1639), reputed next amongst Spanish dramatists to Calderon and Lope de Vega, was born of good family in Mexico, and early obtained a post in the council of the Indies at Madrid, where he died. He was neglected for generations save by plagiarists, but restored to his real rank by modern critics. His heroic tragedies are almost as brilliant as his character-comedies. See the collected editions by Hartzenbusch (1848-52) and Garcia Ramon (2 vols. 1884).

Al'aric I., the Visigoth, appears in 394 A.D. as leader of the Gothic auxiliaries of Theodosius. Next year, however, he invaded and ravaged Thrace, Macedon, Thessaly, and Illyria, but was driven out of the Peloponnesus by Stilicho and the troops of the western empire. In 396 he was made governor of Illyria by the eastern emperor Arcadius; in 400 he invaded Upper Italy, but was met and defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia on the Tanarus (402), whereupon he retired to Illyria. Through Stilicho's mediation he concluded a treaty with Honorius, agreeing to join in attacking Arcadius. The projected expedition did not take place, but when Honorius failed to pay the promised subsidy, Alaric invested Rome. Promises again made were again broken, and a second time he besieged Rome. Enraged by further breach of covenant, he advanced on Rome a third time (410), and his troops pillaged the city for six days, Alaric, who was an Arian Christian like his people, forbidding his soldiers to dishonour women or destroy religious buildings. When Alaric quitted Rome, it was only to prosecute the conquest of Sicily; and he seemed likely to become master of all Italy, when in 410 he died at Cosenza, in Calabria, only thirty-four years of age. Legend tells that, to hide his remains from the Romans, they were deposited in the bed of the river Busento, and that the captives who had been employed in the work were put to death.

Alaric II., eighth king of the Visigoths, ruled, from 484 onwards, Gaul south of the Loire, and most of Spain. An Arian, he was attacked, completely routed near Poitiers, and slain by the orthodox Clovis, king of the Franks (507).

Alasco, JOHN. See LASCO.

Al'ava, DON MIGUEL FRANCISCO DE (1771-1843), Spanish general and statesman, served under Wellington, for a time led the anti-absolutist party in the Cortes, and alternately held office or was an exile in England or Belgium.

Alban, ST., a Roman soldier, the protomartyr of Britain, said to have been beheaded at Verulam or St Albans about 303, for sheltering the Christian priest, Amphibalus.

Alba'ni, a Roman family, many members of which, from the accession of Giovanni Francesco Albani as Clement XI. to the papal throne in 1700, filled high positions in the church. It died out in 1852. It was Cardinal Alessandro Albani (1692-1779) who formed the famous art-collection in the Villa Albani. [Al-bal'nee.]

Albani, FRANCESCO (1578-1660), a painter of the Bolognese school, studied, along with Guido Reni, first under Calvaert, and afterwards under Ludovico Caracci. He painted about forty-five altar-pieces; but his bent inclined him more to mythological or pastoral subjects.

Albani, MADAME (née Emma La Jemmesse), vocalist, was born in 1851 at Chambly, Canada, and, trained in music by her father, at twelve made her début at Albany, whence she assumed the professional name of 'Albani.' She studied at Paris and Milan, and in 1870 sung at Messina with a success that has attended her to London and Paris (1872), the United States (1874), St Petersburg (1878), Berlin (1884), &c. In 1878 she married Mr Ernest Gye, eldest son of the director of the Royal Italian Opera, London.

Albanie, COUNT D', the title assumed successively by two brothers, 'John Sobieski Stolberg Stuart' (1795-1872) and 'Charles Edward Stuart' (1799-1880), who were certainly the sons of Lieutenant Thomas Allen, R.N., and who claimed that he was the son of Prince Charles Edward. For their sojourn in the Highlands, their publications, and the younger brother's descendants, see The Bookman for September 1892.

Albany, DUKE OF, the title conferred in 1881 on Prince Leopold (b. 7th April 1853, d. 28th March 1884), the youngest son of Queen Victoria. Studious and delicate, he died at Cannes, having in 1882 married the Princess Hélène Frederica Augusta of Waldeck-Pyrmont (b. 17th February 1861), who bore him a daughter and a son, Leopold (b. 1884; Duke of Saxe-Coburg, 1905).

Albany, LOUISA, COUNTESS OF, was born at Mons, 20th September 1752, the daughter of Prince Gustav Adôlf of Stolberg, who fell in the battle of Leuthen (1757). A bright, merry girl of nineteen, in 1772 she was married to Prince Charles Edward, no longer 'bonny,' and no longer 'young,' but a selfish worn-out sot. No children came of the marriage; and in 1780, to escape from ill-usage, the countess sought refuge in a nunnery. Three years later she obtained a formal separation; and, both before and after her husband's death (1788), she lived with the poet Alfieri (q.v.), and on his death (1803), with a French painter, Fabre. She died 29th January 1824. See works by Von Reumont (2 vols. Berl. 1860) and Vernon Lee (1884).

Albemarle, the English form of Aumale, in Normandy, whose first earl, Odo, received from his brother-in-law, William the Conqueror, the lordship of the Isle of Holderness, in Yorkshire. Both lordship and title reverted by marriage to the royal family in 1269; and four times subsequently was the title of Albemarle conferred on four different persons—e.g. in 1419 on Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and in 1660 on his soi-disant descendant, General Monk (q.v.). It expired with his son in 1688; and in 1696 Arnold Joost van Keppel (1669-1718), a devoted follower of William III., was made Earl of Albemarle. Among his descendants have been William, second earl (1732-54), soldier and diplomatist; George, third earl (1724-72), who captured Havana; and George Thomas Keppel, sixth earl (1799-1891), who fought at Waterloo, and rose to be a general in 1874. Of several works by him, the most interesting is Fifty Years of my Life (1876).

Alberoni, GIULIO, cardinal and statesman, was born at Firenzuola, near Piacenza, 21st May 1664. The son of a poor vine-dresser, he yet was carried by the Duc de Vendôme, as secretary, to France and Spain. In 1713 the Duke of Parma employed him as his agent in Madrid; and quickly gaining the favour of Philip V., in 1714 he became prime-minister of Spain, and in 1717 was made a cardinal. His internal administration was liberal and wise, and he did much to develop the resources of Spain, while he remodelled the army and fleet, and increased the foreign commerce. To gratify the queen, he suddenly invaded Sardinia, in violation of the Peace of Utrecht—an unexpected audacity that made England, France, Austria, and Holland form, in 1719, the 'Quadruple Alliance.' But Alberoni was not dismayed, even when the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean was destroyed by an English one. He patronised the Pretender to annoy England, and the French Protestants to annoy Louis. He sought to unite Peter of Russia and Charles XII. with him, to plunge Austria into a war with the Turks, to stir up an insurrection in Hungary, and to bring about the downfall of the Regent in France. But Philip lost courage, and concluded a treaty, its chief condition the dismissal of the cardinal. He was ordered to leave Spain without delay, and fled to a monastery at Bologna. On the death of the pope in 1721, he repaired to Rome, and took part in the election of Innocent XIII., who, like his two successors, befriended the great exile. Alberoni, however, soon retired to Piacenza, where he died June 16, 1752. See Italian Life by Bersani (1862).

Albert (or ALBRECHT) I. (c. 1250-1308), Duke of Austria, was crowned German king at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1298. He ruled with vigour and success, and reduced his unruly nobles to obedience; but was murdered while crossing the Reuss in a boat, by his own nephew, John, whose claim to the duchy of Swabia he had refused.—Four other Dukes of Austria bore the name of Albert; of whom Albert V. (1397-1439) was elected German king in 1438, and as such was called Albert II.

Albert (1490-1545) in 1513 became Archbishop of Magdeburg, and in 1514 Archbishop and Elector of Mainz.

Albert (1490-1568), last grand-master of the Teutonic Order, and first Duke of Prussia, was a younger son of the Margrave of Anspach. Elected grand-master in 1511, he embraced the Reformation, and, by Luther's advice, declared himself secular Duke of Prussia.

Albert, or ALBRECHT (1559-1621), the Pious, Archduke of Austria, was the third son of the Emperor Maximilian II. Brought up at the Spanish court, in 1577 he was made cardinal, in 1584 Archbishop of Toledo, and during 1594-96 was viceroy of Portugal. He was next appointed Stadtholder of the Netherlands, where he displayed a moderation unwonted among the proud proconsuls of Spain. He relinquished his orders, and in 1598 married the infanta Isabella. In 1599 he was defeated by Maurice of Nassau, and in 1609 made a twelve years' truce with him.

Albert, PRINCE CONSORT, was born at Schloss Rosenau, near Coburg, August 26, 1819, the younger son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, by his first marriage with Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Gotha-Altenburg. After a careful domestic education, the Prince, along with his elder brother, studied at Brussels and Bonn (1836-38), where, in addition to the sciences connected with state-craft, he devoted himself with ardour to natural history and chemistry, and displayed great taste for the fine arts, especially painting and music. Gifted with a handsome figure, he attained expertness in all knightly exercises; whilst by Baron Stockmar, his mentor, he was imbued with a real interest in European politics. Queen Victoria and he met first in 1836, and fell in love like ordinary mortals, though the marriage had long been projected by King Leopold and Baron Stockmar. It was celebrated in London on 10th February 1840, when Prince Albert received the title of Royal Highness and the rank of Field-marshal. The title of Consort of Her Most Gracious Majesty was formally conferred in 1842, and that of Prince Consort in 1857. Notwithstanding his high and favoured position, he abstained, with rare prudence and tact, from undue meddling with state affairs, whilst opening for himself an influential sphere of action in the encouragement and promotion of science and art. The Exhibition of 1851 owed much to his strong interest. As regards continental politics, his ruling idea was that Prussia should be supreme in Germany. Young in years, but worn out by a life of manifold activity, he died of typhoid fever at Windsor Castle, towards the midnight of Saturday, 14th December 1861. See his Life by Sir Theodore Martin (5 vols. 1874-80); Vitzthum's Reminiscences (trans. 1887); also the articles VICTORIA, EDWARD VII.

Albert was the name by which Alexandre Martin (1815-95), socialist, was commonly known. He was conspicuous in the 1848 revolution, an associate of Louis Blanc (q.v.), promoted the Ateliers Nationaux, was a member of the provisional government, and for joining in an emeute was sentenced to imprisonment for life, but pardoned by Louis Napoleon in 1859. He emerged into notoriety again under the Commune of 1871, but soon finally sank into obscurity.

Albert, EDUARD (1841-1900), born at Senftenberg, in Bohemia, became eminent as professor of Surgery latterly at Vienna, as an operator, and as contributing by his surgical writings and clinical methods to the development of his art.

Albert, EUGEN FRANCIS CHARLES D', born at Glasgow in 1864, the son of a French Musician and dancing-master, studied at London and abroad, and became very distinguished as pianist and composer. He composed operas, a suite, a symphony, many songs, and much music for the piano.

Albert, HEINRICH (1604-51), sometimes called Alberti, was a German composer who did much to develop the German lied as we know it, composed many airs, songs, chorales, and hymn-tunes. He was born at Löbenstein, in Saxony, studied at Leipzig, and became organist in Königsberg.

Albert, JOSEPH (1825-86), a German photographer, who was born at Munich and died there, made valuable improvements on the gelatine process in photo-mechanical printing.

Albertus Magnus, COUNT OF BOLLSTADT, the Doctor Universalis of the schoolmen, was born at Lauingen, in Swabia, in 1193, studied at Padua, and, entering the newly-founded Dominican order, taught in the schools of Hildesheim, Ratisbon, and Cologne, where Thomas Aquinas was his pupil. In 1245-54 he lectured at Paris, in 1254 became provincial of the Dominicans in Germany, and in 1260 was named Bishop of Ratisbon. But in 1262 he retired to his convent at Cologne to devote himself to literary pursuits, and there he died in 1250. Of his works (21 vols. fol. 1651) the most notable are the Summa Theologiae and the Summa de Creaturis. Albertus excelled all his contemporaries in the wideness of his learning, and in legend appears as a magician. He was to the best of his ability a faithful follower of Aristotle as presented by Jewish, Arabian, and western commentators, and did more than any one to bring about that union of theology and Aristotelianism which is the basis of scholasti-cism. See works by Sighart (1857; trans. 1876), D'Assailly, Bach, and Weddigen (1881).

Albery, JAMES (1838-89), dramatic author, born in London, author of Two Roses, Forgiven, Oriana, and other plays.

Alboin, king of the Lombards (in Pannonia), succeeded in 561, fought against the Ostrogoths, and slew Hunimond, king of the Gepidae, with his own hand (566), marrying his daughter Rosamond. In 568 he invaded Italy, subdued it to the Tiber, and fixed his residence at Pavia. He was a just ruler; but at a feast at Verona he made his queen drink from her father's skull, and she incited her paramour to murder him (574).

Alboni, MARIETTA (1826-94), a great contralto opera-singer, was born at Cesena, in the Romagna, and died near Versailles.

Albornoz, GIL ALVAREZ CARILLO, born at Cuenca, in Spain, in 1300, became Archbishop of Toledo, but fought against the Moors, and was dubbed a knight. For denouncing Peter the Cruel, he had to flee to Pope Clement VI. at Avignon, who made him a cardinal; and he died papal legate at Bologna in 1367.

Albrecht, ARCHDUKE (1817-95), son of the Archduke Charles, fought under Radetzky in 1849, and as field-marshal commanded in Italy at Custozza, &c., in 1866. He reorganised the Austrian army, and wrote on military subjects. See Life by C. von Duncker (Vienna, 1897).

Albrechtsberger, JOHANN GEORG (1736-1809), Viennese organist, composer, and author of books on musical composition, was Beethoven's teacher.

Albret, JEANNE D'. See JEANNE.

Albuquerque, AFFONSO D', 'the Great,' viceroy of the Indies, was born in 1453, near Lisbon. Appointed viceroy of the new possessions in India, he landed on the Malabar coast in 1503, and conquered Goa, which he made the seat of the Portuguese government, besides Ceylon, the Sunda Isles, Malacca, and (in 1515) the island of Ormuz. He was active, far-seeing, wise, humane, and equitable; but through his enemies at court he was superseded in his office—a blow that gave a severe shock to his shattered health. A few days after, he died at sea near Goa, December 16, 1515. His Commentaries were translated by Birch for the Hakluyt Soc. (4 vols. 1875-84). See the monograph by Morse Stephens ('Rulers of India,' 1891). [Al-boo-ker'ke.]

Alcæus, one of the greatest Greek lyric poets, flourished in Mitylene about 600 B.C. He was the inventor of the Alcaic verse, which Horace, the happiest of his imitators, transplanted into the Latin language. Of the ten books of Alcæus's odes, only fragments remain, which are collected in Bergk's Poetæ Lyrici Græci (4th ed. Leip. 1878).

Alcamenes, a Greek sculptor, the rival of Phidias (q.v.).

Alcester, FREDERICK BEAUCHAMP PAGET SEYMOUR, LORD (1821-95), admiral R.N., was educated at Eton, entered the navy in 1834, served in Burma, in the Baltic against Russia, and in New Zealand, and received his peerage for the bombardment of Alexandria in 1882.

Alcibiades, born at Athens about 450 B.C., lost his father, Clinias, in the battle of Coronea (447), and so was brought up in the house of his kinsman Pericles. Socrates gained great influence over him, but was unable to restrain his love of magnificence and dissipation, especially after his marriage to the wealthy Hipparete. He first bore arms in the expedition against Potidæa (432 B.C.), but took no part in political matters till after the death of the demagogue Cleon, when, jealous of Nicias, he persuaded the Athenians to ally themselves with Argos, Elis, and Mantinea (420) against Sparta. It was at his suggestion that, in 415, they engaged in the Sicilian expedition, of which he was a commander. But while preparations were making, one night all the statues of Heracles in Athens were mutilated. Alcibiades' enemies threw on him the blame of this sacrilege, and after he had set sail, he was recalled to stand his trial. Passing to Lacedæmon, and conforming to Spartan manners, he induced the Lacedæmonians to send assistance to Syracuse, to form an alliance with Persia, and to encourage Ionia and the islands, whither he now went, to revolt against Athens. But the not unjust suspicions of Agis and other Spartans led him to flee to Tissaphernes, the Persian satrap, to whom he soon became indispensable. And now he began to plot the overthrow of democracy in Athens, and secured Persian support for the oligarchical council established in 411, which did not, however, recall him. Thereupon he took the command of the Athenian (democratic) army at Samos, and during the next four years defeated the Spartans at Cynossema, Abydos, and Cyzicus, recovered Chalcedon and Byzantium, and restored to the Athenians the dominion of the sea. He then returned home (407), and was received with general enthusiasm. He was sent back to Asia with a hundred ships; but his own ill-success against Andros, and the defeat of his lieutenant at Notium, enabled his enemies to get him superseded (406). He went into exile in the Thracian Chersonesus, and after the great Spartan victory at Egospotami, he crossed over to Phrygia, on his way to the court of Artaxerxes. By procurement of the Spartans, who knew he was seeking Persian help to enable the Athenians to crush them, the house he lived in was set on fire by a band of assassins, and he died defending himself in 404.

Alciphron (fl. 180 A.D.), a Greek writer of 118 imaginary epistles (ed. by Hercher, Paris, 1873).

Alcman (fl. 620 B.C.) was born at Sardis, in Lydia, but lived, first as a slave, and afterwards as a freedman, in Sparta. The first to write erotic poetry, he composed in the Doric dialect Parthenia, or songs sung by choruses of virgins, bridal-hymns, and verses in praise of love and wine. Of his scanty fragments, which are given in Bergk's Poetæ Lyrici, the most important is a Parthenion, discovered on an Egyptian papyrus at Paris in 1855.

Alcock, SIR RUTHERFORD, K.C.B. (1862), was born in 1809 in London, studied medicine there at King's College, and served on the medical staff of the British Legion of Spain (1833-36). British consul to China (1844), he was in 1855 made consul-general in Japan, and from 1859 to 1865 was minister-plenipotentiary there, then till 1871 envoy to the Chinese government. Among his works are The Capital of the Tycoon (1863) and Art in Japan (1878). He died 2d Nov. 1897.

Alcott, LOUISA MAY (1832-88), daughter of the pedlar-educationist, Amos Bronson Alcott (1799-1888), was born at Germantown, Philadelphia, and died at Concord. Her greatest success, Little Women (2 vols. 1868-69), was one of twenty-eight works. See the father's Life and Philosophy, by Sanborn and Harris (1893); and Louisa's Life, Letters, and Journals, by Cheney (1889).

Alcudia, MANUEL DE GODOY, DUKE OF (1767-1831), a Spanish statesman, Charles IV.'s unprincipled favourite, was born at Badajoz, and died in Paris, having had to quit Spain in 1808. See his untrustworthy Mémoires (8 vols. 1836).

Alcuin (originally Ealhwine), or ALBINUS, the adviser of Charlemagne, was born at York in 725, and educated at the cloister-school, of which in 778 he became master. In 781, returning from Rome, he met Charlemagne at Parma, and on his invitation attached himself to the court at Aix-la-Chapelle. Here he devoted himself first to the education of the royal family itself, and through his influence the court became a school of culture for the hitherto almost barbarous Frankish empire. In 796 he settled at Tours as abbot; and the school here soon became one of the most important in the empire. Till his death here in 804, he still corresponded constantly with Charlemagne. His works comprise poems; works on grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics; theological and ethical treatises; lives of several saints; and over two hundred letters. The best edition is that of Frobenius (Ratisbon, 1777), reprinted in Migne's Patrologia (1851). See monographs by Lorentz (1829), Momier (1864), Werner (1881), West (1892), and Gaskoin (1904); and Mullinger's Schools of Charles the Great (1877).

Aldhelm, Sr (c. 640-709), was educated at Malmesbury and Canterbury, and became abbot of Malmesbury about 673, Bishop of Sherborne in 705. A skilled architect, he built the little church still standing at Bradford in Wiltshire; a great scholar, he wrote Latin treatises, letters, and verses, besides English poems that have perished. His extant works are published in Dr Giles's Patres Eccles. Angl. (Oxford, 1844).

Aldred (also Ealdred or Alred) became abbot of Tavistock (1027), Bishop of Worcester (1044), and Archbishop of York (1060). He undertook several diplomatic missions to the Continent, and was the first English bishop to visit Jerusalem (1058). It has been alleged that he crowned Harold in 1066; he certainly crowned William the Conqueror, and proved a faithful servant to the Norman king. He was active and courageous, but ambitious, greedy, and self-seeking. Aldred died at York, September 11, 1069.

Aldrich, HENRY (1647-1710), born at Westminster, passed in 1662 from Westminster School to Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became a canon in 1682, and dean in 1689. He designed the Peckwater Quadrangle, and wrote the well-known catch, 'Hark, the bonny Christ Church Bells;' but he is less remembered as architect or composer, or even as an inveterate smoker, than as the author of the Artis Logicæ Compendium (1691), of which a new edition appeared in 1862.

Aldrich, THOMAS BAILEY (1836-1907), poet and novelist, was born at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, U.S. While engaged in a New York counting-house, he began to contribute verse to the newspapers, and soon after the publication of The Bells (1855), adopted journalism as a profession. From 1881 to 1890 he was editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

Aldridge, IRA (c. 1805-67), a negro tragedian, born in Senegambia, in 1825 came to Glasgow from New York to study for a missionary career; but next year, forsaking the pulpit for the stage, made his début as 'Othello' in a small London theatre. He played in the provinces till 1852; then on the Continent won a high reputation, which London refused to endorse (1857); and finally died at Lodz, in Poland.

Aldrovandi, ULISSE (1522-1605), naturalist, was born at Bologna, and educated there and at Padua.

Imprisoned at Rome in 1549 as a heretic, he graduated in medicine at the university of his native city (1553), occupied successively its chairs of Botany and Natural History, and established its Botanical Garden in 1567. All his studies and collections were made subservient to his great work on birds, insects, and mollusca (1599-1642).

Aldus Manutius, or ALDO MANUZZI (1450-1515), the Venetian printer after whom are named the Aldine editions of the Greek and Roman classics and of the great Italian writers that for about a hundred years were printed at Venice by himself and his successors (his son, Paolo Manuzio, 1512-74; and his son, Aldus the younger, 1547-97). He was the first to print Greek books. He had beautiful founts of Greek type and Latin type made, and first used italics on a large scale. In all 908 works were issued, of which the rarest and most valuable are those from 1490 to 1497, the Virgil of 1501, and the Rhetores Græci. See French works by Renouard (3d ed. 1834) and Didot (1875; Eng. trans. 3 vols. 1887), and Horatio F. Brown's The Venetian Printing-Press (1891).

Aleardi, ALEARDO, COUNT (1812-78), an Italian poet, who was born and died at Verona.

Alessandri. See ALEXANDRI.

Aleman, MATEO (c. 1550-1610), a Spanish novelist, was born at Seville, and died in Mexico. His great work is Guzman de Alfarache (1599), a novel with a rascal for the hero, which in half-a-dozen years ran through twenty-six editions, or 50,000 copies. [Ah-le-mahn'.]

Alembert. See D'ALEMBERT.

Alençon, title of a ducal family, a branch of the house of Valois, representatives of which fell at Crecy and Agincourt, and held high command at Pavia. Subsequently the title was given to a brother of Charles IX., who fought against the Huguenots, to the grandson of Louis XIV., to a brother of Louis XVI., and to a grandson of Louis-Philippe. [Ah-lon^o-son^o.]

Alesius, ALEXANDER, Reformer, was born in Edinburgh, 23d April 1500, studied at St Andrews, and became a canon there. Won over to the Reformation, he had to flee to the Continent (1532), and, settling at Wittenberg, signed the Augsburg Confession, and gained the friendship of Melancthon. In 1535 he came over to England, and was well received by Cranmer and Cromwell, and lectured for a time on theology at Cambridge; but the persecuting 'Six Articles' compelled him to return to Germany. He was successively appointed to a theological chair in the universities of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Leipzig, where he died 17th March 1565.

Alexander the Great, son of Philip of Macedonia and Olympias, daughter of Neoptolemus of Epirus, was born at Pella, 356 B.C., and was trained by Aristotle in every branch of human learning. He was but sixteen when his father marched against Byzantium, and left him regent in his absence; and he displayed singular courage at the battle of Charonea (338 B.C.). Philip, being appointed generalissimo of the Greeks, was preparing for a war with Persia, when he was assassinated (336 B.C.), and Alexander, not yet twenty years of age, ascended the throne. Having crushed the rebellious Illyrians, and razed Thebes to the ground (to prevent a coalition with Athens), Alexander crossed the Hellespont in 334 B.C., with 80,000 foot and 5000 horse, and obtained a great victory over the Persians at the river

Granicus; whereupon most of the cities of Asia Minor at once opened their gates to him. At a pass near Issus, in Cilicia, he met Darius and his army of 600,000, and utterly defeated him. The family of Darius fell, as well as the treasure, into the hands of the conqueror, who treated them with the greatest magnanimity. Alexander now occupied Damascus, and took and destroyed Tyre, after seven months of incredible exertion (332 B.C.). Thence he marched victoriously through Palestine. Egypt, weary of the Persian yoke, welcomed him as a deliverer; and here he restored native institutions, and founded Alexandria (331 B.C.). After consulting the oracle of Ammon in the Libyan Desert, he again set out to meet Darius, and near Arbela in 331 B.C. won another decisive victory over an army of more than a million men. Darius escaped on horseback. Babylon and Susa, the treasure-houses of the East, opened their gates to Alexander, who also entered in triumph Persepolis, the capital of Persia. Such marvellous successes dazzled his judgment and inflamed his passions. He became a slave to debauchery, and his caprices were as cruel as they were ungrateful. In a fit of drunkenness, and at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian courtesan, he set fire to Persepolis, the wonder of the world, and reduced it to a heap of ashes. Having discovered a conspiracy in which the son of Parmenio was implicated, he put both father and son to death, though Parmenio was innocent. In 329 he overthrew the Scythians on the banks of the Jaxartes; and next year he subdued the whole of Sogdiana, and married Roxana, whom he had taken prisoner. The murder of his foster-brother, Clitus, in a drunken brawl, followed in 327 B.C. In 326 B.C., proceeding to the conquest of India, hitherto known only by name, Alexander crossed the Indus near to the modern Attock, and at the Hydaspes (Jhelum) overthrew Porus, after a bloody contest, in which he lost his charger Bucephalus; thence he marched through the Punjab, establishing Greek colonies. Having hence fought his way to the ocean, he ordered Nearchus to sail to the Persian Gulf, while he himself marched back through Gedrosia (Beluchistan). Of all the troops which had set out with Alexander, little more than a fourth part arrived with him in Persia (325 B.C.). At Susa he married Stateira, the daughter of Darius. At Babylon he was busy with gigantic plans of conquest and civilisation, when he was taken ill after a banquet, and died eleven days later (323 B.C.). His body was deposited in a golden coffin at Alexandria by Ptolemaeus. His empire soon broke up, and was divided amongst his generals (see PROLEMY, SELEUCIDÆ). Alexander was more than a conqueror. He diffused the language and civilisation of Greece; and to him the ancient world owed a vast increase of its knowledge in geography and natural history.

Alexander the Great became the hero of romance, which arose in Egypt about 200 A.D., and, carried through Latin translations to the West, was widely popular in the middle ages, and was worked into poetic form in French and German; see works on this subject by Spiegel (Leip. 1851), Paul Meyer (Paris, 1886), Budge (Camb. 1890), and Steele (1895).

Alexander I. (c. 1078-1124), king of Scotland, the fourth son of Malcolm Canmore, in 1107 succeeded his brother, Edgar, only however to that part of the kingdom north of the Firths of Forth and Clyde (see DAVID I.). He married Sibylla, a natural daughter of Henry I. of England; initiated a diocesan episcopate; and about 1115 had to quell an insurrection of the northern clans.

Alexander II., born at Haddington in 1198, succeeded his father, William the Lion, in 1214. He early displayed that wisdom and strength of character, in virtue of which he holds so high a place in history among Scottish kings. His entering into a league with the English barons against King John drew down upon him and his kingdom the papal excommunication; but two years later the ban was removed, and the liberties of the Scottish Church were even confirmed. On Henry III.'s accession to the English throne, Alexander brought the feuds of the two nations to a temporary close by a treaty of peace (1217), in accordance with which he married Henry's eldest sister, the Princess Joan (1221). The alliance thus established was broken after her death without issue (1238), and the second marriage of Alexander with the daughter of a noble of France. In 1244 Henry marched against Scotland, to compel Alexander's homage; but a peace was concluded without an appeal to arms. In 1249, while engaged in an expedition to wrest the Hebrides from Norway, Alexander died of fever on Kerrera, near Oban.

Alexander III., born in 1241, in 1249 succeeded his father, Alexander II., and in 1251 married the Princess Margaret (1240-75), eldest daughter of Henry III. of England. Very shortly after he had come of age, his energies were summoned to defend his kingdom against the formidable invasion of Haco, king of Norway (1263), whose utter rout at Largs secured to Alexander the allegiance both of the Hebrides and of the Isle of Man. The alliance between Scotland and Norway was strengthened in 1282 by King Eric's marriage to Alexander's only daughter, Margaret (1261-83); the untimely death of their infant daughter, Margaret, commonly designated the Maid of Norway, on her way to take possession of her throne, was the occasion of many calamities to Scotland. During the concluding years of Alexander's reign, the kingdom enjoyed a peace and prosperity which it did not taste again for many generations. His only surviving son died without issue in 1284; and next year Alexander contracted a second marriage with Joleta, daughter of the Count de Dreux. The hopes of the nation were soon after clouded by his untimely death. Riding on a dark night between Burntisland and Kinghorn, he fell with his horse, and was killed on the spot, 12th March 1286. A monument (1887) marks the scene of his death.

Alexander I., Emperor of Russia, was born 23d December 1777. Educated on Rousseau's principles, in 1793 he married Elizabeth of Baden, and in 1801 succeeded his father, the murdered Emperor Paul. Many reforms were at once initiated, as to education, serfdom, press-censorship, and the administration generally. In 1805, joining the coalition against Napoleon, he was present at the battle of Austerlitz, where the allied armies of Austria and Russia were defeated, and retired with the remains of his forces into Russia. Next year he came forward as the ally of Prussia, but in 1807, after the battles of Eylau and Friedland, he was obliged to conclude the peace of Tilsit. In 1808 he declared war on England, and, attacking her ally Sweden, wrested therefrom the province of Finland. In the war of France against Austria in 1809, he took only a lukewarm part; against Turkey he renewed hostilities, which were continued till the peace of Bucharest in 1812. The unnatural alliance of Alexander with France could not, however, be maintained; and though he was not with his troops during the French invasion of Russia (1812), he took an active part in the great struggles of 1813 and 1814. At the occupation of Paris after the downfall of Napoleon in 1814, Alexander was the central figure, and he was received with equal enthusiasm in London. At the Congress of Vienna he laid claim to Poland, but promised to confer on it a constitution. On Napoleon's return from Elba, Alexander urged the energetic renewal of the war; yet on this occasion, too, France owed much to his generosity. At Paris he had met Madame de Krudener (q. v.), who gave a new direction to his mind, and his French ideas gave place to a decided pietism, with sympathies for Protestant and English ways of thinking. The most important political outcome of this period was the Holy Alliance, founded by Alexander, and accepted by all the Christian powers of Europe, except Britain. Many causes contributed to force him into a reactionary course, especially the influence of Metternich; and the revolt in Greece brought his policy into complete opposition to the deepest sympathies of the nation. The death of his only and much-loved natural daughter, the terrible inundation of St Petersburg in 1824, and a Russo-Polish conspiracy against the house of Romanoff, contributed to break the heart of the emperor, who died at Taganrog, 1st December 1825. See Rambaud's Histoire de la Russie (Paris, 1879; Eng. trans. 1879), Sutherland-Edwards' The Romanoffs (1890), and Clarence Ford's Madame de Krudener (1893).

Alexander II., Emperor of Russia, was born April 29, 1818. He was carefully educated by his father, Nicholas I., but was subjected to such a life of manoeuvring, reviewing, and military parade, as at last injured his health. He then travelled through Germany to recruit his energies, and there in 1841 married the Princess Marie (1824-80), daughter of the Grand-duke of Hesse. He succeeded to the throne, March 2, 1855; and a twelvemonth later the Crimean war was terminated by the peace of Paris. The grand achievement of his reign, which was in great measure his own deed, was the emancipation of the serfs—23,000,000 souls—in 1861. Legal and municipal reforms followed; and in 1865 Alexander established elective representative assemblies in the provinces. He resisted strenuously all foreign interference with Polish affairs during the insurrection of 1863, which was suppressed with great severity. During his reign, the Russian empire was widely extended in the Caucasus and in Central Asia. During the Franco-German war of 1870-71, Alexander maintained a sympathetic attitude towards Germany, a policy which was continued in subsequent alliances both with that country and Austria. In 1874 his only daughter Marie married the Duke of Edinburgh (since 1893 Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha). The Czar shared the national sympathy with the Slavonic races under Turkish rule, and took the field with the army during the victorious war between Russia and Turkey in 1877-78. But the most remarkable feature of the second half of his reign was the struggle with the Nihilists. Like his uncle, Alexander I., he was personally a liberal monarch, but his government repressed the revolutionists severely, and they sought vengeance by attacking the Czar and his officers. After at least three attempts on his life, on 13th March 1881 he was so severely injured by a bomb thrown at him near his palace, that he died a few hours after. See French works by Laferté (1882) and Cardonne (1883).

Alexander III., born 10th March 1845, in 1866 married the Princess Dagmar of Denmark. After the death of his father, Alexander II., through fear of assassination he shut himself up in his palace at Gatchina, but was crowned in 1883 with extraordinary magnificence at Moscow. During his reign, Russia steadily pursued her policy of conquest, and of the consolidation of her dominions, the subjugation of the Turkomans in Central Asia being completed by the fall of Merv. In 1885 hostilities with Britain, with regard to the delimiting of the frontier between the Russian territories and Afghanistan, for a time seemed imminent; as regards European affairs, he appeared inclined to break away from the triple alliance between Russia, Germany, and Austria, and to look rather to France. From 1887 there were repeated attempts by the revolutionary party on the life of the emperor, who died, however, at Livadia, 1st November 1894. See a Life by Charles Lowe (1894), and a work by Samson-Himmelstierna (Eng. trans. 1893).

Alexander, the name of eight popes: Alexander I. (109-119); Alexander II. (1061-73), Alexander III. (1159-81); Alexander IV. (1254-61); Alexander V. (1409-10); Alexander VI. (1492-1503); Alexander VII. (1655-67); and Alexander VIII. (1689-91). Of these the most famous, and withal the most infamous, was Alexander VI., who was born Rodrigo de Borja or Borgia (q.v.), in Spain, at Jativa, 1st January 1481. The beautiful Rosa Vanozza bore him five children, two of them Cæsar and Lucretia. In 1455 he was made a cardinal by his uncle, Calixtus III., and in 1492, on the death of Innocent VIII., was elevated to the papal chair, which he had previously secured by flagrant bribery. The long absence of the popes from Italy had weakened their authority and curtailed their revenues. To compensate for this loss, Alexander endeavoured to break the power of the Italian princes, and to appropriate their possessions for the benefit of his own family, employing the most execrable means to gain this end. He died 18th August 1503, most likely of fever, but according to popular tradition, through having accidentally partaken of poisoned wine, intended for ten cardinals, his guests. He apportioned the New World between Spain and Portugal; whilst under his pontificate the censorship of books was introduced, and Savonarola was executed as a heretic. See Bishop Creighton's History of the Popacy, vols. ii. and iii. (1882-87), and a German Life by Höder (1888).

Alexander of HALES, the 'Irrefragable Doctor,' was originally an ecclesiastic in Gloucestershire, but having repaired to the schools of Paris, and become a noted professor of philosophy and theology, he suddenly, in 1222, entered the order of the Franciscans. He continued to lecture, however, till seven years before his death, in 1245. His chief and only authentic work is the ponderous Summa Universæ Theologiæ (best ed., Venice, 1576, 4 vols.).

Alexander, ARCHIBALD, an American divine of Scottish descent, was born in Virginia, 17th April 1772, in 1812 became theological professor at Princeton College, New Jersey, and died there, 22d October 1851.—His eldest son, JAMES WADDELL ALEXANDER (1804-59), was a Presbyterian minister in Virginia, New Jersey, and at New York; and afterwards professor in Princeton Theological Seminary. He contributed to the Princeton Review, wrote over thirty children's books, a life of his father, and miscellaneous works. See his Life by Dr Hall (1860).—JOSEPH ADDISON ALEXANDER, third son (1809-60), graduated at Princeton in 1826, lectured there on Biblical Criticism and Ecclesiastical History, and for the last eight years of his life filled the chair of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History.

Alexander, SIR GEORGE, actor, born at Reading, 19th June 1858, made his professional début at Nottingham in 1879. He has played in Lady Windermere's Fan, The Second Mrs Tanqueray, The Masqueraders, Prisoner of Zenda, &c.

Alexander, SIR JAMES EDWARD (1803-85), an army officer, knighted in 1838, who served in Burma, Portugal, the Crimea, and New Zealand, and published several volumes of travels.

Alexander, WILLIAM. See STIRLING, EARL OF.

Alexander, WILLIAM, LL.D. (1826-94), the editor of the Aberdeen Free Press, and author of Johnny Gibb of Gushetneuk (1871), &c.

Alexander, WILLIAM, D.D., D.C.L. (1824-1911), an eloquent preacher, Bishop of Derry and Raphoe from 1867, and Archbishop of Armagh and Primate from 1896 to 1910, was born at Londonderry, and educated at Tunbridge and Oxford. He married in 1850 Cecil Frances Humphreys (1818-95), writer of graceful poetry, sacred and for children.

Alexander, WILLIAM LINDSAY, D.D. (1808-84), Scottish Congregational divine, born at Leith, removed in 1835 from Liverpool to Edinburgh, and died at Pinkieburn. See Life by Ross (1887).

Alexander Nevski (1218-63), a Russian hero and saint, was the son of the Grand-duke Jaroslav, of Novgorod, and received the surname Nevski for his splendid victory over the Swedes on the Neva (1240), near the site of St Petersburg.

Alexander Severus (205-235 A.D.), Roman emperor, was the cousin and adopted son of Heliogabalus, whom he succeeded in 222. His virtues but made him an object of hatred to the unruly prætorian guards; and, though his first expedition (231-33), against Artaxerxes of Persia, was successful, during one against the Germans an insurrection broke out, headed by Maximinus, in which Alexander was murdered, with his mother, not far from Mainz.

Alexandra. See EDWARD VII.

Alexandri, or ALECSANDRI, VASILIO (1821-96), Roumanian poet and patriot, born at Jassy, was educated and died in Paris.

Alexei, or ALEXIS, called MICHAÏLOVITCH (1629-76), the second Russian czar of the house of Romanoff, succeeded his father, Michael, in 1645. In his two campaigns against the Poles (1654-67), he took Smoleusk, and conquered almost all Lithuania. He also gained a part of the Ukraine; but his war with Sweden (1656-58) was unfortunate. By his second wife he was the father of Peter the Great.

Alexei, called PETROVITCH (1690-1718), the eldest son of Peter the Great, was born at Moscow.

Having opposed the emperor's reforms, he was excluded from the succession, and declared his intention of retiring to a monastery, but escaped to Vienna, and thence to Naples. He was induced to return to Russia, and soon after the accomplices of his flight were punished mercilessly. Alexei was condemned to death, but pardoned, only to die in prison a few days after. By one account he was beheaded in prison. His son became czar, as Peter II.

Alexis, WILIBALD. See HÄRING, GEORG.

Alexius Comnenus (1048-1118), one of the ablest Byzantine emperors, was the nephew of the Emperor Isaac Comnenus, and in 1081 was elevated by his soldiers to the throne. Everywhere he was encompassed with foes. The Scythians and Turks were pouring down from the north and north-east; the fierce Normans were menacing his western provinces; and, in 1096, the myriad warriors of the first crusade burst into his empire on their way to Palestine. His daughter, Anna Comnena (q. v.), wrote his life.

Alfarabi, an Eastern philosopher and encyclopædic writer, born at Farab, across the Oxus, studied at Bagdad, travelled widely, and died at Damascus.

Alfiéri, VITTORIO, COUNT, Italian poet, was born at Asti, in Piedmont, 17th January 1749. His education was very defective, but at fourteen he found himself master of a vast fortune. The chief interest of his youth was a passion for horses, which he retained through life. The years 1767-72 he spent in travelling through Europe, after which, at Turin, he devoted himself to literary pursuits, renouncing idleness and unworthy amours. The applause which his first attempts received encouraged him to win fame as a dramatist, so at a mature age he began to learn Latin, and also to study the Tuscan dialect in Tuscany. At Florence in 1777 he made the acquaintance of the Countess of Albany (q. v.), wife of Prince Charles Edward; and she having quitted her husband in 1780, and been formally separated from him in 1784, from that time onward the two lived together, chiefly in Alsace or Paris, until the Revolution drove them first to England, and next to Florence. Here Alfieri died, 8th October 1803. Their ashes repose in the church of Santa Croce, in Florence, under a beautiful monument by Canova, between the tombs of Michael Angelo and Macchiavelli. Alfieri published twenty-one tragedies, six comedies, and the 'tramelogedia' Abele, a mixture of tragedy and opera. His Opere (22 vols. Pisa, 1805-15) also include an epic in four cantos, an autobiography, many lyrical poems, sixteen satires, &c. See his Life by Centofanti (1842) and Teza (1861), and his Letters, edited by Mazzatini (1890). [Al-fee-ay'ree.]

Alfonso III., 'the Great,' king of Leon, Asturias, and Galicia from 866 till his death in 910, fought over thirty campaigns and gained numerous victories over the Moors, occupied Coimbra, and extended his territory as far as Portugal and Old Castile. His sons conspired against him more than once.

Alfonso X. (1221-84), 'the Astronomer,' or 'the Wise,' king of Leon and Castile, succeeded his father, Ferdinand III., in 1252. His victories over the Moors enabled him to unite Murcia with Castile, and in 1271 he crushed an insurrection headed by his son Philip; but a second rising under another son Sancho in 1282 deprived him of his throne. Alfonso was the founder of a Castilian national literature. He caused the first general history of Spain to be composed in Castilian, as well as a translation of the Old Testament to be made by Toledo Jews. He completed the well-known code of laws, Leyes de las Partidas, and he wrote several long poems, besides works on chemistry and philosophy.

Alfonso V. (1401-58), 'the Magnanimous,' king of Aragon and Navarre, succeeded his father in 1416, and in 1442, after a long contest, made himself king also of Naples and Sicily.

Alfonso I. (1110-85), 'the Conqueror,' earliest king of Portugal, was only two years old at the death of his father, Henry of Burgundy, conqueror and first Count of Portugal, so that the management of affairs fell to his ambitious and dissolute mother, Theresa of Castile. Wrestling the power from her in 1128, he turned his sword against the Moors, defeated them at Ourique, July 25, 1139, and proclaimed himself king on the field of battle. He took Lisbon (1147), and later, all Galicia, Estremadura, and Elvas.

Alfonso VI. (1643-83), king of Portugal, succeeded his father, John IV., in 1656, and in 1667 was forced to surrender both his crown and queen to his brother Pedro.

Alfonso XII. (1857-25th November 1885), king of Spain, after the expulsion of his mother, Isabella II. (1868), was educated at Vienna and in England. On the waning of the Carlist cause he was proclaimed king (December 1874), and, mainly through the talents of his minister, Canovas del Castillo, his reign of eleven years was a time of relative prosperity, enabling his queen, Christina of Austria, quietly to succeed as regent for his posthumous son, Alfonso XIII. (born 17th May 1886).

Alford, HENRY, born in London in 1810, in 1829 entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and having taken a good degree, in 1834 gained a fellowship. Incumbent of Wymeswold, Leicestershire (1835-53), and then of Quebec Chapel, London, in 1857 he became Dean of Canterbury. He died 12th January 1871. Besides 104 articles, some of them contributed to the Contemporary Review, of which he was the first editor (1866-70), he published 48 volumes, among them The School of the Heart and Other Poems (1835), Chapters of the Greek Poets (1841), an annotated Greek Testament (4 vols. 1844-60), and A Plea for the Queen's English (1863). Several of his hymns are widely popular, as 'Come, ye thankful people, come.' See Life by his widow (1873).

Alfred, king of the West Saxons (Wessex), was born at Wantage, Berkshire, in 849, and in 853 was taken to Rome. The fifth and youngest son of King Ethelwolf, he succeeded to the crown in 871, on the death of his brother Ethelred. By that time the Danes had overrun most of England north of the Thames. The victory of Ashdown, won chiefly by Alfred's bravery, just before his accession, gave only a temporary check to their incursions into Wessex; and in that same year the West Saxons fought eight other battles against them. After that, there was some respite, till early in 878, Guthrum, king of the Danes of East Anglia, suddenly burst into Wessex. Alfred could make no effectual resistance, and, seeking refuge in the marshes of Somerset, raised a fort at Athelney. In May he defeated the Danes at Edington, Wiltshire; and by the peace of Wedmore, Guthrum had to receive baptism, and to acknowledge the supremacy of Alfred, who retained the country south of the Thames and most of Mercia, while ceding to the Danes East Anglia and the rest of Mercia. In 884 Alfred sent a fleet against the Danes of East Anglia; in 886 he took and fortified London; and about the same time Northumbria made submission to him—thus he became overlord of all England. On the whole, he enjoyed a much-needed period of peace, till 893, when a fresh swarm of Danes, under Hasting, invaded the country. They were supported by their fellow-countrymen in East Anglia and Northumbria, and for four years gave much trouble. Alfred died 27th October 901, and was buried at Winchester.

As a leader, his great work consisted in repelling the Danes, who at his accession threatened to subdue the whole country, and in helping towards the consolidation of England into a united monarchy. It is absolutely unhistorical to regard him as establishing trial by jury, as having divided England into counties and hundreds, or as the founder of the university of Oxford; as legislator, he simply compiled or collected the best among the enactments of earlier kings. The aim of all his work was practical, to promote the good of his people; and his writings bear the same character of sagacious usefulness. They include translations of Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy, of the Histories of Bede and Orosius, and of the Pastoral Care of Gregory the Great (ed. by Sweet, 1871). See the Lives by Asser (q.v.), Pauli (1851), Conybeare (1900), Besant (1901), Harrison (1901), and Plummer (1902).

Alli, the first convert to Mohammedanism, and fourth calif, was the son of Abu Taleb, the Prophet's uncle. He was the bravest follower of the Prophet, whose daughter Fatima he married. Made calif in 656 A.D., in place of the murdered Othman, he was himself assassinated in 660.

Alli Bey (1728-73) was a Caucasian slave who in 1763 rose to be chief of the Mamelukes in Egypt, slaughtered the other beys in 1766, and was proclaimed sultan in 1768. He made himself independent of the Porte, and had conquered Syria and part of Arabia, when one of his sons-in-law raised an army against him in Egypt, and defeated him. He died a few days after of his wounds or of poison.

Alli Pasha (surnamed Arslan, 'the Lion') was born in 1741 in Albania, and, after a youth of brigandage, murder, and almost incessant warfare, was in 1787 made pasha of Trikala, in 1788 of Janina, and in 1803 governor of Rumili. The ally successively of France and England, he at length deemed his power securely established, but in 1820 was deposed by Sultan Mahmoud.

Alice-Maud-Mary, Grand-duchess of Hesse, was born 25th April 1843, the second daughter of Queen Victoria. In 1862 she married Prince Louis of Hesse (1837-92), who succeeded his uncle as grand-duke in 1877; and she died at Darmstadt, 14th December 1878. Of her daughters one married a prince of Battenberg, one the Grand-duke Sergius of Russia, a third Prince Henry of Prussia, and a fourth the Tsar Nicholas II. of Russia. See her Letters (1884), with memoir.

Allison, ARCHIBALD, born at Edinburgh in 1757, studied at Glasgow University and Balliol College, Oxford; was ordained in 1784; from 1800 to 1831 was an Episcopal minister in Edinburgh; and died 17th May 1839. His Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste (1790) advocate the 'association' theory of the sublime and beautiful, and are written much in the style of Blair, as are also his Sermons (1814-15).—His son, WILLIAM PULTENEY ALISON (1790-1859), was professor of the Institutes of Medicine at Edinburgh from 1822 to 1856.—A younger son was SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, the historian. Born at Kenley, Shropshire, 29th September 1792, he entered Edinburgh University in 1805, and in 1814 was called to the Scottish bar. Within three years he was making £600 a year, which allowed him to form a fine library, and make four continental tours, till, in 1822, he was appointed advocate-depute, an office he held till 1830. He now began to appear as a writer on law, politics, and literature. Appointed sheriff of Lanarkshire in 1834, and in 1852 created a baronet, he died at Possil House, Glasgow, 23d May 1867. His History of Europe during the French Revolution (10 vols. 1833-42) was continued under the title of The History of Europe from the Fall of Napoleon to the Accession of Louis Napoleon (9 vols. 1852-59). He also published Lives of Marlborough and Castlereagh, Principles of the Criminal Law of Scotland (2 vols. 1832-33), &c., besides contributing to Blackwood's Magazine a series of Tory articles. See his Autobiography (2 vols. 1883).—His son, SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, G.C.B. (1826-1907), born at Edinburgh, was educated at Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities, and entered the army in 1846. He served in the Crimean war; the Indian Mutiny, losing his left arm at the relief of Lucknow; the Ashanti expedition; and the Egyptian campaign, leading the Highland brigade at Tel-el-Kebir. Gazetted general in 1880, he retired in 1893. He is author of a treatise On Army Organisation (1869).

Allan, DAVID, a Scottish painter, Wilkie's fore-runner, was born at Alloa in 1744. From 1755 to 1762 he studied at Foulis's Art Academy in Glasgow; and in 1764 the liberality of friends enabled him to go to Rome, where in 1773 he gained the gold medal of St Luke's Academy by his 'Origin of Painting, or the Corinthian Maid drawing the Shadow of her Lover,' now in the National Gallery at Edinburgh. In 1777 Allan came to London, where he painted portraits; in 1780 he removed to Edinburgh, and in 1786 succeeded Runciman at the head of the art academy there. He died at Edinburgh, 6th August 1796.

Allan, SIR HUGH (1810-82), was born at Saltcoats in Ayrshire, settled in 1824 in Canada, where his firm became eminent as shipbuilders, and founded the Allan Line of steamers. He was knighted in 1871.

Allan, SIR WILLIAM, Scottish historical painter, was born at Edinburgh in 1782, and educated at the High School. Apprenticed first to a coach-painter, he studied at the Trustees' Academy, with Wilkie for a fellow-pupil, and subsequently at the schools of the Royal Academy of London. In 1805 he set out for St Petersburg, where he spent nine years, making tours to the south of Russia, the Crimea, Turkey, and Circassia. In 1814 he returned to Edinburgh; in 1826 was elected an A.R.A., in 1835 an R.A.; and in 1838 became president of the Royal Scottish Academy, and on Wilkie's death in 1841 was appointed Limner to Her Majesty for Scotland and knighted. He died in his painting-room, 22d February 1850.

Allard, JEAN FRANÇOIS (1785-1839), a French soldier, adjutant in 1815 to Marshal Brune, after whose assassination he went, by way of Egypt and Persia, to Lahore (1820), where Ranjit Singh made him generalissimo of the Sikh army.

Alleine, JOSEPH, next to Baxter the most widely read of the Puritan writers, was born at Devizes in 1634. He was educated at Lincoln and Corpus Christi colleges, Oxford, and from 1654 till his ejection in 1662 was assistant-minister at Taunton. Thenceforth an itinerant preacher, often fined and imprisoned, he died 17th November 1668, and was buried in the chancel of his old church at Taunton. His Alarm to the Unconverted (1672) is still deservedly read. His interesting Remains appeared in 1674.

Alleine, RICHARD (1611-81) and WILLIAM (1614-77), two Somerset Puritans, brothers, ministers both of them, and both ejected in 1662.

Allen, CHARLES GRANT BLAIRFINDIE (1848-99), born at Kingston in Canada, graduated from Merton College, Oxford, in 1871. After four years at Queen's College, Jamaica, as professor of Logic and principal (1873-77), he returned to England, and, adopting a literary career, published Physiological Aesthetics (1877), Colour Sense, Evolutionist at Large, Darwin, and several clever novels—Babylon, In all Shades, The Woman who Did (1895), An African Millionaire (1897), &c.

Allen, ETHAN (1738-89), born at Litchfield, Connecticut, distinguished himself early in the revolutionary war by the surprise and capture of Fort Ticonderoga (10th May 1775). He next did good service in Montgomery's expedition to Canada, but was taken prisoner, and not exchanged till 1778. He wrote a famous deistical work (1784).

Allen, JAMES LANE, born in Kentucky in 1849, wrote the Kentucky Cardinal, The Choir Invisible, and other novels.

Allen, JOEL ASAPH, an American zoologist, born at Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1838.

Allen, JOHN (1771-1843), born near Edinburgh, took his M.D. there in 1791, travelled with Lord and Lady Holland in France and Spain (1801-5), and was warden of Dulwich College (1811-20), and then its master. He wrote 41 articles for the Edinburgh Review and The Rise of the Royal Prerogative (1830).

Allen, RALPH (1694-1764), the 'Man of Bath,' the friend of Pope, Fielding, and Chatham, made a fortune by his post-office improvements. See his Life and Times by Peach (1895).

Allen, WILLIAM, Cardinal, was born at Rossall, Lancashire, in 1532, and in 1550 was elected fellow of Oriel College, Oxford. In 1556 he became principal of St Mary's Hall, and, Catholic though he was, he retained this office till 1560; nor was it till the following year that he had to seek refuge in Flanders. Even then he stole back home in 1562, that his native air might cure a wasting sickness; but when, in 1565, he landed once more in the Low Countries, it was never to return to England. He received priest's orders at Mechlin, in 1568 founded the English college at Douay, and in 1587 was created a cardinal during his fourth visit to Rome. He never afterwards quitted it, dying there on 16th October 1594. At the time of the Armada, Allen signed, if he did not pen, the Admonition, urging the Catholics to take up arms. See his Letters, with an introduction by Dr Knox (1882).

Alleyn, EDWARD (1566-1626), a famous actor, contemporary with Shakespeare, the munificent founder of Dulwich College. See his Memoirs by Collier (1841), and Young's Dulwich College (2 vols. 1891).

Allibone, SAMUEL AUSTIN, LL.D., bibliographer, was born in Philadelphia, April 17, 1816; in 1879 became head of the Lenox Library, New York; and died at Lucerne, 2d September 1889. His invaluable Dictionary of English Literature (3 vols. 1858-70-71), containing notices of 46,499 authors, has been supplemented by J. Foster Kirk (2 vols. 1891).

Allies, THOMAS WILLIAM (1813-1903), born at Bristol, passed from Eton to Wadham College, Oxford, where he obtained a first class in 1832. He became examining chaplain to Bishop Blomfield, who in 1842 presented him to Launton Rectory, Oxfordshire. In 1850 he joined the Roman communion; and his marriage excluding him from the priestly office, became secretary to the Catholic Schools Committee. His works include The See of Peter (1850), Per Crucem ad Lucem, the Result of a Life (1879), The Throne of the Fisherman (1887), and Monastic Life (1896).

Allingham, WILLIAM, poet, born of English origin at Ballyshannon in Donegal, 19th March 1824, was in the Irish Customs 1846-70; in 1874 succeeded Froude as editor of Fraser's Magazine; and died in London, 18th November 1889. In 1874 he had married Helen Paterson, who, born near Burton-on-Trent, 26th Sept. 1848, entered the schools of the Academy in 1867, and made herself a name by her book-illustrations and water-colours. His complete works (6 vols. 1890) include Day and Night Songs (1855), illustrated by Rossetti and Millais; Laurence Bloomfield in Ireland (1864); and Irish Songs and Poems (1887).

Allman, GEORGE JAMES (1812-98), zoologist, was born at Cork, and from 1844 to 1855 was professor of Botany at Dublin, and then till 1870 of Natural History at Edinburgh. In 1879 he was president of the British Association.

Allsop, THOMAS (1795-1880), a native of Derbyshire, and London stockbroker, the 'helpful friend' of Coleridge and Lamb.

Allsopp, SAMUEL (1780-1838), a member of the great brewing establishment of Allsopp & Sons, Burton-on-Trent, was noted for the charities of his public and private life. The youngest of his three sons, Henry (1811-87), to whom the development of the firm was largely due, represented Worcestershire (1874-80), and in 1880 was created a baronet, in 1886 Lord Hindlip.

Allston, WASHINGTON, American painter, was born at Waccamaw, South Carolina, in 1779; graduated at Harvard in 1800, and came next year to London to study art. In 1803 he went to Paris, and in 1805 on to Rome, where he formed a close intimacy with Thorwaldsen and Coleridge. Elected an A.R.A. in 1819, he had the year before returned finally to America, and fixed his residence at Cambridge Port, near Boston, where he died 9th July 1843. His pictures are very numerous, the best being scriptural subjects. He was author of a poem, The Sylphs of the Seasons (1813), the art-novel, Monaldi (1842), and Lectures on Art (ed. by Dana, 1850). See his Life by Flagg (1893).

Almagro, DIEGO D', a Spanish conquistador, was a founding, born in 1464 or 1475. He had marched on Chili in 1536, and dispersed the Peruvian army before Cuzco, when, on 6th April 1538, he was defeated in a desperate engagement with the Spaniards under Pizarro near Cuzco, and on the 26th was strangled in prison. His half-caste son, Diego, collecting some hundreds of followers, stormed Pizarro's palace, and slew him (1541); then proclaimed himself captain-general of Peru; but, defeated at Chupas (16th Sept. 1542), was executed with forty companions.

Almansur ('the victorious'), the title assumed by the cruel and treacherous calif Abu-Jafar, who succeeded his brother in 754 and died in 775, having founded Bagdad in 764. See Noldeke's Sketches of Eastern History (trans. 1892).

Alma-Tadema, SIR LAWRENCE, a painter of classical subjects, knighted in 1899, was born at Drouryp, Friesland, January 8, 1836, and, destined originally for a doctor, in 1852 entered the Antwerp Academy of Art. In 1873 he settled permanently in England, and in 1876 was elected an A.R.A., in 1879 an R.A. See the illustrated Life by F. G. Stephens (1895).

Almeida, DON FRANCESCO D', a Portuguese viceroy of the Indies, appointed in 1505, and superseded in 1507 by Albuquerque. He was slain in an affray with savages at Saldanha, S. Africa, March 1, 1510.

Almeida-Garrett, JOÃO BAPTISTA DE (1799-1854), a Portuguese poet, dramatist, and prose-writer. See Life by Gomes de Amorim (3 vols. Lisb. 1881-88).

Almohades, a Moslem dynasty in Africa and Spain during the 12th and 13th centuries.

Almoravides (Arabic al-murabithin, 'dedicated to God's service'), an Arab dynasty in Africa and Spain in the 11th and 12th centuries.

Almqvist, KARL JONAS LUDVIG (1793-1866), a Swedish author, was born at Stockholm, and died at Breinen, after a singular career, in which he once had to flee as a forger and a suspected would-be poisoner to America, where he became Abraham Lincoln's secretary.

Aldorfer, ALBRECHT (c. 1480-1538), painter, engraver, and architect, was born and died at Ratisbon. See W. B. Scott's Little Masters (1879), and a German Life by Friedländer (Leip. 1891).

Alten, KARL AUGUST, GRAF VON (1764-1840), a Hanoverian general, who, coming to England in 1803, entered the German Legion, fought through the Peninsular war, and commanded at Quatre-Bras and Waterloo. After his return to Hanover, he became minister of war.

Altenstein, KARL, BARON VON STEIN ZUM (1770-1840), a Prussian statesman.

Althorp, LORD. See SPENCER.

Alunno, NICCOLO, an Umbrian painter, born at Foligno about 1430.

Alured, or ALFRED, of Beverley, an English chronicler whose Annales, coming down to 1129, was published at Oxford in 1716 by Hearne.

Alva (or ALBA), FERDINAND ALVAREZ DE TOLEDO, DUKE OF, Spanish general and statesman, was born in 1508, and gave such proofs of his courage and capacity in the battle of Pavia (1525), in Hungary against the Turks, in Charles V.'s expedition to Tunis and Algiers, and in Provence, that he became general at twenty-six, and commander-in-chief at thirty. His skillful defence of Navarre and Catalonia (1542) gained him his ducal title; and in 1547 he contributed greatly to Charles V.'s victory at Mülberg over the Elector of Saxony. He took part in the unsuccessful expedition against Henry II. of France, who had seized Metz; but was more fortunate in 1555 in Italy against the combined armies of the pope and the French king. After the abdication of Charles V. in 1556, Alva overran the States of the Church, but was obliged by Philip II. to conclude a peace, and restore all his conquests. On the revolt of the Netherlands, Philip sent Alva in 1567 with unlimited power and a large military force; his first step was to establish the 'Bloody Council.' As many as 100,000 artisans, mechanics, merchants, &c. emigrated to England, while others enlisted under the banners of the proscribed Princes of Orange. Alva, infuriated by the defeat of his lieutenant the Duke of Aremberg, sent Counts Egnont and Horn to the block. He afterwards defeated Prince Louis, and compelled William of Orange to retire to Germany; upon which he entered Brussels in triumph, 22d December 1568. The pope presented him with a consecrated hat and sword, as Defender of the Catholic faith; an honour which, hitherto conferred only on crowned heads, increased his insolence to the highest degree. But Holland and Zealand renewed their efforts against him, and succeeded in destroying his fleet, until, recalled by his own desire in 1573, he left the country, in which, as he boasted, he had executed 18,000 men. He had not long accomplished the conquest of Portugal, when he died at Thomar, 12th January 1582.

Alvarado, PEDRO DE (c. 1495-1541), after sharing with Cortes (q.v.) in the conquest of Mexico, was appointed governor of Guatemala.

Alvarez, JOSÉ (1768-1827), a Spanish sculptor. —LUIS ALVAREZ, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid in 1841.

Amadeus (i.e. 'Love-God'), a common name in the house of Savoy. The first to figure much in history was AMADEUS V. (1249-1323). — AMADEUS VIII. (1383-1451) secured the elevation of Savoy into a duchy (1416), and in 1418 Piedmont chose him for its ruler; but in 1434 he retired to a hermitage by the Lake of Geneva. He was elected pope in 1439 as Felix V.; but he resigned the papal chair in 1449, and died at Geneva. — AMADEUS I. OF SPAIN (1845-90), second son of Victor-Emmanuel of Italy, was elected king of Spain in 1870, but, owing to the want of popular sympathy, abdicated in February 1873, and, as Duke of Aosta, returned to Italy.

Amalia, ANNA (1789-1807), Duchess of Saxe-Weimar, was left a widow in 1758, and, as the prudent regent for seventeen years of her son, attracted to Weimar Herder, Goethe, Musæus, and Schiller. The battle of Jena broke her heart. See Life by Bornhak (Berl. 1892).

Amara-Sinha, a celebrated Hindu grammarian, whose date is variously put at 56 B.C., the 5th century A.D., and the 11th century.

Amari, MICHELE, historian and orientalist, was born at Palermo, 7th July 1806, and died at Florence, 16th July 1889, having been an exile during most of 1841-59, next professor of Arabic at Pisa and Florence, and minister of Public Instruction (1862-64). His best-known work is La Guerra del Vespro Siciliano (1841; 9th ed. 1883). [Amari rec.]

Amasis, king of Egypt from 570 to 526 B.C., cultivated the friendship of the Greeks, and greatly promoted the prosperity of Egypt.

Amati, a family of Cremona, violin-makers, whose famous members were Andrea (died c. 1577); his younger brother Nicola (fl. 1568-86); Andrea's two sons, Antonio (fl. 1559-1627) and Geronimo; and the latter's son, Niccolò (1596-1684), the master of Guarneri and Stradivari.

Amberley, VISCOUNT. See RUSSELL.

Amboise, GEORGE D' (1460-1510), cardinal and prime-minister under Louis XII., to secure his election as pope encouraged a schism between the French Church and Rome, and convened a separate council, first at Pisa, then at Milan and Lyons. He left a vast fortune. [Onobwahz'.]

Ambrose, Sr, was born about 340 at Trèves, son of the prefect of Gaul. He studied at Rome, and in 369 was made consular prefect of Upper Italy, which had suffered much from the controversy between Arians and Catholics. His fairness commended him so much to both parties, that on the death of the Bishop of Milan in 374, Ambrose was unanimously called to succeed him. He long refused to accept this dignity, and even left the city; yet he soon returned, was baptised, as hitherto he had been only a catechumen, and was consecrated eight days afterwards. He sold his goods for the poor, and fitted himself for his new office by theological studies. As a bishop, he won universal reverence; but he was severe and stern against wickedness, even in high places. Thus, he repulsed the Emperor Theodosius himself even from the door of the church, on account of his having caused the rebellious Thessalonians to be massacred, excommunicated him, and restored him only after severe penance. His unflinching defiance of the court party enabled him to save the churches in his diocese from the Arian heretics. Ambrose's most valuable legacy to the church is his hymns, and the improvements he introduced into the service—the Ambrosian ritual and the Ambrosian chant. There is a good edition of his works by Ballerini (Milan, 1875-86). The Ambrosian Library at Milan, founded by Cardinal Borromeo in 1609, was named in honour of Milan's patron saint. See Thornton's St Ambrose (1879) and H. de Rostem's St Ambrose (1896).

Amenophis, or AMEN-HOTEP, the name borne by three Egyptian kings of the 18th dynasty, beginning with Amasis I., about 1525 B.C.

Amerigo Vespucci. See VESPUCCI.

Ames, FISHER (1758-1808), American politician, member of congress, and orator.

Ames, JOSEPH (1689-1759), the historian of printing, was a London ironmonger, born at Yarmouth.

Ames (or AMESIUS), WILLIAM (1576-1633), a Puritan theologian, who wrote mostly in Latin, and spent the later half of his life in Holland.

Amherst, JEFFREY, Baron Amherst, was born at Riverhead, Kent, 29th January 1717, and at fourteen entered the army. In 1758 Pitt gave him the command of the expedition against the French in Canada; and Canada was ours by the autumn of 1760, thanks to his prudence and to Wolfe's enthusiasm. This was the great achievement of his life, though in 1772 he became commander-in-chief, and in 1796 a field-marshal, having been raised to the peerage in 1776. He died at Montreal, his Kentish seat, 3d August 1797.—His nephew, WILLIAM PITT AMHERST, Earl Amherst of Arrakan, was born 14th January 1773, and succeeded as second baron in 1797. His embassy to China (1816) failed through his manly refusal to 'koto' to the emperor; but, in spite of that failure, he received in 1823 the governor-generalship of India. For the successful first Burmese war, and for the capture of Bhurtpore, he was rewarded with an earldom in 1826. He returned to England two years later, and died at Knole Park, Kent, 13th March 1857. See monograph by Anne Thackeray Ritchie and Richardson Evans (1894).

Amherst, NICHOLAS (1697-1742), a Whig poet, expelled from St John's College, Oxford (1719), and editor of The Craftsman (1726-37), for which Bolingbroke and Pulteney wrote.

Amiel, HENRI FRÉDÉRIC, born at Geneva 21st September 1821, studied at Berlin (1844-48), and from 1849 till his death, 11th March 1881, was professor at the Academy (University) of Geneva. He published some essays and poems; but his wide culture, critical power, and profound but melancholy speculation were first made known after his death by a selection from his Journal Intime (2 vols. 1882-84; Eng. trans. 1885).

Amiot. See AMYOT.

Ammanati, BARTOLOMEO (1511-92), Florentine architect and sculptor.

Ammiānus Marcellinus (c. 330-390 A.D.), a Roman historian, born of Greek parents at Antioch, after fighting in Gaul, Germany, and the East, settled at Rome, and devoted himself to literature. He wrote in Latin a history of the Roman empire in 31 books, of which only 18 are extant, comprising the years 353-378. This part of his work, however, is the most valuable, as it treats of affairs with which he was contemporary. The best edition is by Gardthausen (1875).

Ammon, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH VON (1766-1850), a rationalist theologian, was professor of Theology at Erlangen and Göttingen.

Ammonius (c. 175-242 A.D.), surnamed SACCAS, because in youth he was a sack-carrier or porter in Alexandria, was the founder of the Neoplatonic philosophy, and teacher of Plotinus.—Another Ammonius was an Alexandrian grammarian, who taught in Constantinople about 400 A.D.—A third was a Neoplatonist at Alexandria in the 5th century, a disciple of Proclus.

Amory, THOMAS (c. 1691-1788), an eccentric author of Irish descent, who was living in Westminster about 1757, seldom stirred out till dark, and was doubtless somewhat insane. His chief works are: Lives of Several Ladies of Great Britain: A History of Antiquities, Productions of Nature, &c. (1755); and the Life of John Bunce (1756-66)—an odd combination of autobiography, fantastic descriptions of scenery, deistical theology, and sentimental rhapsody.

Amos, the peasant prophet of Tekoa, near Bethlehem of Judea, prophesied in the kingdom of Israel against idolatry about 800 B.C.

Ampère, ANDRÉ MARIE, mathematician and physicist (1775-1836), was born at Lyons, and became a teacher in the Polytechnic School of Paris, a professor in the Collège de France, and a member of the Academy. Among his works are Observations Electro-dynamiques (1822) and Théorie des Phénomènes Electro-dynamiques (1830).

—His son, JEAN JACQUES ANTOINE (1800-64), after a spell of foreign travel, lectured on the history of literature at Marseilles, and after 1830 was professor in the Collège de France. He was elected to the Academy in 1847. Ampère was deeply read in German literature, and wrote on China, Persia, India, Egypt, and Nubia. His chief works are his history of French literature before the 12th century (1840), and in the middle ages (1841); his work on the formation of the French language (1841); La Grèce, Rome et Dante (1848); and La Science et les Lettres en Orient (1865). See the Correspondance (1875) of father and son, the work on them by Barthélemy St Hilaire (1869), that on the elder Ampère (whose name is now employed as a unit of electrical measurement) by Valson (1886), and Potton's on the younger (1867).

Amphill, Lord. See RUSSELL, ODO.

Amru, or AMR, Arab soldier, joined the Prophet about 629, distinguished himself during the conquest of Palestine; in 641 took Alexandria for the calif Omar after a fourteen months' siege (that he burnt the famous library is false); and died governor of Egypt in 664.

Amsler, SAMUEL (1791-1849), engraver after Raphael and Thorwaldsen, became in 1829 professor of engraving at Munich.

Amyot, JACQUES (1513-93), born at Melun, died Bishop of Auxerre. He translated Plutarch, &c.

Amyot, JOSEPH (1718-94), born at Tonlon, from 1750 a Jesuit missionary in China, published a Manchu dictionary and a work on China.

Amyraut (or AMYRALDUS), MOSES (1596-1664), professor of Protestant Theology at Saumur, departed from the doctrine of predestination in the direction of 'hypothetical universalism.'

Anacharsis, a witty Scythian prince who travelled widely in quest of knowledge, and visited Athens in the time of Solon. See BARTHELEMY. [A-na-kar'sis.]

Anacreon was born about 550 B.C. at Teos, an Ionian city in Asia Minor. With his fellow-townsmen he emigrated to Abdera, in Thrace, on the approach of the Persians, and lived at the court of Polycrates of Samos, at Athens, and elsewhere, singing in flowery and graceful strains the praises of the muses, of wine, and of love. He left Athens on the fall of the Pisistratids, and seems to have died, eighty-five years old, in Teos, choked by a grape-stone, according to legend. Of the five books of his poems, only a few genuine fragments have been preserved (edited by Bergk, 1854). The elegant Odes, translated by Cowley and Moore, which have given us the word anacreontic, are admittedly of later origin, though scraps of Anacreon's verse may have been worked up in them. They also have been edited by Bergk and by Rose (2d ed. Leip. 1876).

Anastasius, four popes: (I.) 398-401; (II.) 496-498; (III.) 911-913; (IV.) 1130-54.

Anaxagoras, Ionic philosopher, was born at Clazomenæ, in Ionia, 500 B.C., but taught for thirty years at Athens, where he had many illustrious pupils, among whom were Pericles, Euripides, and possibly Socrates. But at last, his explanations of physical phenomena by natural causes exposed him to accusation of impiety, and withdrawing to Lampsacus, on the Hellespont, he died there in 428. He held that all matter existed originally in the condition of atoms; and that order was first produced out of chaos through an infinite intelligence (Gr. nous). The remaining fragments of his works were edited by Schaubach (1827), and by Schorn (1829). See a monograph by Heinze (1890).

Anaximander (611-547 B.C.), Ionic philosopher and successor of Thales, was born at Miletus. He held the principle of the world to be the infinite or indeterminate (to apeiron).

Anaximenes, Ionic philosopher, was born at Miletus, and died about 500 B.C. He held air to be the primary form of matter, whence all things were formed by compression.

Ancelot, JACQUES-ARSENE-POLYCARPE-FRANÇOIS (1794-1854), born at Havre, for a time was librarian under the restoration government. He produced tragedies, comedies, vaudevilles (most of them of small merit), familiar letters, and a work of travel in Russia. He became a member of the Academy in 1841.

Ancillon, JOHN FREDERICK (1767-1837), a member of a Huguenot family, was born in Berlin, and was successively pastor of the French refugees, professor of History in the Military Academy, tutor to the crown-prince, and foreign minister. He wrote many works on history, politics, and literature, which have now no value.

Anckarström. See ANKARSTROM.

Ancre, BARON DE LUSSIGNY, MARSHAL D', originally Concino Concini, was a Florentine who came to the French court in 1600, in the train of Maria de' Medici, the wife of Henry IV. After Henry's death, he became chief favourite of the queen-regent, and was made a marquis, and, in 1614, even marshal of France, though he had never seen war. His prodigality was immense, and he squandered vast sums on the decoration of his palaces. Hated alike by nobility and populace, he was assassinated in the Louvre, 24th April 1617. His wife was executed for influencing the queen by witchcraft.

Ancus Marcius, fourth king of Rome (640-616 B.C.), is said to have conquered the neighbouring Latin tribes, and settled them on the Aventine.

Anderledy, ANTONIUS (1819-92), from 1884 general of the Jesuits, was born at Brieg in Valais, and died at Fiesole.

Andersen, HANS CHRISTIAN, one of the world's great story-tellers, the most widely popular of Danish authors, was born April 2, 1805, at Odense in Fünen. The son of a poor shoemaker, after his father's death he worked in a factory, but his wonderful singing soon procured him friends and patrons. He early displayed a talent for poetry. Hoping to obtain an engagement in the theatre, he found his way to Copenhagen, but was rejected for his lack of education. He next tried to become a singer, but soon found that his physical qualities were quite unfitted for the stage. Generous friends, however, helped him; and application having been made to the king, he was placed at an advanced school. Some of his poems, particularly The Dying Child, had already been favourably received, and he now became better known by his Walk to Amak, a literary satire in the form of a humorous narrative. In 1830 he published the first collected volume of his Poems, and in 1831 a second, under the title of Fantasies and Sketches. A travelling pension granted him by the king in 1833 bore fruit in his Travelling Sketches of a tour in the north of Germany; Agnes and the Mermaid, completed in Switzerland; and The Improvisatore, a series of scenes inspired by Rome and Naples. Soon afterwards he produced O.T. (1836), a novel containing vivid pictures of northern scenery and manners, and Only a Fiddler (1837). Many more works might be mentioned, but it is such short stories as 'The Tin Soldier,' 'The Emperor's New Clothes,' 'The Tinder Box,' and 'The Goshies of Fortune' that have made him a household divinity throughout the nurseries of the civilised world. He died at Copenhagen, 4th August 1875. See his genially egotistic Story of My Life (1855; Eng. trans. 1871), his Correspondence with the Grand-Duke of Saxe-Weimar (Eng. trans. 1891), and Life by Nisbet Bain (1895).

Anderson, ALEXANDER (1845-1909), the 'Surfaceman-poet,' was born at Kirkcoulter, Dumfriesshire, worked for some years as a surfaceman or railway plate-layer, and in 1880 came to Edinburgh to become assistant and then (1905) chief university librarian. He had published Songs of Labour (1873), Songs of the Rail (1877), &c.

Anderson, ELIZABETH GARRETT, M.D., was born in London in 1837, and brought up at Aldeburgh, Suffolk. In 1860 she entered on the study of medicine; owing to opposition to the admission of women, she had difficulty in qualifying, but in 1865 passed the Apothecaries' Hall examination. In 1870 she was made a visiting physician to the East London Hospital, and headed the poll for the London School Board; and the university of Paris conferred on her the degree of M.D. Since her marriage to Mr Anderson in 1871, she has practised regularly as a physician for women and children; and she has been a director and lecturer at several educational institutes for women. A sister of Mrs Fawcett, she has written several papers on professional and social subjects.

Anderson, GEORGE, the compiler, with his brother Peter, of a Guide to the Highlands (1834).

Anderson, JAMES (1662-1728), antiquary and W.S., was born at Edinburgh, and in 1705 published a treatise vindicating the independence of Scotland; thenceforward to the close of his unhappy life, he was employed on his Selectus Diplomatum et Numismatum Scotiæ Thesaurus (1739).

Anderson, JAMES, LL.D. (1739-1808), writer on political economy and agriculture, was born at Hermiston, near Edinburgh; had a farm in Aberdeenshire; invented the 'Scotch plough'; edited The Bee at Edinburgh (1790-93); and settled in London in 1797. His Recreations of Agriculture anticipated Ricardo's theory of rent.

Anderson, JOHN (1726-96), born in Rosneath manse, Dumbartonshire, studied at Glasgow, and from 1756 to 1760 was professor of Oriental Languages, and then of Natural Philosophy. He also established a bi-weekly class for mechanics, and at his death left all he had to found 'Anderson's College in Glasgow.' The author of Institutes of Physics (1786), &c., he also invented the balloon post, and a gun which, in 1791, he presented to the French National Convention.

Anderson, JOHN HENRY (1815-74), a conjurer, known as the 'Wizard of the North.'

Anderson, JOSEPH, LL.D., born at Arbroath, 14th March 1832, was a schoolmaster (1849-60), then an editor at Wick, and in 1869 became keeper of the Edinburgh Antiquarian Museum. He has published Scotland in Early Christian and Pagan Times (4 vols. 1881-86), &c.

Anderson, MARY, actress, was born at Sacramento, California, July 28, 1859, of Catholic parentage, her father a Confederate officer who fell in the civil war. Her début as Juliet at Louisville in 1875 was successful, and she played with increasing popularity in the chief cities of the Union until in 1883 she appeared at the Lyceum in London. In 1890 she married M. Navarro de Viana of New York. See her A Few Memories (1896).

Anderson, RASMUS BJÖRN, born at Albion, Wis., of Norwegian parentage, 12th January 1846, was Scandinavian professor at Wisconsin (1875-84), and in 1885-89 was U.S. minister to Denmark. He has published numerous works on Scandinavian subjects, partly translations.

Anderson, ROBERT, M.D. (1750-1830), editor of the 'British Poets,' for the last forty years of his life lived in Edinburgh.

Anderson, ROBERT (1806-71), American general, served in the Black Hawk war, the Mexican war, and the beginning of the civil war, defending Fort Sumter.

Anderson, WILLIAM (1803-66), a Scottish journalist, compiler of The Scottish Nation (3 vols. 1859-63), &c.

Andersson, KARL JOHAN (1827-67), Swedish explorer, in 1850 joined Francis Galton in a journey to the territory of the Damaras, and in 1853-54 continued the exploration alone, publishing, on his return to England, Lake Ngami, or Discoveries in South Africa (1856). In 1858 he explored the Okavango, in 1866 set out for the Cunene. He came within sight of the stream, but had to retrace his steps, and died on the homeward journey.

Andral, GABRIEL (1797-1876), physician and pathologist, was born in Paris.

Andrassy, JULIUS, COUNT (1823-90), Hungarian exile 1850-60, and foreign minister 1871-79.

André, JOHN, British officer, was born in London in 1751 of French-Swiss descent; took over his father's business; but in 1774 joined the army in Canada, and became aide-de-camp to Sir Henry Clinton, and adjutant-general. When in 1780 Benedict Arnold (q.v.) obtained the command of West Point, André was selected to make the arrangements for its betrayal. Arnold and André met on September 20 near Haverstraw on the Hudson; then André began his dangerous journey to New York. As he was nearing the British lines he fell into the hands of an armed band of colonials, who delivered him to the American military authorities. The papers found on him proved him a spy; a military board convened by Washington declared that 'agreeably to the laws and usages of nations he ought to suffer death;' and Major André was hanged at Tappanstown, 2d Oct. 1780. In 1821 his remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey. See Life by Sargent (1861) and Lossing's Two Spies (1886).

Andrä, JOHANN VALENTIN (1586-1654), was born near Tübingen, and died at Stuttgart, the Protestant court-chaplain. He was long regarded as the founder or restorer of the Rosicrucians, a view based on his quaint Chymische Hochzeit Christiani Rosenkreuz (1616). Other works by him are Menippus sive Satyricorum Dialogorum Centuria (1617) and Geistliche Kurzweil (1619). See Life by Glöckler (Stuttg. 1886).

Andrea del Sarto. See SARTO.

Andree, SALOMON AUGUST, Swedish engineer, born 18th Oct. 1854, was examiner-in-chief of the Patent Office, when in 1896 he undertook a balloon voyage to the North Pole. With two others, he started from Danes' Island on 11th July 1897. See Laclambre, Andree and his Balloon (1898).

Androëssy, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, COUNT (1761-1828), French Napoleonic general and diplomatist.

Andrew, JOHN ALBION (1818-67), American anti-slavery statesman, four times governor of Mass.

Andrewes, LANCELOT, a great English prelate, was born at Barking in 1555, and educated at Ratcliffe, Merchant Taylors' School, and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which he was in 1576 elected fellow. Taking orders in 1580, he accompanied the Earl of Huntingdon to the north; and in 1589, through Walsingham's influence, he was appointed a prebendary of St Paul's and Master of Pembroke Hall. In 1597 Elizabeth made him a prebendary, and in 1601 dean, of Westminster. He rose still higher in favour with King James, who appreciated his learning and peculiar oratory. He attended the Hampton Court Conference, and took part in the translation of the Bible. In 1605 he was consecrated Bishop of Chichester; in 1609 he was translated to Ely, and in 1618 to Winchester, having the year before accompanied the king to Scotland as one of the royal instruments for persuading the Scotch of the superiority of episcopacy over presbytery. He died 27th September 1626. A zealous High Churchman, Andrews was, with the exception of Usher, the most learned English theologian of his time. His principal works published during his life were two treatises in reply to Cardinal Bellarmine, in defence of the right of princes over ecclesiastical assemblies. His other works consist of sermons, lectures, and manuals of devotion; and the whole fill 8 vols. of the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (1841-54). See Lives by Russell (1863), Otley (1894), and Lady Mary Wood (1898).

Andrews, THOMAS, physicist, was born in Belfast, 19th December 1813, and studied chemistry and medicine at Glasgow, Paris, Edinburgh, and Dublin. He practised as a physician at Belfast, where from 1849 to 1879 he was professor of Chemistry. He died 26th November 1885. See his Scientific Papers, edited, with a memoir, by Profs. Tait and Crum Brown (1889).

Andrioux, FRANÇOIS GUILLAUME JEAN STANISLAUS (1759-1833), a French scholar and dramatist, born at Strasburg.

Androclus, a Roman slave of the 1st century, the hero of the well-known story of the lion.

Andronicus of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, who lived at Rome in Cicero's time.—Another Greek and Aristotelian, ANDRONICUS CALLISTOS, was professor in Italy in the 15th c.

Andronicus, the name of four Byzantine emperors.—ANDRONICUS I., Comnenus, grandson of Alexius I., in his youth served against the Turks, was imprisoned for treason for twelve years, but escaped to Russia. Pardon and employed again, he fell once more into disfavour; and after his scandalous seduction of Theodora, the widow of Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, he settled among the Turks in Asia Minor, with a band of outlaws. After the death of Manuel in 1182, he was recalled to become, first guardian, then colleague, of the young Emperor Alexius II. Soon after, he caused the empress-mother to be strangled, and then Alexius himself, marrying his youthful widow. His reign was vigorous, and restored prosperity to the provinces; but tyranny and murder were its characteristics in the capital. And in 1185 the last emperor of his race was put to death by the infuriated populace.—ANDRONICUS II., second of the Paleologi (1283-1328), withdrew from the negotiations for the union of the Greek and Roman communions, and restored the Greek ritual in full. He and the empire suffered much from Spanish mercenaries, hired for the wars with the Turks.—His grandson, ANDRONICUS III. (1328-41), excluded from the succession for the murder of his brother, compelled his grandfather to make him his colleague in the empire and then to abdicate. Meanwhile the Turks occupied the southern shores of the Bosphorus, and the Servians conquered Bulgaria, Epirus, and Macedonia.—ANDRONICUS IV. leagued himself with the Turks to dethrone his father, John V. (son of Andronicus III.), but was blinded and imprisoned, escaped in 1376, and took possession of the capital. Ultimately he made a treaty with his father, and died in 1385.

Andronicus, LIVIUS. See LIVIVS ANDRONICUS.
Aneurin, a Welsh poet, whose principal work, the Gododin, celebrates the British heroes who fell in conflict with the Saxons in the bloody battle of Catterath, now usually identified with the battle the Saxons called Degastan (Dawstane in Liddesdale?), and fought in 603 A.D. See the editions and translations by Williams ab Ithel (1852), Skene (in The Four Ancient Books of Wales, 1866), and T. Stephens (1885).

Angas, GEORGE FIFE (1789-1879), a founder of South Australia after 1851, was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and died at Adelaide. See Life by Hodder (1891).

Angelico, FRA, the name by which we best know the great friar-painter, Guido di Pietri, whose monastic name was Giovanni (from his monastery called Giovanni da Fiesole), was born in 1387 at Vicchio in Tuscany. In 1407 he entered the Dominican monastery at Fiesole, in 1436 he was transferred to Florence, and in 1445 was summoned by the pope to Rome, where thenceforward he chiefly resided till his death, 18th March 1455. His most important frescoes are those in the Florentine convent of San Marco (now a museum), at Orvieto, and in the Nicholas Chapel of the Vatican. Others were painted at Cortona and Fiesole. Of his easel pictures, the Louvre possesses a splendid example, 'The Coronation of the Virgin,' and the London National Gallery (since 1860) a 'Glory,' or Christ with 265 saints—both of which were originally at Fiesole. There are fine examples of his art in the Uffizi at Florence. Fra Angelico's constant aim is to arouse devotional feeling through the contemplation of unearthly loveliness; the ethereal beauty of his angelic figures gave him his new name. Ruskin says of him that 'by purity of life, habitual elevation of thought, and natural sweetness of disposition, he was enabled to express the sacred affections upon the human countenance as no one ever did before or since. . . . His art is always childish, but beautiful in its childishness.' He was beatified after his death. See works by Miss Phillimore (1881) and Langton Douglas (1900).

Angelo, a celebrated fencing and riding master, whose full name was Dominico Angelo Malevolti Tremamondo. He was born at Leghorn in 1717; came to England from Paris with Peg Woffington about the middle of the century, at one time was making over £2000 a year, and died at Eton, July 1, 1802.—His son, HENRY ANGELO, also a great fencing-master, was born in London in 1760, was educated at Eton, and died apparently in 1839, having published two volumes of his Reminiscences (1828-30), full of curious matter as to Gainsborough, Byron, &c.

Angelo, MICHAEL. See MICHELANGELO.

Angelus Silesius, properly JOHANN SCHEFFLER (1624-77), philosophical poet, born at Breslau, was a Protestant physician who became a Catholic priest. See Life by Seltmann (1896).

Angerstein, JOHN JULIUS (1735-1823), a London underwriter of Russian origin, whose thirty-eight pictures, bought in 1824 for £57,000, formed the nucleus of the National Gallery.

Angerville. See AUNORVILLE.

Anglesey, HENRY WILLIAM PAGET, MARQUIS OF, born in London, May 17, 1768, from Westminster passed to Christ Church, Oxford, sat in parliament off and on from 1790 to 1810; and in 1812 succeeded his father as Earl of Uxbridge. He served in the army with distinction in Flanders (1794), Holland (1799), and the Peninsular war (1808); and for his splendid services as commander of the British cavalry at Waterloo, where he lost a leg, he was made Marquis of Anglesey. In 1828 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, advocated Catholic emancipation, and was recalled by Wellington in 1829. In 1830-33 he held the same office under Lord Grey's administration; but lost his popularity through coercive measures against O'Connell. To him Ireland is indebted for the Board of Education. In 1846-52, now field-marshal, he was Master-general of the Ordnance. He died April 29, 1854.

Angoulême, LOUIS ANTOINE DE BOURBON, DUC D' (1775-1844), eldest son of Charles X. of France. He retired from France along with his father after the Revolution, and lived in various places, including Holyrood. In 1799 he married his cousin, Marie Thérèse (1778-1851), only daughter of Louis XVI., 'the only man in the family,' in the words of Napoleon. After the Restoration, he made a feeble effort, as lieutenant-general of France, to oppose Napoleon on his return from Elba; and in 1823 he led the French army of invasion into Spain. On the revolution in July 1830, he accompanied his father into exile, and died at Görz. See Imbert de Saint-Amand, La duchesse d'Angoulême (1887; Eng. trans. 1892).

Angström, ANDERS JONAS (1814-74), physicist, was successively privat-docent (1839), keeper of the observatory (1843), and professor of Physics (1858) in the university of Upsala, and from 1867 till his death he was secretary to the Royal Society. His works embrace the subjects of heat, magnetism, and especially optics.

Anjou, DUKE OF. See HENRY II.

Ankarström, JOHAN JAKOB (1762-92), the assassin of Gustavus III. of Sweden, was a page at court, served in the bodyguard, but after settling on his estates (1783), was tried for treason, though released for want of evidence. Soon after he formed a plot with a ring of discontented nobles to murder Gustavus, and, the lot falling on him, wounded the king mortally with a pistol at a masked ball. He was publicly flogged for three days, and then executed.

Anna, or ANNE, ST. wife of St Joachim, and mother of the Virgin Mary, is first mentioned by St Epiphanius, in the 4th century. She is the patron-saint of carpenters.

Anna Carlovna (1718-46), niece of the Empress Anna Ivanovna (q.v.), and wife of a Duke of Brunswick, was regent during the one year's reign (1740-41) of her infant son Ivan. He was murdered, and she herself died in prison.

Anna Comnena (1083-1148), a learned Byzantine princess, was the daughter of the Emperor Alexius I. (Comnens). She tried in vain to secure the imperial crown, and failed in her attempt to overthrow or poison her brother (1118), her husband Bryennios being either too timid or too virtuous to back her. Disappointed and ashamed, she withdrew from the court, and sought solace in literature. On the death of her husband (1137), she retired into a convent. Her life of her father (ed. by Schopen and Reifferscheid, 2 vols. 1839-78), though a rhetorical panegyric, is one of the better class of Byzantine histories. See Oster's Anna Comnena (1868-71).

Anna Ivanovna (1693-1740), Empress of Russia, was the second daughter of Ivan, elder brother of Peter the Great. She married in 1710 the Duke of Courland, who died next year. The throne of Russia was bestowed on her by the Supreme Council in 1730, on her accepting constitutional limitations. But she soon declared herself autocrat; her paramour, Biron (q.v.), established a reign of terror, and is said to have banished 20,000 persons to Siberia.

Anne, the last Stuart sovereign, was born at St James's Palace, London, 6th February 1665. She was the second daughter of James II. (then Duke of York), by his first wife, Anne Hyde, the daughter of Clarendon. Her mother died in 1671, and in 1672 her father joined the Church of Rome; but his daughters were brought up members of the Church of England, to which Anne always retained an ardent if not a very enlightened attachment. In 1683 she was married to the indolent and good-natured Prince George of Denmark (1653-1708), when Sarah Jennings (1660-1744), the wife of Lord Churchill (afterwards Duke of Marlborough), was appointed a lady of her bed-chamber. As the queen needed some one on whom she could lean, Lady Churchill speedily acquired supreme influence over her, which she exerted in favour of her husband. In their correspondence, Anne went by the name of Mrs Morley, and Lady Churchill by that of Mrs Freeman. During her father's reign, Anne lived in retirement, taking no part in politics. On the landing of the Prince of Orange, she soon joined his party; but quarrelled presently with her sister, and by 1692 was drawn into intrigues, in which the Churchills were engaged, for the restoration of her father, or to secure the succession to his son. She was herself childless when, on the death of William III., on 8th March 1702, she succeeded to the throne. She had borne, indeed, seventeen children; but one only, William, Duke of Gloucester (1689-1700), survived infancy. The influence of Marlborough and his wife was most powerfully felt in all public affairs during the greater part of her reign, the chief event of which was the union of England and Scotland (1707). The strife of parties was extremely violent, and political complications were increased by the queen's anxiety to secure the succession for her brother. In so far as she had any political principles, they were opposed to that constitutional liberty to which she owed her occupancy of the throne. These principles and her family attachment tended to alienate her from the Marlboroughs, whose policy, from the time of her accession, had become adverse to Jacobitism, and who now, along with Godolphin, were at the head of the Whig party. The duchess also offended the queen by presuming too boldly upon the power she had so long possessed. In 1710 they parted, never to meet again. Anne had found a new favourite in Abigail Masham, a cousin of the duchess, who herself, about 1704, had introduced her into the royal household. To Mrs Masham's influence the change of government in 1710 was in great measure owing, when the Tories came into office, Harley (afterwards Earl of Oxford) and St John (Lord Bolingbroke) becoming the leaders of the ministry. But, although concurring more or less in a design to secure the succession of the throne to her brother, the new ministers had quarrels among themselves which prevented its successful prosecution, and kept the poor queen in a state of constant unrest. She died 1st August 1714. See works by Miss Strickland (1848), J. H. Burton (1880), Mrs Oliphant (1895), M'Carthy (1902), H. Paul (1907).

Anne Boleyn. See BOLEYN.

Anne of AUSTRIA (1601-66), eldest daughter of Philip III. of Spain, in 1615 became the wife of Louis XIII. of France. The marriage was so far from being a happy one, that the royal pair lived for the first twenty-two years in a state of virtual separation—a result due chiefly to the influence of Cardinal Richelieu. On the death of the king in 1643, Anne became queen-regent for the four-year-old Louis XIV., choosing as her minister Cardinal Mazarin (q.v.), after whose death in 1661 she retired to the convent of Val de Grace. See works by M. W. Freer (1866) and Chéruel (Paris, 1879-80).

ANNE OF BOHEMIA (1366-94), in 1382 married Richard II. (q.v.).

ANNE OF BRITTANY (1476-1514), wife of Charles VIII. and Louis XII. of France, was an admirable Duchess of Brittany, her hereditary dominion.

ANNE OF CLEVELS (1515-57), a Lutheran princess, plain of feature, who in 1540 married, as his fourth queen, Henry VIII., a marriage declared null and void six months afterwards.

ANNE OF DENMARK (1574-1619) in 1589 married James VI. of Scotland, the future James I. (q.v.).

ANNESLEY, JAMES (1715-60), the son of Lord Altham, shipped off for twelve years to America by his uncle, Lord Anglesey. See Charles Reade's Wandering Heir (1875).

ANQUETIL, LOUIS PIERRE (1723-1806), historian of France.—His brother, ABRAHAM HYACINTHE ANQUETIL-DUPERRON (1731-1805), orientalist, translated the Zend-avesta (1771).

ANSDELL, RICHARD, animal and landscape painter, was born at Liverpool in 1815, and died at Farnborough, 20th April 1885, having been elected A.R.A. in 1861, and R.A. in 1870.

Anselm, St. Archbishop of Canterbury, was nobly born at or near Aosta, in Piedmont, in 1033. At fifteen he ardently desired to embrace the monastic life, but his father refused his consent; and about 1056, his mother being dead, he left home, and, after three years in Burgundy and France, was attracted by Lanfranc's fame to the abbey of Bec, in Normandy. In 1063 he succeeded his master as prior, and in 1078 became abbot of Bec, the most famous school of the 11th century. Lanfranc, who had meantime become Archbishop of Canterbury, died in 1089; and the diocese remained four years vacant till in 1093 Anselm was appointed. He was distinguished both as a churchman and a philosopher. His numerous embroilments with William Rufus and his successor, and the unbending spirit which he displayed, indicate the vigour and resoluteness of his character, as much as his writings exhibit the depth and acuteness of his intellect. Exiled by Rufus, Anselm returned at Henry's urgent request; but the new monarch's demand that he should renew his homage, and be again invested with his archbishopric, was met with an absolute refusal, and led to a second exile of two years' duration. In 1105, however, Anselm's threat of excommunication led to a reconciliation, and the compromise was devised which, in 1122, was accepted by pope and emperor at Worms. Embracing without question the doctrines of the church mostly as stated by Augustine, and holding that belief must precede knowledge and must be implicit and undoubting, Anselm yet felt the necessity of a religious philosophy, and for this purpose wrote his Monologion, Prosligion, and Cur Deus Homo (Eng. trans. by Prout, 1887). Besides his philosophical treatises, his Meditations and Letters have come down to us, revealing his humble fervent faith, and the tender sympathy of his nature. He died April 21, 1109, and was buried next to Lanfranc at Canterbury; in 1494 he was canonised. See Rémusat's Anselme (2d ed. 1868); Dean Church's Anselm (1870); Life and Times of St Anselm (1883) by Martin Rule; his Rolls edition of Eadmer's two Lives of Anselm (1884); and monograph by J. M. Rigg (1896).

ANSGAR (801-865), the Apostle of the North, was a native of Picardy, and monk of Corveil, who in 826 went, with his colleague Aubert, to preach Christianity to the heathen Northmen of Sleswick. In 831 the pope established an archbishopric in Ilaenburg (transferred to Bremen in 847), and Ansgar was appointed the first archbishop. See his Life by Tapphorn (Münst. 1863).

ANSON, GEORGE, LORD ANSON, born 23d April 1697, at Shugborough Park, Staffordshire, entered the navy in 1712, and was made a captain in 1724. In 1739, on the outbreak of war with Spain, he received the command of a Pacific squadron of six vessels, and sailed from England in September 1740. With only one ship, and less than two hundred men, but with £500,000 of Spanish treasure, he returned to Spithead, June 15, 1744, having circumnavigated the globe in three years and nine months. Anson was made Rear-admiral of the Blue (1744); and in 1747, having utterly defeated the French off Cape Finisterre, and captured £300,000, he was made Baron Anson of Soberton, and, four years later, First Lord of the Admiralty. In 1761 he received the high dignity of Admiral of the Fleet. He died at his country-seat, Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 6th June 1762. Few works have been so popular as Anson's Voyage round the World (1748), of which, whether edited by Walter or Robins, he himself was virtually the author. See his Life by Sir John Barrow (1839).

ANSON, GEORGE WILLIAM, actor, was born in Montrose in 1847, and made his first appearance on the stage in December 1865 at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh.

ANSPACH, ELIZABETH, MARGRAVINE OF (1750-1828), was the daughter of Lord Berkeley, first married (1767) to Lord Craven, but separated from him (1780). After travelling awhile, she settled in the house of the Margrave of Anspach and Bayreuth, whom on Lord Craven's death (1791) she married. She wrote books of travel, plays, and entertaining Memoirs (1826).—An earlier Margravine of Anspach and Bayreuth was the witty Wilhelmine (1709-58), sister of Frederick the Great.

ANSTED, DAVID THOMAS, geologist, born in London, February 5, 1814, was a fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, and died, through a carriage accident near Woodbridge, Suffolk, May 13, 1880.

ANSTEY, CHRISTOPHER (1724-1805), author in 1766 of the New Bath Guide, was educated at Bury St Edmunds, Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, of which he was a fellow (1745-54).

ANSTEY, FRANCIS, the pseudonym of Thomas Anstey Guthrie, who was born in London in 1856, studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and in 1880 was called to the bar at the Middle Temple. He is author of Vice Versâ (1882), The Tinted Venus (1885), A Fallen Idol (1886), &c.

ANTALCIDAS, a Spartan politician, chiefly known by the treaty concluded by him with Persia at the close of the Corinthian war in 387 B.C.

ANTA'RA, or ANTAR, a celebrated Arab chief and poet of the 6th century.

ANTHON, CHARLES, LL.D. (1797-1867), editor of classics, was born in New York, and educated at Columbia College, and in 1835 became head of its classical department.

Anthony, St. See ANTONY, St.

Antigonus, surnamed the 'One-eyed' (Cyclops), one of the generals of Alexander the Great, received, after his death in 323, the provinces of Phrygia Major, Lycia, and Pamphylia. On Antipater's death in 319, he aspired to the sovereignty of Asia, and waged incessant wars against the other generals, making himself master of all Asia Minor and Syria. In 306 he assumed the title of king, but was defeated and slain by Lysimachus, Cassander, and Seleucus at Ipsus in Phrygia, 301 B.C.—His grandson, ANTIGONUS GON'ATAS, king of Macedonia, did not mount his throne until 276, seven years after the death of his father, Demetrius Polioretetes. Expelled in 273 by Pyrrhus of Epirus, he recovered his throne the next year, and kept it until his death in 239.

Antin'ous, a youth of matchless beauty, a native of Claudiopolis in Bithynia, the favourite of the Emperor Hadrian, and his companion in all his journeys. He was drowned in the Nile, near Besa, in 122 A.D., perhaps through suicide, either from weariness of the life he led, or from a belief that his voluntary death would avert disaster from the emperor. The emperor enrolled him among the gods. See two Cornhill articles by J. A. Synonds (1879).

Antiochus, the name of thirteen kings of Syria of the Seleucid dynasty.—ANTIOCHUS I. (323-261 B.C.), surnamed Soter, was the son of Seleucus, one of Alexander's generals, whose murder in 281 gave him the whole Syrian empire, but left him too weak to assert his right to Macedonia. Antiochus gained the name of Soter ('Saviour') for a victory over the Gauls, but fell in battle with them.—ANTIOCHUS II. (261-246), surnamed Theos ('God') by the Milesians, whom he freed from their tyrant Timarchus. On the death of Ptolemy, whose daughter Berenice he had been forced to marry, Antiochus recalled his former wife Laodice; but she, in revenge for the insult she had received, caused Antiochus to be murdered, along with Berenice and her son.—His grandson, ANTIOCHUS III. (242-187 B.C.), surnamed the Great, who in 223 succeeded his father, Seleucus Callinicus, was the most distinguished of the Seleucids. He failed to recover Parthia and Bactria, but waged war with success against Ptolemy Philopater, and though defeated at Raphia near Gaza (217), he afterwards obtained entire possession of Palestine and Coele-Syria (198), dowering therewith his daughter Cleopatra on her betrothal to the young king Ptolemy of Egypt. He afterwards became involved in war with the Romans, who had conquered Macedonia; but he declined to invade Italy at the instigation of Hannibal, who had come to his court for refuge. He crossed over into Greece, but was defeated in 191 at Thermopylae, and in 190 by Scipio at Magnesia. Peace was granted him only on condition of his yielding all his dominions east of Mount Taurus, and paying a heavy tribute. To raise the money, he attacked a rich temple in Elymals, when the people rose against him, and killed him (187 B.C.).—ANTIOCHUS IV. (175-164 B.C.), surnamed Epiphanes, fought against Egypt and conquered great part of it. He twice took Jerusalem; and, endeavouring there to establish the worship of Greek gods, excited the Jews to a successful insurrection under Mattathias and his heroic sons, the Maccabees.—The last of the Seleucids, ANTIOCHUS XIII., surnamed Asiaticus, was deprived of his kingdom by Pompey, who reduced Syria to a Roman province (65 B.C.).

Antipater, (1) a general highly trusted by Philip and Alexander the Great, left by the latter as regent in Macedonia, 334 B.C. He discharged the duties with great ability, both before and after the death of Alexander, in 322 effecting an alliance of the Greek states. He died at an advanced age in 319.—(2) The father of Herod the Great, appointed by Julius Caesar procurator of Judea in 47 B.C. He was poisoned in 43 B.C.—(3) The son of Herod the Great by his first wife, a worthless prince, who was perpetually conspiring against the life of his brothers, but was executed in prison five days before Herod died.

Antiphon (480-411 B.C.), the earliest of the ten Attic orators, born at Rhamnus in Attica, belonged to the oligarchical party; and to him, according to his pupil Thucydides, was mainly due the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred. On its fall, six months later, he was condemned to death, in spite of his noble defence. Of his fifteen extant orations, the best edition is by Blass (Leip. 1881).

Antis'thenes (c. 444-370 B.C.), founder of the Cynic school of philosophy, was the son of an Athenian father and a Thracian mother. He fought at Tanagra (426 B.C.), was first a disciple of Gorgias, afterwards a friend of Socrates, and died at Athens. See works by Chappuis (Paris, 1854) and Dümmler (Halle, 1882).

Antommarchi, FRANCESCO (1780-1838), Napoleon's physician from 1818, was also a native of Corsica, and was already an anatomist of some celebrity at Florence, when he was induced to go to St Helena. Napoleon received him with mistrust, but ultimately gave him his full confidence, and at his death left him 100,000 francs. After his return to Europe, he published Les Derniers Moments de Napoleon (1823). During the Polish revolution he did duty at Warsaw as director of military hospitals. He afterwards went to the West Indies, and died in Cuba.

Antonelli, GIACOMO, cardinal, was born 2d April 1806, at Sonnino, a village situated near the Pontine Marshes. His father was a woodcuter, member of an ancient but decayed family. In 1819 his birthplace having been demolished as a nest of bandits, Antonelli came to Rome, and entered the Grand Seminary, where he gained the favour of Pope Gregory XVI. In 1847 he was made cardinal-deacon by Pius IX., and in 1848 was president and minister of foreign affairs in a Liberal cabinet, which framed the famous Statuto or Constitution. He accompanied the pope in his flight to Gaeta, and, returning with him to Rome, supported the reactionary policy. In 1855 an attempt was made upon his life. In the Vatican Council of 1869-70 Antonelli showed great tact and ability. After his death, 6th November 1876, the vast property, £1,600,000, bequeathed to his three brothers, was vainly disputed by a soi-disante daughter (1877-79).

Antonello of MESSINA (c. 1414-93), an Italian painter, who introduced into Italy the Flemish methods of oil-painting, which he had learned from the Van Eycks. He settled about 1473 in Venice, where he gained great renown as a portrait-painter. His chief extant work is a portrait in Berlin, of 1478.

Anton'us, M. AURELIUS. See AURELIUS.

Antoninus Pius, TITUS AURELIUS FULVUS (86-161 A.D.), Roman emperor, inherited great wealth, and in 120 was made consul. Afterwards he was sent as proconsul into Asia by the Emperor Hadrian, in 138 was adopted by him on the score of merit alone, and that very same year came to the throne. His reign was proverbially peaceful and happy. In his private character he was simple, temperate, and benevolent; while in public affairs he acted as the father of his people. The persecution of Christians was partly stayed by his mild measures, and Justin Martyr's Apologia was received by him with favour. In his reign the empire was extended, and the wall named after him built between the Forth and Clyde. The epithet Pius was conferred on him for his defence of Hadrian's memory. By his much-loved but worthless wife Faustina he had four children; one married Marcus Aurelius, his adopted son and successor. See works by Lacour-Gayet (Par. 1888) and E. C. Bryant (1894).

Antonius, MARCUS (MARK ANTONY), the Roman triumvir, born about 83 B.C., on his mother's side was related to Julius Cæsar. His youth was dissipated, and, pressed by creditors, he escaped to Athens in 58 B.C. In Palestine and Egypt he ingratiated himself with the soldiery; and, after assisting Cæsar in Gaul, he went to Rome in 50 B.C., to uphold his great kinsman, and was appointed quaestor, angur, and tribune of the plebs. Next year he was expelled from the curia, and fled to Cæsar, who made this a pretext for his war against Pompey. Antony was appointed commander-in-chief in Italy; at Pharsalia he led the left wing of Cæsar's army. In 47 B.C. he was made master of the horse by Cæsar, who left him to govern Italy during his absence in Africa. Antony, as usual, disgraced himself. He drank; he divorced his wife, and took up with an actress. In 44 B.C., as consul, he vainly endeavoured to prevail on the Romans to recognise Cæsar as emperor. On Cæsar's assassination, he played the part so finely described by Shakespeare, and the flight of the conspirators from Rome left him with almost absolute power. Next, we find him in dispute with Octavian (see AUGUSTUS), besieging Mutina, and denounced by Cicero. The defeat of Mutina (43 B.C.) drove him a fugitive beyond the Alps; but in Gaul he visited the camp of Lepidus, and gained the favour of the army, of which he took the command. Plancus and Pollio joined him; and Antony returned to Rome at the head of seventeen legions and 10,000 cavalry. Octavian now threw off the mask, and held a consultation with Antony and Lepidus, near Bononia, when it was determined that these 'triumvirs' should share the whole Roman world. Returning to Rome, they began their course of proscription and plunder. Among their first victims was Cicero; and, in all, 300 senators and 2000 equites are believed to have fallen. After securing Italy, and raising an enormous sum of money, Antony and Octavian led their troops into Macedonia, and defeated Brutus and Cassius. Antony next paid a visit to Athens, and then passed over to Asia, to arrange his dispute with Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who captivated him by her beauty and address. He followed her into Egypt, and lived in idleness and luxury, until he was aroused by tidings of a quarrel in Italy between his own kindred and Octavian. This dispute gave rise to a short war, which came to an end before he arrived in Italy. A new division of the Roman world was now arranged, Antony taking the East, and Octavian the West, while Lepidus had to put up with Africa. Antony had married Octavian's sister, Octavia; but, returning now to Cleopatra, he resumed his voluptuous life, and was guilty of acts of the grossest injustice. Octavian used these facts to excite the indignation of the Roman people; and in the naval engagement of Actium (31 B.C.) Antony was defeated. He now went back again to Egypt, where, deserted by the Egyptian fleet, as by his own army, and deceived by a false report of Cleopatra's suicide, he killed himself by falling upon his sword (30 B.C.).

Antony, ST, surnamed 'the Great,' or ANTONY OF THEBES, the father of monachism, was born about 251 A.D. in Upper Egypt. Having sold his possessions for the poor, he withdrew into the wilderness, and took up his abode in an old ruin on the top of a hill, where he spent twenty years in the most rigorous seclusion. In 305 he was persuaded to leave this retreat by the prayers of numerous anchorites, and now founded a monastery, at first only a group of separate and scattered cells near Memphis and Arsinoë. In 355 the venerable hermit, then over a hundred years old, made a journey to Alexandria to dispute with the Arians; but feeling his end approaching, he retired to his desert home, where he died, 356 A.D. Athanasius wrote his Life.

Antony of Padua, ST, born at Lisbon, August 15, 1195, was at first an Augustinian monk, but in 1220 he entered the Franciscan order, and became one of its most active propagators. He preached in the south of France and Upper Italy, and died at Padua, June 13, 1231. He was canonised by Gregory IX. in the following year. According to legend, he preached to the fishes when men refused to hear him; hence he is the patron of the lower animals, and is often represented as accompanied by a pig. See Chronicle of St Anthony of Padua, edited by the Rev. H. J. Coleridge (1883).

Antraigues, EMANUEL DELAUNAY, COMTE D', an ambiguous politician, was born at Villeneuve de Berg, Ardèche, in 1755. His Mémoires sur les États-généraux (1788) was one of the first sparks of the French Revolution; but in 1789, when Antraigues was chosen a deputy, he defended the hereditary privileges and the kingly veto, and ranked himself against the union of the three estates. After 1790 he was employed in diplomacy at St Petersburg, Vienna, and Dresden. In England he acquired great influence with Canning. On July 22, 1812, he was murdered, with his wife, near London, by an Italian servant. See L. Pingaud, Un Agent Secret (1893).

Anville. See D'ANVILLE.

Anvari, a celebrated Persian poet and astrologer, who died between 1191 and 1196.

Aosta, DUKE OF. See AMADEUS.

Apel'les (fl. 325 B.C.), the most celebrated painter of antiquity, was probably born at Colophon, on the Ionian coast of Asia Minor. He was trained at Ephesus and Sicyon, visited Macedon, where he became the friend of Alexander the Great; and is said to have accompanied him on his expedition to Asia, and settled at Ephesus.

Ap'icius, MARCUS GABIVS, a Roman epicure in the time of Augustus and Tiberius. It is said that when he had spent £800,000 upon his appetite, and had only some £80,000 left, he poisoned himself to avoid the misery of plain diet.

Apion, an Alexandrian grammarian, who about 30 A.D. became famous as a teacher of rhetoric at Rome. Except one or two fragments, all his numerous writings are lost.

Apollina'ris the Younger, Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (died 390 A.D.), and one of the warmest opponents of Arianism. His father, Apollinaris the Elder, who was presbyter of Laodicea, was born at Alexandria, and taught grammar, first at Berytus, and afterwards at Laodicea. Apollinaris himself upheld a doctrine condemned by the Council of Constantinople (381), as denying the true human nature of Christ.—He must not be confounded with Claudius Apollinaris, Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia (170 A.D.), who wrote an Apology for the Christian faith, and several other works, all lost.

Apollodorus, (1) an Athenian painter, who flourished about 408 B.C.—(2) An Athenian grammarian, who flourished about 140 B.C., and wrote a work on mythology (ed. by R. Wagner, Leip. 1891-94).—(3) A celebrated architect, executed in 129 A.D. by Hadrian for his fearless criticism of the emperor's design for a temple.

Apollo'nus. (1) APOLLONIUS RHODIUS (born in Alexandria about 240 B.C., but long resident in Rhodes) wrote many works on grammar, and an epic poem, the Argonautica, marked rather by learning and industry than by poetical genius. It was greatly admired by the Romans, was translated into Latin by P. T. Varro, and was imitated wholesale by Valerius Flaccus. There are editions by Merkel (1854) and Seaton (1888), and an English prose translation by E. P. Coleridge (1889).—(2) APOLLONIUS OF PERGA, who flourished 250-220 B.C., was one of the founders of the mathematical sciences. His Works have been edited by Heiberg (2 vols. Leip. 1890-93).—(3) APOLLONIUS OF TY'ANA in Cappadocia, born about 3 B.C., was, according to Philostratus, a zealous neo-Pythagorean teacher, who collected many disciples, travelled through great part of Asia Minor, and ultimately made his way to India. On this journey he was introduced to the Magi at Babylon, and at the court of King Phraortes, in India, made the acquaintance of the notable Brahmins. When he returned his fame as a wise man was greatly increased; the people regarded him as a worker of miracles and a divine being, and princes were glad to entertain him. He himself seems to have claimed insight into futurity, rather than the power of working miracles. He was patronised by Vespasian, and followed him to Egypt. After travels in Spain, Italy, and Greece, he was accused of conspiring with Nerva against Domitian; ultimately he appears to have settled in Ephesus, where he taught until he died nearly one hundred years old. His history was not written till more than a century after his death, by Philostratus (q.v.); it contains a mass of absurdities. See the little Life by J. H. Newman (1853), Froude's Short Studies (vol. iv.), Gildersleeve's Essays and Studies (Balt. 1890), and German works by Baur (1832), Pettersch (1879), Jessen (1885), and Götsching (1889).—(4) APOLLONIUS, surnamed DYSCOLOI (or 'ill-tempered'), of Alexandria, lived in the 2d century, and first reduced grammar to a system.

Apperley, CHARLES JAMES ('Ninrod'), was born near Wrexham in 1777, and educated at Rugby. Having married early, and settled in Warwickshire, he devoted himself to hunting, and in 1821 began to contribute to the Sporting Magazine, but in 1830 had to retire to France, where he thenceforth chiefly resided. He died, however, in London, 19th May 1843. His best writings are The Chase, the Turf, and the Road, which appeared in the Quarterly Review (1827), and the Life of John Myton (1837), to the recent editions of which is prefixed a memoir of 'Ninrod.'

Appert, BENJAMIN NICOLAS MARIE (1797-c. 1857), a French philanthropist, wrote a long series of works on prisons and prison management in France, Belgium, Prussia, and Austria. [Ap-pair'.]

Appia'ni, ANDREA (1754-1817), 'the Painter of the Graces,' was born and died at Milan.

Appius Claudius. See CLAUDIUS (APPUS).

Applegath, AUGUSTUS (died 1871), made important improvements on the steam printing-press and in the manufacture of bank-notes.

Appleton, CHARLES EDWARD, D.C.L., was born at Reading, 16th March 1841, and was educated at Oxford and in Germany. He took a lively interest in the 'endowment of research,' and founded in 1869 the Academy. He died at Luxor, in Upper Egypt, 1st February 1879. See his Life and Literary Relics (1881).

Appleton, DANIEL (1785-1849), the founder of the New York publishing house, formed in 1897 into a limited company with $2,000,000 capital.

Apraxin, FEDOR, COUNT (1671-1728), the creator of the Russian navy, and long all-powerful in the court of Peter the Great.—His nephew, COUNT STEPHAN FEDOROVICH APRAXIN (1702-58), defeated the Prussians at Grossjägerdorf (1757), but died next year a prisoner in disgrace.

Apuleius, or APPULEIUS, Latin satirist, was born about 125 A.D. at Madaura, in Numidia, and studied at Carthage and Athens. The fortune bequeathed him by his father enabled him to travel; he visited Italy, Asia, &c., and was initiated into numerous religious mysteries. The knowledge which he thus acquired of the priestly fraternities he made abundant use of afterwards in his Golden Ass. Having married a wealthy middle-aged lady, he was charged by her relations with having employed magic to gain her affections. His Apologia, still extant, was an eloquent vindication. After this, his life appears to have been devoted to literature and public oratory, in both of which he attained great eminence. His romance of the Golden Ass is a satire on the vices of the age, especially those of the priesthood and of quacks. The most exquisite thing in it is the episode of Cupid and Psyche, Adlington's translation of which (1566) was edited in 1887 by Andrew Lang, and by C. Whibley in 1893. Besides the Apologia and Golden Ass, we have also an Anthology, a work on the Dæmon of Socrates, one on the doctrines of Plato, &c. There is a translation by Sir G. Head of the Golden Ass (1851), and of the entire works (1853), the best edition of which is by Hildebrand (Leip. 1843).

Aquila, PONTICUS, translator of the Old Testament into Greek, was a native of Sinope who flourished about 130 A.D., and is said to have been first a pagan, then a Christian, and finally a Jew.

Aquinas, THOMAS, prince of scholastic theologians, was of the family of the Counts of Aquino, and was born in 1226 in the castle of Rocca-Secca, near Aquino, a small town between Rome and Naples. He was educated by the Benedictines of Monte-Casino, and at the university of Naples; and, against the will of his family, entered (1243) the Dominican order. His brothers carried him off by force, and kept him a prisoner in the paternal castle for two years; ultimately escaping through France to Cologne, he became there a pupil of the great Dominican luminary, Albertus Magnus (q.v.). In 1248 the heretofore 'Dumb Ox' was appointed to teach under Albert, and began to publish commentaries on Aristotle. In 1252 he went to Paris, obtained great distinction as a philosophic theologian, and taught till, in 1258, now a doctor, he was summoned by the pope to teach successively in Rome, Pisa, and Bologna. He enjoyed the highest consideration throughout the church, and his voice carried almost decisive weight. Like most of the other scholastic theologians, he had no knowledge of Greek or Hebrew, and was almost equally ignorant of history; but his numerous writings display intellectual power of the highest order. He gave a new and scientific foundation to many doctrines of his church, especially that of transubstantiation. He also treated Christian morals according to an arrangement of his own. His Summa Theologiae, the first attempt at a complete theological system, remains to this day substantially the standard authority in the Roman Church. The Summa contra Gentiles deals chiefly with the principles of natural religion. His commentaries on Scripture and devotional treatises also have a high reputation. His influence on the theological thought of succeeding ages was immense. He refused all high ecclesiastical appointments, including the archbishopric of Naples. Gregory X., who had called a general council to effect the union of the Greek and Latin churches, summoned Aquinas to defend the papal cause at Lyons. He set out, though suffering from fever, and died on the road at the Cistercian abbey of Fossa-Nuova, March 7, 1274. All Europe mourned his loss; miracles were said to be wrought at his funeral; universities, religious orders, and princes contended for the honour of possessing his body, which was finally bestowed by the pope on Toulouse. Aquinas was canonised in 1323.

The only scholastic theologian who in any degree rivalled Aquinas, already known as the 'Angelic Doctor,' was the Franciscan 'Subtle Doctor,' Duns Scotus (q.v.). The Franciscans followed Scotus, and the Dominicans Thomas, and henceforward mediæval theologians were divided into two schools, Scotists and Thomists, whose divergences penetrate more or less every branch of doctrine, touching the idea of God, the operations of grace and of justification, the mode in which the sacraments take effect, &c. Thomism represents, with few exceptions, the general teaching of the Catholic Church; its rivals now being not the Scotists but the eclectic school of Jesuits. The works of Aquinas have been often printed from 1570 (17 vols.) to 1882 et seq. Migne's edition of the Summa is in 4 vols. St Thomas was the author of the famous Pange Lingua and other eucharistic hymns. See the Lives by Archbishop Roger Vaughan (1871-72; new ed. 1890) and Father Cavanagh (1890); French works by Jourdain (1858) and Lecoulre (1883); and German by Werner (1859), Holtzmann (1874), Otten (1882), Eucken (1886), and Frohschammer (1889).

Arabella Stuart. See STEWART.

Arabi Ahmed ('Arabi Pasha'), the leader of the military insurrection in Egypt in 1882, after his defeat at Tel-el-Kebir, was banished to Ceylon.

Arago, François Jean Dominique, astronomer and physicist, was born February 26, 1786, at Estagel near Perpignan, and died in Paris, 3d October 1853. At seventeen he entered the Polytechnic, and in 1804 became secretary to the Observatory, in 1830 its chief director, having at twenty-three been elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He took a prominent part in the July revolution (1830), and as member of the Chamber of Deputies voted with the extreme left. In 1848 he was a member of the provisional government, and opposing Louis Napoleon, refused to take the oath of allegiance after the coup d'état of 1852. His achievements, mainly in the fields of astronomy, magnetism, and optics, are recorded in his works (ed. by Barral, 17 vols. 1854-62). See Audiganne's Arago, son Génie et son Influence (2d ed. 1869).—His brother, JACQUES ÉTIENNE VICTOR ARAGO (1790-1855), was an author, who travelled much, and latterly was blind.—Another brother, ÉTIENNE (1802-92), was also a popular author.—EMANUEL (1812-96), son of the astronomer, became known as a zealous republican in 1848, and was ambassador to Switzerland (1850-94).—His brother, ALFRED (1816-92), was a painter.

Aram, Eugene, was born in 1704 at Ramsgill, in Upper Nidderdale, Yorkshire. Though but a gardener's son, he contrived to acquire considerable learning, married early, and became a schoolmaster, first at Ramsgill, and in 1734 at Knaresborough, where he became intimate with one Daniel Clark, a shoemaker. The sudden disappearance of the latter in 1745, at a time when he happened to be in possession of valuable goods, threw suspicion on Aram, not as Clark's murderer, but as his confederate in swindling. His garden was searched, and in it was found a portion of the missing property. Aram was arrested and tried, but acquitted for want of evidence. He now left his wife at Knaresborough, and acted as a schoolmaster at various places in England, acquiring, in spite of his nomadic mode of life, a knowledge of botany, heraldry, Chaldee, Arabic, Welsh, and Irish, and amassing considerable materials for a Comparative Lexicon. His secret was betrayed by a confederate, who excited suspicion by the loudness of his protestations that a skeleton found near Knaresborough was not Clark's. The accomplice was at last driven to confess where the murdered man had been buried; the bones were exhumed and identified, and Aram was suddenly dragged from his ushership at Lynn in Norfolk. He was tried at York, 3d August 1759, and hanged on the 6th. At the trial he conducted his own defence, attacking with great acumen, plausibility, and curious erudition, the doctrine of circumstantial evidence. After his condemnation he confessed his guilt, wrote a defence of suicide, but failed in an attempt to illustrate his essay. A factitious interest attaches to his story from Lord Lytton's romance and Hood's ballad. See Nineteenth Century (August 1897).

Aranda, Pedro de Bolea, Count of (1718-99), a Spanish statesman who procured the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain.

Arany, Janos, next to Petöfi the most distinguished of modern Hungarian poets, was born, the son of a poor peasant, at Nagy-Szalonta, 2d March 1817, and died at Pesth, 22d October 1882.—His son, LÁZSLÓ (born 24th March 1844), is also noted as a poet and translator of Shakespeare.

Aratus of Sicyon (c. 271-213 B.C.), a Greek statesman who liberated Sicyon from its tyrant in 251, and whose great object was to unite the Greek states, and so form an independent nation.

Aratus of Soli (in Cilicia) wrote about 270 B.C. two astronomical poems, from one of which St Paul quoted when preaching at Athens.

Arblay, Madame d'. See D'ARBLAY.

Arbuthnot, Alexander (1538-83), a Scottish poet and Presbyterian minister, principal from 1569 of King's College, Aberdeen.

Arbuthnot, or Arbuthnott, John, physician and wit, the much-loved friend of Swift and Pope, was born at Arbuthnott, Kincardineshire, 29th April 1667. His father was the (Episcopal) parish minister, who was ejected after the Revolution. One of John's brothers fought under Dundee at Killiecrankie, and another in Mar's rebellion; John was, according to Chesterfield, 'a Jacobite by prejudice, a republican by reflection and reasoning.' He studied at Aberdeen and University College, Oxford, but took his M.D. degree at St Andrews (1696). Settling in London, where before this he had taught mathematics, in 1697 he attracted notice by his Examination of Dr Woodward's Account of the Deluge. Accident called him into attendance on Prince George of Denmark; in 1705 he was appointed physician to the queen, and her death in 1714 was a severe blow to his prosperity. In 1715, along with Pope, he assisted Gay in Three Hours after Marriage, a farce that yet proved an absolute fiasco. He pronounced the Harveian oration in 1727, and died 27th February 1735. Utterly careless of literary fame, Arbuthnot was the chief, if not sole author of the brilliant Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, first published in Pope's works (1741); and his too was the celebrated History of John Bull (1712). See his Life and Works, by G. A. Aitken (1892).

Arcadius (377-408 A.D.), first emperor of the East alone, was born in Spain, and after the death of his father, the Emperor Theodosius, in 395 A.D., received the eastern half of the Roman empire, the western falling to Honorius. Arcadius lived in oriental state and splendour, and his dominion extended from the Adriatic to the Tigris, and from Scythia to Ethiopia; but the real rulers over this vast empire were the Gaul Rufinus, the eunuch Eutropius, and the Empress Eudoxia, who exiled Chrysostom in 404.

Arcesilaus (316-241 B.C.), a Greek philosopher, founder of the New Academy.

Arch. JOSEPH, was born at Barford, Warwickshire, 10th November 1826, and whilst still a farm-labourer, became a Primitive Methodist preacher. In 1872 he founded the National Agricultural Labourers' Union, and in 1885-86 was M.P. for North-west Norfolk, which again returned him in 1892 and 1895. See his Autobiography, edited by the Countess of Warwick (1898).

Archelaus, (1) a philosopher of the Ionic school who flourished about 450 B.C. He was the first to maintain the spherical form of the earth.—(2) King of Macedonia from 413 to 399 B.C.—(3) A general sent by Mithridates the Great to Greece to oppose the Romans in 87 B.C. He was defeated by Sulla at Charonea and at Orchomenos in 86. Unjustly suspected of treason, Archelaus went over to the Romans at the outbreak of the second war in 81.—(4) The son of the preceding, married Berenice, daughter of King Ptolemy Auletes, in 56 B.C., and ruled over Egypt for six months during Ptolemy's banishment.—(5) Ethnarch of Judæa, son of Herod the Great, succeeded his father in 1 A.D., and maintained his position against an insurrection raised by the Pharisees. His heirship being disputed by his brother Antipas, Archelaus went to Rome, where his authority was confirmed by Augustus, who made him Ethnarch of Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, while his brothers, Antipas and Philip, were made tetrarchs over the other half of Herod's dominions. After a nine years' reign, he was deposed by Augustus for his tyranny, and banished to Vienne, in Gaul, where he died. [Ar-ke-lay'us.]

Archenholz, JOHANN WILHELM VON (1745-1812), a German historian who passed ten years in England (1766-79). [Ar-ken-holts.]

Archer, FREDERICK J., jockey, was born at Cheltenham, 11th January 1857; rode his first race in 1870; in all had 2746 mounts, winning the Derby five times, the Oaks four, the St Leger six, the Two Thousand Guineas five, &c.; and shot himself, whilst temporarily insane, at his house in Newmarket, 8th November 1886.

Archer, WILLIAM, dramatic critic and apostle of Ibsen, was born at Perth, 23d September 1856, and in 1878 went up from Edinburgh to London.

Archilochus of PAROS flourished about 714-676 B.C., and is regarded as the first of the Greek lyric poets, by the ancients being ranked with Homer, Pindar, and Sophocles. Even Plato calls him 'the very wise.' The best editions of his fragments are those of Schneidewin and Bergk.

Archimedes (c. 287-212 B.C.), the most celebrated of ancient mathematicians, was born at Syracuse, and perished in the capture of that city by the Romans. He alone of the ancients contributed anything of real value to the theory of mechanics and to hydrostatics, first proving that a body plunged in a fluid loses as much of its weight as is equal to the weight of an equal volume of the fluid. Among the numerous inventions ascribed to him are the endless screw, and the Archimedes screw or spiral pump for raising water. His extant works, written in Doric Greek, were edited by Torelli (Oxf. 1792), and Heiberg, with a Latin translation (3 vols. Leip. 1880-81).

Archytas of TARENTUM, general, mathematician, and Pythagorean philosopher, flourished about 400 B.C., and, according to Horace, was drowned in the Adriatic. [Ar-ky'tas.]

Arculfus. See ADAMNAN.

Arditi, LUIGI (1822-1903), composer, born near Turin, studied music at Milan. Famous first as a violinist, he conducted the Italian opera at New York (1852-56), and was musical director at Her Majesty's Theatre, London (1857-78). His operas, I Briganti (1841) and La Spia (1856), are less known than some of his songs, violin duets, and waltzes such as Il Bacio. See his Reminiscences (1896). [Ar-dee'tee.]

Ardmillan, JAMES CRAUFURD, LORD (1805-76), Scotch judge, known through the Yelverton case.

Arends, LEOPOLD (1817-82), founder in 1860 of a system of stenography, was born near Wilna in Russia, and died in Berlin. His is the youngest of the three great rival systems in Germany—the others being those of Gabelsberger and Stolze—but it is perhaps the most widely used, and has been introduced into the Spanish, French, Hungarian, and Swedish languages. See a monograph by Wendtland (Leip. 1883).

Aretæus (fl. 100 A.D.), a Greek physician of Cappadocia, considered to rank next to Hippocrates. The first four books of his great work, preserved nearly complete, treat of the causes and symptoms of diseases; the other four, of the cure. There is an edition by Adams (1856), and an English translation (1837).

Aretino, PIETRO, poet, was born at Arezzo, Tuscany, 20th April 1492, the natural son of a nobleman named Luigi Bacci. Banished from his native town, he went to Perugia, where he wrought as a bookbinder, and afterwards wandered through Italy in the service of various noblemen. At Rome he distinguished himself by his wit, impudence, and talents, and secured even the papal patronage, which, however, he subsequently lost by writing his sixteen shameless Sonetti Lussuriosi. He now went to the Medicean court, where John de' Medici grew fond of him, and procured him an opportunity of ingratiating himself with Francis I. at Milan in 1524. A few years later he settled at Venice, there also acquiring powerful friends. The Bishop of Vicenza not only soothed the irritation of the pope, but recommended Aretino to the Emperor Charles V. The latter, as well as Francis, pensioned the fortunate wit, besides enriching him with splendid presents. It is said that while laughing heartily at a droll adventure of one of his sisters, he fell from a stool, and was killed on the spot (1557). His poetical works include five witty comedies and a tragedy of some merit. See Lives by Chasles (Paris, 1873), Sinigaglia (Naples, 1882), Samosch (Berl. 1881), Lucio (Turin, 1888), and Schultheiss (Hamburg, 1890).

Arguelles, AUGUSTIN (1776-1844), a Spanish reforming statesman.

Argyll', ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, MARQUIS OF, was the descendant of Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow or Loch Awe, who was knighted in 1286, and who through his prowess bequeathed to the chiefs of his line the Gaelic title of Mac Cailean Mhor or Mac Callum More ('great Colin's'). Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow was raised to the peerage as Lord Campbell in 1445; and Colin, his son, was created Earl of Argyll in 1457. The second earl fell at Flodden (1513); the fourth, who died in 1553, was the first of the Scottish nobility to embrace the Reformation; and the fifth (1530-73) figured prominently in Mary's reign, first as a Lord of the Congregation, and next as an adherent of the queen. Archibald was born in 1598, and in 1619, his father having turned Catholic and quitted Scotland, became the sole potentate of all the broad lands of his line. He succeeded as eighth earl in 1638. In the General Assembly at Glasgow (1638) he openly took the side of the Covenanters, and next year he joined Leslie's encampment on Duns Law. In 1640 he marched with 4000 men through Badenoch, Athole, Mar, and Angus, enforcing subjection to the Scottish Parliament. Charles, on his visit to Scotland in 1641, created him marquis. In 1644 he dispersed the royalist forces under Huntly; but Montrose in 1645 annihilated his army at Inverlochy. He was strongly opposed to the king's execution; and in 1651 he crowned Charles II. at Scone. After the defeat of Worcester he defended himself for nearly a twelvemonth in his castle of Inveraray against Cromwell's troops; but in 1652 he gave in his submission to the Protector. On the Restoration he repaired to Whitehall, encouraged by a letter from his son; but he was at once committed to the Tower. Thence taken by sea to Leith, on 27th May 1661 he was beheaded with the 'maiden' at the cross of Edinburgh. A gorgeous monument was erected to him in 1895 in St Giles' Cathedral. See Life by Rev. J. Willcock (1902).

—His son, ARCHIBALD, 9th Earl of Argyll, exhibited great bravery at Dunbar, where he commanded a regiment on the royalist side. After Worcester he continued, like his father, in arms, and made himself so obnoxious to Cromwell that he was specially excepted from the act of grace in 1654. Acting under Charles's orders, he submitted next year to the Protectorate, but from 1657 to 1660 was a prisoner. On the Restoration he was received into high favour (as a balance to his father's execution), and participated in some of the iniquitous acts of the Scottish legislature. Thus, in 1681, he voted in council against Donald Cargill; yet, the same year, would only sign the new test with a reservation, which led to his trial for 'leasing-making,' and his condemnation to death. His step-daughter helped him to escape from Edinburgh Castle to Holland. Landing in Argyllshire, in May 1685, with an armed force, to co-operate in Monmouth's rebellion, he was, after a series of misfortunes, taken prisoner, and beheaded at Edinburgh, on his former sentence, 30th June 1685.—His son, ARCHIBALD (d. 1703), an active promoter of the Revolution, was created Duke of Argyll in 1701.—His son, JOHN, 2d Duke of Argyll, was born in 1678. Destined, says Pope, 'to shake alike the senate and the field,' he as royal commissioner in 1705 had a principal share in bringing about the Act of Union; whilst as a soldier, from 1694 he distinguished himself under Marlborough at Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. Previous to 1710 he had been a keen Whig; now he became a declaimer against Marlborough. For reward he was appointed by the Tories generalissimo in Spain; but shortly after he again turned Whig. His tortuous career up to the '15 seriously detracts from his services then, which in 1713 gained him the English title of Duke of Greenwich. In 1721 he again played into the hands of the Tories, for the purpose of securing the entire patronage of Scotland. In 1737 he rose into immense popularity in Scotland by his spirited defence of Edinburgh before parliament in regard to the Porteous mob. He died 3d September 1743.—GEORGE JOHN DOUGLAS CAMPBELL, 8th Duke of Argyll, in 1892 made a duke of the United Kingdom, was born at Ardincaple Castle, near Helensburgh, on 30th April 1823, and succeeded his father in 1847. At the age of nineteen he wrote A Letter to the Peers from a Peer's Son, on the struggle which ended in the Disruption; and seven years later appeared his Presbytery Examined. He was Lord Privy Seal (1853-55; 1859-66) and Postmaster-general (1855-58) under Lord Palmerston. Under Mr Gladstone he was Secretary of State for India (1868-74) and Lord Privy Seal (1880-81). He resigned, disapproving of the Irish Land Bill, as later of Home Rule. His works include, besides papers on zoology, geology, &c., The Reign of Law (1866), Primeval Man (1869), Antiquities of Iona (1870), The Eastern Question (1879), Scotland as it Was and as it Is (1887), The Unseen Foundations of Society (1893), and The Burden of Belief (poems, 1896). In 1895 he married his third duchess, and he died 24th April 1900.—He was succeeded by his eldest son, JOHN DOUGLAS SUTHERLAND CAMPBELL (b. 1845), who in 1871 married Princess Louise (b. 1848), and was governor-general of Canada 1878-83. In 1895-1900 he was Liberal Unionist M.P. for S. Manchester. He is author of several books on Canada, a life of Queen Victoria, several books of verse, the libretto of an opera (Diarmid), &c.

Argyropu'los, JOANNES (1416-c. 1486), one of the earliest teachers of Greek learning in the West, was born at Constantinople and died in Rome.—PERIKLES ARGYROPOULOS (1809-60), a Greek publicist, born at Constantinople, became professor of Jurisprudence at Athens in 1837, and in 1854-55 was foreign minister.

Arias Montanus, BENEDICTUS (1527-98), a Spanish Catholic divine and orientalist.

Ariosto, LUDOVICO, one of the greatest of Italian poets, was born at Reggio, near Parma, September 8, 1474. He was bred to the law, but abandoned it for poetry. However, in 1500 he was compelled by his father's death to exert himself for the support of a large family. In 1503 he was introduced to the court at Ferrara of the Cardinal Ippolito d'Este, who employed him in many negotiations, but was extremely niggardly in his rewards. Here, in the space of ten years, Ariosto produced his great poem, Orlando Furioso (1516), the Roland epic that forms a continuation of Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato. After the cardinal's death (1520), the duke, his brother, invited the poet to his service, and acted to him with comparative liberality. In 1522 he was commissioned to suppress an insurrection in the wild mountain-district of Garfagnana, an arduous task which he successfully accomplished; and after remaining three years governor of the province, he returned to Ferrara. It was now that he composed his comedies, and gave the finishing touch to his Orlando. At length, in 1532, that poem made its appearance in a third edition, enlarged to its present dimensions. Ariosto died 6th June 1533, and was buried in the church of San Benedetto, at Ferrara, where a magnificent monument marks his resting-place. He is described in the Latin verses of his brother Gabrielle as a man of noble personal appearance and amiable character. Besides his great work, Ariosto wrote comedies, satires, sonnets, and a number of Latin poems. Of these the sonnets alone show the genius of the poet. His Latin poems are mediocre indeed, and his comedies, besides lacking interest, are disfigured by licentious passages. Of the Orlando there are many English translations: by Harrington (1607 and 1634), Croker (1755), Huggins (1757), Hoole (1783), and Stewart Rose (1823). In the last only is there to be found a fair representation of the feeling and spirit of the original. One of Ariosto's comedies had been rendered into English by Gascoigne as early as 1566. A list of the hundred and more editions of the Orlando, and of the various lives of its author, will be found in Ferrazzi's Bibliografia Ariostea (1881). See too E. G. Gardner, The King of Court Poets (1906).

Arivovstus, a German chief, defeated by Cæsar near Vesontium (Besançon), 58 B.C.

Aristarchus of Samos, an Alexandrian astronomer who flourished 280-264 B.C., and who seems to have anticipated Copernicus, maintaining that the earth moves round the sun.—ARISTARCHUS OF SAMOTHRACE, an Alexandrian grammarian and critic who flourished about 160 B.C.

Aristides, surnamed 'the Just,' at the battle of Marathon (490 B.C.) was appointed one of the ten leaders, but induced his companions to make Miltiades commander-in-chief. Next year he was chief archon, and secured the general respect of the citizens; but about 483 the jealousy of Themistocles procured his banishment. Three years later came Xerxes' invasion, when, on the eve of Salamis, Aristides, hearing that the Greek fleet was hemmed in by that of the Persians, made his way from Ægina to offer his aid to Themistocles. He did good service in that great sea-fight; and, as Athenian general, he divided with Pausanias the glory of Platea (479). In 477 B.C. he introduced a sweeping change into the constitution, by which all citizens, without distinction of rank, were admitted to the archonship. Through him, too, about the same time, Athens, not Sparta, became the ruling state of a maritime confederacy. He was an old man when he died (most likely in 468), and so poor, it is said, that he had to be buried at the public cost. See Vom Berg, Das Leben des Aristides (Gött. 1871).

Aristides, a first-century Christian apologist, whose work, mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome, was only lately discovered. A fragment from the Armenian was first published; in 1889 Mr Rendel Harris discovered a Syriac version in the convent of St Catherine on Mount Sinai; and from it Mr Robinson recognised that the Greek speech in the mediæval legend of Barlaam and Josaphat is, in a curtailed form, the original Greek of the Apology. See the edition by Rendel Harris (1891; 2d ed. 1893), and a work by Mrs Harris (1892).

Aristippus, founder of the Cyrenaic or Hedonistic philosophy, was a native of Cyrene in Africa. He became a pupil of Socrates at Athens, and remained with him almost up to the master's death, 399 B.C. He himself taught philosophy both at Athens and Ægina, and was the first of the pupils of Socrates to take money for his instruction. Much of his life was passed in Syracuse, at the court of Dionysius the tyrant, where he acquired the reputation of a philosophic voluptuary. He lived some time at Corinth, in intimacy with the famous Lais, but towards the close of his life he is supposed to have retired to Cyrene. He taught his doctrines to his daughter Arete, by whom they were communicated to her son Aristippus the Younger.

Aristobulus, an Alexandrian Jew and Peripatetic philosopher, who lived about 170 B.C., was considered by the early fathers as the founder of the Jewish philosophy in Alexandria.

Aristophanes, the greatest of Attic, if not of all, comedians, was born about 448 B.C. Of his personal history we have nothing recorded, except that he had three sons—Philippus, Ararós, and Nikostratos—all comic poets. He is said to have written fifty-four plays, but eleven only are extant, which may be ranged under the categories of political, philosophical, social, and literary; and again under three periods, ending respectively 425, 406, and 388 B.C., about which last date he died. To the first period belong the Acharnians, Knights, Clouds, and Wasps, the poet's four masterpieces, named from their respective choruses, and the Peace, in all of which full rein is given to political satire; to the second, the Birds, Lysistrata, Thesmophoriazuse, and Frogs, in which we find less political rancour, and more reticence and caution; to the third, the Ecclesiazuse and Plutus, comedies of a tamer type, known as that of the middle comedy, in which political allusions and the distinctive characteristic of the old comedy, the parabasis, disappear. The first printed edition, the Aldine (Venice, 1498), contains nine plays; Junta (1515) added two. Other editions are those of Bergler (1760), Brunck (1783), Invernizzi-Beck (1794), with a collation of the Ravenna or oldest MS., Bekker (1829), Dindorf (Poetæ Scenici, 5th ed. 1869), Bergk (1857), Meineke (1860), Blaydes (1886), Holden (5th ed. 1887). There are translations of some of the plays by Mitchell (1822), J. H. Frere, Walsh (1837), B. H. Kennedy (1874), R. Y. Tyrrell (1883), and B. B. Rogers (1876-1909, in incomparable metre).

Aristotle was born at Stagira, a Greek colony on the peninsula of Chalcidice, in 384 B.C., the son of the friend and physician of Amyntas II., king of Macedon, father of Philip, and grandfather of Alexander the Great. In his eighteenth year he left Stagira for Athens, and, three years later, became Plato's pupil. During his twenty years' sojourn in Athens he established a school of rhetoric—then, as including incidentally a little law and politics, the recognised preparation for public life. On the death of Plato (347), Aristotle left Athens—either because he was chagrined that Plato had not appointed him his successor as head of the 'Academy' or Platonic school of philosophy, or because Athens and Philip of Macedon were now at feud. He stayed three years with an old pupil, now despot of Lesbos, at Atarneus in Asia Minor, and married his daughter; and after his friend had been assassinated, retired to Mitylene. In 342 he was invited by Philip to Macedon, to educate his son Alexander, who for at least three years was his pupil. The two parted finally when Alexander set forth on his expedition into Asia (334 B.C.), and Aristotle, coming to Athens, opened a school called the 'Lyceum,' from its proximity to the temple of Apollo Lyceus. His followers were called the Peripatetics, either from his practice of walking up and down in the garden during his lectures, or because the place was known as 'The Walk' (Peripatos). After the death of Alexander the anti-Macedonian party at Athens accused Aristotle of impiety. With the fate of Socrates before his eyes, he made a timely escape (322 B.C.) to Chalcis in Eubœa, where, in the autumn of the same year, he died, aged 62, of his old malady, indigestion.

Of the numerous writings which have come down to us under the name of Aristotle, some are undoubtedly not his; some may be the products of his school. Even of his most famous and undisputed works the structure is so irregular, and the style so unequal, that it has been with great probability supposed that they are to a large extent notes and rough jottings edited by disciples. In the middle ages Aristotle's philosophy became known to the learned in the West, at first mainly through Arabian translations, which in their turn were translated into Latin. At the time when what was supposed to be the Aristotelian system was (especially through the influence of Thomas Aquinas) dominant in western Europe, Aristotle's works were hardly known to any one in the original.

It is often but erroneously said that 'Plato was an idealist, Aristotle an empiricist;' the difference is great in appearance mainly. Sir Alexander Grant truly declared that 'Aristotle codified Plato.' Plato was a poet, and is always an artist, as well as a thinker, in his Dialogues. Aristotle, with the education of a physician, has the mental habits and tendencies of the man of science predominant; and while lacking Plato's inspiration and enthusiasm, has a wider, in fact, an all-embracing range of interests, and cares more for actual facts for their own sake. He appears to have projected what may be called an Encyclopædia of Philosophy, though the scheme is only imperfectly carried out in his works. Organon was the name given to the treatises on logic, of which the most notable were that on the Categories (on substance, quality, quantity); Prior Analytics (syllogistic moods and figures); and Posterior Analytics (the theory of knowledge and of scientific method). The Rhetoric deals with the art of persuasion; the Topics, with dialectical argument and reasoning from probabilities. The name Metaphysics (i.e. 'after the Physics') was given to Aristotle's discussions on 'first philosophy,' because they were placed by his editors after his books about nature; they treat of the relations of matter and form, the actual and potential, the four causes, &c. The Physics have to do mainly with the metaphysical aspects of movement. The book On the Soul is as much a biological as a psychological treatise. The Ethics and Politics have in both mediæval and modern times exercised an enormous influence. Aristotle is said to have made a collection of 158 'Constitutions,' as a preparation for writing his Politics: of these the most important was the Constitution of Athens, first published in a complete form in 1891 from a British Museum papyrus from the Fayum. The Economics are not considered to be by Aristotle. The Poetics contains little more than a discussion of tragedy; but few books on literary criticism have had more influence.

The great edition of Aristotle is still that of Bekker (1831-40). In Germany a succession of Aristotelian scholars—Bonitz, Schwegler, Trendelenburg, Torstrik, Waitz, and Susemihl (the text of the Politics by the latter and Sticks, 1895, is admirable)—have edited, translated, and expounded his writings. In English there is no good translation of all Aristotle, but there are serviceable translations of the Nicomachean Ethics (Peters and Welldon), Politics (Jowett and Welldon), Rhetoric (Welldon), Poetics (Twining, Wharton), De Anima (Wallace), Post. Analytics (Poste), Parts of Animals (Ogle), and Constitution (Dynes, Kenyon, Poste). See Grote's Aristotle (3d ed. 1884), works by G. H. Lewes (1864), E. Wallace (1875), Sir A. Grant (1877), and Prof. Butcher (1895), Zeller's Greek Philosophy: Aristotle (trans. 1897), and Stocks's Lectures in the Lyceum (1897).

Aristoxenus of TARENTUM, a Greek writer upon music, flourished about 350 B.C.

Arius (Gr. Ἀρειός), the founder of Arianism, was born in Libya about 260 A.D., was trained in Antioch, and became a presbyter in Alexandria. Here about 313 he maintained, against his bishop, that the Son was not co-æqual or co-eternal with the Father, but only the first and highest of all finite beings, created out of nothing by an act of God's free-will. He secured the adherence of clergy and laity in Egypt, Syria, and Asia Minor, but was deposed and excommunicated in 321 by a synod of bishops at Alexandria. Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, absolved him, and in 323 convened another synod in Bithynia, which pronounced in his favour. At Nicomedia, Arius wrote a theological work in verse and prose, called Thaleia, some fragments of which remain. The controversy became fierce, and to settle it the Emperor Constantine convoked the memorable Council of Nicæa, or Nice, in Bithynia, 325. Three hundred and eighteen bishops, especially from the East, were present, besides priests, deacons, and acolytes. Arius boldly expounded and defended his opinions. It was principally by the reasoning of Athanasius (q.v.) that the Council was persuaded to define the absolute unity of the divine essence, and the absolute equality of the three persons. All the bishops subscribed it except two, who were banished, along with Arius, to Ilyricum. Arius was recalled in 328, but Athanasius refused to readmit him to church communion, and the controversy went on all over the East. In 336 Arius went to Constantinople, and the Emperor commanded the bishop to admit him to the sacrament. But a day or two before the Sunday appointed for the purpose, he died suddenly—poisoned by the orthodox, said his friends; by the direct judgment of God, according to his enemies.

After his death the strife spread more widely abroad: the Homoousian doctrine (identity of essence in Father and Son) and the Homoiousian (similarity of essence) seemed alternately to prevail; and synods and counter-synods were held. The West was mainly orthodox, the East largely Arian or semi-Arian. There was a good deal of persecution on both sides; but Julian the Apostate (361-3) and his successors extended full toleration to both parties. Arianism at last was virtually suppressed in the Roman empire under Theodosius in the East (379-95), and Valentinianus II. in the West. Among the Germanic nations, however, it continued to spread through missionary efforts, the Lombards being the last to come round (in 662). Milton held Arian or semi-Arian views. The Arian controversy was revived in England by Dr Samuel Clarke (1675-1729), and Whiston (1667-1752); but Arianism was superseded by Unitarianism. See Gwatkin, Studies in Arianism (1882) and The Arian Controversy (1889).

Arkwright, SIR RICHARD, cotton-spinning inventor, was born at Preston in Lancashire, December 23, 1732. Of humble origin, the youngest of thirteen children, he settled about 1750 as a barber in Bolton, and became also a dealer in hair, a secret process of his own for dyeing hair increasing the profits of his trade. About 1767, assisted by a Warrington clockmaker named Kay, he seems to have given himself wholly up to inventions in cotton-spinning. Next year he removed to Preston, where he set up his celebrated spinning-frame—the first machine that could produce cotton-thread of sufficient tenacity and strength to be used as warp. The same year, to escape the popular rage against machinery, he removed to Nottingham, and set up his first mill, driven by horses; in 1771, entering into partnership with Jedidiah Strutt of Derby, the celebrated improver of the stocking-frame, he set up a larger factory, with water-power, at Cromford, Derbyshire. In organising his business Arkwright showed remarkable energy and capacity; and he may be regarded as the founder of the factory system. In 1775 he took out a fresh patent for various additional improvements in machinery. His success stimulated rivals to invade his patent; and to such an extent did other cotton-spinners use his designs that he was obliged, in 1781, to prosecute nine different manufacturers—the outcome, however, that in 1785 his letters patent were cancelled. Popular animosity was also excited against him on the ground that his inventions diminished the demand for labour; and in 1779 his large mill near Chorley was destroyed by a mob in the presence of a military and police force. Yet Arkwright triumphed over all opposition. In 1786 he was knighted, in 1787 became high-sheriff of Derbyshire, in 1790 introduced the steam-engine into his works at Nottingham; and at his death, on 3d August 1792, at Cromford, was worth half a million sterling.

Arlington, HENRY BENNET, EARL OF, was born at Arlington, Middlesex, in 1618, and from Westminster School proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford. During the Civil War, at Andover he got a life-long scar on the nose; afterwards at Madrid, as Charles's agent, he acquired an equally lasting pomposity. The Restoration brought him back to England. Created Lord Arlington in 1663, and Earl of Arlington in 1672, he was not the most scrupulous member of the unscrupulous Cabal. In 1674 he was impeached as a promoter of popery, a self-aggrandiser, and a betrayer of trust—in brief, as the 'conduit-pipe' of Charles's evil policy. The impeachment fell through; but Arlington found it desirable to exchange the office of secretary of state for that of lord chamberlain, and finally he retired to his Suffolk seat, Euston, where he died, 28th July 1685.

Armfelt, GUSTAF MAURITZ (1757-1814), a favourite of the Swedish king, Gustavus III., after whose death in 1792 he underwent great vicissitude, until in 1811 he entered the service of Russia. See his Autobiography (Stock, 1830), and a Life by Tegner (3 vols. Stock. 1833-37).

Arminius (16 B. C.—19 A. D.), a famous chief of the German Cheruski, who in 9 A. D., in a three days' battle in the 'Tentoburg Forest,' probably near Detmold, annihilated the whole Roman army. 'Varus, Varus, give me back my legions!' was the cry of the Emperor Augustus, now old and weak, on hearing the fatal news. The Germans, who had only their own liberation in view, prosecuted their victory no further; but when Germanicus (q.v.) assumed the command on the Lower Rhine he resolved to crush the barbarians. In two successive campaigns (15-16 A. D.) he reduced Arminius to great straits; but in 17 A. D. he was recalled to Rome by the Emperor Tiberius. No sooner, however, was the foreign enemy expelled than internal feuds broke out, in the course of which Arminius was slain by his own kinsmen. See BANDEL, and German works by Böttger (1874) and Kemmer (1893).

Arminius (i.e. HARMENSEN), JACOBUS, theologian, was born in 1560, at Oudewater, in South Holland, and studied at Utrecht, Leyden, Geneva, and Basel. In 1586 he visited Italy, and on his return to Amsterdam (1588) was ordained a minister. Selected to defend Beza's doctrine of predestination, he soon came to adopt the opinions he had been commissioned to confute. Yet in 1603 he was made professor of Theology in the university of Leyden. In 1604 his colleague Gomar (q.v.) attacked his doctrines, and from that hour to the end of his life Arminius was engaged in a series of bitter controversies. Arminius asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent of their sins and believe in Christ; he wills that all men should attain salvation, and only because he has from eternity foreseen the belief or unbelief of individuals, has he from eternity determined the fate of each—thus rejecting the high Calvinistic doctrine of absolute predestination or election. In 1608 Arminius himself besought the States of Holland to convoke a synod to settle the controversy; but, worn out with care and disease, he died on 19th October 1609, before it was held. Arminius was less Arminian than his followers, who in 1610 presented to the States of Holland a Remonstrance—the famous 'Five Articles.' The strife between Gomarists or Calvinists and Remonstrants or Arminians went on furiously, and became a kind of civil war; Maurice of Orange treating the Arminians as republicans and enemies. Barneveldt (q.v.) died on the scaffold, Grotius (q.v.) escaped from life-long imprisonment. Ultimately (1618-19) the Synod of Dort condemned Arminianism, which, however, not merely survived at home, but told directly on foreign Protestantism. Thus in England Laudians and Latitudinarians were alike Arminian in tendency; Wesleyans, and many Baptists and Congregationalists, are distinctly anti-Calvinist. J. Nichols translated two vols. of Arminius' works (1825-28); and Guthrie translated Brandt's Life of him (1854).

Armitage, EDWARD (1817-96), historical painter, was born in London, and elected an A.R.A. in 1867, an R.A. in 1872, in 1875 being appointed lecturer on painting. He died at Tunbridge Wells.

Armstead, HENRY HUGH, sculptor, was born in London, 18th June 1828, and elected an A.R.A. in 1875, an R.A. in 1879. He died 4th Dec. 1905.

Armstrong, ARCHY, court-jester to James I. and Charles I., withdrew in 1641 to Arthuret in Cumberland, and died at a great age in 1672.

Armstrong, JOHN, physician and poet, was born about 1709 in Castleton manse, Liddesdale, Roxburghshire. He took the Edinburgh M.D. in 1732, and soon after commenced practice in London. In 1736 he published a nauseous poem, The Economy of Love; in 1744 his principal work, The Art of Preserving Health, a didactic poem in four books. In 1746 he was appointed physician to the London Soldiers' Hospital, in 1760 physician to the forces in Germany, whence he returned on half-pay in 1763, to resume practice. With Fuseli, the painter, he made a continental tour (1771); and he died in London from a fall, 7th September 1779. The friend of Thomson, Mallet, Wilkes, &c., Armstrong seems to have been a reserved, indolent, and splenetic man, 'who quite detested talk'; kind-hearted withal, and frugal.

Armstrong, JOHN, physician, was born 8th May 1784, at Ayres Quay, near Bishop-Wearmouth, where his father was superintendent of glass-works. He graduated M.D. of Edinburgh (1807), commenced practice at Bishop-Wearmouth, in 1811 was chosen physician to Sunderland Infirmary, and, having greatly extended his reputation by a work on Typhus (1816), in 1818 removed to London, where from 1819 to 1824 he was physician to the Fever Hospital. He died of consumption, 12th December 1829. See his Life by Dr Boott (2 vols. 1833).—His son, JOHN ARMSTRONG (1818-56), in 1853 became Bishop of Grahamstown.

Armstrong, JOHNNIE, of Gilnockie, near Langholm, a Border freebooter, hanged, with thirty-six followers, by James V. at Caerlanrig, in 1529.

Armstrong, WILLIAM, or 'Kinnmont Willie,' a Dumfriesshire moss-trooper, rescued in 1596 by Scott of Buccleuch from Carlisle Castle.

Armstrong, WILLIAM GEORGE, LORD ARMSTRONG, inventor, born 26th Nov. 1810 at Newcastle, was articulated to a solicitor, and became a partner; but in 1840 he produced a much improved hydraulic engine, in 1842 an apparatus for producing electricity from steam, and in 1845 the hydraulic crane. He was elected an F.R.S. in 1846; and shortly afterwards commenced the Elswick Engine-works, Newcastle. This large establishment at first chiefly produced hydraulic cranes, engines, accumulators, and bridges, but was soon to be famous for its ordnance, and especially the Armstrong gun, whose essential feature is that the barrel is built up of successive coils of wrought-iron, and which in 1858 was recommended by the Rifle-cannon Committee. Armstrong offered to government all his inventions; and, till 1863, there existed a kind of partnership between government and the Elswick firm, Armstrong being knighted in 1858. The firm, which in busy time employs 14,000 workmen, and since 1882 comprises shipbuilding, has supplied many foreign governments with guns, and in 1888-90, with the support of the Italian government, established a branch (for military engineering) near Pozzuoli. In 1887 Armstrong was created Baron Armstrong; in 1894 he purchased Bamborough Castle, to convert it into a retreat for cultured poverty. He wrote on Electric Movement (1897), and died 27th December 1900.

Arnaud, HENRI (1641-1721), pastor and military leader of the Waldenses, wrote in exile at Schönberg his famous Histoire de la Rentrée des Vaudois dans leurs Vallées (1710).

Arnaud, ST. See ST ARNAUD.

Arnauld, ANTOINE (1560-1619), the greatest advocate of his time in France, won a wide celebrity by his zealous defence of the university of Paris against the Jesuits in 1594.—His eldest son, ROBERT ARNAULD D'ANDILLY (1588-1674), quitted the bustle of the world for the seclusion of Port-Royal des Champs, and published graceful translations of Josephus, Augustine, St Teresa, and others.—The advocate's twentieth (and youngest) son, ANTOINE (1612-94), 'the great Arnauld,' studied at the Sorbonne, became doctor and priest, and, living mostly in seclusion, became famous for his brilliant controversial writings, mainly against the Jesuits and in defence of the Jansenists. He became the religious director of the nuns of Port-Royal des Champs, the convent of which his sister was abbess. Here he and his friends, Pascal (q.v.), Nicole, and other 'Port-Royalists' living near him, produced many books, including treatises on grammar, geometry, and logic. He also wrote in defence of transubstantiation and against Calvinism. Under Jesuit influence, the king issued an order for his arrest. Arnauld hid himself for some time, but finally withdrew to Brussels, where he died. His works were published in 45 vols. (1775-83).—His sister, MARIE-ANOËLQUE (1591-1661), was made abbess of Port-Royal at eleven, ultimately reformed the convent by her holy example and severe discipline, resigned, and returned to be prioress under her sister Agnes (1593-1671).—Their niece, la Mère ANOËLQUE (1624-84), the daughter of Robert, became a nun at Port-Royal, was successively sub-prioress and abbess; and during the persecution of the Port-Royalists, sustained by her heroic courage the spirits of the sisterhood and their friends. See Frances Martin's Angélique Arnauld (1873), and Sainte-Beuve's Port-Royal (4th ed. 6 vols. 1878).

Arnault, ANTOINE VINCENT, poet, was born in Paris in 1766, suffered four years' exile as an Imperialist (1815-19), and died, secretary of the Academy, near Havre, 16th September 1834. A rigid classicist, he produced seven dramas—the best Les Vénitiens (1799), but all inferior to his Fables et Poésies (1812). See his Souvenirs d'un Sexagénaire (1833).

Arndt, ERNST MORITZ, German poet and patriot, was born in the then Swedish island of Rügen, 26th December 1769. The son of a former serf, he yet received an excellent education at Stralsund, Greifswald, and Jena, with a view to the ministry; but in 1805, after travelling over great part of Europe, he became professor of History at Greifswald. His Geschichte der Leibeigenschaft in Pommern und Rügen (1808) led to the abolition of serfdom; and in his Geist der Zeit (1807) he attacked Napoleon with such boldness that, after Jena, he had to take refuge in Stockholm. Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland? and others of his fiery songs, did not a little to rouse the spirit of Germany. In 1817 he married a sister of Schleiermacher's, and in 1818 became professor of History in the new university of Bonn; but, aiming steadily at constitutional reforms, he was suspended in 1819 for participation in so-called 'demagogic movements,' and was not restored till 1840. He was elected a member of the German national assembly in 1848, but retired from it in 1849. Vigorous in mind and body, beloved and revered by the whole German people as 'Father Arndt,' he died at Bonn, 29th January 1860. His works comprise an account of the Shetland and Orkney Islands (1826), numerous political addresses, some volumes of reminiscences, two of letters (1878-92), and his poems. See German lives of him by Langenberg, Baur, and Schenkel, and an English one, with preface by Seeley (1879).

Arndt, JOHANN (1555-1621), a German Lutheran divine, whose semi-mystic Wahres Christenthum ('True Christianity') has been called the Protestant Imitatio. There are two English translations—by Boehm (1720) and by Jaques (1815).

Arne, THOMAS AUGUSTINE, composer, was born in London, 12th March 1710, and educated at Eton. His father, an upholsterer, intended him for the bar, but young Arne became skillful as a violinist, forming his style chiefly on Corelli; and his zeal in the study of music induced his sister (the actress, Mrs Cibber, 1714-66) to cultivate her excellent voice. He wrote for her a part in his first opera, Rosamond, which was performed with great success in 1733. Next followed his comic operetta, Tom Thumb; and afterwards his Comus (1738). He married a singer, Cecilia Young (1736); and after a successful visit to Ireland, was engaged as composer to Drury Lane Theatre, and wrote many vocal pieces for the Vauxhall concerts. Rule Britannia, originally given in The Masque of Alfred, is his; so too is Where the Bee Sucks, as well as two oratorios and two operas, Eliza and Artaxerxes. He died in London 5th March 1778.

Arnim, HARRY, GRAF VON (1824-81), from 1864 to 1870 was Prussian ambassador at Rome, where he backed up the anti-infallibilists during the Vatican Council. He was rewarded with the title of Graf, but, as German ambassador to France (1872-74), he fell into Bismarck's disfavour, and, on a charge of purloining state documents, was sentenced to three months' six months', five years' imprisonment. He had, however, retired into exile, and died at Nice.

Arnim, LUDWIG ACHIM VON (1781-1831), a fantastic but original German writer of romances, stirred up a warmer sympathy for old popular poetry, and published over 20 volumes, mainly tales and novels.—His wife, BETTINA VON ARNIM (1785-1859), a sister of Clemens Brentano (q.v.), was in her girlhood enthusiastically attached to Goethe, and afterwards published a (largely fictitious) Correspondence with him, besides 10 vols. of tales and essays.

Arnobius (1) the Elder, a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca, in Numidia, became a Christian about 300, and died most probably in 327. He wrote a defence of Christianity, translated in vol. xix. of the Ante-Nicene Library.—(2) ARNOBIUS the Younger was a bishop in Gaul in the 5th century, who wrote a commentary on the Psalms.

Arnold of Brescia, educated in France under Abelard, adopted the monastic life; and having by his preaching exasperated the people of Brescia against their bishop, was banished from Italy by the Lateran Council (1139). In France he met with bitter hostility from St Bernard, and took refuge in Zurich, where he remained five years. Meanwhile an insurrection against the papal government had taken place in Rome, and thither in 1143 Arnold repaired, and struggled for ten years to found amongst disorderly and disunited masses a republic on ancient Roman lines. Pope Adrian IV. (Nicholas Breakspear) laid the city under an interdict, when Arnold, whose party fell to pieces, retired to Campania. On the arrival of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, in 1155, Arnold was arrested, brought to Rome, and hanged, his body burned, and the ashes thrown into the Tiber. But he is remembered alongside Rienzi and Savonarola. See German Life by Hausrath (1892).

Arnold of Winkelried, a Swiss of Unterwalden, who, according to tradition, made a way for his comrades into the enemy's ranks at Seinpach (1386) by grasping an armful of Austrian spear-heads and plunging them into his own bosom.

Arnold, BENEDICT, the traitor, was born at Norwich, Connecticut, January 14, 1741. At fifteen he ran away, joined the provincial troops then engaged in the old French war, but soon deserted, and became a merchant in New Haven. On the breaking out of the Revolutionary war he joined the colonial forces, assisted in the capture of Fort Ticonderoga, and in 1775, for his gallantry at the (unsuccessful) siege of Quebec, was made a brigadier-general. Though greatly admired by General Washington, he had bitter and influential enemies; to his great chagrin, in 1777 five of his inferiors in rank were promoted by congress over his head. At the battle of Ridgefield, his horse was killed under him, and for his gallantry he was made a major-general. He fought with distinction in the eventful battles of Saratoga (having his horse killed, and being himself severely wounded). In 1778 he was placed in command of Philadelphia. In 1780 Arnold sought and obtained the command of West Point, which, through a conspiracy with André (q.v.), he agreed to betray. On the capture of André, Arnold fled to the British lines, and was given a command in the royal army. In 1781 he led an expedition against his native state; and after the war lived in obscurity in London, where he died June 14, 1801. See the Life by Jared Sparks; and that extenuating his treason, by Isaac N. Arnold (1880).

Arnold, SIR EDWIN, K.C.I.E. (1858), C.S.I. (1877), poet, was born 10th June 1832, the son of a Sussex magistrate, and, after an education at Rochester and King's College, London, was elected a scholar of University College, Oxford. He won the Newdigate (1853) with a poem on Belshazzar's Feast, for a while was second master at Birmingham, and then became principal of the Government Sanskrit College at Poona. Returning to England in 1861, he joined the staff of the Daily Telegraph. His numerous works include Poems (1853); The Indian Song of Songs (1875); The Light of Asia (1879); Indian Poetry (1881); The Song Celestial (1885); Lotus and Jewel (1888); The Light of the World (1891); Seas and Lands (1891); Polyphos's Wife (1892); Adzuma, or the Japanese Wife, a play (1893); and The Tenth Muse (1895). He died 25th March 1904.—His brother ARTHUR (1833-1902) was Liberal M.P. for Salford (1880-86), and wrote on the Levant, Persia, Free Land, &c. Chairman of the London County Council, he was knighted in 1895.

Arnold, JOHN (1736-99), a native of Bodmin, who helped to perfect the chronometer.

Arnold, MATTHEW, one of the greater modern English poets, and the Sainte-Beuve of English criticism, eldest son of Dr Arnold of Rugby, was born at Laleham, near Staines, 24th December 1822, was educated at Winchester, Rugby, and Balliol College, Oxford, and, graduating with honours in 1844, was next year elected a fellow of Oriel. After acting for four years as private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, he was appointed one of the lay inspectors of schools in 1851, an office from which he retired in 1886. During 1857-67 he was professor of Poetry at Oxford. He was more than once sent by government to inquire into the state of education on the Continent, especially in France, Germany, and Holland; and his masterly reports, with their pregnant hints and downright statement of English deficiencies, attracted much attention in England. So, too, did his audacious application to Scripture of the methods of literary criticism. In 1883 a pension of £250 was conferred on him, and in the same year he lectured in the United States. He died suddenly at Liverpool, 15th April 1888, and was buried at Laleham. His works, some forty in number, include a Rugby prize poem on Alaric (1840), the Newdigate prize poem on Cromwell (1843), Poems (1853-54), Essays in Criticism (1865), Lectures on the Study of Celtic Literature (1867), New Poems (1867), Culture and Anarchy (1869), St Paul and Protestantism (1870), Literature and Dogma (1872), Last Essays on Church and Religion (1877), Mixed Essays (1879), Irish Essays (1882), and Discourses on America (1885). See his Letters (1895), and books on him by Saintsbury (1899), H. W. Paul (1902), and G. W. E. Russell (1904).

Arnold, SAMUEL, composer (1740-1802), became organist to the Chapels Royal (1783) and to Westminster Abbey (1793). He is best remembered by his valuable collection of cathedral music (1790). His son, Samuel James (1774-1852), was a playwright and manager.

Arnold, THOMAS, D.D., head-master of Rugby, was born June 13, 1795, at East Cowes, Isle of Wight. In 1807 he went to Winchester, whence in 1811 he was elected a scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Having taken a first class in classics (1814), he was next year elected a fellow of Oriel, and he gained the chancellor's prizes for the Latin and English essays in 1815 and 1817. He took deacon's orders in 1818, and the year after settled at Laleham, near Staines, where he prepared pupils for the university. In 1820 he married Mary Penrose, daughter of a Nottinghamshire rector, and sister of one of his earliest friends; in August 1828 he entered on the task of regenerating Rugby, where he had the tact to make himself both loved and feared. In 1832 he purchased for his vacations Fox How, between Rydal and Ambleside; in 1841 he received from Lord Melbourne the regius professorship of Modern History at Oxford. He died suddenly of angina pectoris, 12th June 1842, and was buried in Rugby Chapel. His principal works are six volumes of Sermons (best ed. 1848); an edition of Thucydides (3 vols. 1830-35); the History of Rome (3 vols. 1838-43), broken off at the end of the second Punic war; and his Oxford Lectures on Modern History (1842). 'These,' in the words of an Edinburgh reviewer, 'are all proofs of his ability and goodness. Yet the story of his life is worth them all.' And that story has been admirably told by Dean Stanley in his Life of Arnold (1845, 12th ed. 1881). See too works by Findlay (1897), Worboise (1897), and Fitch (1897).

Arnold, THOMAS KERCHEVER (1800-53), educational author, was born at Stamford, and died rector of Lyndon, Rutlandshire.

Arnot, HUGO (1749-86), author of a History of Edinburgh (1779).

Arnot, WILLIAM (1806-75), Scottish Free Church preacher and author. See Autobiography (1877).

Arnot, NEIL, was born at Arbroath in 1788, and died 22d March 1874 in London, where he had a large medical practice (1811-55). He invented a water-bed, a stove, and a ventilator.

Arouet, the family name of Voltaire (q.v.).

Arpad (d. 907), the national hero of Hungary, under whom the Magyars first gained a footing in that country about 884.

Arran, EARL OF. See HAMILTON.

Arrhenius, SVANTE, born near Upsala in 1859, became professor of physics in 1895. He has done valuable work in connection with the dissociation theory of electrolysis.

Arrian, FLAVIUS (c. 95-180 A.D.), a native of Nicomedia in Bithynia, who in 136 was appointed prefect of Cappadocia. He edited the Enchiridion of his friend and master Epictetus, whose lectures (Diatriba) he wrote out in eight books. Only four have been preserved. His chief work, however, is the Anabasis Alexandrou, or history of the campaigns of Alexander the Great, which has come down to us almost entire. His accounts of the people of India, and of voyages round the Euxine and Red Sea, are valuable with regard to ancient geography. See edition by Dr E. J. Chinnock (1893).

Arrol, SIR WILLIAM, born in 1839, rose from a blacksmith to be head of the great firm who were contractors for the (new) Tay Bridge, the Forth Bridge, &c. He was knighted in 1890, and returned as a Unionist to parliament for South Ayrshire in 1895.

Arrowsmith, AARON (1750-1823), born at Winston, Durham, about 1770 came up to London, and by 1790 had established a great map-making business.—His nephew, JOHN (1790-1873), was also an eminent cartographer.

Arsacidæ, a dynasty of Parthian kings, so called from the founder, Arsaces, who wrested a kingdom for himself from the feeble grasp of the Seleucid Antiochus II. about 250 B.C., which ultimately extended from Bactria to the Euphrates, and included Persia. Its greatest kings were Mithridates, Phraates, Mithridates 'the great,' Volagases I., and Artabanus, who fell at Hormizdjân in 227 A.D., attempting to stem the conquering career of Ardashir, founder of the Sassanian dynasty of Persia.

Arsin'oe, daughter of Ptolemy I. of Egypt, married first, about 300 B.C., the aged Lysimachus, king of Thrace, and finally, in 279, her own brother, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus.

Artabazus, the name of several Persian generals under the dynasty of the Achæmenidæ.

Artaxerxes (anc. Persian Artakshathra), the name of several Persian kings.—ARTAXERXES I., surnamed Longimanus ('long-handed,' no doubt from his wide-reaching power), the second son of Xerxes, reigned from 465 to 425 B.C.—ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Mnemon ('the mindful'), reigned from 404 to 358 B.C.—His son and successor, ARTAXERXES III., named Ochus, found the empire falling to pieces, but did much to build it up again. He was poisoned in 338 by his favourite eunuch, Bagoas.—ARTAXERXES, or Ardashir, the founder of the new Persian dynasty of the Sassanidæ, overthrew Ardavân (Artabanus), the last of the Parthian kings, in 227 A.D. He next conquered Media and a large part of the Iranian highlands, but was defeated by Alexander Severus in 233. He died in 242.

Artedi, PETER (1705-35), a Swedish ichthyologist and botanist, drowned in a canal near Amsterdam. [Ar-tay'dee.]

Artemisia, queen of Caria 352-350 B.C., erected a magnificent mausoleum to the memory of her brother and husband, Mausolus.—Another Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, accompanied Xerxes, with five ships, in his expedition against Greece, and distinguished herself at Salamis (480 B.C.); an unfortunate love-affair made her leap from a rock into the sea.

Artevelde, JACOB VAN, a wealthy and high-born brewer of Ghent, who, in 1335, when war was raging between England and France, gave his support to the former power, while the Count of Flanders sided with the latter, and who actually concluded a treaty with Edward III. Proclaimed governor of Flanders, for nine years he was almost absolute ruler; but he went too far when he proposed that the Black Prince should be elected Count of Flanders, and was killed in a popular insurrection, July 24, 1345. His son Philip van Artevelde in 1381 headed a new revolt of the people of Ghent, and gained a victory over the Count of Flanders, the son of his father's old enemy. The count therefore sought the assistance of Charles VI. of France, and Philip was defeated and slain at Roosbeke, 1382. His history forms the theme of a fine drama by Sir Henry Taylor. See Hutton, James and Philip van Artevelde (1883).

Arthur, a half-legendary king of the Britons—Cymri driven into the west of England by the Saxons—is represented as having united the British tribes in resisting the pagan invaders, and as having been the champion, not only of his people, but also of Christianity. He is said to have lived in the 6th century, and to have maintained a stubborn contest against the Saxon Cerdic, but the Saxon Chronicle is suspiciously silent as to his warfare and as to his existence. Indeed the Welsh bards of the earliest period do not assert that he was a contemporary, and it is more than doubtful whether he is an historic personage. It is worthy of remark that the fame of Arthur is widely spread; he is claimed alike as a prince in Brittany, Cornwall, Wales, Cumberland, and the lowlands of Scotland; that is to say, his fame is contemporaneous with the Brythonic race, and does not extend to the Goidels or Gaels.

See Villemarqué, Contes Populaires des Anciens Bretons (1842); and his Poèmes des Bardes Bretons du 6^e Siècle (1850); San-Marte (A. Schulz), Die Arthursage (1842); Rhys, Celtic Britain (1882); The Arthurian Legend (1891); and his edition of Malory's King Arthur (1894); O. Sommer's edition of the same (1881-91); Maccallum, Tennyson's Idylls (1894); Skene, Four Ancient Books of Wales (1868); Glennie, Arthurian Localities (1869); Cox's Popular Romances (1871); and Alfred Nutt's Studies on the Holy Grail (1888).

Arthur, PRINCE, the posthumous son of Geoffrey (Henry II.'s fourth son) by Constance, Duchess of Brittany, was born in 1187. On Richard's death in 1199, Arthur by the law of primogeniture should have succeeded to the English crown; and the French king, Philip II., upheld his claims, until John (q. v.) bought him over to a disgraceful treaty. Arthur soon after fell into his uncle's hands, and was imprisoned, first at Falaise, afterwards at Rouen, where, on 3d April 1203, he is supposed to have perished, either by assassination or by drowning in an attempt to escape. The story of John's orders to Hubert to put out his eyes was current as early as 1228.

Arthur, PRINCE, the eldest son of Henry VII., was born at Winchester, 19th September 1486; on 14th November 1501 married Catharine of Aragon, and died at Ludlow, 2d April 1502.

Arthur, CHESTER ALAN, twenty-first president of the United States, was born at Fairfield, Franklin County, Vermont, 5th October 1830, the son of the Rev. W. Arthur, D.D. (1796-1875), a Baptist minister from Antrim. He was admitted to the bar in 1853, and became the head of a very eminent law firm. A leader of the Republican party in New York state, he was made vice-president of the United States when Garfield became president in 1881; and, after Garfield's death, he was installed as president on the 22d September 1881, and held the office till 4th March 1885. He was neither a great nor a brilliant president, but he was practical, business-like, and honourable in the fulfilment of his duties. He died in New York, November 18, 1886.

Arthur, SIR GEORGE (1785-1854), at twenty entered the army, and was successively governor of British Honduras (1814-22), Van Diemen's Land (1823-36), Upper Canada (1837-41), and Bombay (1842-46). He was knighted in 1837, and made a baronet in 1841.

Arundel, THOMAS (1353-1413), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the third son of Robert Fitzalan, Earl of Arundel. In 1373 he became Archdeacon of Taunton and Bishop of Ely; in 1388 he was translated to the archbishopric of York, and in 1396 to that of Canterbury. Banished by Richard II. (1397), he helped to seat Henry of Lancaster on the throne (1399); but he is chiefly remembered as a bitter opponent of the Lollards.

Asbjørnsen, PETER CHRISTIAN, was born 15th January 1812 at Christiania. He studied at the university there, then for four years was a tutor in the country. In long journeys on foot he collected a rich store of popular poetry and folklore. On his return to the capital he devoted himself to medicine and the natural sciences, and from 1846 to 1853 he explored and dredged, at government expense, parts of the Norwegian coast. In 1849-50 he accompanied a Norwegian ship of war to the Mediterranean, and from 1856 to 1858 studied forestry in Saxony. Appointed inspector of forests for the Trondhjem district in 1860, he was sent in 1864 to investigate the preparing of peat in Holland, Germany, and Denmark. On his return he was appointed to take measures for its better preparation among the peasantry, and he resigned this office only in 1876. He died at Christiania, 6th January 1885. Asbjørnsen wrote many books on natural history, forestry, cookery, &c.; but it is by his inimitable collections of folk-tales that his name will be remembered. He was fortunate in finding for his first collection a coadjutor, the poet Jørgen Moe (1815-82), afterwards Bishop of Christian-sand; they published in 1842 Norske Folkeeventyr. Asbjørnsen alone published his Norske Huldre-eventyr og Folkesagn (2 vols. 1845-48); and in 1871 a second volume of the Folkeeventyr. These books have been translated into English by Sir George W. Dasent in Popular Tales from the Norse (1859) and Tales from the Fjeld (1874); and by H. L. Braekstad in Round the Yule Log (1881).

Asbury, FRANCIS, the first Methodist bishop consecrated (1784) in America, was born at Handsworth, Staffordshire, August 20, 1745; in 1771 was sent as a missionary to America; and died at Richmond, Virginia, March 31, 1816. See Lives by Larrabee (1853) and Strickland (1858).

Ascham, ROGER, was born in 1515 at Kirby Wiske, near Thirsk, in Yorkshire. He received his early education in the family of Sir Anthony Wingfield, and by him was sent in 1530 to St John's College, Cambridge, where in 1534 he took his B.A., and, in spite of his avowed leaning to the Reformed doctrines, obtained a fellowship. His reputation as a classical scholar soon brought him numerous pupils; and about 1538 he was appointed Greek reader at St John's. His leisure hours were devoted to music, penmanship (in which he excelled), and archery. In defence of the latter art, he published, in 1545, Toxophilus, the pure English style of which ranks it among English classics. For this treatise, which was dedicated to Henry VIII., he received a pension of £10, equivalent to about £100 of our present money. In 1546 he was appointed university orator. He was tutor at Cheshunt to the Lady Elizabeth (1548-50), and as secretary to Sir Richard Morysin, ambassador to Charles V., spent three years (1550-53) on the Continent, at Augsburg chiefly, but with occasional visits to Venice, the Tyrol, and Carinthia. On his return he became Latin secretary to Queen Mary, his pension being at the same time doubled. His prudence and moderation preserved him from offending by his Protestantism; and after Mary's death Elizabeth retained him at court as secretary and tutor, which offices he held till his death, 30th December 1568. His principal work, The Scholemaster, a treatise on classical education, was published in 1570, and was edited by Mayor (1863); his 295 admirable letters are included in Giles's edition (3 vols. 1864-65); the English works were edited in 1905 by W. Aldis Wright. See Katterfeld's (German) monograph (1879). [Ascham spelt his name sometimes Askham and Ascum.]

Asclepiades, a Greek physician, born at Prusa, in Bithynia, who flourished during the early part of the 1st century B.C. He seems to have wandered about as a not very successful teacher of rhetoric before he finally settled at Rome, where, by the practice of medicine, he had risen in Cicero's time to considerable fame and wealth.

As'coli, GRAZIADIO ISAIA (1829-1907), Italian philologist, was born of Jewish parentage at Görz, and was destined for a mercantile career, but early devoted himself to comparative philology. In 1861 he obtained a chair of philology at Milan, and in 1889 was created a senator.

Asello, GASPARO (1581-1626), an Italian physician, the discoverer of the lacteal vessels.

Asgill, JOHN, an eccentric writer, born at Hanley Castle, Worcestershire, in 1659, was called to the bar in 1692. Having got into difficulties, he sailed in 1699 for Ireland, where an act for the resumption of forfeited estates promised plenty of lawsuits. His talents gained him a lucrative practice; and in 1703 he obtained a seat in the Irish parliament. Three years before, however, he had published a paradoxical pamphlet, bepraised by Coleridge, to prove that by the rules of English law the redeemed need not die. Much to his own surprise, the Irish parliament voted this a blasphemous libel, and expelled its author from the House. In 1705 he returned to England, and entered the English parliament as member for Bramber, in Sussex. But the fame of his unlucky pamphlet haunted him; for the English House condemned it to be burned by the common hangman, and expelled Asgill in 1707. At last he found peace in the King's Bench and the Fleet, where he died in November 1738.

Ashbourne, EDWARD GIBSON, LORD, LORD

Chancellor of Ireland, was born in Dublin, 4th September 1837, educated there at Trinity College, and called to the Irish bar in 1860. Entering parliament in 1872, he rose through various posts in successive Conservative administrations to the Chancellorship (1885, 1886, 1895); and as Chancellor he carried a measure (1885) facilitating the purchasing clauses of the Land Act.

Ashburton, ALEXANDER BARING, LORD, born in 1774, second son of Sir Francis Baring (q.v.), was for several years engaged in the United States in the service of the great London mercantile house established by his father. In 1810 he succeeded him as head of Baring Brothers & Co., having four years before been elected member for Taunton. He represented that place, Callington, and Theford in the Liberal interest till 1832, and in 1833 was returned for North Essex as a moderate Conservative. In Peel's brief administration (1834-35) he was President of the Board of Trade, and was created Baron Ashburton in 1835. In 1842, as special ambassador to the United States, he concluded the Washington or Ashburton Treaty, defining the frontier line between Maine and Canada. He opposed free trade, but strongly supported the penny-postage system when it was first proposed by Rowland Hill in 1837. He died May 13, 1848.—His son, WILLIAM BINGHAM BARING, second Lord Ashburton (1799-1864), is chiefly remembered through his first wife, who made their house a meeting-place of politicians and men of letters, among the latter Thackeray and Carlyle.

Ashe, THOMAS (1836-89), minor poet, clergyman, mathematical master, and student of Coleridge, was born at Stockport.

Ashley, LORD. See SHAFESBURY.

Ashmead-Bartlett, SIR ELLIS (1849-1902), born in Philadelphia, was educated at Torquay and Oxford, in 1877 was called to the bar, in 1880 entered parliament as a Conservative, and in 1892 was knighted. An ardent Turco-phil, he was captured by the Greeks in 1897. See BURETT-COURTS.

Ashmole, ELIAS, antiquary, was born at Lichfield, 23d May 1617, and commencing the study of law when only sixteen, in 1638 became a solicitor. During the Great Rebellion he embraced the Royalist cause; but at the same time exhibited his love of study by entering Brazenose College, Oxford, where he applied himself to mathematics, natural philosophy, astronomy, astrology, and alchemy. In 1646 he became acquainted with Lilly and other famous astrologers; and in 1650 he edited a work of Dr Dee's, to which he subjoined a treatise of his own. In 1652 he issued his Theatrum Chymicum, and in 1672 his magnum opus, a History of the Order of the Garter. At the Restoration various honours and emoluments were conferred upon him; and thenceforward he mainly devoted himself to heraldic and antiquarian studies. In 1682 he presented to the university of Oxford a fine collection of rarities, bequeathed him by his old friend Tradescant, and known as the Ashmolean Museum. He died 18th May 1692. Among his friends were Selden and Dugdale, whose daughter became his third wife. See his quaint Diary (1717).

Ashmun, JEHUDI (1794-1828), philanthropist, the founder in 1822 of the colony of Liberia for liberated negroes on the west coast of Africa, was born at Champlain, New York, and died at New Haven, Connecticut. See Life by Gurley (1835).

Ashwell, ARTHUR RAWSON (1824-79), a well-known preacher and writer, from 1870 a canon of Chichester, and principal of the Theological College there.

Asinius. See POLLIO.

Aske, ROBERT, a Yorkshire attorney of Gray's Inn, who was hanged at York in 1537 for having in the previous autumn headed the Catholic rising known as the Pilgrimage of Grace.

Askew, ANNE, Protestant martyr, was born of gentle parentage near Grimsby, Lincolnshire, in 1521. Early embracing the Reformed doctrines, she was turned out of doors by her husband, and thereupon went up to London to sue for a separation; but in 1545 she was arrested on a charge of heresy. After examination and torture by the rack, she was burned in Smithfield, July 18, 1546.

Asnyk, ADAM (1838-97), Polish lyric poet and dramatist, was born at Kalisz, and lived at Cracow.

Asoka, an Indian king 264-223 B.C., organised Buddhism as the state religion, having become a convert to it about 257.

Aspa'sia, a native of Miletus, the celebrated mistress of Pericles (q.v.), after whose death in 429 B.C. she formed a union with Lycicles, a wealthy cattle-dealer.

Asquith, HERBERT HENRY, born at Morley, Yorkshire, 12th September 1852, was educated first at the Moravian school of Fulneck near Leeds, and from the City of London School passed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he took a first class in classics (1874), won the Craven and gained a fellowship. Called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1876, he became a Q.C. in 1890, in 1886 entered parliament as a Gladstonian for the East division of Fife, and from 1892 to 1895 was Home Secretary; in 1905 he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in 1908 Prime-minister in succession to Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman. Great measures were the budget of 1909, the Parliament Act, the Payment of Members of the House of Commons, the Minimum Wage Act, the third Home Rule measure for Ireland, and a bill for the disestablishment of the Church in Wales. The government opposed the referendum; and for his attitude towards women's franchise, Mr Asquith was much persecuted by militant suffragists.

Assemani, JOSEPH SIMON (1687-1768), orientalist, was born of Maronite family at Tripoli in Syria, and died keeper of the Vatican Library. Three of his kinsmen were also eminent orientalists.

Asser, King Alfred's biographer, was a monk of St Davids (Menevia), who about 885 was invited to the court of Alfred. Here he resided at intervals till the king's death (901), assisting him in his studies, and enjoying an affectionate confidence, of which he seems to have every way been worthy. Alfred promoted him to various dignities, and prior to 900 made him Bishop of Sherborne. He died in either 909 or 910. His Latin life of Alfred was first published, with various interpolations, in 1572 by Archbishop Parker (best ed. by W. H. Stevenson, 1904).

Assi, ADOLPHE ALPHONSE (1810-86), a French communist, transported in 1872 to New Caledonia.

Assollant, ALFRED (1827-86), a French novelist and journalist, born at Aubusson.

Assurbanipal. See SARDANAPALUS.

Astell, MARY (1668-1731), a Newcastle merchant's daughter, who lived at Chelsea, and in 1694 projected an Anglican sisterhood.

Astley, PHILIP (1742-1814), theatrical manager, equestrian, and the best horse-tamer of his time, in 1770 started a circus at Lambeth.

Astor, JOHN JACOB (1763-1848), millionaire, the founder of the 'American Fur Company,' was born near Heidelberg, and helped on his father's farm, until in his 16th year he went to London and worked with his brother, a maker of musical instruments. In 1783 he sailed to America, and, by the advice of a dealer in furs whom he met on the voyage, invested his small capital in furs. On his death at New York, he left property estimated at $20,000,000, and a legacy of $350,000 for the establishment of a public library in New York.—His wealth was mainly inherited by his son, WILLIAM (1792-1875), who continued to augment it till his death, when he is said to have left $50,000,000. He added $200,000 to his father's bequest for a public library. He was called the 'landlord of New York.'—A great-grandson, WILLIAM WALDOFF, born at New York, 31st March 1848, in 1875 was admitted to the bar. In 1882 he was appointed U.S. minister to Italy, and in 1892 settled in England, purchasing the Pall Mall Gazette and Budget and the Cliveden property near Maidenhead. He started the Pall Mall Magazine in 1893.—Another great-grandson, JOHN JACOB (1864-1912), went down with the Titanic.

Astorga, EMANUELE D' (1681-1736), composer, was born at Palermo, and died in a monastery at Prague. His masterwork is a Stabat Mater.

Astruc, JEAN (1684-1766), a French medical professor who by a work on Moses founded the modern criticism of the Pentateuch.

Astyages, son of Cyaxares, the last king of Media, reigned 594-559 B.C., in the latter year being dethroned by Cyrus, who, according to Herodotus, was his grandson.

Atahualpa, last of the Incas, on his father's death in 1525 received the kingdom of Quito, and in 1532 completely defeated his elder brother, Huascar, who had obtained Peru. Meanwhile the Spaniards had disembarked; and Atahualpa, made a captive, agreed to pay an enormous ransom, but was accused of plotting against Pizarro, tried, and strangled (1533).

Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, seized the throne of Judah to herself after the death (843 B.C.) of her son, Ahaziah, at the hands of Jehu, by the slaughter of all the royal children save Ahaziah's son, Joash. Her support of Baal-worship, after six years, to an insurrection headed by the priests; Joash was made king, and Athaliah put to death (837). Her fate is the subject of a play by Racine, with music added by Mendelssohn.

Athanas'aric, a prince of the Western Goths, who fought three campaigns with the Emperor Valens, but was finally defeated in 369, and who, driven by the Huns from the north of the Danube, died at Constantinople in 381.

Athanasius, born in Alexandria about 296 A.D., in his youth often visited the celebrated hermit St Antony, and himself for a time embraced an anchorite's life. He was only a deacon when he distinguished himself at the great Council of Nicea or Nice in 325. In 326 he was chosen Patriarch of Alexandria and Primate of Egypt, and was but newly installed when Arius, banished on the condemnation of his doctrine at Nice, was recalled, and recanted. Athanasius refused to comply with the will of the Emperor Constantine that the heretic should be restored to communion. Hence, and on other charges brought by the Arians, he was summoned by the emperor to appear before the synod of Tyre, in 335, which deposed him. The sentence was confirmed by the synod of Jerusalem in 336, when he was banished to Augusta Trevirorum (Trevés). In 338, however, he was recalled and restored; but in 341 he was again condemned by a council of ninety-seven (mainly Arian) bishops at Antioch. Orthodox synods at Alexandria and at Sardica protested in his favour, and he was again replaced in his office (349). Under the Arian Emperor Constantius, he was again condemned by councils at Arles (353) and Milan (355), and was forcibly expelled by soldiers, whereupon he retired to a remote desert in Upper Egypt. Under Julian the Apostate, toleration was proclaimed to all religions, and Athanasius became once more Patriarch of Alexandria (361). His next controversy was with the heathen subjects of Julian, by whom he was compelled again to flee from Alexandria, and remained concealed in the Theban desert until 363, when Jovian ascended the throne. After holding office again for a short time, he was expelled anew by the Arians under the Emperor Valens, who, after a few months, moved, by petitions from the orthodox Alexandrians, restored the patriarch to his see, in which he continued till his death in 373 A.D.

Athanasius was the great leader during the most trying period in the history of the early Christian church. His conscientiousness, his wisdom, his fearlessness, his commanding intellect, his activity and patience, all mark him out as an ornament of his age. His writings, polemical, historical, and moral, are simple, cogent, and clear. The polemical works treat chiefly of the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the divinity of the Holy Spirit. The standard edition of the works is that in Migne's great Patrologia Græco-Latina (4 vols. 1860). There are translations of some of them by Parker (1713), Whiston (1713), Newinan (1842), &c. See, besides the church histories, Bush's Athanasius (1888), Reynolds' Athanasius (1889), and Robertson's Select Works and Letters of Athanasius (1892). See also ARIUS. The so-called Athanasian Creed (representing Athanasian beliefs) is little heard of till the 7th century.

Atheling. See EDGAR.

Athelstan (c 895-940), son of King Edward the Elder, and grandson of Alfred the Great, was crowned king of the Mercians and West Saxons at Kingston-upon-Thames in 925. He conquered portions of Cornwall, Wales, and Northumbria, and, a league being formed against him in 937 of Welsh, Scots, and Danes, completely routed them at Brunanburh. After this his fame spread to the Continent; and one of his sisters married Otho the Great, afterwards emperor; another, Hugh, Duke of the French, father of Hugh Capet. At home he improved the laws, built monasteries, and promoted commerce.

Athênas'us, a Greek writer, born at Naucratis in Egypt. He lived first at Alexandria and afterwards at Rome about the close of the 2d century. His Deipnosophistæ ('Banquet of the Learned'), in fifteen books, but of which we possess only the first two, and parts of the third, eleventh, and fifteenth, is very interesting as one of the earliest collections of Ana. There are German editions by Schweighäuser (14 vols. 1801-7), Dindorf (3 vols. 1827), Meineke (4 vols. 1859-67), and Kibel (3 vols. 1887-90), and an English translation (3 vols. 1854).

Athenag'oras, a Christian philosopher of the 2d c., who taught first at Athens, and afterwards at Alexandria. His two extant treatises have been edited by Schwartz (Leip. 1891).

Atherstone, EDWIN, was born at Nottingham, 17th April 1788, and died at Bath, 29th January 1872. He was a friend of the painter Martin, and between 1821 and 1868 published a dozen volumes of Martinesque poetry and romance, one of them an epic in thirty books.

Athole, a mountainous Perthshire district, has given to the Murrays the title of earl (1629), marquis (1676), and duke (1703).

Atkinson, THOMAS WILLIAM (1799-1861), a Yorkshire stonemason, who travelled in and wrote on Asiatic Russia.

At'talus, the name of three kings of Pergamos, of whom the last, dying in 133 B.C., left his kingdom to Rome.

Atterbom, PETER DANIEL AMADEUS (1790-1855), a Swedish Romanticist poet, professor at Upsala of Logic (1828) and of Æsthetics (1835).

Atterbury, FRANCIS, Bishop of Rochester, was born 6th March 1663, at Milton-Keynes, near Newport-Pagnell, and educated at Westminster, whence in 1680 he passed to Christ Church, Oxford. In 1687 he answered a pseudonymous attack on Protestantism by Obadiah Walker, master of University College; and, taking orders about the same time, won such reputation as a preacher, that he was appointed lecturer of St Bride's (1691), a royal chaplain, and minister to Bridewell Hospital. Boyle's Examination of Bentley's Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris (1698), a clever, but shallow performance, was really by Atterbury, who had been the young nobleman's tutor at Christ Church; his defence (1700) of Convocation won him the archdeaconry of Totnes, a canonry of Exeter, and the degree of D.D. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanery of Carlisle; in 1710 was chosen prolocutor of Convocation; in 1712 became Dean of Christ Church; and in 1713 was made Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster. To Atterbury is ascribed, with great likelihood, Dr Sacheverel's famous defence (1710) before the Lords; and he was author of the scarcely less famous Representation of the State of Religion (1711). He may well have aspired to the primacy; but the death of Queen Anne extinguished his hopes in that direction. His known character and Jacobite leanings made him no favourite with George I. In 1715 he refused to sign the bishops' declaration of fidelity, and in 1722 he was committed to the Tower for complicity in an attempt to restore the Stewarts. A bill of pains and penalties was passed; and Atterbury, who had defended himself with great ability, was deprived of all his offices, and for ever banished the kingdom. In 1723 he quitted England, and after a short stay at Brussels, settled in Paris, where he died, 15th February 1732. He was laid in a nameless grave in Westminster Abbey. His works comprise sermons, and letters to Pope, Swift, Bolingbroke, and others of his friends. See Canon Beeching's Life and Williams' Memoirs and Correspondence of Atterbury (2 vols. 1869).

Atticus, TRITUS POMPONIUS, born in Rome 109 B.C., was educated with Cicero and the younger Marins. In 85 B.C. he withdrew to Athens; and, after 65 B.C., when Sulla induced him to return to Rome, he still devoted himself chiefly to study and the pleasures of friendship. In 32 B.C. he was informed that a disorder he suffered from was mortal, and died after five days of voluntary starvation. A man of large wealth, and an Epicurean in philosophy, he was intimately acquainted with both Greek and Roman literature, and his taste was so good that Cicero used to send him his works for revision. None of his own writings have been preserved, but we have 396 epistles addressed to him by Cicero, ranging from 68 to 44 B.C. His life by Cornelius Nepos is a panegyric rather than a biography.

Attila (Ger. Etzel, Hungarian Ethele), the 'Scourge of God,' was born about 406, the son of Mundzuk. In 434 he and his brother Bleda succeeded their uncle Ruas as joint kings of countless hordes of Huns from Asia scattered from the north of the Caspian to the Danube. Attila put Bleda to death in 445, and becoming more and more mighty and formidable, soon had Vandals, Ostrogoths, Gepidae, and Franks fighting under his banner, so that ere long, while his headquarters were in Upper Hungary (near Tokay), his dominion extended over Germany and Scythia, from the Rhine to the frontiers of China. In 447 he devastated all the countries between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. The Emperor Theodosius was defeated in three bloody engagements, and Constantinople owed its safety solely to its fortifications and the ignorance of the enemy in the art of besieging; Thrace, Macedon, and Greece were overrun, and Theodosius was compelled to cede a territory south of the Danube, and to pay tribute. In 451 Attila invaded Gaul, but Aëtius, the Roman commander, and Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, compelled him to raise the siege of Orleans, and, after a fearful and bloody contest, utterly defeated him on the Catalaunian Plain, near Châlons-sur-Marne. Over 200,000 are said to have fallen on the field. Attila's strength was broken, and he retreated to Hungary, but next year made an incursion into Italy, devastating Aquileia, Milan, Padua, and other cities, and driving the terrified inhabitants into the Alps, the Apennines, and the lagoons of the Adriatic. Rome itself was saved from destruction by the personal mediation of Pope Leo I., who bought off the city with large sums—the more readily that the dread barbarian's army was sore stricken by pestilence. He died in 453, soon after his return to Pannonia, immediately after his marriage to the beautiful Burgundian Ildeco. After his death the Hunnish empire decayed, and Germanic and Scythian peoples gained their independence. Jornandes describes his low stature and powerful frame, his swarthy complexion, his large head, with small, brilliant, deep-seated eyes. See Gibbon's Decline and Fall, and the younger Thierry's Histoire d'Attila (1856).

Attwood, THOMAS (1765–1858), musician, during 1783–87 studied at Naples under Cinque and Latilla, at Vienna under Mozart, and was organist of St Paul's from 1796 till his death.

Atwood, GEORGE (1746–1807), a mathematician, tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge, who invented a machine to illustrate the relations of time, space, and velocity in the motion of a body falling under the action of gravity.

Aubanel, THÉODORE (1829–86), a Provençal playwright and lyric poet, by calling an Avignon printer. See monographs by Saint-Rémy (1882) and Mariéton (1883).

Auber, DANIEL FRANÇOIS ESPRIT, composer of operas, was born at Caen in Normandy, January 29, 1782, and died in Paris, May 13, 1871. His best-known works are La Muette de Portici, usually entitled Masaniello (1828), and Fra Diavolo (1829) [O-bair'].

Aubrey, JOHN, antiquary and folklorist, was born at Easton Percy, near Chippenham, Wiltshire, 12th March 1626, and was educated at Malmesbury, Blandford, and Trinity College, Oxford. He entered the Middle Temple in 1646, but was never called to the bar; in 1652 he succeeded to estates in Wiltshire, Herefordshire, and Wales, but was forced through lawsuits to part with the last of them in 1670, and with his books in 1677. His last years were passed, in 'danger of arrests,' with Hobbes, Ashmole, and other protectors, till in June 1697 he died at Oxford, on his way back from London to Draycott. Only his quaint, credulous Miscellanies (1696) was printed in his lifetime; but he left a large mass of materials. Of these, his Wiltshire and Surrey collections have in part been published; his Brief Lives (Hobbes, Milton, Bacon, &c.), given to Antony a Wood, appeared in Letters by Eminent Persons (1813), and were edited by A. Clark (2 vols. 1898); his Remains of Gentilism and Judaism was issued by the Folklore Society in 1880. See Masson in British Quarterly (1856).

Aubusson, PIERRE D'. See D'AUBUSSON.

Auchmuty, SIR SAMUEL, general, son of a New York clergyman (Samuel Auchmuty, 1722–77), was born there 22d June 1758, entered the British army as a volunteer in 1777, and during the revolutionary war served three campaigns against the American colonists. Having attained to a captaincy, he served in India (1783–97) at Seringapatam, &c. A lieutenant-colonel and G.C.B., he was one of Baird's chief lieutenants in the desert march to support Abercromby at Alexandria. He captured Montevideo in 1806, and afterwards commanded in the Carnatic, in Java, and in Ireland, where he died 11th August 1822.

Auckland, WILLIAM EDEN, LORD, statesman and diplomatist, third son of Sir Robert Eden, Bart., of West Auckland, Durham, was born 3d April 1744, educated at Eton and Oxford, and called to the bar in 1768. In 1772 he was appointed Under-secretary of State, and afterwards Lord of Trade, commissioner to treat with the American insurgents, chief secretary to the Irish viceroy, minister-plenipotentiary to France (concluding a commercial treaty with that country, 1786), ambassador to Spain, ambassador to Holland, and Postmaster-general. In 1788 he was raised to the Irish, in 1793 to the British, peerage as Baron Auckland. He died May 28, 1814. Besides Principles of the Penal Law (1771), we have his Journal and Correspondence (4 vols. 1860–62).—His son, GEORGE EDEN, EARL OF AUCKLAND, was born at Eden Farm, near Beckenham, Kent, 24th August 1784, and in 1814 succeeded as Lord Auckland. A steadfast supporter of reform, he held two or three offices, and in 1835 was appointed governor-general of India. As such, in 1838, he plunged into the unhappy Afghan war, whose successful beginning procured him, in 1839, the title of Earl of Auckland. Superseded in 1841, he returned to England, and died unmarried at the Grange, near Alesford, Hants, 1st January 1849. See Trotter's Earl of Auckland (1893).

Audebert, JEAN BAPTISTE (1759–1800), a French naturalist and artist, best known by his Histoire Naturelle des Singes. [Ohd-bair'].

Audley, SIR JAMES, one of the original knights of the Order of the Garter, founded in 1344 by Edward III., in 1350 fought in the sea-fight of Sluys, and in 1354 attended Edward the Black Prince to France. He showed such valour at Poitiers that the Prince declared him the bravest knight on his side. Audley in 1362 was governor of Aquitaine, in 1369 great seneschal of Poitou. He took part that same year in the capture of La-Roche-sur-Yon, and died a few months after at Fontenay-le-Comte.

Audley, THOMAS, LORD (1488-1544), in 1529 became Speaker of the House of Commons, and in 1532 Lord Chancellor.

Audouin, JEAN VICTOR (1797-1841), a French entomologist. [Oh-doo-an'.]

Audran, EDMOND (1842-1901), a French composer of operettas, born at Lyons.

Audran, GÉRARD (1640-1703), French engraver, like his nephews, Benoit (1661-1721) and Jean (1667-1756). See Duplessis, Les Audran (1892).

Audubon, JOHN JAMES, ornithologist, was born near New Orleans, Louisiana, May 4, 1780. His father, a French naval officer, went to San Domingo; and there his mother, a lady of Spanish extraction, perished in the negro insurrection. The elder Audubon settled in Nantes, and resumed his duties in the French navy; and through his stepmother's indulgence young Audubon gratified his taste as a naturalist while studying painting under David, until in 1797 he was sent to America to occupy a property in Eastern Pennsylvania, which his father had purchased. Here he married in 1808 Lucy Bakewell, daughter of an English settler. Immediately after, he sold his land, and migrated westward to become a merchant—first in Kentucky and then in Missouri. But as he was chiefly engaged in bird-hunting, and trading was left to his partner Rosier, business did not thrive; and for a time he supported his family by painting portraits at Cincinnati, Louisville, Kentucky, and elsewhere. In 1820 he left Cincinnati without a dollar, on an excursion down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, stopping at the principal towns and drawing portraits, and adding to his already wonderful collection of coloured designs of birds. After a precarious existence of this sort for some three years, Audubon visited the cities of the Atlantic coast with the view of publishing his works; but meeting with little encouragement, he returned (1820) to Louisiana, and taught music and dancing in a school his wife had established. Encouraged and assisted by her, he embarked for Europe in 1826. Public exhibitions of his drawings in Liverpool and Edinburgh proved successful, and in 1827 he issued the prospectus of his great work, The Birds of America. Painting pictures to defray his expenses, he in 1828 visited Paris, where his work received the highest encomiums from Cuvier. The work (1830-39) embraces coloured figures of 1065 birds (natural size), and is said to have cost £20,000 ($100,000). Meanwhile, Audubon explored the least-known regions of the Atlantic coast from Labrador to the Gulf of Mexico, returning to London in 1837. In 1839 he settled in New York, visited the Yellowstone in 1843, and with his sons published The Quadrupeds of North America. He died 27th Jan. 1851. See Life by Mrs St John (1856); that, practically an autobiography, edited by R. Buchanan (1868); and Maria R. Audubon's Audubon and his Journals (1898).

Auerbach, BERTHOLD, German novelist, was born, of Jewish parentage, at Nordstetten, in the Württemberg Black Forest, 28th February 1812. He received his education at the Talmud school of Hechingen, at Karlsruhe, at Stuttgart gymnasium, and at the universities of Tübingen, Munich, and Heidelberg, in 1836 suffering several months' imprisonment in the fortress of Hohenasperg as a member of the students' Burschenschaft. He had been destined for the synagogue, but had early abandoned theology for law, then law for history and philosophy—the philosophy, above all, of the great thinker of his race, Spinoza. A biographical romance, based on Spinoza's life, succeeded in 1837 his earliest work, Das Judentum und die neueste Litteratur (1836), and itself was followed by a translation of Spinoza's works (5 vols. 1841). In the first series of his Schwarzwälder Dorfgeschichten (1843), on which his fame chiefly rests, he gives charming pictures of Black Forest life, though his peasants too often are peasant Spinozas. The longer stories—Darfüssele (1856), Joseph im Schnee (1861), and Edelweiss (1861)—are good, but not so good; but the three-volume didactic romances of the third and last period of his literary career, though clever of course, are tedious to a degree. These were Auf der Höhe (1865), Das Landhaus am Rhein (1869), Waldfried (1874), &c. After a restless life, passed at Frankfurt, Vienna, Dresden, Berlin, &c., he died at Cannes, 8th February 1882. See Berthold Auerbach, eine Gedenkrede (1882), and two volumes of his Correspondence (1884).

Auersperg, ANTON ALEXANDER, GRAF VON (1806-76), an Austrian poet, distinguished by his Liberalism and ultra-German sympathies, but best known under the nom de plume of Anastasius Grün as one of the German epic and lyrical poets, among whom he holds a high rank. His collected works fill 7 vols. (1877). See the Life by Radicz (2 vols. 1876-78).

Aufrecht, THEODOR (1822-1907), philologist, born at Leschütz in Upper Silesia, in 1852 was appointed to a post in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. In 1862 he became professor of Sanskrit at Edinburgh, and in 1875 resigned the chair for one at Bonn. [Oh-frehht.]

Augereau, PIERRE FRANÇOIS CHARLES (1757-1816), Duke of Castiglione, marshal and peer of France, one of the most brilliant of Napoleon's generals, was the son of a Paris fruiterer, in 1787 settled in Naples as a fencing-master, and subsequently fought at Lodi, Castiglione, Rovredo, Jena, Eylau, and Leipzig. [Oh-rö.]

Augier, GUILLAUME VICTOR ÉMILE (1820-89), a French dramatist; his masterpiece, Les Fourchambault (1874). His Théâtre complet fills 7 vols. (1889). See monographs by Pailleron (1889) and Parigot (1890). [O-zhe-ay'.]

Augusti, JOHANN CHRISTIAN WILHELM (1772-1841), a German theologian, at first a decided rationalist, but subsequently an orthodox Lutheran. [Ow-goos'tee.]

Augustine, St. AURELIUS AUGUSTINUS, the greatest of the Latin fathers, was born at Tagaste in Numidia, 12th November 353 A.D. His father, a magistrate, was a heathen till advanced in years; his mother was the saintly Monica. The gifted boy was sent to Carthage to complete his studies, but yielded to the temptation of the second city of the empire. Before he had reached his eighteenth year, his mistress bore him a son, Adeodatus. What seems to have first stirred his deeper being was a passage in the Hortensius of Cicero on the value of philosophy; and fascinated by the pretensions of the Manichean sect to supply 'a satisfactory solution of all things human and divine,' he became a professed Manichean. He afterwards lectured on literature, first at Tagaste and then at Carthage. Here he wrote, in his twenty-seventh year, his first work, a (lost) treatise on aesthetics. His spiritual nature became more imperative in its demands, and he forsook the Manicheans in disgust. In 383 he went to Rome, but soon settled in Milan as a teacher of rhetoric, and became a friend of the bishop, the eloquent and devout St Ambrose. He was now an enthusiastic student of Plato, and also zealously studied the Bible. At last he became a decided Christian, and was baptised by Ambrose in 387, along with his natural son Adeodatus. Before leaving Italy for Africa, Augustine wrote treatises against the Manicheans and on Free Will; other works he wrote after his return. In 391 he was ordained a priest by Valerius, Bishop of Hippo in Numidia, whose colleague he became in 395. Then ensued the great Donatist and Pelagian controversies; and Augustine proved a most formidable and relentless antagonist to both heretical schools. In 397 appeared his Confessions—a sacred autobiography of one of the greatest intellects the world has seen. In 413-426 he produced his De Civitate Dei, a profound and masterly vindication of the Christian church, conceived of as a new order rising on the ruins of the old Roman empire—though here as elsewhere the powerful intellect is frequently misled by defective scholarship, for of Greek 'Augustine knew little, and of Hebrew nothing.' In 428 Augustine published his Retractions, in which he frankly acknowledges the errors and mistakes in his works. In 430 the Vandals, under Genseric, besieged Hippo; and Augustine died on 28th August in the third month of the siege. The central tenets of his creed were the corruption of human nature through the fall of man, the consequent slavery of the human will, predestination, election and reprobation, and the perseverance of the saints. It was not by his controversial writings merely, but by his profound conception of Christianity and the religious life, and by his personal fervour and force of character that Augustine moulded the spirit of the Christian church for centuries, so that at the Reformation Protestants and Catholics alike appealed to his authority. Calvinism is by many regarded as little more than a reassertion of Augustinianism, though this is denied by the Catholic Church; and Jansenism professed to be the true expression of Augustine's views.

The best complete edition of his works is that of the Benedictines (1679-1700), reprinted in 16 vols., of Migne's Patrologia Latina. A complete English translation was published at Edinburgh in 15 vols. (1872-80) under the editorship of Dr Marcus Dods. See, besides the church histories, German monographs by Cloth (1840), Bindemann (1844-69), Dorner (1873), Böhringer (1878), and Reuter (1887); Poujoulat's, in French (6th ed. 1875); W. Cunningham's Hulsean Lecture for 1885; Augustine's Letters, edited by Mary Allies (1890); and Dr Schaff's St Chrysostom and St Augustine (1891).

Augustine, or AUSTIN, Sr, first Archbishop of Canterbury, was prior of the Benedictine monastery of St Andrew at Rome, when, in 596, he was sent, with forty other monks, by Pope Gregory I., to convert the Anglo-Saxons to Christianity, and establish the authority of the Roman see in Britain. Landing in Thanet, the missionaries were kindly received by Ethelbert, king of Kent, whose wife Bertha, daughter of the Frankish king, was a Christian. A residence was assigned to them at Canterbury, where they devoted themselves to monastic exercises and preaching. The conversion and baptism of the king contributed greatly to the success of their efforts among his subjects, and it is recorded that in one day Augustine baptised 10,000 persons in the river Swale. In 597 he went to Arles, and there was consecrated Bishop of the English. His efforts to extend his authority over the native British (Welsh) church, with whose bishops he held a conference in 608 at Aust on the Severn, were less successful. He died 26th May 604, and in 612 his body was translated to his abbey of SS. Peter and Paul, its site now occupied by St Augustine's Missionary College (1848). See works by Cutts (1895) and Mason (1897).

Augustulus, ROMULUS, the last emperor (475-476 B.C.) of the western half of the old Roman empire. His father, Orestes, a Pannonian, had risen to high rank under the Emperor Julius Nepos, on whose flight he conferred the vacant throne on Augustus (the diminutive Augustulus was a nickname), retaining all substantial power in his own hands. Orestes failing to conciliate the barbarians who had helped him against the emperor, they, under Odoacer, besieged him in Pavia, and killed him. Augustulus yielded at once, and being of too little consequence to be put to death, was dismissed to a villa near Naples with an annual pension of 6000 pieces of gold.

Augustus, CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS, first Roman emperor, was born in 63 B.C., the son of Caius Octavius, senator and prætor, and Atia, Julius Cæsar's niece. His grand-uncle adopted him as his son and heir. At the time of Cæsar's assassination (44 B.C.) Augustus was a student under the orator Apollodorus, at Apollonia in Illyricum, but returned at once to Rome. Mark Antony at first refused to surrender Cæsar's property; but after some fighting, in which Antony was forced to flee across the Alps, Augustus obtained the consulship, and carried out Cæsar's will. When Antony returned from Gaul with Lepidus, Augustus threw off the republican mask, and joined them in establishing a triumvirate. He obtained Africa, Sardinia, and Sicily; Antony, Gaul; and Lepidus, Spain. Their power was soon made absolute by the massacre of those unfriendly to them in Italy, and by the victory at Philippi over the republicans under Brutus and Cassius. Difficulties between Augustus and Antony, raised by Fulvia, Antony's wife, were removed by her death and Antony's marriage with Octavia, sister of Augustus. Shortly afterwards the Roman world was divided anew, Augustus taking the western half, and Antony the eastern, whilst Lepidus had to content himself with Africa. While Antony was lost in dissipation at the court of Cleopatra, Augustus was striving to gain the confidence of the Roman people. War was at length declared against the Egyptian queen, and by the naval victory at Actium (31 B.C.) Augustus became sole ruler of the Roman world. Antony and Cleopatra committed suicide; Antony's son by Fulvia, and Cæsarion, son of Cæsar and Cleopatra, were put to death; and in 29 B.C., after regulating affairs in Egypt, Greece, Syria, and Asia Minor, Augustus returned to Rome in triumph, and, closing the temple of Janus, proclaimed universal peace.

His subsequent measures were mild and prudent, and he reformed many abuses. Republican names and forms still remained, but they were mere shadows; and Octavian, henceforward known by the new title of Augustus ('sacred', 'venerable'), was, in all but name, absolute monarch. After a course of victories in Asia, Spain, Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Gaul, he suffered the one crushing defeat of his long rule (9 B.C.), when the Roman army under Varus was annihilated by the Germans under Arminius (q.v.). Thenceforth he confined himself to domestic improvement and reform, and so beautified Rome, that it was said, 'Augustus found the city built of brick, and left it built of marble.' He also built cities in several parts of the empire; altars were raised to commemorate his beneficence; and the name Augustus was given to the month Sexilis. Age, domestic sorrow, and failing health warned him to seek repose in Campania; but his infirmity increased, and he died at Nola in 14 A.D. He was succeeded by his step-son, Tiberius. Augustus had consummate tact as a ruler, and skilfully used the passions and talents of others; but his best measures originated mostly with himself. Horace, Virgil, Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus, and Livy were the glory of the Augustan Age, a name since given in France to the reign of Louis XIV., in England to that of Queen Anne. See E. S. Shuckburgh's Augustus (1908).

Augustus (1526-86), Elector of Saxony, is chiefly notable as having first used his utmost influence in favour of the Calvinistic doctrine of the sacraments; and then, becoming Lutheran, in 1574 persecuted the Calvinists. But he gave a great impetus to education, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. The Dresden library and most of the galleries owe their origin to him.—AUGUSTUS II. (1670-1733), Elector of Saxony and king of Poland, was nicknamed 'the Strong.' After fighting the Turks with credit, he became a candidate for the throne of Poland; and, adopting the Catholic faith, was elected king by the venal nobles (1697). His efforts to recover the provinces lost to Sweden led to his defeat, his deposition from the kingdom, and the election of Stanislas Leszcynski (1704). On the defeat of Charles XII. at Pultowa, in 1709, he marched into Poland, formed a fresh alliance with the czar, and recommenced a war with Sweden, which raged till the death of Charles XII. (1718). The rival king had disappeared, and Augustus kept the crown of Poland till his death. The Saxon court became known as the most dissolute in Europe. Maurice (q.v.) of Saxony was one of his illegitimate children (said to number 300!); his only legitimate son, AUGUSTUS III. (1696-1763), succeeded as Elector of Saxony in 1733, and by help of Russia drove out Stanislas once more and became king of Poland (1734). He took Maria Theresa's side, and was vanquished by Frederick the Great. Count Brühl (q.v.) was his minister.

Aumale, CHARLES DE LORRAINE, DUC D' (1556-1631), one of the leaders of the League against the Huguenots, was defeated by Henry IV. at Arques and Ivry, went over to the Spaniards, was condemned to be broken alive on the wheel, and lived in exile till his death. [O-mah'.]

Aumale, HENRI-EUGÈNE-PHILIPPE-LOUIS D'ORLÈANS, DUC D', fourth son of King Louis-Philippe, was born at Paris, January 16, 1822, and greatly distinguished himself in the campaigns in Algeria, where in 1847 he succeeded Marshal Bugeaud as governor-general. On the revolution of 1848 he retired to England. Here he became known by his contributions to the Revue des Deux Mondes, his incisive pamphlets against Louis Napoleon, and his great works, Histoire des Princes de Condé (1869-97) and Les Institutions militaires de la France (1867). He might not serve in the Franco-German war, but in 1871 was elected to the Assembly, and in 1873 presided over Bazaine's court-martial, but in 1883 was disqualified from further military command. An Academician since 1871, in 1886 he bequeathed his magnificent chateau of Chantilly to the Institute. The decree expelling him from France was revoked in 1889. His wife died in 1867, his two sons in 1866 and 1872; and he himself died 6th May 1897, through the shock of the burning of his niece, the Duchesse d'Alençon, at the Paris bazaar.

Aungerville, RICHARD (1281-1345), churchman, is known as Richard de Bury, from his birth-place, Bury St Edmunds. He studied at Oxford, became a Benedictine monk at Durham, and having been tutor to Edward III., was made successively Dean of Wells and Bishop of Durham, besides acting for a time as high chancellor, as ambassador to France and Germany, and as commissioner for a truce with Scotland. He had a passion for collecting manuscripts and books; and his principal work, Philobiblon, intended to serve as a handbook to the library which he founded in connection with Durham College at Oxford (afterwards suppressed), describes the state of learning in England and France. See E. C. Thomas's edition of the Philobiblon (1888).

Aurelianus, LUCIUS DOMITIUS, Roman emperor, was born, a husbandman's son, in Dacia or Pannonia, about 212 A.D., and enlisting early as a common soldier, rose rapidly to the highest military offices. On the death of Claudius (270), Aurelian was elected emperor by the army, with whom his great stature, strength, and courage had made him very popular. He repulsed the Alemanni and Marcomanni, and erected new walls round Rome. He resigned Dacia to the Goths, and made the Danube the frontier of the empire. He defeated Zenobia (q.v.), besieged her in Palmyra, and took her prisoner. When an insurrection broke out again in Palmyra, he returned in 273, and gave the splendid city up to destruction. Aurelian quelled a rebellion in Egypt, and recovered Gaul from Tetricus. By restoring good discipline in the army, order in domestic affairs, and political unity to the Roman dominions, he merited the title awarded him by the senate—'Restorer of the Roman Empire.' He was assassinated near Byzantium during a campaign against the Persians (275).

Aurelius. MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS, Roman emperor, and one of the noblest figures in history, was the son of Annus Verus and Domitia Calvilla, and was born at Rome, 26th April 121 A.D. His original name was Marcus Annus Verus. When only seventeen years of age he was adopted by Antoninus Pius, who had succeeded Hadrian, and whose daughter Faustina was selected for his wife. From 140 A.D., when he was made consul, to the death of Pius in 161, he discharged his public duties with the utmost fidelity, and maintained the kindest relations with the emperor; while at the same time he still devoted himself with zeal to the study of law and philosophy, especially the Stoic philosophy. On his accession to the throne, with characteristic magnanimity he voluntarily divided the government with his brother by adoption, Lucius Aurelius Verus, who in 161 was sent to take command against the Parthians. The generals obtained a victory—not final—in spite of the self-indulgence and luxury of Verus; and the victorious army brought back with it a dreadful pestilence that long scourged Rome. The peaceful Marcus Aurelius was throughout his reign destined to suffer from constant wars, and though in Asia, in Britain, and on the Rhine the barbarians were checked, permanent peace was never secured. Rome was suffering from pestilence, earthquakes, and inundations when the imperial colleagues led the Roman armies against the northern barbarians on the Danube. The Marcomanni were humbled in 168, and in 173 almost annihilated in retreating across the Danube. Verus had died in 169. The victory over another Germanic tribe, the Quadi, in 174 A.D., was attributed by the Christians to the prayers of what afterwards became known as the 'Thundering Legion' (because of a fierce and unexpected thunder-storm which confounded the enemy). He was next summoned to the East by a rebellion of the governor, Avidius Cassius, who, before Aurelius arrived, had fallen by an assassin's hand. Meanwhile, his wife Faustina (q.v.), whom the emperor tenderly loved in spite of stories to her discredit, died in an obscure village at the foot of Mount Taurus. On his way home he visited Lower Egypt and Greece. At Athens he showed his catholicity by founding chairs of philosophy for each of the four chief sects—Platonic, Stoic, Peripatetic, and Epicurean. Towards the close of 176 he reached Italy, and next autumn departed for Germany, where fresh disturbances had broken out. Victory again crowned his arms; but his constitution, never robust, at length gave way, and he died either at Vienna or at Sirmium in Pannonia, 17th March 180.

Marcus Aurelius was the flower of the Stoic philosophy; and few books have had such a potent charm as his Meditations. His sentences reveal the loneliness of his soul, but they show us that he did not suffer himself to be embittered as well as saddened by his experience of life. His death was felt to be a national calamity; he became almost an object of worship to the citizens of the empire, and was believed to appear in dreams like the saints of subsequent Christian ages. Aurelius twice persecuted the Christians: in the first persecution (166) Polycarp perished; in the second (177), Irenæus. He doubtless believed that what he regarded as Christian fanaticism and superstition were dangerous to true philosophy, to society, and to the empire.

There are editions of the Meditations (which were written in Greek) by Gataker (1652) and Stich (1882); and English translations by Jeremy Collier (new ed. 1887), George Long (1869), and others. See Renan's Marc Aurèle (1882; trans. 1888); the Life by Watson (New York, 1884); Farrar's Seekers after God (1868); and Matthew Arnold's Essays in Criticism (new ed. 1888).

Aurelle de Paladine, LOUIS JEAN BAPTISTE D', general (1804-77), served in Roume, Algeria, and the Crimea. In 1870 he commanded the Loire army; and he sat in the National Assembly and in the Senate.

Aurungzebe (Aurangzib, 'Ornament of the Throne'), the most magnificent of the Mogul emperors of India, was born in 1618, and was the third son of Shah-Jehan, who in 1657 was seized with a serious illness. The reins of power were at once seized by the eldest son, Dara, who was attacked by another brother, Shuja, governor of Bengal. Aurungzebe's policy was to let the two fight it out, and then play off his next brother against the victor. By this time, however, Shah-Jehan had somewhat recovered; so Aurungzebe, professing the utmost loyalty, made him a prisoner; and the old man, still in confinement, died in the seventh year of his undutiful son's reign. Aurungzebe ultimately seized and confined his too confiding brother Murad; and after a struggle of three years, Dara and Shuja also fell into his power, and all three were put to death. The sceptre was now firmly within his grasp. His long reign of half a century was distinguished by great outward prosperity; but the empire was diseased at its heart. Everywhere there was distrust; the emperor, who had established his throne by fraud, was naturally enough distrusted by all. His sons imitated him in his disobedience to his father, and the Hindus, whom he treated with great harshness, excited the Mahrattas against him in the south. Some of the minor Mohammedan princes were subdued, but the Hindu states were gathering strength for the overthrow of the Mogul power. Most of his enterprises failed; and he may be said to have ruined the empire. His later years were passed in the fear of receiving the measure he had meted to others, and he died, a fugitive before the Mahrattas, at Ahmednagar, in February 1707. See Stanley Lane-Poole's Aurangzib (1893).

Ausonius, DECIUS MAGNUS, foremost Latin poet of the 4th century, was born at Burdigala (Bordeaux) about 309 A.D. He was appointed by Valentinian tutor to his son Gratian; and he afterwards held the offices of quaestor, prefect of Latium, and consul of Gaul. On the death of Gratian, Ausonius retired to his estate at Bordeaux, where he occupied himself with literature and rural pursuits until his death (392). It is most probable that he was a Christian. His works include epigrams, poems on his deceased relatives and on his colleagues, epistles in verse and prose, and idylls. In spite of his grace of expression, Ausonius is but a poor poet. The best edition is Schenk's (Berl. 1883).

Austen, JANE, one of the greater English novelists, was born December 16, 1775, at Steventon Rectory, Hampshire, her home for twenty-five years. She was the youngest of seven children, six of them boys, of whom two rose to be admirals. Her father, who took pupils, gave her a better education than was common then for girls; she learned French and Italian, and had a good acquaintance with English literature, her favourite authors being Richardson, Johnson, Crabbe, Cowper, and, later, Scott. She sang a few old ballads with much sweetness, and was very dexterous with her needle. She grew up tall and remarkably graceful in person, with bright hazel eyes, fine features, rich colour, and beautiful brown curly hair. Her disposition was very sweet and charming, and she was an especial favourite with children, whom she used to delight with her long improvised stories. In her life there is a hint of an affection for a lover who died suddenly, but there is no trace of such a tragedy in her books, which are cheerful and wholesome throughout, free from anything morbid or bitter. In 1801 she went with her family to Bath, and after her father's death in 1805, removed to Southampton, and finally, in 1809, to Chawton near Winchester. She had written stories from her childhood, but it was here that she first gave anything to the world. Four stories were published anonymously during her lifetime—Sense and Sensibility (1811), Pride and Prejudice (1813), Mansfield Park (1814), and Emma (1816). The first two were written before she was more than two-and-twenty. Early in 1816 her health began to give way. In the May of 1817 she came for medical advice to Winchester, and here she died, July 18. She was buried in the cathedral. Northanger Abbey and Persuasion were published in 1818, when the authorship of the whole s's was first acknowledged. See Lives by J. E. Austen Leigh (2d ed. 1871), Sarah Tytler (1880), Mrs Malden, Goldwin Smith, O. F. Adams (1897), W. H. Pollock (1899), and Miss Hill (1902); Miss Thackeray's Book of Sibyls (1883); and Austin Dobson's introductions to the novels (1895-97).

Austin, ALFRED, born of Catholic parents at Headingley, Leeds, May 30, 1835, was educated at Stonyhurst and Oscott, graduated at the University of London in 1853, and was called to the bar in 1857. He has published The Season: a Satire (1861), The Human Tragedy (1862), The Conversion of Winkelmann (1897), and a dozen more volumes of poems, and an Autobiography (1911). In 1883-93 he was editor of the National Review, in 1896 became poet-laureate.

Austin, JOHN, writer on jurisprudence, was born at Creeting Mill, Suffolk, March 3, 1790. He served in the army in Sicily, but in 1818 was called to the bar. In 1820 he married Miss Sarah Taylor of Norwich, and in 1826 he was appointed professor of Jurisprudence in the newly founded university of London (now University College); to fit himself for his duties, he read law at Bonn (1827). His lectures were well received by a few distinguished men; but the subject was not recognised as a necessary branch of legal study, and from lack of students, Austin resigned the chair (1832). His Province of Jurisprudence Determined, defining (on a utilitarian basis) the sphere of ethics and law, was at first little read; but by-and-by it practically revolutionised English views on the subject, and introduced a definiteness of terminology hitherto unknown. In 1833 he was appointed a member of the Criminal Law Commission; in 1836 he did not believe that the public received any advantage from such bodies. 'If they would give me £200 a year,' he said, 'for two years, I would shut myself up in a garret, and at the end of that time I would produce a complete map of the whole field of crime, and a draft of a criminal code.' Austin was afterwards appointed a member of a commission on Maltese grievances. His health was bad. In 1841-44 he lived in Germany, and in 1844-48 in Paris. The revolution of 1848 drove him back to England, and he then settled at Weybridge, where he died in December 1859. His Lectures on Jurisprudence were published after his death by his widow (1863; new ed. by Campbell, 1869). See the Memoir by Mrs Austin, prefixed to the new edition of the Province (1861).—His wife, SARAH AUSTIN (1793-1867), bore him one child, Lady Duff Gordon (q.v.). A remarkably gifted woman, she is known by her translations from German and French, including Ranke's Popes and Guizot's Civilisation. She also wrote works on Germany and national education. See Three Generations of Englishwomen (1889), by Janet Ross, daughter of Lady Duff Gordon.—CHARLES AUSTIN (1799-1874), John's brother, was educated at Bury and Jesus College, Cambridge, called to the bar in 1827, and made a Q.C. in 1841. During the railway mania he realised an enormous fortune as a parliamentary lawyer; in 1848 he retired. So that this first of lawyers and most eloquent of Benthamites, who to Mill had seemed 'capable of dominating the world,' died a country squire at Brandeston Hall, in Suffolk. See L. Tollemache's Safe Studies (1891).

Avenzoar (properly Ibn Zohr, c. 1072-1162), Arabian physician and author on medicine at Seville in Spain, praised by his pupil Averroës.

Averroës, or AVERROES (properly Ibn Roshd), the most famous of the Arabian philosophers, was born at Cordova in Spain, in 1126, and was the son of the Kadi there. He himself was Kadi successively in Cordova, Seville, and Morocco; and though for a time stripped of all honours and banished, he was restored again by a new calif to his dignities at Morocco, where he died in 1198. He was an indefatigable and acute commentator on Aristotle's writings, and hence was called 'the Expositor.' It was, however, to Alexandrian or Neoplatonic influences that he owed his doctrine of a Universal Reason (other than the individual reasons), indivisible, but shared in by all; he denied, too, the immortality of individual men. He expounded the Koran according to Aristotle, and so founded a Moslem philosophy of religion, the cause of many heresies. He profoundly influenced many of the great scholastics, though ultimately Averroists were condemned by Leo X. Most of his writings are known to us only through Latin translations; the great edition being that of 1552 (11 vols. folio, Venice). Averroës also wrote a sort of medical system, which, under the name of Colliget, was translated into Latin, and repeatedly printed. See Renan's Averroës (2d ed. 1860), and Lafinio's Studii sopra Averroë (1875).

Avia'nus, FLAVIUS, a 4th-century Latin author of fables in poor elegiac verse. See vol. iii. of Hervieux' Les Fabulistes Latins (1893).

Avicebron (or Ibn Gabirol), Jewish poet and philosopher, was born in 1020 at Malaga, and died about 1070 at Valencia. His great work, Fons Vitæ, translated from the Arabic, is largely Neoplatonist. [A-vee'-se-bron.]

Avicenna (Arabic Ibn Sina), Arab philosopher and physician, born 980 near Bokhara, was physician to several sultans, and for some time vizier in Hamadan, in Persia, where he died in 1037. His philosophy was Aristotelianism modified by Neoplatonism; his medical system was long the standard. See Forget's edition of his Book of Theorems (Leyden, 1892).

Avienus, RUFUS FESTUS, a Latin descriptive poet, who flourished about 375 A.D. See Holder's edition (Innsbruck, 1887).

Avila, GIL GONZALEZ D' (1577-1658), royal historiographer for Castile.

Avila y Zuñiga, LUIZ DE (c. 1490-1550), Spanish general, diplomatist, and author of a history of Charles V.'s German wars. Charles V. intrusted him with embassies to Popes Paul IV. and Pius IV.; and he accompanied the emperor on his expedition against the German Protestant princes. His Comentarios (1547) were translated into several languages.

Avison, CHARLES (c. 1710-70), composer, was born and died at Newcastle. He figures in Browning's Parleyings.

Avogadro, AMEDEO (1776-1856), professor of Physics at Turin, formulated his law as to the Atomic Theory in 1811.

Axel, or ABSALON (1128-1201), Archbishop of Lund from 1177, was also minister to Valdemar I. and Canute VI. of Denmark.

Aya'la, PEDRO LOPEZ DE (1332-1407), a brave soldier and able statesman, who held high office under several kings of Castile, and wrote the Cronicas de los Reyes de Castilla (best ed. 1780), and a didactic and satirical poem begun during his captivity in England (1367). — ADELARDO LOPEZ DE AYALA (1829-79) was likewise a poet and statesman.

Ayeshah, or AISHA (610-677 A.D.), the favourite of the nine wives of Mohammed, bore him no children. On Mohammed's death on 8th June 632, she resisted Ali, the Prophet's son-in-law, and secured the califate for her own father, Abu-Bekr (q.v.).

Aylmer, JOHN, Bishop of London, was born in 1521 at Aylmer Hall, Tivetshall St Mary, Norfolk, and in 1541 graduated B.A. of Cambridge. Taking orders, he became tutor to Lady Jane Grey; in 1553 was installed Archdeacon of Stow, in 1562 of Lincoln, having lived abroad during the Marian persecution; and finally, in 1577, was consecrated Bishop of London. Under the designation of 'Morrell,' he is described in Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar as the 'proude and ambitious pastoure'—a fair enough estimate of one who showed equal rigour to Catholics and Puritans, and was always quarrelsome and arbitrary. He died 3d June 1594.

Aymon, or HAIMON, Count of Dordogne, whose sons, Alard, Richard, Guichard, and Renaut, were the chief heroes of one of the finest romances of the Carolingian cycle.

Ayrer, JACOB, next to Hans Sachs the most prolific German dramatist of the 16th century. He was a citizen of Nuremberg in 1594, and a procurator in the courts of law.

Ayton, SIR ROBERT (1570-1638), a Scottish poet and courtier, knighted by James I. in 1612. He was one of the first Scotsmen who wrote in English with any degree of elegance and purity. 'I do confess thou'rt smooth and fair,' and the prototype of 'Auld Lang Syne,' have been ascribed to him, but on scant authority. See his Poems, with Memoir by Dr C. Rogers (1871).

Aytoun, WILLIAM EDMONSTONE, born in Edinburgh, 21st June 1813, was educated at the Academy and the university, and for some months studied German at Aschaffenburg. In 1835 he became, like his father, a Writer to the Signet, and in 1840 was called to the Scottish bar. To his mother he owed his love of ballad-lore and Jacobitism, and, taking early to literary work, he entered in 1836 on his lifelong connection with Blackwood's; in 1845 was appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in Edinburgh University, and in five years quintupled the number of his hearers. In 1849 he married a daughter of Professor Wilson; in 1852 was made sheriff of Orkney; and next year received from Oxford the honorary degree of D.C.L. His works include Poland, Homer, and Other Poems (1832); Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers (1848); Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy (1854); Bon Gaultier Ballads (1855) and Poems of Goethe (1858), both produced conjointly with Theodore Martin; Bothwell (1856); and Norman Sinclair (1861), a semi-autobiographical novel. He died at Blackhills, near Elgin, 4th August 1865. See his Life by Sir Theodore Martin (1867).

Azeglio, MASSIMO TAPARELLI, MARCHESE D' (1798-1866), an Italian statesman, landscape-painter, publicist, and romance-writer. See Lives by Massari (1867), Pavesio (1871), and Bianchi (1884). [Ad-azyl'yo.]

Azu'ni, DOMENICO ALBERTO (1749-1827), a Sardinian jurist.

BADER, FRANZ XAVER VON, a Roman Catholic theologian and mystical philosopher, who drew largely from the writings of Jacob Boehme, was born at Munich, March 27, 1765, and died there, May 23, 1841. See Life prefixed to his complete works (16 vols. Leip. 1850-60), and that by Claassen (2 vols. Stuttg. 1886-87).

Babbage, CHARLES, born 26th December 1791, at Totnes, Devon, entered Trinity College, Cambridge in 1811, but graduated from Peterhouse in 1814. Two years later he was elected an F.R.S., and from 1828 to 1838 filled the sinecure of Lucasian professor of Mathematics at Cambridge. As early as 1812 the idea had occurred to him of a calculating machine, and by 1822 he had constructed a small model of one. A larger and improved machine, having cost £6000 of his own money and £17,000 of the nation's, was abandoned by government in 1842, after eight years of circumlocution, and is now preserved in an unfinished state in the South Kensington Museum. Of eighty writings by him may be noted his Table of Logarithms (1827), On the Economy of Manufactures and Machinery (1832), and the autobiographical Passages from the Life of a Philosopher (1864). In his later years he was chiefly known by his fierce hostility to organ-grinders. He died 18th October 1871.

Bâb-ed-Din ('gate of righteousness'), the title assumed by Mirza Ali Mohammed, who in 1843 formed a new faith composed of Mohammedan, Christian, Jewish, and Parsee elements (still known as Babism), and after a long imprisonment was put to death in 1850.

Bab'er (Zehir-Eddin Mohammed), the first of the Great Moguls in India, a descendant of Timur, was born in 1483, and was barely twelve when he succeeded his father in the sovereignty of the countries lying between Samarkand and the Indus. Having made himself master of Kashgar, Kunduz, Kandahar, and Kabul, in April 1526 he routed at Panipat the vast army of the Afghan emperor of Delhi, and entered the capital; Agra next month surrendered. Baber died in 1530. See his autobiography (trans. by Leyden and Erskine, 1826; abridged by Caldecott, 1844).

Babeuf, FRANÇOIS NOEL, born in 1762 or 1764 at St Quentin, was a land-surveyor at Roye in Picardy, when on the outbreak of the Revolution in 1789 he attached himself to the most extreme party. As 'Gracchus Babeuf,' in his Tribun du Peuple, he advocated a rigorous system of communism; and a secret conspiracy was formed, its aim the destruction of the Directory and the establishment of an extreme democratic and communistic system. The plot was discovered, and Babeuf guillotined, 27th May 1797. See Lives by Fleury (1851) and Advielle (1885).

Babinet, JACQUES (1794-1872), a French physician and meteorologist. [Bab'ee-nay.]

Babington, ANTONY, was born of an old Catholic family at Dethick, Derbyshire, in 1561. Young, handsome, rich, left an orphan at ten years of age, he had served as page to Queen Mary of Scotland, then a prisoner at Sheffield, when in 1586, some seven years after his marriage, he was induced by Ballard and other Catholic emissaries to put himself at the head of a conspiracy that had for its object Elizabeth's murder and Mary's release. The plot was betrayed, and after hiding in the depths of St John's Wood and at Harrow, he was taken, and with thirteen others condemned to die. His prayers for mercy were all in vain, and on 20th September 1586, he followed Ballard to the scaffold.

Babington, BENJAMIN GUY, M.D. (1794-1866), orientalist, was born in Guy's Hospital, and was physician there 1837-55.

Babington, CHARLES CARDALE (1808-95), born at Ludlow, in 1861 became professor of Botany at Cambridge. See his Memorials (1898).

Babington, WILLIAM (1756-1833), an Irish physician and mineralogist, who lived in London.

Babrius, Greek fabulist, probably lived a little before the age of Augustus, though some make him as late as 250 A.D. He collected Æsopic fables, which he turned into popular choliambic verse. These had been almost all lost, till in 1843-57 a Greek discovered at Mount Athos 123 and 95 of them. See Rutherford's Babrius (1883).

Bacchylides, a Greek lyric poet of the 5th century B.C. at the court of Hiero of Syracuse. Fragments of his epinikian odes, discovered in 1896, were edited by Kenyon (1897) and Jebb (1898).

Bacciocchi, MARIA BONAPARTE (1777-1820), eldest sister of Napoleon, born at Ajaccio, married Felice Bacciocchi, and was created by her brother in 1805 Princess of Lucca, Piombino, Massa, and Carrara, and in 1809 Grand-duchess of Tuscany. She spent her last years in Austria, dying on her estate near Trieste. Her husband died in 1841; her only son, in 1833; and her only daughter, the Countess Camerata, in 1869. [Bat-cho'kee.]

Baccio della Porta. See BARTOLOMMEO.

Bach, JOHANN SEBASTIAN, one of the supremely great musicians of the world, was born at Eisenach, 21st March 1685. The family had already produced many musicians, among whom two cousins of Sebastian's father, Johann Christoph and Johann Michael Bach, wrote several excellent motets, and had considerable influence on their illustrious kinsman. Before he was ten years old, Sebastian lost his father, and was placed under the care of an elder brother, Johann Christoph, who was organist at

Ohrdruf. In 1700 he entered the choir of St Michael's school at Lüneburg, remaining there, after his beautiful soprano voice had broken, as accompanist on the harpsichord, and also as a violinist. In 1703 he was given a court appointment at Weimar; and in 1704 became organist at Arnstadt, where many of his 'church cantatas' were written, as well as the famous 'Capriccio on the Departure of a Brother,' composed when his brother, Johann Jakob, went to join the Swedish Guard. In 1707 he married a cousin, Maria Barbara Bach (d. 1720), and removed to Mühlhausen; in 1708 he was appointed court organist at Weimar. The nine years spent at the ducal court did much to perfect Bach's style as a composer for the organ, and some of the best of his cantatas were also written there. In 1717 Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Köthen offered him the post of kapellmeister at his court, a situation which he retained till 1723. In December 1721 he married Anna Magdalena Wülkens, the beautiful daughter of the court trumpeter at Weissenfels; much of his music exists in copies made by her, and many of his works for keyed instruments were written for her use. Most of the well-known 'suites' date from this time, as well as many works for stringed instruments. The first half of the wonderful collection of Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues, called in Germany Das Wohltemperirte Clavier, was also written at Köthen, the second half being composed many years afterwards. In 1723 he was appointed Cantor of the Thomas-schule at Leipzig, a post he retained till the end of his life. In Leipzig all his greatest works for chorus were written, among which the most important are the two settings of the Passion, many church cantatas, and the Mass in B minor. Two movements from this latter work were presented to Augustus III. at one of Bach's frequent visits to Dresden, where he received in 1736 the honorary title of Hofcomponist. A more famous visit was that paid to Frederick the Great at Potsdam, in May 1747, its fruit The Musical Offering, which, like the Art of Fugue, is a monument of contrapuntal ingenuity and theoretical learning. Some two and a half years after this visit his eyesight began to fail, and he was persuaded to have recourse to an English oculist then resident in Leipzig. An operation resulted in absolute blindness, and, worse than that, the remedies used affected his health. In July 1750 he was struck with apoplexy, and on the 28th he died. His third son, Karl Philipp Emanuel (1714-88), holds an important place in the history of music, since he did much to develop the 'sonata.' Wilhelm Friedmann (1710-84), Sebastian's eldest son, dissipated his fine musical talents, leaving comparatively few compositions; Johann Christoph Friedrich (1732-95) lived as kapellmeister at Bückeburg; and the youngest son, Johann Christian (1735-82), established himself in London. The biographies of the master, by Forkel (1803) Hilgenfeldt (1850), and Bitter (1850), were superseded by Spitta's (1873-80; trans. 1885). See also Lives by Taylor (1897), Boughton (1907), and Sir H. Parry (1909). [The ch in Bach is guttural, as in Scotch, loch.]

Bache, ALEXANDER DALLAS, physicist, a grandson of Benjamin Franklin, was born at Philadelphia, 19th July 1806, and died at Newport, Rhode Island, 17th February 1867. [Baitch.]

Bache, FRANCIS EDWARD (1833-58), violinist, organist, and composer for the piano, was born and died in Birmingham.

Bachelet, JEAN LOUIS THÉODORE (1829-79), a French historian. [Bahsh-tay.]

Bachman, JOHN (1790-1874), an American naturalist and Lutheran pastor.

Back, SIR GEORGE, Arctic explorer, was born at Stockport in 1796, and entering the navy in 1808, next year was taken prisoner by the French in Spain. With Franklin (q.v.) he had already shared in three Polar expeditions—to the Spitzbergen Seas (1819), the Coppermine River (1819-22), and Mackenzie River (1822-27)—when he volunteered to go in search of Captain (Sir John) Ross, who was supposed to be lost. He left London in February 1833, and on 28th June started from a station of the Hudson Bay Company on his journey north. After passing a terrible winter with his companions near the Great Slave Lake, he discovered, in 1834, Artillery Lake and the Great Fish River, or Back's River, which he traced to the Frozen Ocean. Hindered by the ice from proceeding along the coast, he returned by the river, reaching England in the autumn of 1835, when he was raised to the rank of captain by order in council, an all but unprecedented honour. In 1836-37 he further explored the Arctic shores; and of this, as of the preceding voyage, he published a vivid description. He was knighted in 1839, and made admiral in 1857; but his hardships had disabled him from further active service. He died 23d June 1878.

Backhuysen, or BAKHUIZEN, LUDOLF, a famous marine painter of the Dutch school, was born at Emden in Hanover in 1631, and died at Amsterdam in 1708.

Bacon, DELIA, American authoress, was born at Tallmadge, Ohio, 2d February 1811; spent the four years 1853-58 in England (St Albans, Stratford-on-Avon, &c.); and died in Hartford, Conn., 2d September 1859. She was eminent in her day as a teacher, and wrote several stories, but now is remembered only as an eloquent but more than half-crazed advocate of the theory that Shakespeare's plays were written by Lord Bacon, Raleigh, Spenser, &c. She did not originate the idea herself, but was the first to give it currency in her Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare Unfolded (1857), with a preface by Hawthorne. See Delia Bacon, a Biographical Sketch (1883).

Bacon, FRANCIS, Lord Verulam and Viscount St Albans, born at York House in the Strand, London, 22d January 1561, is usually, but inaccurately, spoken of as Lord Bacon. He was the younger son of Sir Nicholas Bacon (q.v.). With his elder brother Anthony (1558-1601), the future diplomatist, Bacon passed his boyhood under the stern discipline of his mother, a zealous Calvinist. In 1573 the brothers entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1576 Gray's Inn, Francis being called to the bar in 1582. At Cambridge he had recognised the barrenness of scholastic philosophy and the need of educational reform. He became member of parliament for Melcombe Regis in 1584, for Taunton in 1586, and for Middlesex in 1593; and sought to attract the queen's attention by addressing to her a paper advocating tolerance in the treatment of recusants. In 1593 he offended the queen by opposing in parliament the grant of a subsidy. Failing in his efforts to obtain any favour from Burghley (who had married his mother's sister), Bacon attached himself to the Earl of Essex, from whom he accepted a gift of land at Twickenham. He advised his patron in 1598 (although he afterwards denied having done so) to undertake the suppression of Tyrone's rebellion in Ireland, and when the earl returned in disgrace (1599) and was tried, Bacon acted with the prosecuting counsel—in the hope, he said, of aiding his patron. When in 1601 Essex broke into open rebellion, Bacon voluntarily endeavoured to secure his conviction on the charge of treason, and after the execution drew up the official declaration of Essex's treasons. In the last years of Elizabeth's reign, he tried to act the part of mediator between crown and commons, and recommended a tolerant policy in Ireland. On James I.'s accession (1603), he sought royal favour by extravagant professions of loyalty; by planning schemes for the union of England and Scotland, and for pacifying the Church of England on comprehensive lines; and by making speeches in parliament to prove that the claims of the king and parliament could be reconciled. For these services he was knighted (1603), was made a commissioner for the union of Scotland and England, and received a pension of £60 a year. In 1605 Bacon published the Advancement of Learning; in 1606 he married a London alderman's daughter; in 1607 he became solicitor-general. In 1612 he offered to manage parliament for the king, and to obtain supplies without concerting undignified bargains. In 1613 he was promoted to the attorney-generalship. He failed to harmonise the interests of king and parliament, but craved for personal advancement with increased eagerness; and henceforth he obtained it by suppressing his real opinions, by conventional flattery of all who could serve him, and by petty tricks to circumvent opposition. In 1615 he examined under torture an old clergyman, Edmund Peacham, charged with preaching treason, and undertook to confer privately with each judge of the King's Bench in order to secure a conviction. In 1616 he prosecuted Somerset, with whom he was intimate, for the murder of Overbury.

In 1616 Bacon became a privy-councillor, in 1617 lord keeper, and in 1618 lord chancellor, being raised to the peerage as Lord Verulam, a title taken from Verulamium, the Latin name of St Albans, near which lay Bacon's estate of Gorhambury. His obsequiousness was now more marked than ever; he even accepted the king's policy of the Spanish marriage. A word from Buckingham influenced his behaviour to suitors in the Court of Chancery; in one case, when Buckingham expressed his surprise, Bacon cancelled his decision. He was on the side of severity in the case of Raleigh (1618). In 1620 he published his Novum Organum, and in 1621 was created Viscount St Albans. But his fall was now at hand. The Commons, led by Bacon's enemy Coke, first inquired into a recent increase of monopoly-patents, promoted by Bacon, by which Buckingham had enriched his relatives. Complaint was then made that Bacon was in the habit of taking bribes from suitors in his court, and in 1621 charges were sent to the House of Lords by the Commons for inquiry. That he took presents from suitors was undeniable, but that he allowed these gifts to influence his judicial decisions is disputed. Bacon, who had fallen ill, submitted himself to the will of his fellow-peers, without offering any defence. It was ordered that he be fined £40,000, imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and banished parliament and the court. After a few days he was released from the Tower, and retired to Gorhambury; three months later the king pardoned him, but declined to allow him to return to parliament or the court. Bacon employed himself in completing his Henry VII. and his Latin translation of the Advancement (De Augmentis). In March 1626 he caught cold while stuffing a fowl with snow near Highgate, in order to observe the effect of cold on the preservation of flesh; taken to a friend's house, he died there on 9th April, and was buried in St Michael's Church, St Albans. He died deep in debt.

Bacon's literary work is divisible into philosophical, purely literary, and professional writings. His philosophy is chiefly to be studied in (1) The Advancement of Learning (1605), a review of the state of knowledge in his own time, and its chief defects; (2) De Augmentis Scientiarum (1623), a Latin expansion of the Advancement; and (3) Novum Organum (1620), intended to form the second book of a never-completed greater treatise, Instauratio Magna, a review and encyclopædia of all knowledge. Bacon abandoned the deductive logic of Aristotle and the schoolmen, and for interpreting Nature relied on inductive methods. He took all knowledge for his province, and his inductive system was to arrive at the causes not only of natural but of all moral and political effects. He described heat as a mode of motion, and light as requiring time for transmission, but he was behind the scientific knowledge of his time; knew nothing of Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood, or of Kepler's calculations, and rejected the Copernican astronomy. His system was never finished. His greatness consists in his insistence on the facts that man is the servant and interpreter of Nature, that truth is not derived from authority, and that knowledge is the fruit of experience; and in spite of the defects of his method, the impetus he gave to future scientific investigation is indisputable. He was the practical creator of scientific induction. An unparalleled belief in himself, which justified to himself his ignoring of all ordinary laws of morality, is the leading feature in the character of this 'wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind.' As a writer of English prose and a student of human nature, Bacon is seen to best advantage in his Essays, ten of which were first published in 1597; after passing through new editions in 1598, 1604, 1606, and 1612, they reached the final number of 58 in 1625. His History of Henry VII. (1622) shows scholarly research, besides a direct and nervous style. In his fanciful New Atlantis he suggests the formation of scientific academies. The Apophthegms (1625) are a disappointing collection of witticisms. His religious works included prayers and a verse translation of the Psalms (1625). The professional works embrace Maxims of the Law (1630), Reading on the Statute of Uses (1642), pleadings in law cases, and speeches in parliament.

The standard edition of Bacon's works is that by Spedding, Ellis, and Heath (14 vols. 1857-74; 7 vols. being devoted to the apologetic Life). There are works on Bacon by Kuno Fischer (trans. 1857), Church (1884), Abbott (1885), and Nichol (2 vols. 1890). Macaulay's brilliant essay (1837) was unduly eulogistic of Bacon's philosophy, and perhaps too severe on his character. For the theory that Bacon was the author of the plays attributed to Shakespeare, see BACON (DELIA).

Bacon, JOHN. See BACONTHORPE.

Bacon, JOHN, sculptor, was born in London, November 24, 1740, and died there, 4th August 1799, leaving £60,000 to his five children, of whom the second son, John (1777-1859), was also a sculptor. See Life by Richard Cecil (1801).

Bacon, LEONARD (1801-81), American Congregationalist divine, was professor of Theology at Yale, and wrote many works on theology and against slavery. Delia Bacon (q.v.) was his sister.

Bacon, NATHANIEL (c. 1642-76), a native of Suffolk, who, emigrating to Virginia, there signalled himself by his raids against the Indians and his opposition to the governors.

Bacon, SIR NICHOLAS, was born in 1509, most likely at Chislehurst, Kent, passed from the abbey school at Bury to Corpus Colledge, Cambridge (1523), and was ten years later called to the bar. In 1537 he was appointed solicitor to the Court of Augmentations, and in 1546 attorney of the Court of Wards. During Mary's reign his Protestantism cost him all his public honours and emoluments; but on her death in 1558 he received from Elizabeth the post of lord keeper of the Great Seal. Elizabeth left to him and to Cecil 'the ordering of church matters for the most part'; and Parker chiefly owed to him the see of Canterbury. He was always honestly opposed to Catholics generally, above all, to Mary of Scotland. Elizabeth paid him several visits—one of six days in 1577, at his magnificent mansion of Gorhambury, Herts. He died at York House, his London residence, 20th February 1579.

Bacon, PHANUEL (1700-83), a clergyman, born at Reading, the author of five miserable plays.

Bacon, ROGER, monkish philosopher, was born of a well-to-do family at Ilchester, Somerset, about 1214. He studied at Oxford, where he seems to have been in orders in 1233, and then proceeded to Paris. About 1250 he returned to Oxford, and may then have entered the Franciscan order. Physics seems to have been at that time the chief object of his labours; and liberal friends of science supplied him with the means of pursuing his researches. In exploring the secrets of nature he made discoveries and invented applications which were looked upon by the ignorant as the work of magic. This prejudice was encouraged by the jealousy of his brother monks; and about 1257 he was imprisoned at Paris, forbidden all human intercourse, and even all opportunity of writing. Among the few clear-sighted men who admired and pitied Bacon was Guy de Foulques, sometime papal legate in England. He had desired to see Bacon's writings; and, on his ascent of the papal throne as Clement IV. in 1265, Bacon wrote to him expressing his readiness to furnish him with whatever he desired. Clement repeated the request to see his works; and Bacon accordingly drew up his Opus Majus, which he sent to the pope by his favourite pupil, John of London. How Clement received it is not well known; but it could only have reached him about the time of his last illness in 1268. The year before, Bacon had regained at least comparative freedom; but in 1278 the general of the Franciscans declared himself against him, forbade the reading of his books, and issued an order for his imprisonment—an imprisonment that lasted ten years. When in 1288 Jerome himself became Pope Nicholas IV., Bacon sent him a treatise on the means of warding off the infirmities of old age, but in vain. He seems to have at last recovered his freedom about 1292, and two years later to have died at Oxford. A true forerunner of his greater namesake, Bacon yet could not rid himself of all the prejudices of his time. He believed in the philosopher's stone and in astrology. His chief invention is the magnifying-glass. There are also in his writings other new and ingenious views on optics; for example, on refraction, on the apparent magnitude of objects, on the great increase in the size of the sun and moon in the horizon. He prepared a rectified calendar, and he made several chemical discoveries which were wonders at that time. He knew, for instance, that with sulphur, saltpetre, and charcoal we may produce explosions. Mathematics applied to observation he considered to be the only means of arriving at a knowledge of nature. He studied several languages, and wrote Latin with great elegance. On account of his extensive knowledge, he received the name of 'Doctor admirabilis.' Six of his works had been printed between 1485 and 1614, when, in 1733, S. Jebb edited the Opus Majus. Professor Brewster edited the Opus Tertium, Opus Minus, and Compendium Philosophiæ in 1859, as Opera Inedita; and J. H. Bridges the Opus Majus (2 vols. 1897). See also E. Charles, Bacon, sa Vie, ses Ouvrages, ses Doctrines (1861); the German works of Siebert (1861), Schneider (1873), Werner (1879), and Held (1881); Fæther Gasquet (Eng. Historical Rev., 1897); and for Bacon as 'Friar Bungay,' Ward's Old English Drama (1878).

Baconthorpe, or BACON, JOHN (d. 1346), a diminutive Norfolk Carmelite, but a great Averroist, known as the 'Resolute Doctor.'

Bacsanyi, JÁNOS (1763-1845), a Hungarian poet.

Badcock, SAMUEL (1747-88), a Dissenting minister, born at South Molton, who took Anglican orders, and wrote much for the magazines.

Baddeley, SOPHIA (1745-86), an actress and singer of some notoriety. See her Memoirs by Mrs Steele (6 vols. 1781).

Baden Powell. See POWELL.

Badger, GEORGE PERCY (1815-88), orientalist, served in India, Arabia, Persia, &c., as government chaplain and interpreter, and wrote on the Nestorians and oriental subjects.

Badham, CHARLES (1780-1845), doctor, traveller, and author, father of CHARLES BADHAM, D.D. (1813-84), a great scholar, who died professor of Classics in Sydney.

Badia-y-Lablich, DOMINGO, was born at Barcelona in 1766, and during 1801-7, disguised as a Mussulman, visited Morocco, Barbary, Egypt, Mecca (the first Christian ever here), Syria, and Constantinople. Returning to Spain, he attached himself to King Joseph, and was appointed in 1812 Prefect of Cordova; but on the fall of Napoleon's power went to Paris, where in 1814 he published his Voyage d'Al-Bel en Afrique et en Asie. Four years later he set off on another journey to the East, but died in Syria, 30th August 1818.

Baedeker, KARL (1801-59), a German publisher at Coblenz, the originator of a series of admirable guidebooks, published since 1872 at Leipzig.

Baer, KARL ERNST VON, a Russian naturalist, who contributed largely to embryology, was born in Esthonia, February 29, 1792, and died at Dorpat, 28th November 1876. See his (German) Autobiography (2d ed. Brunswick, 1886). [Bayr.]

Baffin, WILLIAM, navigator, was probably born in London about 1584, and sailed in 1612 as pilot of the Patience from Hull, on a voyage of discovery to Greenland. In 1613-14 he served in the Spitzbergen whale-fishery, and he wrote an account of this and his previous voyage. In 1615 he took service as pilot of the Discovery in search of a North-west Passage, and made a careful examination of Hudson Strait. In 1616 he discovered, charted, and named Smith's Sound, and explored the large inlet now associated with his name. His latest voyages, 1616-21, were to the East.

At the siege of Ormuz, which the English were helping the Shah of Persia to recover from the Portuguese, he was killed by a shot, 23d January 1622. See Voyages of William Baffin, 1612-22, edited by C. K. Markham (1880).

Bage, ROBERT (1728-1801), published between 1781 and 1796 half-a-dozen novels, the last and best Hermesprong, or Man as he is not.

Bagehot, WALTER, economist and journalist, was born at Langport, Somerset, 3d February 1826. From a school at Bristol he passed in 1842 to University College, London, where he took his M.A. in 1848; in 1852 he was called to the bar, but joined his father as a banker and shipowner at Langport. In 1858 he married a daughter of the Right Hon. James Wilson, founder of the Economist newspaper; and from 1860 till 24th March 1877, when he died in his native town, he was its editor. His works include The English Constitution (1867), Physics and Politics (1872), Lombard Street (1873), Literary Studies (2 vols. 1878, with Memoir), and Economic Studies (1880). [Bag'ut.]

Bagford, JOHN (1650-1716), a London boot-maker and antiquary, who collected both ballads and title-pages.

Baggesen, JENS, poet, was born at Korsör, in the island of Zealand, February 15, 1764, and died at Hamburg, October 3, 1826. His German works fill 5 vols. (1836); his Danish, 12 (new ed. 1845-48). See his Life by his son (4 vols. Cop. 1849-56); and Arentzen, Baggesen og Oehlenschläger (8 vols. Cop. 1870-78).

Bagimont. See BAJIMONT.

Baglivi, GIORGIO (1669-1707), an Italian physician, whose De Fibra Motrice founded the theory of medicine known as 'solidism.' [Ba-glee'vee.]

Bagnacavallo, the name (from his birthplace) by which the painter Bartolommeo Ramenghi (1484-1542) is known. [Ban-ya-ca-val'lo.]

Bagration, PETER IVANOVICH, PRINCE, a Russian general, descended from the royal Bagratidæ of Georgia, was born in 1765. He entered the Russian service in 1783, and, after much active service, in November 1805, with 6000 troops, stood during six hours against 30,000 French under Murat. He fought, too, at Austerlitz, Eylau, Friedland, and the siege of Silistria (1809). Mortally wounded at Borodino, he died October 7, 1812. [Ba-gräh-te-ohn'.]

Bähr, JOHANN CHRISTIAN FELIX (1798-1872), scholar, was born at Darmstadt, and died at Heidelberg, where in 1823 he had become professor of Classical Philology.

Bährdt, KARL FRIEDRICH, theologian and freethinker, was born in 1741 at Bischofswerda, in Saxony, was a professor at Leipzig (1766-68) and Giessen (1771-75), for ten years kept a public-house at Halle, and died there, April 23, 1792. See his Life by Leyser (2d ed. 1870).

Baikie, WILLIAM BALFOUR, traveller, naturalist, and philologist, was born at Kirkwall, Orkney, 27th August 1825, and, having studied medicine in Edinburgh, in 1848 became a naval surgeon. He was appointed surgeon and naturalist to the Niger expedition in 1854, and, succeeding through the captain's death to the command of the Pleiad, he penetrated 250 miles higher than any previous traveller; but in his second expedition of 1857 the Pleiad was wrecked, and he was left to continue his work alone. He founded Lukoja, at the junction of the Quorra and Benue (now military headquarters of the Royal Niger Company), and within five years had opened the navigation of the Niger, constructed roads, collected a native vocabulary, and translated parts of the Bible and Prayer-book into Haussa. He died at Sierra Leone, 12th December 1834.

Bailey, JOHN (1750-1819), a Yorkshireman, long agent at Chillingham, and inventor (1795) of the first rational plough.

Bailey, JOHN EGLINTON (1840-88), a Manchester merchant and antiquary, wrote a Life of Fuller (1874) and other works.

Bailey, NATHAN or NATHANIEL, the compiler of An Universal Etymological English Dictionary (1721-27; 30th ed. 1802), was a 'Seventh-day Baptist,' and kept a boarding-school at Stepney, where he died June 27, 1742.

Bailey, PHILIP JAMES (1816-1902), poet, was born at Basford, Nottingham, the son of the historian of Nottinghamshire, Thomas Bailey (1785-1856). After studying at Glasgow University, he was called to the English bar in 1840, but never practised. Festus: a Poem (1839) reached an 11th (Jubilee) edition in 1889, having meanwhile received a large amount of new matter. It was hailed in America with a perfect tornado of applause; and by so great a poet as Rossetti it was, says his brother, under date 1843, 'enormously relished, read again and yet again.'

Bailey, SAMUEL, was born in 1791 in Sheffield, where afterwards he became a banker. He twice contested his native city as a 'philosophical radical' without success, and died there, after a remarkably busy but unusually quiet and uneventful life, January 18, 1870, leaving £80,000 as a bequest to the town. Between 1821 and 1862 he published thirteen works, chiefly on political economy and mental philosophy.

Baillie, LADY GRIZEL, born in 1665, was the daughter of the Scottish patriot, Sir Patrick Hume (q.v.), and in 1684 supplied him with food during his concealment in the vault beneath Polwarth church. She shared her parents' exile at Utrecht (1686-88), and in 1692 married the son of Baillie of Jerviswood. He died in 1738, and she on 6th December 1746. She is remembered by her songs, the best of which is, 'And werena my heart licht I wad dee;' and also by Memoirs of her (1822) by her daughter, Lady Grizel Murray of Stanhope (1693-1759).

Baillie, JOANNA, poetess, was born 11th September 1762, in Bothwell manse; in 1776 her father became professor of Divinity in Glasgow. In 1784 she went to reside in London, where her brother, Matthew Baillie (q.v.), had established himself as a physician. In 1806 she and her sister, Agnes, took a house for themselves at Hampstead, and here she remained till her death, on 23d February 1851. Agnes survived till 1861. No authoress ever enjoyed a larger share than the 'immortal Joanna' of the esteem and affection of her literary contemporaries. All vied in showing her a courteous respect, and even America sent its votaries to her little shrine at Hampstead. Her greatest achievement is undoubtedly the nine Plays on the Passions (1798-1836), which, though erroneous in conception, are full of noble and impressive poetry, and often characterised by intense dramatic power. The most popular as well as the most powerful of them, the tragedy De Monfort, was brought out at Drury Lane in 1800, Kemble and Mrs Siddons taking the leading parts. Her Family Legend, produced at Edinburgh under Scott's auspices in 1810, was a great success. See Miss Thackeray's Book of Sibyls (1883).

Baillie, MATTHEW, anatomist, brother of the above, was born in Shotts manse, 27th October 1761. His mother was a sister of the great anatomists, William and John Hunter; and Matthew, after seven years at Glasgow and Oxford (1773-80), studied anatomy under his uncle William, and in 1783 succeeded to his practice and lectureship. Working often sixteen hours a day, he made a very large income—one year, £10,000—so that he purchased the estate of Duntisborne in Gloucestershire, and at his death there, on 23d September 1823, left a fortune besides of £80,000. See Life by Wardrop, prefixed to his Works (2 vols. 1825), the most important of which, on Morbid Anatomy, was published in 1795.

Baillie, ROBERT, Presbyterian divine, was born at Glasgow in 1599, and educated at the university of that city. In 1622 he received episcopal ordination, and was shortly after presented to the parish of Kilwinning. In 1637 he refused to preach in favour of Laud's service-book, in 1638 sat in the famous General Assembly of Glasgow, in 1639 served as chaplain in the Covenanting army at Duns Law, and in 1640 was selected to go to London, with other commissioners, and draw up charges against Archbishop Laud. On his return to Scotland in 1642 he was appointed joint-professor of Divinity at Glasgow. In 1643 he was again sent to London as a delegate to the Westminster Assembly, in 1649 was chosen by the church to proceed to Holland, and invite Charles II. to accept the Covenant and crown of Scotland. He performed his mission skillfully; and, after the Restoration, was made Principal of Glasgow University. He died July 1662. See his valuable Letters and Journals, edited by David Laing (3 vols. Bannatyne Club, 1841-42).

Baillie, ROBERT, of Jerviswood, the 'Scottish Sidney,' was a native of Lanarkshire, who in 1683 entered into correspondence with Monmouth's supporters in London, and repaired there to concert measures for securing adequate reforms. On the discovery of the Rye-house Plot, he was arrested and sent down to Scotland. Accused of conspiring against the king's life, and of hostility to monarchical government, he was tried at Edinburgh, condemned to death, and hanged on the same day, 24th December 1684. His son married Lady Grizel Baillie (q.v.).

Baillon, HENRI ERNEST (1827-05), botanist, was born at Calais, and died in Paris. [Ba-yon.]

Baillet, PIERRE FRANÇOIS DE SALES (1771-1852), a French violinist and composer. [Ba-yoh.]

Bailly, JEAN SYLVAIN, born in Paris, September 15, 1736, from art turned aside to literature, and thence to astronomy. He was early admitted to the Académie des Sciences, and he justified his honours by his great Histoire de l'Astronomie (5 vols. 1775-87). Elected to the Académie Française, and next year to the Académie des Inscriptions, he was thus a member of the three academies at once, an honour that had fallen to no one before him save Fontenelle. The Revolution of 1789 interrupted his peaceful studies. As President of the National Assembly and Mayor of Paris, he conducted himself with great integrity; but at last lost his popularity by allowing the National Guard to fire on the masses who were assembled in the Champ de Mars, 17th July 1791, to demand the dethronement of the king. He now threw up his mayoralty, and went to live first at Nantes, and afterwards with his friend

Laplace at Melun. Here he was seized by the Jacobin soldiery, and brought to Paris, where he was guillotined November 12, 1793. See Nourrisson's Turgot, Necker, Bailly (1855). [Ba-yeé.]

Baily, EDWARD HODGES, sculptor, was born at Bristol, 10th March 1788, and died at Holloway, 22d May 1867. The statue of Nelson, in Trafalgar Square, is by him.

Baily, FRANCIS, astronomer, was born at Newbury, Berks, 28th April 1774. An apprenticeship in a London mercantile house was followed by two years of roving in North America, but in 1799 he settled down as a stockbroker in London. In financial business he showed great capacity, and gradually acquired a large fortune, publishing meantime a series of excellent books on banking and assurance. At 51 he retired from business to devote himself entirely to astronomy. Among his chief services were his share in the foundation of the Astronomical Society, the improvement of the Nautical Almanac, his laborious repetition of Cavendish's measurement of the earth's density, and the production of the Astronomical Society's Star-catalogue. Baily's ninety-one writings included a Life of Flamsteed (1835), but mostly appeared in the Astronomical Society's Memoirs. He died in London, 30th August 1844. See Memoir by Sir J. Herschel (1845).

Bain, ALEXANDER, writer on mental philosophy of the empirical school, was born in Aberdeen in 1818, filled the chair of Logic there from 1860 to 1881, and then was elected Rector of his university. From 1855 he published nearly a score of works—the most important The Senses and the Intellect (1855), The Emotions and the Will (1859), Mental and Moral Science (1868), Logic (1870), Education as a Science (1879), and books on the two Mills. He died in September 1903.

Baines, EDWARD (1774–1848), from 1801 proprietor of the Leeds Mercury, Liberal M.P. for Leeds 1834–41, and historian of Lancashire. See the Life (1851) by his son, Sir Edward Baines (1800–90), who also sat for Leeds 1859–74, and was author of a History of the Cotton Manufacture in Great Britain (1835).

Bainhill, ALEXANDER (1810–77), a telegraphic inventor, was born in Caithness, and died near Kirkintilloch.

Baini, GIUSEPPE (1775–1844), musician, was born at Rome, and from 1844 was director of the pope's choir. His principal work is a Life of Palestrina (1828). [Bi'vee.]

Bairakdar, or BAIRAKTAR ('standard-bearer'), Turkish grand-vizier, was born in 1755 of poor parents, and, early entering the military service, soon distinguished himself by his valour. When he was pasha of Ruscchuk in 1806, he fought against the Russians, and after the revolt of the janissaries in 1807, by which Selim III. was deposed in favour of Mustapha IV., Bairakdar marched his troops to Constantinople, where they found the dead body of Selim lying in the seraglio. Bairakdar executed the murderers, deposed Mustapha, and proclaimed his brother, Mahmoud II., sultan on 28th July 1808. As grand-vizier, he endeavoured to carry out Selim's reforms, to strengthen the regular army, and to annihilate the janissaries, who, however, rebelled, and, backed by the fleet, demanded the restoration of Mustapha. Bairakdar defended himself bravely, until at last, strangling Mustapha, he threw his head to the besiegers, and then blew himself up.

Baird, SIR DAVID, general, was born 6th

December 1757, at Newbyth, Haddingtonshire. He entered the service in 1772, and in 1779 sailed to India as captain in a Highland regiment. In July 1780 Hyder Ali burst into the Carnatic at the head of 100,000 men, disciplined and commanded by French officers. A portion of the English army fell into an ambuscade and was cut to pieces; among the few prisoners was Baird, who endured a captivity of nearly four years at Seringapatam. In March 1784 he was released, and after a two years' visit to England (1789–91), he took part in several important sieges, attacks, and skirmishes, till in 1799, now a major-general, he led the storming column at the victorious assault of Seringapatam. He commanded an expedition sent from India to Egypt in 1801 to aid in the expulsion of the French, and marched across the desert to the Nile. On his return to India in 1802, he found that the Wellesley star was in the ascendant, and applied for leave of absence. Knighted in 1804, in 1805 he commanded an expedition against the Dutch settlements at the Cape of Good Hope. In 1807 he commanded the first division at the bombardment of Copenhagen; and in 1808 was sent to Spain with 10,000 men, to assist Sir John Moore. In the battle of Corunna, January 16, 1809, his left arm was shattered, and had to be amputated. Created a baronet, he retired from active service in 1810, and in 1820 was made commander of the forces in Ireland. He died at Fern-Tower, Crief, 27th August 1829. See his Life by Theodor Hook (2 vols. 1832).

Baird, JAMES (1802–76), ironmaster, of Gartsherrie, Lanarkshire, at his death left property valued at £3,000,000, having in 1871 founded the 'Baird Lectures' for the defence of orthodox theology in Scotland, and in 1873 gifted to the Church of Scotland a sum of £500,000. He represented the Falkirk burghs as a Conservative in 1851–52 and in 1852–57.

Baird, SPENCER FULLERTON, LL.D., naturalist, was born at Reading, Pa., 23d February 1823, and died at Woodshole, Mass., 19th August 1887.

Baireuth, MARGRAVINE OF. See ANSPACH.

Bajazet I., or BAJAZID, Sultan of the Turks, was born in 1347, and in 1389 succeeded his father, Murad I., who was slain on the battlefield of Kossovo. In three years he conquered Bulgaria, with parts of Servia, Macedonia, and Thessaly, and most of Asia Minor. From the rapidity of his conquests he received the name of Ilderim—that is, 'Lightning.' He for ten years blockaded Constantinople, to rescue which King Sigismund of Hungary (afterwards emperor) assembled a large army, including 2000 French nobles, and laid siege to Nikopolis, on the Danube. Bajazet hastened to meet him, and gained a decisive victory (1396). Bajazet would now have entirely destroyed the Greek empire, if he had not in 1402 been completely defeated by Timur (q.v.) near Angora. Bajazet himself fell into the hands of the conqueror, who treated him with great generosity (the iron cage is a myth), and in whose camp he died, 8th March 1403. He was succeeded by his son Soliman I.

Bajazet II. (1446–1512) succeeded his father, Mohammed II., the conqueror of Constantinople, in 1481. His 32 years' reign was a succession of wars against Hungary, Poland, Venice, Egypt, and Persia, which served on the whole to establish the Ottoman power.

Bajimont, or BOIAMOND, a canon of Asti in Piedmont, sent in 1274 to Scotland to collect the tithe of all the church livings for a crusade.

Bajus, or DE BAY, MICHAEL (1513-89), Catholic theologian, born in Hainault, in 1551 became professor of Theology at Louvain. He was a devoted student of St Augustine, and seventy-six of his propositions were condemned by a papal bull in 1567. He may be regarded as the precursor of the Jansenists. See Linsenmann, Michael Bajus (Tüb. 1867). [Báh'yoos.]

Bajza, JOSEPH (1804-58), a Hungarian poet and prose-writer, resident in Pesth.

Bakacs, THOMAS, a Hungarian statesman, archbishop, and cardinal, who died in 1521, leaving enormous wealth.

Bake, JAN, classical scholar, was born at Leyden in 1787, from 1817 to 1857 was professor of Greek and Roman literature there, and died 26th March 1864. [Báh'keh.]

Baker, HENRY, naturalist, born in London in 1698, from a bookseller's apprentice turned a teacher of deaf-mutes, and, making a largish fortune, in 1729 married Defoe's youngest daughter. In 1740 he was elected a Fellow both of the Royal Society and of the Society of Antiquaries. He was founder of the Bakerian lectureship, and died 25th November 1774.

Baker, JOHN GILBERT, botanist, was born at Guisbrough, Yorkshire, 13th January 1834, and in 1866 was appointed assistant-curator at the herbarium at Kew.

Baker, SIR RICHARD, born in Kent about 1568, was educated at Oxford, and was knighted in 1603. High-sheriff of Oxfordshire in 1620, in 1635 he was thrown into the Fleet Prison for debt which his wife's family had contracted, but for which he had become responsible. Here he wrote his Chronicle of the Kings of England (1643); and here he died 18th February 1645.

Baker, SIR SAMUEL WHITE, African traveller, born in London, June 8, 1821, in 1845 went to Ceylon (where he established an agricultural settlement at Nuwara Eliya), and afterwards superintended the construction of a railway across the Dobrudja. In 1860 he married a Hungarian lady, and with her undertook the exploration of the Nile sources. Setting out from Cairo in April 1861, at Gondokoro they were joined by Speke and Grant coming from the south, who told Baker of the Victoria Nyanza, which they had discovered; they also mentioned that the natives had described to them another great lake, named Luta Nzige. Baker resolved to reach this lake; and after many adventures they beheld, on 14th March 1864, from a lofty cliff, the great inland sea to which Baker gave the name of the Albert Nyanza. In 1869-73 he commanded an expedition, organised by the pasha of Egypt, for the suppression of slavery and the annexation of the equatorial regions of the Nile Basin. He thoroughly explored Cyprus in 1879, and afterwards visited Syria, India, Japan, and America. Knighted in 1866, he died at his home near Newton-Abbot, 30th December 1893. He published The Rifle and the Hound in Ceylon (1854); Eight Years' Wanderings in Ceylon (1855); The Albert Nyanza (1866); The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia (1867); Ismaïlia (1874); Cyprus as I saw it (1879); and Wild Beasts and their Ways (1890). See Life by Murray and White (1895).—His brother, COL. VALENTINE BAKER (1831-87), or 'Baker Pasha,' served in the British army 1848-75, and entered the Turkish service in 1877.

Baker, THOMAS, antiquary and nonjuror, was born at Lanchester, Durham, in 1656, and was elected a Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge, where he died in 1740. His History of that college was edited by Professor Mayor in 1867.

Baker, THOMAS, the author of five comedies produced between 1701 and 1708.

Bakewell, ROBERT, grazier, was born in 1725 at Dishley, Leicestershire; and died there in 1795.

Bakhuizen. See BACKHUYSEN.

Baku'nin, MICHEL, anarchist, was born near Moscow in 1814 of a noble family, and entered the Russian army, but in 1838 threw up his commission. In 1841 he visited Germany, in 1847 Paris. He took part in the German revolutionary movement of 1848-49, especially at Dresden, and was condemned to death. He was, however, given up to Russia, and sent to Siberia in 1855, but managed to escape in an American ship to Japan, leaving behind him wife and child, and arrived in England in 1861. In 1865 he was in Italy diffusing his socialistic views; in September 1870 he attempted an abortive rising at Lyons. As the leader of anarchism Bakunin was in the International the opponent of Karl Marx; but at the Hague Congress in 1872 he was outvoted and expelled. He died in the hospital at Berne, 1st July 1876.

Balbi, ADRIANO (1782-1848), geographer and statistician, born in Venice, died at Padua.

Balbi, GASPARO, a Venetian merchant of the 16th century, who, on a journey from Aleppo to India, visited Bagdad, Bassora, Goa, Cochin, and Pegu, and a Latin translation of whose Viaggio (1590) was printed at Frankfurt in 1594.

Balbo, CESARE, COUNT (1789-1858), an Italian statesman and author, born at Turin. See Life by Ricotti (1856).

Balboa, VASCO NUÑEZ DE, a Spanish conquistador, was born of a noble but reduced family at Xeres-de-los-Caballeros in 1475. After rather a dissolute youth, he settled in San Domingo; but fortune proving adverse, he had himself smuggled on shipboard, and joined the expedition to Darien in 1510, commanded by Francisco de Enciso. An insurrection which took place obtained for Balboa the supreme command in the new colony. Confused accounts which reached him of a great western ocean impelled him in 1513 to set out in quest of it; and on 25th September he obtained the first sight of the Pacific from 'a peak in Darien.' The governorship of the territories conquered by Balboa was obtained in 1514 by the cruel, narrow-minded Pedrarias Davila, through intrigues at the Spanish court. Balboa married a daughter of Davila's, and, in a subordinate situation, undertook many successful expeditions; but on the first occasion of dispute, he was, most unjustly, beheaded in 1517.

Baldung, or GRÜN, HANS (c. 1476-1545), a German painter and engraver, who was contemporary with Albert Dürer. See a monograph by Rosenberg (Frankf. 1889).

Baldwin I. (1058-1118), king of Jerusalem from 1100, was born in 1058, the youngest brother of Godfrey (q.v.) de Bouillon, with whom he took part in the first Crusade.—His cousin and successor, BALDWIN II., reigned 1118-31.—BALDWIN III. (1129-62) succeeded his father, Foulques of Anjou, Baldwin II.'s successor, in 1143, and himself was succeeded by his brother Amalric, who died in 1173.—BALDWIN IV., the son and successor of Amalric, surnamed the Leper, reigned till 1184, when he caused his nephew, BALDWIN V. (1178-86), to be crowned.

Baldwin I., born at Valenciennes in 1171, succeeded his parents as Count of Hainault and Flanders in 1195. In 1200 he joined the fourth Crusade, and in 1204 was chosen the first Latin emperor of Constantinople. The Greeks, invoking the aid of the Bulgarians, rose and took Adrianople. Baldwin laid siege to the town, but was defeated and taken prisoner, and died a year after (1206) in captivity.—His sister's son, BALDWIN II. (1217-73), was but eleven years old when, by the death of his brother Robert, he succeeded to the throne of Constantinople. He never had the means or the ability to maintain his position against his Greek and Bulgarian opponents; in 1261 his capital was taken, and he fled to Italy. With him terminated the Latin empire in the East.

Bale, JOHN, Bishop of Ossory, was born at Cove, near Dunwich, Suffolk, 21st November 1495. From a Carmelite monastery at Norwich he passed to Jesus College, Cambridge, and obtained the Suffolk living of Thorndon, though he had married and turned Protestant. In 1540 he had to flee to Germany, whence in 1547 he was recalled by Edward VI., who in 1552 made him Bishop of Ossory in Leinster. Here 'Bilious Bale' made himself so obnoxious to the Catholics that, on news of the death of Edward, his house was attacked and five of his servants killed. He himself escaped only with great difficulty. On Elizabeth's accession he returned to England, and was made a prebendary of Canterbury. He died in 1563. His fame rests partly on a Latin history of English literature (1548; ed. by R. Lane Poole, Oxf. 1896); and he occupies also an important place in the history of the drama. His plays are sorry doggerel; yet his Kinge Johan is a link between such moralities as his own Brefe Comedy of Johan Baptyste and the masterpieces of the Elizabethan stage. The Parker Society published his select works (1849).

Balfe, MICHAEL WILLIAM, composer, was born in Dublin, 15th May 1808. In his ninth year he made his debut as a violinist, having begun to compose two years earlier; in 1823 he came to London, and during 1825-26 studied in Italy under Paer, Galli, Federici, and Rossini. In 1826 he wrote the music for a ballet, La Pérouse, performed at Milan; and in 1827 he sang in the Italian Opera at Paris with great applause, his voice being a pure rich baritone. In 1833 he returned to England, and in 1846 was appointed conductor of the London Italian Opera. He died at Rowley Abbey, his estate in Hertfordshire, 20th October 1870. Of his numerous operas, operettas, and other compositions, produced in rapid succession from 1830, the most permanently successful have been The Bohemian Girl (1843), The Rose of Castile (1857), and Il Talismano (1874). Many of his songs are admirable. See Kenney's Memoir of Balfe (1875), and Barrett's Balfe and his Works (1882).

Balfour, THE RIGHT HON. ARTHUR JAMES, was born 25th July 1848, and in 1856 succeeded his father in the estate of Whittinghame, Haddingtonshire. Educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, he entered parliament in 1874 as Conservative member for Hertford, and from 1878 to 1880 was private secretary to his uncle, Lord Salisbury, whom he accompanied to the Berlin Congress. For a while an unattached member of Lord Randolph Churchill's 'Fourth Party,' he led off the attack on the 'Kilmainham Treaty' (1882), negotiated with Lord Hartington the franchise compromise (1884), was returned for East Manchester (1885), and was appointed President of the Local Government Board (1885), Secretary for Scotland (1886), Chief-secretary for Ireland (1887), and First Lord of the Treasury and leader in the Commons (1892-93), and in 1902-6 was prime-minister (reconstructing his cabinet on the fiscal question). He resigned the Conservative leadership in 1911, but remained a private member. He published a Defence of Philosophic Doubt (1879; 2d ed. 1894), Essays and Addresses (1893), and The Foundations of Belief (1895).—His brother, FRANCIS MAITLAND BALFOUR, embryologist, was born at Edinburgh, 10th November 1851, from Harrow passed in 1870 to Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1873 he entered upon researches on the development of the elasmobranch fishes, which threw new light on many problems of vertebrate morphology; and he also took a leading part in the work of founding the then incipient Cambridge school of natural science. In 1878-83 appeared his well-known Comparative Embryology. Besides receiving many scientific distinctions, and declining tempting offers from Oxford and Edinburgh, he was appointed to a special chair of Animal Morphology in 1882. But on the 19th July of that year he lost his life while attempting to climb one of the spurs of Mont Blanc.—Another brother, GERALD, born 1853, from Eton passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, took a first in classics (1874), and became a fellow (1878). Private secretary for a time to his eldest brother, and returned as a Conservative by the Central Division of Leeds (1885), in 1895-96 he was Chief-secretary for Ireland. [In Scotland, Bal-foor'].

Balfour, JABEZ SPENCER, born at Leith, 4th Sept. 1843, became first mayor of Croydon in 1883, and Gladstonian M.P. for Burnley in 1889. Extradited by Argentina, in Nov. 1895 he got fourteen years for his infamous 'Liberator' frands.

Balfour, SIR JAMES, Lord President of the Court of Session, was a son of Sir Michael Balfour of Montquhanie, Fife. One of Cardinal Beaton's murderers, on the surrender of the castle of St Andrews (1547) he was carried prisoner to France with Knox. In 1549 he purchased freedom by apostasy, and returning to Scotland, 'served with all parties, deserted all, and yet profited by all.' When Morton became regent Balfour carried favour with him, and received a commission to make a general digest of the law. It is doubtful, however, how far the Practicks of Scots Law is really his; for, not feeling himself safe in Scotland, he left it for France (1573-80). He died in 1583.

Balfour, JOHN, of Kinloch (or of Burley, in Scott's Old Mortality), was one of the chief actors in the assassination of Archbishop Sharp (q.v.) in 1679, for which a price was set upon his head. He fought at Drunclog and Bothwell Bridge, and is said afterwards to have escaped to Holland. By one account he died on a homeward voyage to Scotland, by another at Rosneath, Dumbartonshire. He is quite a different personage from John Balfour, who, having spent his youth in France, in 1663 succeeded to his father as third Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and who died in 1688.—ALEXANDER HUGH BRUCE, sixth Lord Balfour of Burleigh, was born 13th January 1849, from Eton passed to Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1869 had the peerage restored to him, which had been in abeyance since the '15. In 1895 he became Secretary for Scotland in Lord Salisbury's government.

Balfour, JOHN HUTTON, born in Edinburgh, September 15, 1808, and died there, February 11, 1884, from 1841 to 1845 was professor of Botany at Glasgow, and then till 1879 at Edinburgh.

His second son, Isaac Bayley Balfour (b. 31st March 1853), obtained the latter chair in 1888.

Balguy, JOHN, a liberal divine, was born at Sheffield in 1686, and died at Harrogate in 1748.

Balliol, an Anglo-Norman family, whose founder, Guido or Guy, held Bailien, Harcourt, and other fiefs in Normandy, and from Rufus received broad possessions in Durham and Northumberland. Bernard, his son, built the fortress of Barnard Castle; and his great-grandson, JOHN, about 1268 founded Balliol College, Oxford. He died in 1269, and was survived till 1290 by his widow, Devorguilla, the daughter and co-heiress of Alan, Lord of Galloway, and the great-granddaughter of David I.—Their son, JOHN DE BALLIOL, born in 1249, succeeded in her right to the lordship of Galloway, as well as to his father's vast possessions in England and Normandy. On the death of the Maid of Norway in 1290, he became a competitor for the crown of Scotland, and his claim was pronounced superior to that of Robert Bruce, Lord of Annandale. The arbiter was Edward I. of England, to whom Balliol swore fealty before and after his coronation at Scone (1292). He was soon made to feel that his sovereignty was merely nominal, and the indignities which he experienced at length roused him to an assertion of his rights as king. In 1295 he took upon him to conclude an alliance with France, then at war with England; Edward thereupon invaded Scotland, took Balliol prisoner, and compelled him formally to surrender his crown, July 7, 1296. Balliol was confined for three years at Hertford and in the Tower; in 1302 he was permitted to retire to his estates in Normandy, where he died in 1315. 'Toom Tabard,' or 'Empty Jacket,' was his Scottish nickname.—EDWARD, his son, in 1332, accompanied by the 'disinherited barons,' who were bent on recovering their forfeited Scottish estates, landed with 3400 followers at Kinghorn in Fife; defeated the Earl of Fife; and at Dupplin Moor in Perthshire, on the night of 12th August, surprised and routed 30,000 men under the new regent Mar, who himself was slain, with 13,000 besides. On 24th September he was crowned king of Scotland at Scone. Less than three months after, he was surprised in his camp at Annan by Archibald Douglas, and nearly lost life as well as crown. He died near Doncaster in 1367, and with him ended the house of Balliol.

Ball, JOHN, a priest who was one of the leaders in the rebellion of Wat Tyler (q.v.).

Ball, JOHN, F.R.S., was born in Dublin, 20th August 1818, and died in London, 21st October 1889. Besides his well-known Alpine Guide (1863-68), he wrote on the botany, &c. of Morocco and South America.

Ball, SIR ROBERT STAWELL, LL.D., F.R.S., astronomer, was born in Dublin, 1st July 1840, and studied at Trinity College. He was appointed Lord Rosse's astronomer at Parsonstown in 1865; professor of Applied Mathematics and Mechanics at the Royal Irish College of Science in 1873; in 1874 professor of Astronomy at Dublin, and astronomer royal for Ireland; and in 1892 Lowndean professor of Astronomy at Cambridge. Knighted in 1886, he has written Story of the Heavens (1885), Great Astronomers (1895), &c.

Ballanche, PIERRE SIMON, a philosopher, was born at Lyons, 4th August 1776, and died in Paris, 12th June 1847. His works are a strange medley of mysticism, socialism, and the philosophy of history. See his Life by Ampère (1848).

Ballantine, JAMES (1808-77), artist and poet, born in Edinburgh, was brought up as a house-painter, but afterwards learned drawing under Sir William Allen, and was one of the first to revive the art of glass-painting. Two prose volumes, The Gabeltunzie's Wallet (1843) and Miller of Deanhaugh (1845), contain some of his best-known songs and ballads.

Ballantine, WILLIAM (1812-86), serjeant-at-law, was called to the bar in 1834, and soon obtained a large practice, chiefly in criminal cases. He was created a serjeant in 1856. Amongst the famous trials with which he was associated were the Müller murder trial, Tichborne case, and the defence of the Guicowar of Baroda. From the latter he is said to have received a fee of 20,000 guineas to induce him to visit India. See his Experiences of a Barrister's Life (1882); and his Old World and the New (1884).

Ballantyne, JAMES (1772-1833) and JOHN (1774-1821), Scott's printers, were the sons of a merchant of Kelso, where in 1783 they were both at school with Sir Walter. James was bred for the law, but in 1797 started the Tory Kelso Mail; and in 1802, having already printed some ballads for Scott, he produced the first two volumes of the Border Minstrelsy. The beauty of their typography established his fame as a printer; and at Scott's suggestion he removed to Edinburgh. In 1805 Scott became a secret partner in the business, which in 1808 expanded into the printing, publishing, and bookselling firm of John Ballantyne & Co., Scott having one-half share, and each of the brothers one-fourth. 'Aldi-borontiphosphornio' and 'Rigdumfunnidios' were Scott's nicknames for pompous James and sporting John; he seems to have liked them both, though sometimes he might plead 'For heaven's sake, treat me as a man, and not as a milch cow.' As early as 1813 bankruptcy threatened the firm, and it was hopelessly involved in Constable's ruin (1826). John had died bankrupt five years earlier; and James, after the settlement of affairs, was employed by the creditors' trustees in editing the Weekly Journal and in the literary management of the printing-office. See History of the Ballantyne Press (Edin. 1871).

Ballantyne, ROBERT MICHAEL, writer of tales for boys, was born at Edinburgh in April 1825, a nephew of Scott's printers. The first of his eighty volumes, issued in 1848, was a record of personal experiences during a six years' residence (1841-47) in the territories of the Hudson Bay Company; in 1856 he took to literature as a profession. Harrow was his home, but he died at Rome, 8th February 1894. See his Personal Recollections (1893).—His elder brother, JAMES ROBERT BALLANTYNE, orientalist, was born at Kelso, 13th December 1818, and died 16th February 1864, having from 1845 to 1861 been Principal of the Sanskrit college at Benares.

Ballard, JOHN, a Jesuit executed in 1586 for his connection with Babington's conspiracy.

Ballou, HOSEA (1771-1852), the chief founder of the Universalist Church, originally a Baptist minister, was born at Richmond, New Hampshire, and died in Boston.

Balmerino, ARTHUR ELPHINSTONE, sixth LORD (1688-1746), was beheaded on Tower Hill for his share in the '45. See J. Campbell's History of Balmerino (Edin. 1867).

Balnaves, HENRY, of Halhill, Scottish Reformer, was born at Kirkcaldy in Fife, and educated at St Andrews and Cologne. In 1538

James V. made him a Lord of Session; and in 1543 the regent Arran appointed him Secretary of State. Shortly after, however, he suffered a six months' imprisonment in Blackness Castle on account of his Protestantism; and in 1546, like Knox, he joined Beaton's murderers in the castle of St Andrews. When the castle was captured by the French (1547), Balnaves, with Knox and others, was sent to Rouen. While in prison here, he wrote a treatise on Justification, which, with notes and a preface by Knox, was published in 1584 as The Confession of Faith. In 1556 his forfeiture was rescinded, and he returned to Scotland, and took an active part on the side of the Lords of the Congregation. He died in 1579.

Baltimore, GEORGE CALVERT, first LORD, born at Kipling, in Yorkshire, about 1580, entered parliament in 1609, was knighted in 1617, and in 1619 became Secretary of State. In 1625 he declared himself a Catholic, and resigning office, was created Baron Baltimore in the Irish peerage, and retired to his Irish estates. As early as 1621 he had despatched colonists to a small settlement in Newfoundland, and in 1627 he visited the place. Next spring he returned with his family, and stayed till the autumn of 1629. The severe winter induced him to sail southward in search of a more genial country; but his attempts to settle in Virginia led to disputes, and he returned home to obtain a fresh charter. He died, April 15, 1632; and the patent was granted in June to his son, Cecil, second Lord Baltimore (c. 1605-75). See Life by Neill (Balt. 1869).

Balzac, HONORÉ DE, born at Tours, 20th May 1799, was educated at the Collège de Vendôme, and studied law at the Sorbonne. His father wished him to become a notary, but he left Tours in 1819 to seek his fortune as an author in Paris. From 1819 to 1830 he led a life of frequent privation and incessant industry, producing stories which neither found nor deserved to find readers, and incurring—mainly through unlucky business speculations—a heavy burden of debt, which harassed him to the end of his career. He first tasted success on the publication of Les Derniers Chouans (1829), which was soon followed by La Peau de Chagrin, a marvellous interweaving of the supernatural into modern life, and the earliest of his great works. After writing several other novels, he formed the design of presenting in the Comédie Humaine a complete picture of modern civilisation. All ranks, professions, arts, trades, all phases of manners in town and country, were to be represented in his imaginary system of things. In attempting to carry out this impossible design, he produced what is almost in itself a literature. The stories composing the Comédie Humaine are classified as 'Scènes de la Vie Privée, de la Vie Parisienne, de la Vie Politique, de la Vie Militaire,' &c. Among the masterpieces which form part of Balzac's vast scheme may be mentioned La Recherche de l'Absolu, Le Père Goriot, Les Illusions Perdues, Les Paysans, Les Marana, La Femme de trente Ans, Les Parents Pauvres, and Eugénie Grandet. The Contes Drôlatiques (1833) stand by themselves—a series of gross stories in the vein of Rabelais. Balzac's industry was phenomenal. He represents himself as working regularly for fifteen and even eighteen hours a day. He wrote eighty-five novels in twenty years, and he was a fastidious writer. His work did not bring him wealth; his yearly income rarely exceeded 12,000 francs. During his later years he lived principally in his villa at Sèvres. In 1849, when his health had broken down, he travelled to Poland to visit Madame Hanska, a rich Polish lady, with whom he had corresponded for more than fifteen years. In 1850 she became his wife, and three months later, on 18th August, Balzac died at Paris.

His sister, Laura Surville, whom he loved with a rare affection, and to whom he opened throughout his life all the hopes and sorrows of his heart, wrote his biography (1858). The 'édition définitive' of his works was published in 25 vols. (1869-75); the last contains his correspondence 1819-50 (Eng. trans., with memoir, 1879). A supplemental volume is Histoire des Œuvres de Balzac, by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul (1879), who also wrote Autour de Balzac (1897). A series of translations under Prof. Saintsbury's editorship began in 1895. See works by Lamartine (1876), Champfleury (1879), Favre (1887), Ferry (1888), Miss Wormeley (1892), Miss Sandars (1904), Le Breton (1905), Brunetière (1906).

Balzac, JEAN LOUIS GUEZ DE (1594-1654), born at Angoulême, died on his estate of Balzac. His Lettres (1624), Lettres Inédites (1873), &c., did much to refine the French language.

Bamford, SAMUEL, the Lancashire weaver-poet, was born at Middleton, 28th February 1788, and died at Harpurhay, Manchester, 13th April 1872. His Passages in the Life of a Radical and Early Days (1840-59) were reprinted in 1894.

Bampton, JOHN (d. 1751), a Salisbury prebendary who founded the Oxford Bampton Lectures.

Bancroft, GEORGE, historian and diplomatist, was born at Worcester, Massachusetts, October 3, 1800. At thirteen he entered Harvard College, graduated with high honours in 1817, and then studied in Germany. Returning to America in 1822, he served a year as Greek tutor in Harvard College, when he and Dr Cogswell, a fellow-tutor, established the Round Hill School at Northampton, Massachusetts, with which Bancroft was associated until 1830. In 1823 he published a volume of poems, and subsequently made translations from the German of the minor poems of Goethe, Schiller, &c., and of some of the historic-political works of Heeren. His History of the United States from the Discovery of the Continent (10 vols. 1834-74) was supplemented by The History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States (2 vols. 1882), which afterwards formed a constituent part of the revised edition of the complete History (6 vols. 1883-85). In his political sentiments Bancroft in early life was a democrat. He served as collector of the port of Boston (1838-41), and was an unsuccessful candidate for the governorship of Massachusetts in 1844. He accepted a seat in the cabinet of President Polk as secretary of the Navy in 1845, and was minister to the court of St James (1846-49) and to Berlin (1867-74). He died at Washington, 17th January 1891.

Bancroft, HUBERT, historian, born in Ohio, 5th May 1832, settled at San Francisco in 1852, where he started a book-shop, and soon amassed a large fortune. He collected at vast expense 45,000 volumes, mainly on American history and ethnography, and published The Native Races of the Pacific States (5 vols. 1875-76), History of the Pacific States (40 vols. 1882-91), and Chronicles of the Builders of Commonwealths (7 vols. 1891-95). See his autobiographical Literary Industries (1891).

Bancroft, RICHARD, Archbishop of Canterbury, and a bitter opponent of the Puritans, was born at Farnworth, Lancashire, in 1544. Sent to Cambridge by his uncle, Hugh Curwen, Archbishop of Dublin, he took his B.A. in 1567, and in 1576 became rector of Teversham, Cambridgeshire; in 1597 he was consecrated Bishop of London. He attended Elizabeth during her last illness, and took the lead at the Hampton Court Conference. He succeeded Whitgift as archbishop in 1604, and died November 2, 1610.

Bancroft, SIR SQUIRE, actor and manager, born in London, 14th May 1841, made his debut at Birmingham (1861) and in London (1865). In 1867 he married Miss Marie Wilson, a native of Doncaster, who, after playing infant prodigy in the provinces, had come out in London in 1856. From 1865 to January 1880 the Prince of Wales's Theatre witnessed their triumphs in Robertson's comedies, the School for Scandal, Masks and Faces, &c.; then until 1885 they were successful lessees of the Haymarket. Both have sometimes reappeared since—e.g. in Diplomacy (1893). In 1897 he was knighted. See their autobiographical Mr and Mrs Bancroft on and off the Stage (2 vols. 1888).

Bandel, ERNST VON (1800-76), sculptor, was born at Ansbach, studied art at Munich, Nuremberg, and Rome, and from 1834 lived chiefly at Hanover, engaged, off and on, for forty years on his colossal bronze statue of Arminius, near Detmold, 84 feet high (with pedestal, 187), which was unveiled by the Emperor William on 16th August 1875. See Life by H. Schmidt (Han. 1892).

Bandello, MATTEO (c. 1480-1562), writer of novelle or tales, was born at Castelnovo in Piedmont. For a while a Dominican, he was driven from Milan by the Spaniards after the battle of Pavia (1525), and settling in France, was in 1550 made Bishop of Agen. His 214 tales (4 vols. 1554-73; best ed. Milan, 1814) furnished themes to Shakespeare, Massinger, &c. Twelve of them were done into English by Percy Pinkerton (1894); and the whole by John Payne for the Villon Society (6 vols. 1890).

Bandiera, ATTILIO and EMILIO, two brothers, Venetians, born in 1817 and 1819, were lieutenants in the Austrian navy, where their father (1785-1847) was admiral. Having attempted a rising in favour of Italian independence, they were shot at Cosenza, 25th July 1844. [Ban-dec-ay-ra.] Bandinelli, BACCIO (1493-1560), sculptor, was born and died at Florence, the son of a famous goldsmith. He was a jealous rival of Michael Angelo, who is said to have repaid his enmity with contempt. His talent, however, secured him many patrons, and Pope Clement VII. bestowed on him an estate. Among his works are his colossal Hercules and Cacus, his Adam and Eve, his copy of the Laocöon, and the exquisite bass-relievi in the Duomo of Florence.

Baner, JOHAN (1598-1641), a general of Gustavus Adolphus.

Banim, JOHN, Irish novelist, born at Kilkenny in 1798, in 1813 went up to Dublin to study art, and two years later became a drawing-master in his native town. His youth was darkened by an unhappy love-affair; but having achieved some success as a playwright (1821), having married, and settled in London, he produced, in conjunction with his brother Michael (1796-1874), the Tales of the O'Hara Family (6 vols. 1825-26), which were followed by The Croppy, The Denouéed, The Smuggler, The Mayor of Windgap, Father Connell, &c. In 1836 general sympathy having been attracted towards Banim's privations, occasioned by disease that precluded all literary exertion, a pension of £150 was awarded him, which was afterwards increased by £40 for the education of his only daughter. He died in poverty, 13th

August 1842, at Windgap Cottage, near Kilkenny. See P. J. Murray's Life of John Banim (1857).

Bankes, LADY MARY (d. 1661), the valiant defender of Corfe Castle in 1643 and 1646 against the rebels, who on the second occasion captured it through treachery. See works by G. Bankes (1853) and T. Boud (1884).

Banks, ISABELLA (nie Varley), was born at Manchester, 25th March 1821, and in 1846 married George Linnaeus Banks (1821-81), poet, orator, and journalist. Of nearly a score of works by her, chiefly novels, the most popular is The Manchester Man (1872). She died 4th May 1897.

Banks, SIR JOSEPH, naturalist, born in London, 13th February 1744, and educated at Harrow, Eton, and Christ Church College, Oxford, in 1766 made a voyage to Newfoundland, collecting plants; and in 1768-71 accompanied Cook's expedition round the world in a vessel equipped at his own expense (Journal, ed. by Sir J. D. Hooker, 1896). In 1772 he visited the Hebrides and Iceland, and made the wonders of Staffa known to the world. In 1778 he was elected President of the Royal Society, an office which he held for 41 years; in 1781 he was created a baronet, and in 1802 a member of the French Institute. He died at Spring Grove, Isleworth, 19th June 1820. Banks founded the African Association; and the colony of Botany Bay owed its origin mainly to him. Through him the bread-fruit was transferred from Tahiti to the West Indies, the mango from Bengal, and many of the fruits of Ceylon and Persia. Blumenthal, Hornemann, Burckhardt, Mungo Park, &c. were aided by him.

Banks, NATHANIEL PRENTISS (1816-94), American politician and soldier, was at first a factory-worker, but studied law, and became successively a member of the state and national legislatures. He was Speaker of congress in 1856, and in 1857, 1859, and 1861 was elected governor of his native state, Massachusetts. On the outbreak of the war, he commanded first on the Potomac, then at New Orleans, and finally on the Red River. Relieved of his command in 1864, he was a member of congress till 1873.

Banks, THOMAS, sculptor, born in Lambeth, 29th December 1735, for seven years was apprenticed to an ornament carver, and in 1763 gained a medal for a bas-relief from the Society of Arts, in 1770 the gold medal of the Academy. In 1772-79, having married a well-to-do wife, he resided in Rome; in 1781-82 visited Russia. Elected an R.A. in 1785, he died 2d February 1805.

Bannatyne, GEORGE (1545-1608), a native of Forfarshire and Edinburgh burghess, whose MS., compiled during the plague of 1568, preserved much of the poetry of the 15th and 16th centuries. The Bannatyne Club was founded in 1823.

Bannerman. See CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN.

Bannister, JOHN (1760-1836), comedian, was born at Deptford, the son of the actor and vocalist, Charles Bannister (c. 1738-1804), and died in London. See Life by John Adolphus (1839).

Banting, WILLIAM (1797-1878), a London undertaker, who in 1863 published a pamphlet describing how he had reduced his obesity.

Banville, THÉODORE DE, was born, the son of a French naval officer, at Moulins, 14th March 1823. In the first of his dozen or so of works, Les Caryatides (1841), as in the latest, Dans la Fournaise (1892), he showed himself one of the most musical of lyrists, one of the wittiest of parodists. The title 'roi des rimes' was given him from the ingenuity with which he handled the most difficult forms of verse—the mediæval ballades and romands. He was also an eloquent but hardly a discriminating critic. He died 12th March 1891.

Bar, KARL E. VON. See BAER.

Baraguay d'Hilliers, LOUIS (1764–1813), a French general, like his son Achille (1795–1878).

Barante, AIMABLE GUILLAUME PROSPER BRUGÈRE, BARON DE, a French historian and statesman, born at Riom in Auvergne, June 10, 1782, and died at his château in Auvergne, November 23, 1866. His chief work was a Histoire des Ducs de Bourgogne, 1364–1477 (12 vols. 1824–28). See his Souvenirs (5 vols. 1893–96). [Bar-ron'v'.]

Baratynski, JEVGENI ABRAMOVICH, a Russian poet, born in 1800, died at Naples in 1844.

Barbara, St, suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia, in Bithynia, in 240 or 306. Her own father offered himself to behead her; scarce had he done so when he was struck with lightning. Hence St Barbara is the patron saint of artillery.

Barbaros'sa. See FREDERICK I.

Barbarossa, HORUK and KHAIR-ED-DIN, two brothers, renegade Greeks, natives of Mitylene, who as Turkish corsairs were the terror of the Mediterranean. The former was captured and beheaded in 1518; the latter, with thousands of captives, returned in triumph to Constantinople, where he died July 4, 1546. See S. L. Poole's Barbary Corsairs (1890).

Barbaroux, CHARLES JEAN MARIE, one of the greatest of the Girondists, was born at Marseilles, 6th March 1767, and guillotined at Bordeaux, June 25, 1794. [Bar-ba-roo'.]

Barbauld, ANNA LETITIA, was born 20th June 1743, at Kibworth-Harcourt, Leicestershire, where her father, the Rev. John Aikin, D.D., a dissenter, kept an academy. Her Poems (1773) ran through four editions in the twelvemonth, encouraged by which she the same year, conjointly with her brother, John Aikin (q.v.), published Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose. Next year she married the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, a dissenting minister at Palgrave, Suffolk; a boys' boarding-school, opened by them, soon was made celebrated by Mrs Barbauld's literary fame and assiduity. During the ten years spent here she published Early Lessons for Children, Hymns in Prose, and Devotional Pieces. In 1792 she commenced with the same brother the well-known Evenings at Home. In 1810 she published a collection of the British novelists, the task of editing which she had undertaken to divert her mind from the suicide of her husband two years before. Her last poetical effort was an ode, Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, in which she anticipated Macaulay's New Zealander. She died at Stoke-Newington, 9th March 1825. See Memoir by Lucy Aikin, prefixed to her Works (2 vols. 1825); Lives by Mrs Le Breton (1874) and Grace Ellis (Boston, U.S. 1874); and Miss Thackeray's Book of Sibyls (1883).

Barberini, a Tuscan family that acquired wealth by trade in the 16th century, and rose to the front rank among the Roman nobility on the elevation of Maffeo Barberini as Urban VIII. to the papal chair in 1623. His brother Antonio became cardinal; Carlo, general of the papal troops; while to a son of the latter, Taddeo, was given the principality of Palestrina. Francesco (1597–1679), brother of Taddeo, cardinal and vice-chancellor, founded the Barberini Library; another brother, Antonio (1608–71), was cardinal and high-chamberlain under Urban VIII. The power and ambition of the Barberini excited the jealousy of the neighbouring princes, and led to the war (1641–44) in which the Duke of Parma defeated the papal troops. Under Urban's successor, Innocent X., proceedings were instituted against the Barberini, who fled to France, but returned to Italy in 1652. [Bar-ber-ee'nee.]

Barbier, ANTOINE ALEXANDRE (1765–1825), a French bibliographer. [Barb-yay'.]

Barbier, HENRI AUGUSTE (1805–82), a French satirist, author of Iambes (1831; 31st ed. 1882).

Barbier, PAUL (b. March 8, 1825), dramatist.

Barbon, PRAISE-GOD. See BAREBONE.

Barbou, a French family of printers, whose founder, John Barbou of Lyons, issued in 1539 the beautiful edition of the works of Clement Marot. His son Hugh removed to Limoges, where his edition of Cicero's Letters to Atticus appeared in 1580. Joseph Gerard settled in Paris, and continued in 1755 the series of Latin duodecimo classics—rivals to the earlier Elzevirs—which had been begun in 1743 by Costelier.

Barbour, JOHN, the father of Scottish poetry and history, was born about 1316; paid several visits to England and France; and was Archdeacon of Aberdeen from 1357, or earlier, till his death, on 13th March 1396. His national epic, The Brus, first printed at Edinburgh in 1571, has been reprinted by Dr Jamieson in 1820; by Cosmo Innes, for the Spalding Club, in 1856; and by Professor Skeat, for the Early English Text Society, in 1870–77, and the Scottish Text Society in 1893–94. Of the Legends of the Saints, unearthed by Mr Bradshaw in the Cambridge University Library, and doubtfully ascribed to him, there is a German edition by Horstmann (2 vols. Heilbronn, 1881–82), and one by Metcalfe for the Scottish Text Society (1887–96).

Barclay, ALEXANDER, poet and prose-writer, was born about 1475, almost certainly in Scotland, may have studied at either or both of the English universities, then travelled in France and Italy, and some time before 1508 was appointed a priest of Ottery St Mary, Devon. About 1511 he became a monk of the Benedictine monastery of Ely; later he assumed the Franciscan habit at Canterbury; and he died at Croydon in June 1552, six weeks after obtaining the rectory of All-Hallows, London. His famous poem, The Shyp of Folsy of the Worlde (1509), is partly a translation and partly an imitation of the German Narrenschiff by Sebastian Brandt (q.v.). He also published The Castell of Laboure, Egluges (Eclogues), a translation of Sallust's Jugurthine War, &c. See the admirable edition of the Shyp of Folsy by T. H. Jamieson (2 vols. Edin. 1874).

Barclay, JOHN, author of the Argenis, was born in 1582, at Pont-à-Mousson in Lorraine, where his father, a Scot, was professor of Law. Owing, it is said, to persecution by the Jesuits, he came with his father to England about 1603, and either then or in 1605 published his Euphromionis Satyricon, a politico-satirical romance, chiefly directed against the Jesuits, supplements to which were the second part (1607), the Apologia (1611), and the Icon Animorum (1614). In 1616 he went to Rome, where he died, a good Catholic, in 1621. In the same year appeared his Latin political allegory, Argenis, according to Cowper the 'best romance that ever was written.' There are three English versions, the last by Clara Reeve in 1772. See Dupond, L'Argenis de Barclai (1875).

Barclay, JOHN, M.D., anatomist, was born 10th December 1758, in Perthshire, and died in Edinburgh, 21st August 1826. He was mainly instrumental in founding the Dick Veterinary College in Edinburgh.

Barclay, JOHN (1734-98), a Scottish Presbyterian minister, who in 1773 founded the now almost extinct sect of the Bereans.

Barclay, ROBERT, the apologist of the Quakers, was born at Gordonstown, near Elgin, December 23, 1648. His father, Col. David Barclay (1610-86), had served under Gustavus Adolphus, and in 1666 became a convert to Quakerism. Robert was educated at the Scots College at Paris, of which his uncle was rector; and here he withstood every temptation to embrace Catholicism. He returned to Scotland in 1664, and in 1667 joined the Society of Friends. He prosecuted his studies ardently, married a Quakeress in 1670, and became involved in controversies in which he showed himself the superior in logic and learning, no less than in tolerance. In 1672 he startled Aberdeen by walking through its streets in sackcloth and ashes. He suffered much persecution and was frequently imprisoned, but at last found a protector in the Duke of York, afterwards James II. He made several journeys into Holland and Germany, the last in company with William Penn and George Fox. He was one of the twelve Quakers who acquired East New Jersey in 1682, and was appointed its nominal governor. He visited London, but continued to live at his estate of Urie, near Stonehaven, where he died October 3, 1690. Barclay's works were collected in 1692 in a folio entitled Truth Triumphant, republished in 3 vols. in 1717-18. Of these the greatest is An Apology for the True Christian Divinity held by the Quakers (1678).

Barclay-Allardice, ROBERT, known as Captain Barclay, the pedestrian, was born in 1779, and succeeded to the estate of Urie, near Stonehaven, in 1797. He entered the army (1805), and served in the Walcheren expedition (1809), but afterwards devoted himself to agriculture, cattle-breeding, and the claiming of earldoms (Airth, Strathearn, and Menteith). He died 8th May 1854. His great feat of walking 1000 miles in 1000 consecutive hours took place at Newmarket in June to July 1809.

Barclay de Tolly, MICHAEL, PRINCE (1761-1818), a Russian general of Scottish ancestry, who distinguished himself against Napoleon.

Bar-coch'ba, SIMON, the leader of the Jews in their great but fruitless insurrection against the Emperor Hadrian, from 130 to 135 A.D.

Bardesanes (properly Bar-Daisan), a Syrian, the 'last of the Gnostics,' was born at Edessa in 154, and died in 222. See Hilgenfeld's Bardesanes (Leip. 1864).

Barebone, or BARBON, PRAISE-GOD (c. 1596-1679), an Anabaptist leather-merchant of London, famous solely for having given nickname to Cromwell's 'Little Parliament' of 1653, of which he was one of the 139 members.

Barentz, or BARENTS, WILLIAM, a Dutch navigator, was pilot to several Dutch expeditions in search of the North-east passage, and died off Nova Zembla, 20th June 1597. Captain Carlsen found his winter-quarters undisturbed in 1871, after 274 years, and in 1875 part of his journal was recovered by another explorer. See Van Campen's Barents' Relics (1877).

Barère de Vieuzac, BERTRAND, a French revolutionist and régicide, the 'Anacreon of the guillotine' was born at Tarbes, 10th September

1755; died 14th Jan. 1841. See his lying Mémoires (4 vols. 1842; trans. 1897). [Bar-eh'r de V'ye'h-zak'.]

Baretti, GIUSEPPE MARC ANTONIO, born at Turin in 1719, in 1751 established himself as a teacher of Italian in London. He revisited the Continent (1760-66), where he published a readable book of travels, and in Venice started the Frusta Letteraria, or 'literary scourge.' In 1769 he stabbed a Haymarket bully in self-defence, and was tried for murder, but acquitted.—Dr Johnson, Burke, and Garrick testifying to his character. He died in London, 5th May 1789. His thirty-six works included an Italian and English Dictionary (1769; 10th ed. 1854).

Barham, FRANCIS FOSTER, founder of a new mystic religion called 'Alisin,' was born near Penzance in 1808, and died at Bath, 9th February 1871. See Memorial by Sir J. Pitman (1873).

Barham, RICHARD HARRIS, author of the Ingoldsby Legends, was born at Canterbury, 6th December 1788. In 1795 he succeeded to the manor of Tappington, and in 1802 he met with an almost fatal coach accident whilst on his way to St Paul's School, an accident that partially crippled his right arm for life. He entered Brasenose College, Oxford (1807), was ordained (1813), and in 1821 received a minor canonry of St Paul's Cathedral, three years later becoming incumbent of a City church, and priest in ordinary of the chapels royal. His first novel, Baldwin (1819), fell still-born; his second, My Cousin Nicholas (1841), appeared in Blackwood's Magazine; and with the commencement of Bentley's Miscellany in 1837, he began his series of inimitable burlesque metrical tales under the pen-name of Thomas Ingoldsby. They were first collected into a volume in 1840, and the third series was published in 1847 with a brief memoir of the author by his son. Barham's lyrics were published separately in 1881. He died in London, June 17, 1845. See his Life and Letters by his son (2 vols. 1870; 3d ed. 1880).

Bariatinski, ALEXANDER IVANOVICH, PRINCE (1814-79), a Russian field-marshal, who distinguished himself against the famous Shamyk (q.v.).

Baring, a great financial and commercial house established in London in 1770 by the two sons of John Baring (1697-1748), a German cloth manufacturer, who in 1717 started a small business at Larkbear, near Honiton, Devon. Those sons were John (1730-1816) and Francis (1740-1810), who was created a baronet by Pitt in 1798, and who at the time of his death had amassed a fortune of nearly seven millions.—His eldest son, SIR THOMAS BARING (1772-1848), was chiefly remarkable as a patron of art.—His fourth son, CHARLES THOMAS (1807-79), Bishop of Durham, was a strong Evangelical, noted for his piety and personal kindness.—SIR FRANCIS THORNHILL BARING (1796-1866), created Lord Northbrook in the year of his death, eldest son of Sir Thomas, was educated at Oxford, where in 1817 he took a double first. He represented Portsmouth from 1826 till 1865. Under successive Whig governments, he was Lord of the Treasury, Secretary to the Treasury, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and First Lord of the Admiralty.—His son, THOMAS GEORGE, second Lord Northbrook, was born in 1826, and was successively a Lord of the Admiralty, Under-secretary of State for India, Under-secretary of War, Governor-general of India (1872-76), First Lord of the Admiralty (1880-85), and an earl (1876), and died 1904.—THOMAS BARING (1799-1873), brother of the first Lord Northbrook, devoted himself early to commercial pursuits, to picture-collecting, and to politics. Entering parliament as a Conservative in 1835, he represented Huntingdon from 1844 till his death. In 1885 the head of the firm, EDWARD CHARLES BARING (1828-97), was raised to the peerage as Baron Revelstoke. The firm is engaged in the negotiation of national loans, in exchange and money-broking, and in importation and exportation. In 1890 it just tided over a severe crisis.—For ALEXANDER BARING, see ASHBURTON, LORD; and for SIR EVELYN BARING, see CROMER, LORD.

Baring-Gould, SABINE, born at Exeter, 28th Jan. 1834, of an old Devon family, in early life lived much in Germany and France. Educated at Clare College, Cambridge, he became incumbent of Dalton, Thirsk, in 1866; rector of East Mersea, Colchester, in 1871; and in 1881 rector of LewTrenchard, Devon, having also on his father's death (1872) succeeded to the estate there. His works (about a hundred) include Iceland (1862), Curious Myths of the Middle Ages (1866-67), The Origin and Development of Religious Belief (1869-70), Germany Present and Past (1879), Deserts of Southern France (1894), English Minstrelsie (1895-97), St Paul (1897), and Mehalah (1880) the best of a number of novels.

Barker, EDMUND HENRY (1788-1839), classical scholar, born at Hollym vicarage, SE. Yorkshire, studied at Trinity, Cambridge. He lost all he had in a lawsuit, and after some years in the Fleet prison, died in a mean London lodging-house.

Barker, LADY. See BROOME.

Barker, ROBERT (1739-1806), a native of Kells, and artist in Edinburgh, who in 1788 exhibited a panorama of that city, the earliest known of.

Barker, THOMAS, 'of Bath' (1769-1847), painter of rural and other scenes, was born near Pontypool, and died at Bath.—His eldest son, THOMAS JONES BARKER (1815-82), was born at Bath, and died in London. A painter of battle-scenes, he has been styled the 'English Horace Vernet.'

Barlow, JANE, born at Clontarf, 17th Oct. 1860, the eldest daughter of a fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, published in 1892 a remarkable volume of Irish Idylls, followed by Bogland Studies, Kerri-gan's Quality, Mrs Martin's Company, &c.

Barlow, JOEL, poet and politician, born 24th March 1754 at Redding in Connecticut, studied at Dartmouth and Yale colleges, and served as a military chaplain during the war of independence. In 1788 he came to France as agent for a land company; in 1792 published in London a poem entitled The Conspiracy of Kings; and the same year was deputed by the London reformers to proceed to Paris, where he received the rights of French citizenship. He spent some years on the Continent in political, literary, and mercantile pursuits, in which he made a fortune, and served as American consul at Algiers. He returned to America in 1805, and was appointed ambassador to France in 1811. He died, 22d December 1812, near Cracow, when on his way to a conference with Napoleon. His Columbiad (1807), the germ of which was contained in his Vision of Columbus (1787), is an historical review of events from the time of Columbus to the French Revolution. Other works are his intemperate Advice to the Privileged Orders (1791-95), and the would-be humorous poem, Hasty Pudding. See Todd's Life and Letters of Joel Barlow (1886).

Barlow, THOMAS (1607-91), the 'trimming' Calvinistic Bishop of Lincoln, was born at Orton in Westmorland, and educated at Appleby and Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became provost in 1657. He was consecrated in 1675, and died at his palace of Buckden, Hunts.

Barlow, WILLIAM (died 1568), a weathercock reformer, from 1536 Bishop successively of St Asaph, St Davids, Bath, and Chichester.—His son William (died 1625), Archdeacon of Salisbury, wrote on the compass and magnetism.

Bar'mecides, or BARMEKIDES, a Persian family descended from Barmak, a physician and priest of Balkh, in Khorassan. Khālid bin Bernek became prime-minister of the first Abbaside calif; and his virtuous and able son, Yāhya, was in 786 made vizier by Haroun-al-Raschid, who, however, in 803 exterminated the entire race.

Barnard, LADY ANNE (1750-1825), author of 'Auld Robin Gray,' eldest daughter of James Lindsay, fifth Earl of Balcarres, in 1793 married Andrew Barnard, a son of the Bishop of Limerick, and colonial secretary to Lord Macartney at the Cape. There she lived till 1807, when, losing her husband, she returned to London. Her matchless lyric, named after the old Balcarres herd, was written to an ancient melody in 1772; but she first acknowledged its authorship in 1823 to Sir Walter Scott. Her Letters were published in 1901 as South Africa a Century Ago. See Lord Crawford's Lives of the Lindsays (1849).

Barnard, HENRY (1811-1900), American educationist, born at Hartford, Conn.

Barnardo, DR THOMAS JOHN (1845-1905), founder in 1866 of the 'Barnardo Homes' for homeless children, was born in Ireland of Spanish-German-Anglo-Irish parentage. See his Life (1907).

Barnato, BARNEY (1852-97), South African millionaire, was born in Whitechapel of Jewish parentage, went out to Kimberley with a small circus in 1873, and drowned himself off a homeward Cape steamer. See Life by Raymond (1897).

Barnave, ANTOINE (1761-93), Revolutionist, born at Grenoble, brought back the royal family from Varennes, but, subsequently advocating more moderate courses, was guillotined.

Barnby, SIR JOSEPH (1838-96), musician, was born at York, and knighted in 1892.

Barnes, ALBERT (1798-1870), biblical expositor, was born at Rome, N. Y., and died at Philadelphia, a Presbyterian minister there 1830-67.

Barnes, THOMAS (1786-1841), editor of the Times from 1807, was educated at Christ's Hospital and Pembroke College, Cambridge.

Barnes, WILLIAM (1800-86), England's best purely pastoral poet, was born at Rushay, near Sturminster-Newton, in the Vale of Blackmoor, of an old Dorset stock. Spite of early difficulties, he acquired remarkable learning, and after some time in a solicitor's office, taught a school at Dorchester with success. After obtaining a university degree and receiving ordination, he became curate of Whitcombe in 1847, and rector of Winterborne Came in 1862. Meantime he had become widely known by his fine idyllic poetry in the Dorset dialect, 'the bold and broad Dorie of England.' His first volume appeared in 1844; the second, Homely Rhymes, in 1859; the third in 1862; the three were collected in 1879 as Poems of Rural Life in the Dorset Dialect. He wrote several philological works, being specially jealous to preserve the purity of the English tongue. See Life (1887) by his daughter, Mrs Baxter ('Leader Scott'), who has written much on Italian themes.

Barnett, JOHN, composer, was born at Bedford, 15th July 1802, and died 16th April 1890, having for some time been musical director of the Olympic Theatre.—His nephew, JOHN FRANCIS BARNETT, also a composer, was born in 1838.

Barneveldt, JAN VAN OLDEN, Grand Pensionary of Holland, was born at Amerfoort in 1547, and in 1569 commenced practice at the Hague as an advocate. Through Barneveldt's influence Prince Maurice succeeded his murdered father as stadtholder (1584); but Barneveldt it also was, who, becoming head of the republican party, opposed the warlike tendencies of Maurice, concluded (1609) a truce with Spain, and prevented the States-general from joining the revolt of the Bohemians. His influence excited the house of Nassau to still greater jealousy, which in the religious controversies between the Remonstrants and Gomarists degenerated into the bitterest hostility (see ARMINIUS). To obviate a civil war, Barneveldt proposed an ecclesiastical assembly, which agreed to a general toleration. The States concurred; but the intrigues of the Orange party brought about a change of views, by representing the Remonstrants as secret friends of Spain. Barneveldt was scurrilously attacked and insulted by the mob, with whom Maurice was an idol. In 1618 he was illegally arrested, along with Grotius; and, condemned as a traitor, on 13th May 1619 he was beheaded at the Hague. His two sons were at the same time dismissed from office. Four years after their father's death they took part in a conspiracy, which, however, was discovered. The elder escaped to Antwerp, the younger was beheaded. See Motley's Life of Barneveldt (2 vols. 1874).

Barnfield, RICHARD, born at Norbury, Shropshire, in 1574, studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and died, a country gentleman, at Stone, in Staffordshire, in 1627. There are editions of his pastoral poems, quaint, rhythmic, dainty, but over-luxuriant, by Grosart (1876) and Arber (1882).

Barnum, PHINEAS TAYLOR, American showman, was born at Bethel, Conn., July 5, 1810, and died at Bridgeport, 7th April 1891, worth $5,000,000. See his Autobiography (1854; new ed. 1888), Humbugs of the World (1865), Struggles and Triumphs (1869), and Money-getting (1883).

Baroche, PIERRE-JULES (1802-70), a French Bonapartist politician. [Bar-voash'.]

Baronius, CESAR, a great Catholic ecclesiastical historian, born at Sora, in Naples, 30th August 1538. Coming to Rome at nineteen, he was one of the first pupils of St Philip Neri, and attached himself to his Congregation of the Oratory, of which in 1593 he became superior. His Annales Ecclesiastici a Christo nato ad Annum 1193 (12 vols. 1588-93) was written in reply to the Protestant Magdeburg Centuries, its object to prove that the Church of Rome was identical with the Christian church of the 1st century. Honours were now showered upon him. He became confessor to the pope, apostolical protonotary, cardinal in 1596, Vatican librarian, and would have been elected pope in 1605 but for the Spaniards, who were indignant at his argument against Spain's claim to Sicily. He died June 30, 1607. The best edition of the Annales—a too polemical and uncritical work—is by Mansi (38 vols. Lucca, 1738-59), which contains Pagi's Critica. Odoricus Raynaldus wrote a continuation to 1565 (9 vols. 1646-76). A new edition, with the continuations of Raynaldus, &c., is by Theiner (37 vols. Bar-le-Duc, 1864-83), who wrote a continuation for 1572-85 (Rome, 3 vols. 1857). Baronius's Martyrologium Romanum (1590) also deserves notice. See Lives by Sarra (Rome, 1862) and Lady A. Kerr (1899).

Barrantes, VICENTE, a Spanish writer, born at Badajoz, 29th March 1829.

Barras, PAUL-JEAN-FRANÇOIS-NICOLAS, COMTE DE, Revolutionist, was born June 30, 1755, at Fos-Emphoux in Var, of one of its oldest families. In his youth he served against the English in India; then, returning home, plunged into reckless dissipation at Paris. An original member of the Jacobin Club, he represented Var in the National Convention, voted for the king's execution, and had a share in the Girondists' downfall. He conducted the siege of Toulon, and suppressed, with great cruelty, the revolt in the south of France. Hated by Robespierre, he played the chief part in the tyrant's overthrow, and by the terrified Convention was appointed virtual dictator; as such he crushed the intrigues of the Terrorists. On subsequent occasions he acted with decision against both Royalists and Jacobins; and in 1795, being again appointed dictator, he called his young friend Bonaparte to his aid, who assured his own future with the historical 'whiff of grape-shot.' The Directory being appointed, Barras was nominated one of the five members. Once more dictator in 1797, he guided the state almost alone, until his covetousness and love of pleasure had rendered him so unpopular that Bonaparte, with Siyès' help, overthrew him easily on 18th Brumaire (November 9) 1799. Compelled to remove from Paris, he resided in Brussels, Marseilles, Rome, and Montpellier; in 1815 he returned, and purchased an estate near Paris with part of the great fortune acquired in the Revolution. He died 29th January 1829. See his Memoires, edited by G. Duruy (Eng. trans. 4 vols. 1895-96). [Bar-rah'.]

Barré, ISAAC, British soldier and politician, was born at Dublin in 1726. Gazetted as an ensign in 1746, he rose under Wolfe to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and was wounded in the cheek at Quebec (1759). He sat in parliament from 1761 to 1790, and held office successively under Lord Bute, Pitt, Rockingham, and Lord Shelburne. He died in London, 20th July 1802.

Barrett, WILSON, actor and manager, was born in Essex, 18th February 1846, and in 1879 became manager of the Court Theatre, London, in 1881 of the Princess's. The Silver King, Claudian, Hamlet, Hoodman Blind, and his own Christian melodrama, The Sign of the Cross, are among the plays he acted in. He died in July 1904.

Barrie, JAMES MATTHEW, humorist, was born 9th May 1860 at Kirriemuir, Forfarshire, and educated there and at Dumfries Academy and Edinburgh University, taking his M.A. in 1882. After a year and a half as a journalist in Nottingham, he settled in London, and became a regular contributor to the St James's Gazette, British Weekly (as 'Gavin Ogilvy'), National Observer, Speaker, &c. His first volume, Better Dead (1887), was largely a satire on London life; in Auld Licht Idylls (1888) he opened a new and rich vein, the humour and the pathos of his native village. 'Thrums,' that village, still furnishes the keynote to When a Man's Single (1888), nominally a tale of literary life in London; and still more to A Window in Thrums (1889). The Little Minister (1891), his first novel, came out in Good Words, and showed grim humour, pathos, power of character-sketching and nature-description, with the gift of veracious and vivacious dialogue, but was fantastic and less true to nature than his shorter tales and sketches; it was dramatised in 1897. Walker, London, a farcical comedy, had a prodigious run at Toole's Theatre in 1892; Jane Annie (1893) was written with Sir Conan Doyle. Other successful pieces have been The Professor's Love Story (1895), The Wedding Guest, The Admirable Crichton, Little Mary, Peter Pan (1904), Alice-sit-by-the-Fire (1905), What Every Woman Knows (1908), &c. Sentimental Tommy (1896), a story, was continued in Tommy and Grizel (1900); Margaret Ogilvy (1896) dealt with his mother's life; The Little White Bird appeared in 1902. Peter Pan appeared also in Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens (1906), and Peter and Wendy (1911).

Barrington, GEORGE, was born 14th May 1755 at Maynooth, Ireland, the son of a silversmith named Henry Waldron. In London he turned nickpocket, and was in 1790 transported to Botany Bay, but on the voyage out frustrated a convict conspiracy, so was emancipated in 1792. He became high constable of Parramatta, New South Wales, where he died, 28th Dec. 1804. He was not the author of A Voyage to New South Wales (1795), a Sequel thereto (1800), or even of the prologue, 'True patriots w^b. &c. (1796). See Athenæum, Feb. 12, 1898, p. 216.

Barrington, JOHN SHUTE, VISCOUNT, was born, the son of a London merchant, at Theobalds in 1678, and, after four years' study at Utrecht, was called to the bar in 1699. His Rights of Protestant Dissenters (1704) gained him the confidence of the Presbyterians; his Dissuasive from Jacobitism (1713) recommended him to George I., and in 1720 he was raised to the Irish peerage as baron and viscount, having ten years before assumed the name Barrington. He was returned for Berwick in 1715, but expelled from the House of Commons in 1723 for his connection with a bubble speculation. He died at Becket, Berkshire, 14th December 1734. See Life prefixed to his theological works (3 vols. 1828). Of his six sons, four deserve notice.—WILLIAM WILDMAN, 2d VISCOUNT (1717-93), in 1740 was returned by Berwick-upon-Tweed, and until 1778 constantly held office in the Admiralty, War Office, Exchequer, or Post-office.—DAINES (1727-1800) was called to the bar, where he attained a considerable position. His numerous writings embrace law, antiquities, and natural history, but his only important work is his Observations on the Statutes (1766).—SAMUEL (1729-1800) was a distinguished admiral.—SHUTE (1734-1826) became successively Bishop of Llandaff, Salisbury, and (1791) Durham.

Barros, João de (1496-1570), a Portuguese historian, born at Vizeu.

Barrot, CAMILLE HYACINTHE ODILON (1791-1873), a liberal French statesman. See his Mémoires Posthumes (4 vols. 1875-76). [Bar-rol.]

Barrow, ISAAC, mathematician and divine, was born in 1630 in London, where his father was linen-draper to Charles I. At the Charterhouse he was chiefly distinguished for pugnacity; but at Felstead, in Essex, his next school, he greatly improved. In 1643 he was entered at Peterhouse, Cambridge, under his uncle, Isaac Barrow (1614-80), then a fellow, and afterwards Bishop of Sodor and Man and St Asaph. In 1645, before he had come into residence, his uncle was ejected; so he went instead to Trinity, where he became a fellow in 1649. Finding that to be a good theologian he must know chronology, that chronology implies astronomy, and astronomy mathematics, he applied himself to the latter science with distinguished success. To the classics he had already devoted much study, and in 1654 he was recommended for the Greek chair; but a suspicion of Arminianism interfered with his success. After this disappointment he went abroad (1655), and travelled four years through France and Italy to Smyrna and Constantinople, back to Venice, and home through Germany and Holland. Soon after his return he took orders (1659), and next year was appointed professor of Greek. In 1662 he received the chair of Geometry at Gresham College, London, which he resigned on his appointment to the Lucasian professorship of Mathematics at Cambridge (1663). This too he resigned in 1669, in favour of his pupil Isaac Newton. On quitting his professorship, he obtained from his uncle a small sinecure in Wales, and from Dr Seth Ward, Bishop of Salisbury, a prebend in that cathedral. He devoted the revenues of both to charitable purposes, and resigned them in 1672, on being appointed by the king Master of Trinity College. In 1675 he was nominated vice-chancellor of the university; on 4th May 1677 he died in London, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He was only 47, but he had achieved a reputation which time has left unimpaired. As a theologian, his fame rests mainly on his posthumous Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy, and on his eloquent sermons, unmatched as specimens of clear, exhaustive, vigorous discussion. One, however, on charity, lasted three hours and a half; and at Westminster Abbey he once detained the audience so long that they got the organ to play 'till they had blown him down.' Far the best edition of Barrow's English theological works is the Rev. A. Napier's (9 vols. Camb. 1859), with a memoir by Whewell, who in 1860 also edited his Latin mathematical works, Lectiones Geometricæ, Lectiones Opticæ, &c., some of which have been translated.

Barrow, SIR JOHN, was born of humble parentage at Dragley Beck, Lancashire, in 1764, and educated at Ulverston. Having for three years been timekeeper in a Liverpool iron-foundry, he made a voyage (1781) on a Greenland whaler, and next taught mathematics in a school at Greenwich. In 1792 he became private secretary to Lord Macartney, ambassador to China; in China he learnt Chinese, and collected valuable materials, which he afterwards published, partly in the Quarterly Review, and partly in his Travels in China (1804). When in 1797 Lord Macartney became governor of Cape Colony, Barrow made extensive excursions in the interior, which he described in his still valuable Travels in Southern Africa (1803). From 1804 to 1845 he was secretary to the Admiralty; in 1835 was created a baronet; and died in London, 23d November 1848. Barrow also published A Voyage to Cochín-China (1806), The Life of Macartney (1807), Voyages into the Arctic Regions (1818), Voyages of Arctic Discovery (1846), besides a series of lives of naval worthies. He promoted Arctic expeditions; and Barrow Strait, Cape Barrow, and Point Barrow preserve his memory. He may also be claimed as the founder of the Geographical Society (1830), of which he was vice-president till his death. See his Autobiography (1847), and the Memoir by Staunton (1852).

Barry, ANN. See BARRY, SPRANGER.

Barry, COMTESSE DU. See DU BARRY.

Barry, SIR CHARLES, R.A., architect, was born at Westminster in 1795, and educated at private schools in Leicestershire and Bedfordshire. In 1810 he was indentured to a firm of Lambeth surveyors; in 1817 he went to Italy. A wealthy Englishman, attracted by the beauty of his drawings, took him with him to the East; in 1820 he returned to England. He was architect of the Manchester Athenæum, a building in the Grecian style, and of the Birmingham grammar-school, the latter the most beautiful of his works. In London he designed the Travellers' and Reform Clubs, and the College of Surgeons. After the burning of the old Houses of Parliament in 1834, on a public competition Barry's design for the new building was adjudged the best. The work was commenced in 1840; and on 3d February 1852 Her Majesty opened the Victoria Tower and Royal Gallery in state, and knighted the architect. Elected an R.A. in 1841, he died at Clapham, May 12, 1860, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See the Life (1867) by his second son, ALFRED BARRY, D.D., who, born in 1826, was Bishop of Sydney from 1884 to 1889. The eldest son, CHARLES BARRY (1823-1900), was an architect; so was the third son, EDWARD MIDDLETON BARRY (1830-80); the fifth son, SIR JOHN WOLFE-BARRY, C.B., born in London, 7th Dec. 1836, was the engineer of the Tower Bridge, and was created a baronet in 1897.

Barry, ELIZABETH (1658-1713), a London actress, brought out by the Earl of Rochester.

Barry, JAMES, historical painter, was born at Cork, October 11, 1741. A protégé of Burke, he studied in Italy (1766-70), and in 1782 was appointed professor of Painting to the Royal Academy, from which his irritable temper brought about his expulsion (1799). He died in poverty, 22d February 1806. See J. Conynns Carr's Papers on Art (1885).

Barry, MARTIN (1802-55), physiologist, born at Fratton, Hampshire, studied much abroad, was house-surgeon to the Maternity Hospital, Edinburgh (1844-53), and died at Beccles.

Barry, SPRANGER (1719-77), an actor, Garrick's rival, born at Dublin, in 1768 married the actress Mrs Ann Dancer, née Street (1734-1801).

Barry Cornwall. See PROCTER.

Bartas, GUILLAUME DE SALLUSTE DU, soldier, diplomatist, and man of letters, was born at Montfort, in Armagnac, in 1544, and died in 1590 of wounds received at the battle of Ivry. His chief poem, La Sepmaine, gives an account of the creation, and is said to have had a considerable influence on Milton's Paradise Lost. Thirty editions of it came out in six years. Joshua Sylvester (1563-1618) Englished his poems. See Pellissier's Vie de Du Bartas (1883).

Barth, HEINRICH, traveller, was born at Hamburg, 16th February 1821. He studied at Berlin, and, after visiting Italy and Sicily, in 1845 passed over to Tangier in Africa. On his journey to Cairo, he was wounded and plundered by Arab robbers. He afterwards visited Sinai, Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece. He was next appointed by the British government, along with Dr Overweg, scientific companion to Mr James Richardson. Starting from Tripoli early in 1850, they crossed the Great Desert. Barth soon separated from his friends, who both succumbed to the climate, and continued his explorations, which extended to Adamáwa in the south, and from Bagirmi in the east to Timbuktu in the west, upwards of 12,000 miles, and which he described in Travels and Discoveries in Central Africa (5 vols. 1857-58). Afterwards he made several journeys in Greece, Turkey, and Asia Minor. He died at Berlin, November 25, 1865.

Barth, or BART, JEAN, was born, a fisherman's son, at Dunkirk in 1651, and served first in the Dutch navy under De Ruyter, but on the outbreak of the war with Holland passed over to the French service. For a while the captain of a privateer, in 1691 he commanded a small squadron in the North Sea, where he destroyed many English vessels, and made a descent on the coast near Newcastle. In 1694, after a desperate struggle with a superior Dutch fleet, he recaptured a large flotilla of cornships, and brought them safely into Dunkirk. Soon after he was taken prisoner and carried to Plymouth, but escaped in a fishing-boat to France. The king received him with distinction at Versailles, and in 1697 appointed him to the command of a squadron. The peace of Ryswick terminated Barth's active career, and he died at Dunkirk, April 27, 1702. See Life by De la Landelle (Paris, 1874), and Professor Laughton's Studies in Naval History (1887).

Barthélemy, AUGUSTE-MARSEILLE (1796-1867), a French poet and Bonapartist, was born and died at Marseilles, of which city he was librarian.

Barthélemy, JEAN JACQUES (1716-95), a learned French abbé and antiquary, best known by his Voyage du jeune Anacharsis en Grèce (4 vols. 1788). The first complete edition of his works was that of Villenave (4 vols. 1821), with a biography.

Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire, JULES (1805-95), a French scholar and statesman, born in Paris, best known by his translation of Aristotle and his writings on Indian philosophy.

Bartholdi, AUGUSTE (1834-1904), sculptor, was born at Colmar, Alsace, of Italian ancestry on his father's side. His best-known work is the colossal bronze 'Liberty enlightening the World,' which was unveiled on Bedloe's Island, New York Harbour, in 1886; the statue itself is 151 feet high, and the top of the torch rises 304 feet above low-water mark. Bartholdi received the Cross of the Legion of Honour in 1887.

Bartholin, KASPAR (1585-1629), Swedish author of fifty works.—His son, THOMAS (1616-80), was a philologist, naturalist, and physician.

Bartholomæus Anglicus. See GLANVILLE.

Bartleman, JAMES (1769-1821), a London baritone singer with a voice of unusual compass.

Bartlett. See ASHMEAD-BARTLETT.

Bartlett, WILLIAM HENRY, artist, born in London in 1809, and died on the voyage from Malta to Marseilles, 13th September 1854. He illustrated nineteen quarto volumes with English, Continental, and Eastern sketches.

Bartley, GEORGE (1782-1858), a comedian, born at Bath, who married in 1814, for his second wife, an actress more celebrated than himself, Sarah Williamson or Smith (1783-1850).

Bartoli, TADDEO (1362-1422), an Italian painter of the Siennese school.—DANIELO BARTOLI (1608-85) was rector of the Jesuit College at Rome in 1685, and wrote a history of the order (1653-73).—PIETRO SANTO BARTOLI, sometimes called 'Perugino' (1635-1700), was a painter after the manner of Poussin, and a skillful etcher.

Bartolini, LORENZO (1777-1850), an Italian sculptor, born at Vernio in Tuscany.

Bartolomme'o, FRA (properly Baccio della Porta), one of the most distinguished masters of the Florentine school of painting, was born near Florence in 1475. His first teacher was Cosimo Rosselli; but he owed his higher cultivation to the study of the works of Leonardo da Vinci. His subjects are mostly religious, and by far the greater part of his pieces belong to the later years of his life. He was a warm adherent of Savonarola, after whose tragical end he in 1500 assumed the Dominican habit. The visit of the young Raphael to Florence in 1504 seems to have been instrumental in stimulating him to resume his art. He imparted to Raphael his knowledge of colouring, and acquired from him a more perfect knowledge of perspective. The two remained constant friends—Bartolommeo on one occasion finishing certain of Raphael's unfinished works, Raphael performing a like kindness for him at another time. Bartolommeo died at Florence, 31st October 1517. The greater number of his works are to be seen at Florence, in the gallery of the Pitti Palace, but the Louvre possesses a fine 'Annunciation' by him. See works by Frantz (Ratisbon, 1879), Leader Scott (London, 1880), and Gruyer (Paris, 1886).

Bartolozzi, FRANCESCO, engraver, was born in Florence, September 21, 1727, and settled in London in 1764. In 1769, on the formation of the Royal Academy, he was nominated an original member, and executed, from a design by his friend Cipriani, the diploma, which is still in use, and ranks as one of his masterpieces. In 1802 he accepted a flattering invitation from the Prince Regent of Portugal, to take the superintendence of a school of engravers at Lisbon, whither he repaired three years afterwards, and there resided until his death, March 7, 1815. He was the grandfather of Madame Vestris. His prints, said to be more numerous than those of any engraver, include line engravings and stippled works, printed in brown and red. See Tuer's Bartolozzi and his Works (2 vols. 1882).

Barton, ANDREW, a Scottish naval commander who in 1506 sent James IV. three barrels full of Flemish pirates' heads, and who was killed in an engagement with two English ships in the Downs, 2d August 1511.

Barton, BENJAMIN SMITH (1766-1815), American naturalist and medical practitioner.

Barton, BERNARD, the Quaker poet, was born at Carlisle, 31st January 1784. In 1809 he became clerk to a bank at Woodbridge, a post which he held till within two days of his death, 19th February 1849. His Metrical Effusions (1812) brought him into correspondence with Southey; whilst Poems by an Amateur (1818), Poems (1820), and several more volumes of verse, increased his reputation, and gained him the friendship of Lamb. His devotional poems have an echo of George Herbert, and some of his lyrics are graceful; but he is on the whole less a poet than a versifier, easy and pleasant withal. Lamb's advice to him was sound, 'Keep to your bank, and your bank will keep you;' and by Lamb's advice it was that he accepted the sum of £1200, raised by some Quaker friends in 1824. See his Poems and Letters (1849), selected by his daughter, with a memoir by her husband, Edward Fitz-Gerald, and E. V. Lucas's Bernard Barton and his Friends (1894).

Barton, ELIZABETH, the Holy Nun or Maid of Kent, was born in 1506, and about 1525, when a domestic servant at Aldington in Kent, had an illness, and uttered hysterical ravings. When her illness left her, she still continued her trances and prophetic utterances, which drew so much attention that Archbishop Warham sent two monks to examine her. One of these, Edward Bocking, instructed her carefully in the controversial points between his church and the Protestants, and persuaded her to give herself out as directly inspired by the Virgin. Soon afterwards she became an inmate of the priory of St Sepulchre at Canterbury, with Bocking for confessor. As soon as Henry VIII.'s divorce was mooted, the Nun denounced it, and threatened the king with death if he persisted. His marriage to Anne Boleyn (1533) and subsequent immunity destroyed her credit; and meantime Warham had died, and Cranmer reigned in his room. She was soon 'put to the question,' and repeated examinations drew a full confession from her that 'she never had visions in all her life.' She was hanged at Tyburn with Bocking and four other accomplices on 20th April 1534.

Baruch ('the Blessed'), the son of Neriah, the faithful friend and secretary of Jeremiah.

Barye, ANTOINE LOUIS (1795-1875), a French sculptor, distinguished for his bronze statues of animals. See French monographs by Alexandre (1889) and Ballu (1890). [Bah-ree.]

Basedow, JOHANN BERNHARD (1723-90), an educationist who sought to reduce to practice the maxims of Rousseau and Comenius, was born at Hamburg, and died at Magdeburg. See his Life by Meyer (2 vols. 1792), and works by Hahn (1885) and Pinloche (Paris, 1890). [Bah-zeh-dō.]

Basevi, GEORGE (1794-1845), the architect of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, was killed by a fall in Ely Cathedral.

Bashkirtseff, MARIE, artist and diarist, was born of noble family at Pultowa, South Russia, 11th November 1860, and died of consumption, on the 31st October 1884, at Paris, where she had become famous as a brilliant member of society, a woman of marvellous accomplishments, and a painter of very high promise. See her Journal (Eng. trans. 1890) and Letters (trans. 1891).

Basil, ST, surnamed THE GREAT (c. 329-79), one of the greatest of the Greek Fathers, was born at Caesarea, in Cappadocia, and in 370 succeeded Eusebius as bishop of his native city. The best editions of his works are the Benedictine (3 vols. Paris, 1739) and Migne's (4 vols. Paris, 1866).

Basil I, the Macedonian Byzantine emperor (867-886).

Basile, GIAMBATTISTA, the compiler of the Pentamerone (Naples, 1637), a collection of fifty Neapolitan folk-tales, edited by Liebrecht (Breslau, 1846), and translated by Sir R. Burton (1893).

Basilides, one of the greatest of the Gnostics, who flourished at Alexandria about 125 A.D.

Basire, ISAAC (1607-76), archdeacon of Northumberland and rector of Stanhope, was born of Huguenot parentage either at Rouen or in Jersey. Ousted by the parliamentarians, he visited the Levant (1647-61) to incline the Greek Church to communion with the English. See Life by Darnell (1831).

Basire, JAMES (1730-1802), a London engraver, the son, father, and grandfather of three engravers—Isaac (1704-68), James (1769-1822), and James (1796-1869).

Baskerville, JOHN, printer, was born in 1706 at Sion Hill, Wolverley, Worcestershire. A footman to start with, he afterwards became a writing-master in Birmingham, and from 1740 carried on the business of jappanning there with great success. About 1750 he began to make costly experiments in letter-founding, and produced types which have scarcely yet been excelled. His quarto Virgii (1756), in Macaulay's words, 'was the first of those magnificent editions which went forth to astonish Europe,' and which, 55 in number, included Milton, Juvenal, Congreve, Addison, the Bible, a Greek New Testament, Horace, and Catullus. He died, bequeathing £12,000, 8th January 1775. A foe to 'superstition,' he chose to be buried in his own garden, whence in 1825 his remains were exhumed.

Basnage, JACQUES (1653-1723), a theologian, diplomatist, and historian, driven from France to Holland by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. See French Life by Mailhet (1880).

Bass, GEORGE, a naval surgeon who in 1796-98 explored the strait that bears his name between Tasmania and Australia. He died about 1812, a South American miner.

Bass, MICHAEL THOMAS (1799-1884), of the famous Burton brewing firm of Bass & Co., founded by William Bass in 1777, joined the business on leaving school, and afterwards acted as traveller. From 1848 till 1883 he sat as a Liberal for Derby, to which, as to Burton, his benefactions were very munificent. Of simple tastes, he declined more than once a baronetcy and a peerage. Both honours were conferred on his son Michael Arthur Bass (1837-1909), the former in 1882, and the latter in 1886, when he took the title of Baron Burton.

Bassano (properly GIACOMO DA PONTE), painter, was born at Bassano in 1510, and studied at Venice. He founded a school whose speciality was the delineation of markets, cattle, and country scenes; but his altar-piece of the 'Nativity' at Bassano shows his power of handling sublimer subjects. He died in 1592, leaving four sons, all also painters.

Basse, WILLIAM, an Oxfordshire poet, who published between 1602 and 1653, his best-known piece an elegy on Shakespeare. R. W. Bond has edited his poems (1892).

Bassendyne, THOMAS, an Edinburgh bookseller, who in 1576 reprinted the second Geneva version of the New Testament (the first published in Scotland), and died 3d October 1577. See Dobson's History of the Bassandyne Bible (Edin. 1887).

Bassompierre, FRANÇOIS DE (1579-1646), was raised to the rank of Marshal of France in 1622; bore an active part in the siege of La Rochelle; but was imprisoned by Richelieu in the Bastille from 1631 to 1643. He was an accomplished courtier, extravagant in luxury, and excessively addicted to gallantries. His Journal de ma Vie, written in the Bastille, has been edited by the Marquis de Chantérac (4 vols. 1870-77).

Bastian, ADOLF (1826-1905), traveller and anthropologist, author of over thirty works, was born at Bremen. He studied at Berlin, Heidelberg, Prague, Jena, and Würzburg, and in 1851 sailed for Australia as a ship's doctor, thereafter travelling in North and South America, Europe, Asia, Africa, and where not else besides.

Bastian, HENRY CHARLTON, physiologist, was born at Truro, Cornwall, 28th April 1837, and from a private school at Falmouth proceeded to University College, London, where he became professor of Pathological Anatomy (1867), hospital physician (1871), and professor of Clinical Medicine (1887-95). He is the champion of the doctrine of spontaneous generation.

Bastiat, FRÉDÉRIC, political economist, was born at Bayonne, 29th June 1801, and died in Rome, 24th December 1850. His works, in which he combated protection and socialism, fill 7 vols. (new ed. 1881). See works by Bouchié de Belle (1878) and Bondurant (1879). [Bast-yah'.]

Bastide, JULES, a French radical journalist, Minister of Foreign Affairs in 1848, and member of the Constituent Assembly, was born at Paris in 1800, and died March 3, 1879. [Bas-veed'.]

Bastien-Lepage, JULES, impressionist painter of peasant-life and portraitist, was born at Dainville (Meuse), November 1, 1848, and died in Paris, December 10, 1884. See Theuriot's monograph (Eng. trans. 1892), and Portfolio for April 1894. [Bast-yah'' Lek-pázh'.]

Bastwick, JOHN (1593-1654), a Puritan doctor of Colchester, who under Laud lost his ears in the pillory, and was imprisoned (1637-40).

Batallard, PAUL (1816-94), a French writer from 1844 on the Gypsies. [Ba-ti-yar'.]

Bateman, KATE JOSEPHINE, actress, was born at Baltimore, U.S., 7th October 1842, in 1862 appeared as 'Leah' at Boston, and in 1863-64 played that part 210 nights at the Adelphi, London. In 1866 she married a Dr George Crowe, but in 1868 returned to the stage.—ISABELLA BATEMAN was a younger sister.

Bateman, THOMAS (1821-61), a Derbyshire antiquary, his seat Lomberdale House near Bakewell.

Bates, HENRY WALTER, F.R.S., naturalist and traveller, was born at Leicester, 8th February 1825. During his apprenticeship to a manufacturing hosier, he formed a friendship with Mr Alfred R. Wallace (q.v.); and in April 1848 the two left to explore the Amazons, where Bates remained till 1859. In 1864 he became assistant-secretary of the Royal Geographical Society, which post he held till his death, 16th February 1892. See Memoir by E. Clodd prefixed to fourth ed. of his Naturalist on the Amazons (1892).

Bates, JOSHUA (1788-1864), partner from 1828 in the great London banking-house of Baring Brothers, was born at Weymouth, near Boston, U.S. He was a munificent benefactor of the Boston free library.

Bath'ori, a noble Transylvanian family, dating from the 11th century, that in 1575 gave Poland a king in Stephan Bathori (1532-86). His niece, Elizabeth, wife of the Hungarian Count Nádasdy, was discovered in 1610 to have murdered 650 young girls, that she might renew her own youth by bathing in their warm blood. Her accomplices were burnt; but she was shut up for life in her fortress of Csej, where she died in 1614. See Baring-Gould's Book of Werewolves (1865).

Bath'urst, EARL, a title conferred in 1762 on ALLEN BATHURST (1684-1775), a Tory statesman, and the friend of Pope, Swift, Congreve, Prior, and Sterne. He had been raised to the peerage forty years before as Baron Bathurst.—His son HENRY (1714-94), second earl, sat for Cirencester from 1735 to 1754, and from 1771 to 1778 was Lord Chancellor—'one of the weakest, though one of the worthiest,' that ever sat on the woolsack.—His son HENRY (1762-1834), third earl, was Secretary for the Colonies from 1812 to 1828. To the same family belonged Henry Bathurst (1744-1837), from 1805 Bishop of Norwich, the 'only Liberal bishop' of his day; and his son Benjamin (1784-1809), who disappeared mysteriously between Berlin and Hamburg, as he was travelling with despatches from Vienna.

Batman, JOHN, the 'Founder of Victoria,' was born at Parramatta in 1800, in May 1835 colonised the shores of Port Phillip from Tasmania, and died at Melbourne, 6th May 1840.

Battenberg. The title Countess of Battenberg was conferred in 1851 on Prince Alexander of Hesse'smorganatic spouse, the Countess Hauke (1825-95). Fruits of that union were Prince Louis Alexander of Battenberg (born at Gratz, 24th May 1854; vice-admiral British R.N.), who in 1884 married the eldest daughter of the Princess Alice of Hesse; Prince Alexander of Battenberg (1857-93), and Prince of Bulgaria (see below); and Prince Henry of Battenberg (born at Milan, 5th October 1858), who in 1885 married the Princess Beatrice (born 14th April 1857), youngest daughter of Queen Victoria. He died at sea, of fever caught in the Ashanti campaign, 20th Jan. 1896.

The above Prince Alexander, chosen prince of Bulgaria in 1879, proclaimed the union of Eastern Roumelia with Bulgaria (1885) without consulting Russia, and thereby also provoked the jealousy of the Servians, whom he defeated in a fortnight's campaign. But in August 1886 partisans of Russia overpowered him in his palace at Sofia, forced him to abdicate, and carried him off to Reni, in Russian territory. Set free in a few days, he returned; but after a futile attempt to conciliate the Czar, he abdicated finally next month, and as Count Hartenau retired to Darmstadt. He died 17th Feb. 1893.

Bathyanvi, one of the oldest and most powerful of the noble families of Hungary.—Count Casimir Bathyanvi (1807-54) died an exile in Paris, having shared in the Hungarian insurrection of 1849.—Count Louis Bathyanvi (1809-49) was shot by martial law for his part in that same insurrection. His estates, worth £400,000, were confiscated, but were restored to his family in 1867; and in 1870 his body was removed, and interred anew with great solemnity.—A Prince Bathyanvi (1803-83) occupied for forty-five years a prominent position on the turf, winning the Derby in 1876. Baudelaire, CHARLES, Romanticist, was born at Paris on the 21st April 1821, and died there, 31st August 1867. His Œuvres complètes (new ed. since 1891) include Fleurs du Mal (1857), Les Paradis artificiels, Opium et Haschich (1860), and the exquisite Petits Poèmes en Prose. [Bode-lay'r.]

Baudissin, WOLF HEINRICH, COUNT (1789-1878), a German author, was for a time in Danish state service, helped Tieck and Schlegel in the translation of Shakespeare, wrote books on Shakespeare and Ben Jonson, and translated Molière and Goldoni.—Another Count Baudissin (Wolf Wilhelm Friedrich, born 1847) has devoted himself to theology, becoming professor at Strasburg, at Marburg, and at Berlin. He has written on Job, the history of Semitic religion, and the Jewish priesthood. [Bow'dis-seen.]

Baudry, PAUL (1828-86), painter, was born at La Roche-sur-Yon, and died in Paris. See Life by Ephrussi (Paris, 1887). [Bô-dree.]

Bauer, BRUNO, an audacious biblical critic, was born at Eisenberg, 9th September 1809, and died at Rixdorf, near Berlin, 13th April 1882. [Bow'er.]

Bauer, CAROLINE, a German actress, born at Heidelberg in 1807, made her début in 1822, and had achieved a brilliant success, in comedy and tragedy alike, when in 1829 she married Prince Leopold, afterwards king of the Belgians. Their morganatic union was as brief as it was unhappy; in 1831 she returned to the stage, which she quitted only in 1844, on her marriage to a Polish count. She died at Zürich, 18th October 1878. Her Memoirs (Eng. trans. 1884), with their denunciations of Prince Leopold and Baron Stockmar, offer a striking contrast to her bright theatrical reminiscences (2 vols. 1871-75).

Baumé, ANTOINE (1728-1804), a French chemist, born at Senlis, known specially for his improvements on the areometer. [Boh-may.] and acute thinker of the school of Wolf, the founder of Æsthetics, was born at Berlin, 17th July 1714, and in 1740 became professor of Philosophy at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he died 26th May 1762. See Joh. Schmidt's Leibnitz und Baumgarten (Halle, 1874). [Bowm'gar-ten.]

Baumgarten-Crusius, LUDWIG FRIEDRICH ORTO, a semi-rationalistic theologian, born at Merseburg in 1788, became in 1817 professor of Theology at Jena, where he died May 31, 1843.

Baur, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN, the founder of the 'Tübingen School' of theology, was born at Schmiden, near Stuttgart, 21st June 1792, became professor in the seminary at Blaubeuren in 1817, was called to the Tübingen chair of Theology in 1826, and died 2d December 1860. [Bowr.]

Bautain, LOUIS EUGÈNE-MARIE (1796-1867), philosopher and theologian, was born and died at Paris. A pupil of Cousin, he became in 1816 professor of Philosophy at Strasburg. He took orders in 1828, but was suspended in 1834 owing to charges of heterodoxy brought against his writings. In 1848, however, he was appointed vicar-general of the Paris diocese, and in 1853 a professor of the Theological Faculty. [Bo-tain'.]

Baxter, SIR DAVID (1793-1872), a linen manufacturer of Dundee, to which he was a great benefactor, in 1863 received a baronetcy. His sister contributed £150,000 to found Dundee University College (1883).

Baxter, JOHN (1781-1858), a Lewes printer and publisher, best known by his Bible.

Baxter, RICHARD, Nonconformist divine, was born November 12, 1615, at Rowton, Shropshire. His father, Richard Baxter, of Eaton-Constantine, Shrewsbury, had gambled away his property, so for the first ten years of his life Baxter lived with his grandfather. His education was irregular, but he acquired immense stores of varied knowledge by private study. At eighteen he was persuaded to make trial of a court life; but at the end of a month he returned home, 'glad to be gone.' From his earliest days he was under religious impressions, and in 1638 he was ordained by the Bishop of Worcester, entering on the mastership of Dudley grammar-school, and preaching occasionally. After a year he went as assistant to a clergyman in Bridgnorth, where he laboured for nearly two years. Originally, like his family and friends, an unhesitating conformist, he about this time found himself led to adopt some of the Nonconformist views. In 1640 he removed to Kidderminster; in 1642, on the outbreak of the Civil War, retired to Coventry, and ministered for two years to its garrison and inhabitants. His sympathies were almost wholly with the Puritans, and after Naseby he acted as army-chaplain, and was present at the sieges of Bridgwater, Bristol, Exeter, and Worcester. His health continuing very uncertain, he retired to Rouse-Lench, Worcestershire; and here, 'with one foot in the grave,' wrote the first part of the best of all his works, The Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650). Then, returning to Kidderminster, he laboured there with eminent success. At the Restoration he was appointed a royal chaplain, and took a leading part in the Savoy Conference. Presbyterian though he was, he did not object to a modified form of Episcopacy; yet he declined the proffered bishopric of Hereford. In 1662 the Act of Uniformity drove him out of the English Church, and he retired to Acton, Middlesex. The Act of Indulgence in 1672 permitted him to return to London, where he divided his time between preaching and writing. But in 1685 he was brought, for alleged sedition in his Paraphrase of the New Testament, before Judge Jeffreys, who treated him in the most brutal manner, calling him a dog, and swearing it would be no more than justice to whip such a villain through the city. Condemned to pay 500 marks, and to be imprisoned till the fine was paid, he lay in King's Bench Prison for nearly eighteen months, and was released only through Lord Powis. He died 8th December 1691. See his autobiographical Reliquiæ Baxterianæ (1696); the Life by Orme, prefixed to the complete edition of his practical works (23 vols. 1830); and shorter Lives by Dean Boyle (1853) and Davies (1886).

Baxter, ROBERT DUDLEY (1827-75), political economist, Conservative, and Westminster lawyer, was born at Doncaster, and published thirteen works. See Memoir by widow (1878).

Bayard, JAMES ASHETON (1767-1815), American statesman, was bred a lawyer, and was elected to congress in 1796, where he was a conspicuous member of the Federal party. He was in the senate from 1804 to 1815, opposed the war of 1812, and was one of the negotiators of the treaty which followed.—His son, RICHARD HENRY (1796-1868), was long a senator, acting with the Whigs, and represented the United States in Belgium.—Another son, JAMES ASHETON (1799-1880), was also a distinguished democratic senator; and his son, THOMAS FRANCIS, born at Wilmington, Del., 29th Oct. 1828, was bred to commerce, but qualified for the bar like his father and grandfather, and entering the senate (1869), acted with the Democrats. He was proposed for the presidency in 1880 and 1884, and, secretary of state 1885-89, was in 1893-97 ambassador to Great Britain. Oxford made him a D.C.L. in 1896. He died at Dedham, Mass., 28th Sept. 1898. [B'ard.]

Bayard, PIERRE DU TERRAIL, CHEVALIER DE, 'the knight without fear and without reproach,' was born in 1476, at the Chateau Bayard, near Grenoble. Accompanying Charles VIII. to Italy in 1494-95, he won his spurs at the battle of Fornovo, where he captured a standard. Early in Louis XII.'s reign, in a battle near Milan, he followed the defeated forces with such impetuosity that he entered the city with them, and was made a prisoner, but the Duke Ludovico Sforza released him without ransom. At Barletta, in 1502, Bayard and ten other French knights fought an equal number of Spaniards; and although seven Frenchmen were overthrown in the first charge, the result, chiefly through Bayard's bravery, after a six hours' combat, was declared equal. Next we find him fighting bravely in Spain, and against the Genoese and Venetians. In 1515 Bayard was sent into Dauphiné to make a way for the army over the Alps and through Piedmont; in this expedition he made Prosper Colonna a prisoner. Next, at Marignano, he gained a victory for Francis I., who, in consequence, submitted to receive the honour of knighthood from Bayard. When Charles V. broke into Champagne, at the head of a large army, Bayard defended Mézières against all assaults. He was mortally wounded by a shot from an arquebus, while defending the passage of the Sesia, April 30, 1524, and died with his face to the foe, reciting the Miserere. His body was restored to France, and interred in the Minorites' church near Grenoble. See Lives by Terrebasse (5th ed. Paris, 1871), Poirier (1889), Champier (1525), and his secretary, Jacques Joffrey ('Le Loyal Serviteur,' 1527), of which there are English translations by Sara Coleridge

(1825), Kindersley (1848), and Larchey (1883). [Fr. pron. Ba-yahr'.]

Bayer, JOHANN (1572-1625), astronomical cartographer, was born at Rhain, in Bavaria, and died an advocate at Augsburg. His zeal for Protestantism was such that he was called Os Protestantium ('the Protestants' Mouth'). [B'ér.]

Bayle, PIERRE, was born at Carlat, near Foix, in Languedoc, 18th November 1647. The son of a Calvinist pastor, he yet studied philosophy under the Jesuits at Toulouse, and for a year and a half turned Catholic. To escape ecclesiastical censure, he withdrew to Geneva, and thence to Coppet, on the Lake of Geneva, where he studied the philosophy of Descartes. After a few years he returned to France, and in 1675 was elected to the chair of Philosophy at Sedan, in 1681 at Rotterdam. In 1684 he started Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, one of the most successful attempts at a popular journal of literary criticism. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes led Bayle to write a strong defence of toleration; but accusations brought forward by the theologian Jurieu, who regarded Bayle as an agent of France and the enemy of Protestantism, led to the loss of his license to teach (1693). Bayle now assiduously devoted his leisure to the Dictionnaire Historique et Critique (2 vols. Rotterdam, 1696; latest ed. 16 vols. Paris, 1820). This, the first work published under his own name, exercised an immense influence over literature and philosophy, and was the dawn of scepticism of the 18th century. Jurieu induced the consistory of Rotterdam to censure the Dictionary, on account of the irreligious tendency of the article 'David,' and its commendation of certain atheists. New opponents were called into the arena by his Réponse aux Questions d'un Provincial, and the continuation of an earlier work, Pensées sur la Comète. Jacquelot and Leclerc attacked his religious opinions, while others persecuted him as the enemy of Protestantism and Holland. He died 28th Dec. 1706. His Œuvres Diverses appeared at the Hague (4 vols. 1725-31), his selected Correspondance Inédite at Copenhagen (1891). See French Life by Desmaizeaux (Amst. 1730), and German by Fenerbach (1838); also Sir J. F. Stephen's Horæ Sabbaticæ (vol. ii. 1892).

Bayly, ADA ELLEN. See LYALL, EDNA.

Bayly, THOMAS HAYNES, song-writer, was born at Bath, October 13, 1797, and was trained for the church at Winchester and St Mary Hall, Oxford. In 1824, however, he settled in London; and his I'd be a Butterfly was quickly followed by The Soldier's Tear, We met—'twas in a Crowd, She wore a Wreath of Roses, Oh, no, we never mention her, &c. He also wrote a novel, several volumes of verse, some tales, and thirty-six dramatic pieces. In his last years afflicted by sickness and loss of fortune, he died April 22, 1839. See A. Lang's Essays in Little (1891).

Bayne, PETER, born at Fodderty, Ross-shire, 19th Oct. 1830, studied at Aberdeen, and became a newspaper editor in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and London. Author of Christian Life (1855), Hugh Miller (1871), Luther (1887), Free Church of Scotland (1893), &c., he died in London, 12th Feb. 1896.

Baynes, THOMAS SPENCER, born at Wellington, Somerset, 24th March 1823, studied at Bristol College and Edinburgh University, and became assistant to Sir William Hamilton. In 1857-64 he was assistant-editor of the Daily News, and in 1864 became professor of Logic at St Andrews, where he remained till his death, in London, 30th May 1887. He wrote much for reviews and magazines, and was editor of the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. See Memoir by Prof. Lewis Campbell prefixed to Baynes's Shakespeare Studies and other Essays (1894), and J. Skelton's Table-talk (1895).

Bazaine, François Achille, a marshal of France, born at Versailles, 13th February 1811. Entering the army in 1831, he served in Algeria, Spain, the Crimea, the Italian campaign of 1859, and the French expedition to Mexico (1862), but is solely remembered by his capitulation at Metz (October 27, 1870), when 3 marshals, over 6000 officers, and 173,000 men became prisoners of war. For this, in 1873, he was court-martialled, and sentenced to degradation and death, a sentence commuted to 20 years' imprisonment. But in 1874 he escaped from the fortress on the Île Ste Marguerite, near Cannes, and he died at Madrid, 23d September 1888.

Bazalgette, Sir Joseph William (1819-90), the engineer of great drainage works and the Thames embankments, was knighted in 1874.

Bazancourt, César, Baron de (1810-65), novelist and military historian, was born and died in Paris. [Ba-zon^u-coor^r.]

Bazard, Saint-Amand (1791-1832), born at Paris, in 1820 founded an association of French Carbonari, and in 1825 attached himself to the school of Saint-Simon, he and Enfantin becoming its 'Pères Suprêmes.' [Ba-zar^r'].

Bazin, François (1816-78), a French composer of comic operas. [Ba-zan^u'].

Bazin, Jacques Rigomer (1771-1820), a French democrat and publicist, who fell in a duel.

Bazin, René, born at Angers in 1853, is famous as a novelist and miscellaneous author. He is a member of the Academy.

Beaconsfield, Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of, statesman and novelist, was born 21st December 1804, in London, most likely at 6 King's Road (now 22 Theobald's Road), Bedford Row. He was the eldest son of Isaac D'Israeli (q.v.), whose father came to England from Modena as an importer of Leghorn chip and straw hats, but became a banker; the mother's family had been driven out of Spain by the Inquisition. He was duly circumcised at the Spanish Synagogue in Bevis Marks, but in 1817, a boy of twelve, was baptised at St Andrew's, Holborn, and entered thus on all the privileges from which the Jewish race was still debarred. He was educated partly at a private school kept at Walthamstow by a Unitarian minister; in 1821 was articled to a solicitor; in 1824 entered Lincoln's Inn, and kept nine terms; but in 1831 had his name removed from the books. In 1826 the first part of Vivian Grey became straightway the talk of the town; the second part, now little read, succeeded in 1827; the Gulliverian Captain Popanilla in 1828; and the high-flown Young Duke in 1831. In 1830-31 he took a twelvemonth's holiday in the Mediterranean, visiting Spain, Venice, Jerusalem (the home of his ancestors), and describing his doings in the fourteen graphic Home Letters (1835), where we see him young, brilliant, foppish, affectedly affected, just as we know him in Maclise's portrait.

He returned to England to find the country in the throes of the Reform Bill; and in 1832 stood twice for Wycombe as an advanced Radical, backed by O'Connell and Joseph Hume. He failed both times, and failed again in 1835, when as a Tory he contested Taunton, quarrelling with O'Connell, and sending a challenge to O'Connell's son. Not until 1837, the first year of Victoria's reign, did he enter parliament, as member for Maidstone. Meanwhile he had published Contarini Fleming (1832), The Wondrous Tale of Alroy (1833), The Revolutionary Epick (1834), Vindication of the English Constitution (1835), Henrietta Temple (1837), and Venetia (1837). His maiden speech, on Irish election petitions, was clever enough, yet was greeted with shouts of laughter, till, losing patience, he cried, almost shouted: 'I have begun several things many times, and have often succeeded at last; ay, and though I sit down now, the time will come when you will hear me.' In less than nine years that time did come. A reckless free-lance at first, persistent in little save hatred of the Whigs, he had risen since 1842 to be head of the 'Young England' party, when suddenly, from the hour of his savage onslaught on Peel in the Corn-law debate of 22d January 1846, he became the real leader of the Tory Protectionist squires, though their nominal chief for two years was Lord George Bentinck (q.v.). To this period belong Coningsby (1844), Sybil (1845), and Taucred, or the New Crusade (1847). As Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the Lower House in the brief Derby administration of 1852, he coolly discarded Protection, and came off on the whole with flying colours; still, his budget was rejected, mainly through Mr Gladstone's attack on it; and Mr Gladstone succeeded him, in the Aberdeen coalition ministry. In 1858 he returned, with Lord Derby, to power, and next year introduced a petty measure of parliamentary reform—his 'fancy franchise' bill—whose rejection was followed by resignation. For seven long years the Liberals remained in office; and Disraeli, in opposition, displayed talents as a debater, and a spirit and persistency under defeat that won for him the admiration of his adversaries. As Chancellor of the Exchequer in the third Derby administration (1866), he introduced and carried a Reform Bill (1867), far more democratic, more sweeping in its character, than one just rejected by the Conservatives and malcontent Liberals. It was 'a leap in the dark,' Lord Derby's own phrase; the leap at any rate was boldly taken. In February 1868 he succeeded Lord Derby as premier; but, in the face of a hostile majority, he resigned in December. On this occasion Mrs Disraeli was raised to the peerage as Viscountess Beaconsfield, an honour she survived only till 15th December 1872. The rich widow, fifty-six years old, of his first colleague, Mr Wyndham Lewis, she had married Disraeli in 1839.

In 1874 Disraeli entered on his second premiership, the first two years of which were marked by the abolition of church patronage in Scotland, by an act to put down Ritualistic practices, and by one excellent measure, to protect British seamen against 'floating coffins,' which was forced on the government by Mr Pimsloll. But a spirited foreign policy was more to Disraeli's taste than humdrum domestic reforms. In 1875 he made Britain half-owner of the Suez Canal; and in 1876 he conferred on the Queen the new title of Empress of India, himself the same year being called to the Upper House as Earl of Beaconsfield. He had sat for Shrewsbury from 1841 to 1847, and thenceforward for Buckinghamshire. A free career was opened to his enterprise by the outbreak of insurrection in the Balkan Peninsula. Himself, he pooh-poohed the 'Bulgarian atrocities,' and was all for upholding Turkey as a bulwark against Russian aggression. When Constantinople seemed threatened, a British fleet was despatched to the Dardanelles, six millions were voted for military and naval purposes, and an Indian contingent was summoned to Malta. It was very magnificent; after all, though, it was not war, for the Berlin Congress (1878), which Lord Beaconsfield himself attended with Lord Salisbury, and which raised him to the zenith of his fame, gave back to Russia all she had lost by the Crimean war, and left Turkey the shadow of her former self. England's share was 'Peace with honour'—and with Cyprus. The Afghan and Zulu wars combined with commercial depression and with troubles in Ireland to sicken the country of an 'Imperial' policy; and the general election of 1880 returning a large Liberal majority, the government resigned before the meeting of parliament. Lothair had appeared in 1870; and now came Endymion, like so many of Beaconsfield's novels, the story of a fortunate politician. On 19th April 1881 he died at his London residence in Curzon Street; and the terms of his will precluding a public funeral in Westminster Abbey, he was buried at Hughenden, near Wycombe, his home for the last thirty years.

Fraser's Disraeli and his Day (1891); a Beaconsfield Bibliography in Notes and Queries (1893); and the Lives by O'Connor (hostile, 1879), Brandes (trans. 1880), Ewald (1882), Hitchman (3d ed. 1885), Keble (1888, 1896), Froude (1890), Meynell (1903), Sichel (1904), and Monypenny (3 vols. 1910-13); also Wolf's introduction to the centenary edition of his works (1905).

Beale, LIONEL SMITH (1828-1906), physiologist, born in London, studied at King's College, where he was professor 1853-96. His works include Protoplasm (1870), Life Theories (1871), Life and Vital Action (1875), Our Morality (1886), &c.

Beale, DOROTHEA (1831-1906), eminent educationist and LL.D. of Edinburgh, was from 1868 principal of the Cheltenham Ladies' College.

Beales, EDMOND (1803-81), a radical reformer and county court judge, born at Cambridge.

Beard, GEORGE MILLER (1839-83), an American physician, best known by his valuable American Nervousness (1881).

Beardley, AUBREY, designer in black and white, born at Brighton in 1874, was in an architect's and a fire-insurance office, and became famous by his posters and illustrations in the Yellow Book (1894, &c.). In 1897 he turned Catholic, and died at Mentone, 16th March 1898.

Beaton, or BETHUNE, DAVID, Cardinal and Primate of Scotland, was born at Balfour, Fife, in 1494, and educated at the universities of St Andrews and Glasgow, afterwards studying theology and law at Paris. In 1519 the Regent Albany appointed him resident for Scotland at the French court; in 1525 he took his seat in the Scots parliament as Abbot of Arbroath; in 1528 was appointed Lord Privy Seal. Twice sent ambassador to France, to negotiate James V.'s two marriages, he was admitted to all the privileges of a French citizen, and in 1537 was made Bishop of Mirepoix in Foix. After his return, he became coadjutor to his uncle in the see of St Andrews, and in 1538 was elevated to the dignity of a cardinal. On his uncle's death in 1539, he succeeded him as Archbishop of St Andrews, and soon commenced a persecution of the Reformers, obtaining from the pope the appointment of legatus a latere in Scotland. On James's death, after the disastrous rout at Solway Moss (1542), Beaton produced a forged will, appointing himself and three others regents of the kingdom during the minority of the infant Queen Mary. The nobility, however, elected the Earl of Arran regent, who then professed the reformed faith. Beaton was arrested, but soon liberated and reconciled to the regent, whom he induced to abandon the English interest, and publicly to abjure Protestantism. On the young queen's coronation in 1543, Beaton was again admitted of the council and appointed chancellor. In 1546 he caused George Wishart (q.v.) to be burnt at St Andrews, and witnessed his sufferings from a window. Three months later he was himself assassinated by a band of conspirators in his castle of St Andrews, 29th May 1546. His mistress, Marion Ogilvy, had borne him at least two sons and one daughter—the last married an Earl of Crawford. See Life by Professor Herkless (1891).

Beaton, JAMES, uncle to the cardinal, took his M.A. at St Andrews in 1493, and rose rapidly to be Archbishop of Glasgow (1509), and of St Andrews (1522). One of the regents during James V.'s minority, he upheld the Hamilton against the Douglas faction; and in 1526 he had 'to keep sheep in Balgrungo,' whilst the Douglases plundered his castle. He was soon, however, reinstated in his see, and figured as a zealous supporter of France, and an opponent of the Reformation, Patrick Hamilton and three other Protestants being burnt during Beaton's primacy. He died at St Andrews in 1539.—Another JAMES BEATON, nephew to the cardinal, was born in 1517, and in 1552 was consecrated archbishop of Glasgow. He stood high in favour with the queen-regent, Mary of Lorraine, on whose death in 1560 he withdrew to Paris. There he dwelt as Scottish ambassador, honoured by all men for his blameless life, till his death, 30th April 1603.

Beattie, GEORGE (1786-1823), a Montrose lawyer, the author of John o' Arnha and other poems, was born in St Cyrus parish, and there shot himself, having been jilted.

Beattie, JAMES, poet and essayist, was born at Laurencekirk in 1735; studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen (1749-53); was for five years schoolmaster to Fordoun parish; in 1758 was appointed a master of Aberdeen grammar-school, and in 1760 professor of Moral Philosophy in his old college. He had published three or four volumes of verse, when in 1770 appeared his Essay on Truth, an onslaught upon Hume, which met with most extravagant success. In 1771-74 appeared The Minstrel, the poem by which alone he is now remembered. He published four more volumes during 1776-93, and died August 18, 1803. See Forbes, Beattie and his Friends (1904); Mackie, James Beattie the Minstrel (1908).

Beauchamp, ALPHONSE DE (1767-1832), a native of Monaco, the author of French works on the Chouans, the history of Brazil and Peru, the campaign of 1814-15, Louis XVIII., &c. [Bo-shon'].]

Beauclerk, TOPHAM (1739-80), who figures in Boswell's Johnson as the loved friend of the lexicographer, was the only son of Lord Sydney Beauclerk and a grandson of the first Duke of St Albans. In 1768, two days after her divorce from Lord Bolingbroke, he married Diana (1734-1808), daughter of the second Duke of Marlborough, and an artist of some ability, still known through Bartolozzi's engravings. See Birkbeck Hill's Dr Johnson, his Friends and Critics (1878).

Beaufort, DUKE OF, a title conferred in 1682 on Henry Somerset, the son of the Marquis of Worcester (q.v.). Henry Charles Fitzroy Somerset, eighth Duke (1824-99), succeeded his father in 1858. He was one of the editors of the sporting 'Balminton Library.'

Beaufort, HENRY (1377-1447), Cardinal, was a natural son of John of Gaunt by Catherine Swynford, and thus half-brother to Henry IV. His parents were married in 1396, and their children legitimised next year by Richard II. He studied at Oxford and at Aix-la-Chapelle; was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln in 1398; in 1405 succeeded William of Wykeham in the see of Winchester; thrice filled the office of chancellor; and at the Council of Constance (1417) voted for the election of Pope Martin V., by whom in 1426 he was made a cardinal. He strongly opposed Henry V.'s proposition to levy a new impost on the clergy for the war against France; but in 1416-21 he lent the monarch, out of his own private purse, £28,000—a sum which justifies the belief that he was the wealthiest subject in England. In 1427 the pope sent him as legate into Germany, to organise a crusade against the Hussites. This undertaking failed; and the cardinal fell under papal displeasure. In 1431 he conducted the young king, Henry VI., to Paris, to be crowned as king of France and England. He died at Winchester.

Beaufort, JANE. See JAMES I., of Scotland.

Beaufort, MARGARET (1441-1509), daughter and heiress of the Duke of Somerset, was thrice married—to the Earl of Richmond, Henry Stafford, and the Earl of Derby. She is the 'Lady Margaret' who was a benefactor to both Cambridge and Oxford.

Beauharnais, ALEXANDRE, VICOMTE DE (1760-94), was born in Martinique of an ancient French family; served in the American war of independence; and in 1789 eagerly embraced the French Revolution. He was made Secretary of the National Assembly, but was guillotined July 23, 1794. In 1779 he had married Josephine (q.v.), afterwards wife of Napoleon, and his daughter Hortense in 1802 married Napoleon's brother Louis; so that Beauharnais was thus the grandfather of Napoleon III.—His son, EUGÈNE DE BEAUHARNAIS (1781-1824), after his mother's marriage (1796) with Napoleon, accompanied him to Italy and Egypt. He rapidly rose to the highest military rank; and in 1805 was made a prince of France and viceroy of Italy. In 1806 he married the Princess Amelia Augusta of Bavaria (1788-1851), and in 1807 was created Prince of Venice, and declared by Napoleon his adopted son, and heir of the kingdom of Italy. Wise, honorable, and virtuous, he showed great military talent in the Italian campaigns, in the wars against Austria, and in the retreat from Moscow. In the Hundred Days he took no part; and he was allowed to retain his possessions in the March of Ancona, large sums being granted him in compensation for his other Italian possessions, with which he purchased the landgraviate of Leuchtenberg and principality of Eichstädt, as Duke of Leuchtenberg taking his place among the nobles of Bavaria. He died at Munich. See Lives by Aubriet (1825) and Bandoncourt (1827), and his Mémoires et Correspondance, by Du Casse (10 vols. 1858-60).—His second son,

MAX EUGÈNE JOSEPH NAPOLEON (1817-52), who in 1835 succeeded his elder brother as Duke of Leuchtenberg, married a daughter of the Emperor Nicholas of Russia; and his descendants bear the name of Romanowski, and rank among the members of the Russian imperial family. [Bo-ar-nay.]

Beaumarchais, DE, the name assumed by PIERRE AUGUSTIN CARON, next to Molière the greatest French comic dramatist. Born in Paris, January 24, 1732, he was brought up to the watchmaker's (his father's) trade, and at twenty-one invented a new escapement, which was pirated by a rival. His vigorous defence of his rights brought him into notice at court, where his handsome figure and fine address quickly procured him advancement. He was engaged to teach the harp to Louis XV.'s daughters, and in 1756 the wealthy widow of a court official married him, whereupon he assumed the title by which he was known thenceforward. Duverney, a rich banker of Paris, also helped him to some speculations which realised a handsome fortune, largely increased in 1768 by another prudent marriage with a wealthy widow. His first plays, Eugénie (1767) and Les Deux Amis (1770), had but a moderate success. The death of Duverney in 1770 involved him in a long lawsuit with his heir, Count Lablache, in the course of which he became the idol of the populace, as the supposed champion of popular rights against the corrupt tribunals of the old regime. Beaumarchais appealed to the public by publishing his famous Mémoires du Sieur Beaumarchais par lui-même (1774-78; new ed. by Sainte-Beuve, 1873), a work which united the bitterest satire with the sharpest logic, and gained for him a reputation that made even Voltaire uneasy. The same brilliant satire burns in his two famous comedies, Le Barbier de Séville (1775) and La Folle Journée, ou le Mariage de Figaro (1784). The latter had a most unprecedented success; and both are still popular acting plays in France, but in England are chiefly known through Mozart's and Rossini's adaptations. The Revolution cost Beaumarchais his vast fortune, and, suspected of an attempt to sell arms to the émigrés, he had even to take refuge in Holland and England (1793). Stone-deaf in his last years, he died in Paris, May 19, 1799. His Théâtre has been edited by Saint-Marc Girardin (1861) and by D'Heylli and Marescot (1869-75), his Œuvres Complètes by Moland (1874) and Fournier (1875). See Lives and monographs by Loménie (4th ed. 1880), Paul Lindau (Berl. 1875), Bettelheim (Frankf. 1886), Bonnefon (1887), Lintilhac (1887), Gudin de la Brenellerie (1888), and André Hallays (1897). Beaumont and Fletcher, a pair of the greatest dramatists of the Elizabethan age. Francis Beaumont was the third son of Francis Beaumont, judge of the Common Pleas, and was born at Gracedieu, Leicestershire, in 1584. He was admitted in 1597 to Broadgate Hall, Oxford (now Pembroke College), and in 1600 to the Inner Temple. In 1602 he published Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, an expansion of Ovid's story, and ere long became an intimate friend of Ben Jonson and the other men of genius who assembled at the Mermaid Tavern, among them, doubtless, John Fletcher. He was born at Rye in December 1579, the third son of that Dean of Peterborough who disturbed the last moments of Mary Stuart, and afterwards as Bishop of London died either of chagrin at the queen's displeasure on account of his second marriage, or of the immoderate use of tobacco. The boy entered Bene't

(now Corpus) College, Cambridge, at twelve, and found himself at seventeen in poverty on his father's death (1596). We know nothing of him until 1607, when he produced the Woman Hater. The intimacy which now commenced was one of singular warmth even for that romantic age. The two lived in the same house, and had clothes and cloak and everything in common. Beaumont married in 1613, but died 6th March 1616. Fletcher wrote on until his death, in his last four years producing no less than eleven new plays. He died of the plague in August 1625.

The works of Beaumont and Fletcher, first collected in 1647, comprise in all fifty-two plays, a masque, and several minor poems. Of these may be specified The Maid's Tragedy, Philaster, The Two Noble Kinsmen (in which Shakespeare had almost certainly a hand), and that most delightful pastoral The Faithful Shepherdess. See G. C. Macaulay's study (1883). Dyce's edition (11 vols. 1843-46) was followed by A. H. Bullen's (11 vols. 1904 et seq.), and Glover and Waller's (11 vols. 1905 et seq.).

Beaumont, SIR GEORGE HOWLAND, landscape-painter and art-patron, was born at Stonehall, Dunmow, Essex, 6th November 1753, and studied at Eton and New College, Oxford. He was an intimate friend of Reynolds; at his Leicestershire seat, Coleorton, entertained Wordsworth, Scott, Rogers, Byron, Wilkie, Haydon, &c.; and presented his valuable collection of pictures to the National Gallery. He died 7th February 1827. See Knight's Memorials of Coleorton (1887).

Beaumont, JEAN BAPTISTE ÉLIE DE (1798-1874), a French geologist, born at Canon, Calvados.

Beaumont, SIR JOHN (1582-1627), elder brother of the dramatist, from Broadgates Hall, Oxford, proceeded to the Inner Temple, and in 1626 was created a baronet. His 'Bosworth Field' and sacred poems (1629) have been edited by Dr Grosart in his 'Fuller's Worthies Library.'

Beaumont, JOSEPH, D.D. (1616-99), poet, born at Hadleigh, Suffolk, from 1663 was master of Peterhouse, Cambridge. His Psyche (1648), which is longer than the Faerie Queene, was edited with his other poems by Grosart (2 vols. 1880).

Beaumont, WILLIAM (1796-1853), an American doctor, whose work on Digestion (1833) was based on experiments with a young Canadian, Alexis St Martin, suffering from a gun-shot wound.

Beaumont-Vassy, ÉDOUARD DE LA BONNINIÈRE, VICOMTE DE (1816-75), a French historian.

Beaune, FLORIMOND DE (1601-52), a mathematician and friend of Descartes, was born and died at Blois. [Boan.]

Beauregard, PIERRE GUSTAVE TOUTANT, Confederate general, was born 28th May 1818 near New Orleans, graduated at West Point in 1838, served with distinction in the Mexican war, and was appointed by the Confederate government to the command at Charleston, S.C., where, April 12, 1861, he commenced the war by the bombardment of Fort Sumter. He was virtually in command at the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861; and, sent to the west in the spring of 1862 as second to General A. S. Johnston, he succeeded to the command when the latter was killed in the first day's battle of Shiloh or Pittsburg Landing. Defeated on the second day's fighting, he retreated to Corinth, Miss., where he reorganised his division; but on the approach of the Union troops he evacuated the place, and was superseded by General Bragg. In 1864 he commanded the military division of the west, but failed to check Sherman's march to the sea. He died in New Orleans, 21st February 1893. [Do-re-gard.]

Beausobre, ISAAC DE (1659-1738), Huguenot writer, was born at Niort, in Poitou, and died at Berlin, having been expelled from France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. [Bo-sobr.]

Bebel, FERDINAND AUGUST, social democrat, born at Cologne, 22d Feb. 1840, in 1860 came to Leipzig, where in 1864 he established himself as a master turner. Since 1862 an active politician (getting two years' imprisonment in 1872), he has since 1871 been a leader of the social-democratic movement in the Reichstag and in the press. He is an effective speaker and writer. Amongst his works are Der Deutsche Bauernkrieg (1876), Die Frau und der Sozialismus (18th ed. 1893), Die Socialdemokratie (1895), Aus meinem Leben (1910).

Beccaria, CESARE, MARCHESE DE, was born at Milan, March 15, 1735 (or 1738). Having formed his opinions by study of the French encyclopædists and Montesquieu, in 1764 he published anonymously his Dei Delitti e delle Pene ('On Crimes and Punishments'), in which he argues against capital punishment and torture. The work was hailed with enthusiasm by the French school; commentaries were published by Voltaire and Diderot; and the subsequent reforms have generally taken the direction it pointed out. Beccaria was among the first to advocate the beneficial influence of education in lessening crime. In 1768 he was appointed professor of Political Philosophy at Milan; in 1791 he was made a member of the board for the reform of the judicial code. He died of apoplexy, November 28, 1794. See Life prefixed to J. A. Farren's translation of the Dei Delitti (1880).—GIACOMO BATTISTA BECCARIA (1716-81) from 1748 was professor of Physics at Turin, and died much to forward the science of electricity. Becher, JOHANN JOACHIM (1635-82), chemist, was born at Spire, and lived successively at Mainz, Vienna, Munich, Würzburg, Haarlem, and London, where he died. His Physica Subterranea (1669) was the first attempt made to bring physics and chemistry into close relation. [Bay-her.]

Beck, or BEEK, DAVID, a Dutch portrait-painter, who worked in England, and died at the Hague, 20th December 1656.

Becker, KARL FERDINAND (1775-1849), from 1815 a doctor, and from 1823 a schoolmaster at Offenbach, who wrote valuable works on the German language.

Becker, KARL FERDINAND (1804-77), musician and writer on music, was born and died at Leipzig.

Becker, NIKOLAUS (1809-45), the author in 1840 of the Rheinlied ('Sie sollen ihn nicht haben'), which called forth Alfred de Musset's answer ('Nous l'avons eu votre Rhin allemand').

Becker, WILHELM ADOLF, was born at Dresden in 1796, in 1842 became professor of Archaeology at Leipzig, and died at Meissen, 30th September 1846. In Charicles (1840) he ventured to reproduce the social life of old Greece; and in Gallus (1838) of the Augustan age at Rome.

Beckerath, HERMANN VON (1801-70), a German politician and banker, who was born and died at Krefeld. He was a resolute advocate of German unity. See Life by Kopstadt (1874).

Becket, THOMAS, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in London in 1118 of Norman parent-age, his father being a wealthy merchant. That his mother was a love-lorn Saracen is a pretty but baseless tradition. Educated at Merton Priory and in London, he was trained in knightly exercises at Pevensey Castle, next studied theology at Paris, and then, on his father's failure, was clerk for three years in a lawyer's office. About 1142 he entered the household of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who sent him to study canonical jurisprudence at Bologna and Auxerre, heaped preferments on him, including the archdeaconry of Canterbury (1154), and employed him in several important missions. At the papal court in 1152 he had promoted the cause of Henry of Anjou against that of Stephen's son, Eustace; in 1155, the year after Henry's accession, he received the office of chancellor, and thus resuscitated the hopes of the English, as the first Englishman-born since the Conquest who had filled any high office. So magnificent was his hospitality, that Henry himself did not live in a manner more sumptuous. He fought like any knight in the Toulouse campaign (1159), and would seem in everything to have regarded himself as a mere layman, though he held deacon's orders. The change, then, was all the more sudden when in 1162 he was created Archbishop of Canterbury. He resigned the chancellorship, turned a rigid ascetic, showed his liberality only in charities, and in short became as zealous a servitor of the church as ever before of king or archbishop. He figured soon as a champion of her rights against all aggressions by the king and his courtiers, several nobles and other laymen being excommunicated for their alienation of church property. Henry II., who, like all the Norman kings, endeavoured to keep the clergy in subordination to the state, in 1164 convoked the Council of Clarendon, where were adopted the so-called 'Constitutions,' or laws relative to the respective powers of church and state. To these, curtailing clerical immunities, the primate at first declared he would never consent; but afterwards he was induced to give his unwilling approbation. Henry now began to perceive that Becket's notions and his own were utterly antagonistic, and clearly exhibited his hostility to Becket, who thereupon tried to leave the country. For this offence Henry confiscated his goods, and sequestered the revenues of his see. A claim was also made on him for 44,000 marks, as the balance due by him to the crown when he ceased to be chancellor. Becket appealed to the pope, and escaped to France. He spent two years at the Cistercian abbey of Pontigny in Burgundy; and then, the pope seeming disposed to take up his cause, he went to Rome, and pleaded personally before his holiness, who reinstated him in the see of Canterbury. Becket now returned to France, and thence he wrote angry letters to the English bishops, threatening them with excommunication. Several efforts were made to reconcile him with Henry, which, however, proved futile; but at length in 1170 an agreement was patched up. The result was that Becket returned to England, entering Canterbury amid the rejoicings of the people, who regarded him as a shield from the oppressions of the nobility. Fresh quarrels soon broke out; excommunications were renewed; and Henry at last exclaimed: 'Of the cowards that eat my bread, is there none will rid me of this turbulent priest?' Four knights—Fiturse, Tracy, Brito, and Morville—overheard the hasty words; and, quitting Normandy by separate ways, on the evening of 29th December 1170 entered Canterbury cathedral, and slew the archbishop before the altar of St Benedict, in the north transept. Two years afterwards Becket was canonised.

Beckford, PETER (1740-1811), of Stapleton, near Blandford, published Thoughts upon Hare and Fox Hunting (1781).

Beckford, WILLIAM, born in Jamaica in 1709, in 1723 was sent to England, and educated at Westminster. Elected an alderman (1752) and member for the City of London (1753), he was twice Lord Mayor. As such he showed himself a doughty Whig, a rival almost of Wilkes, a man who dared to speak face to face with a king. A petition from the London corporation, presented by him to George III., being treated as unconstitutional, he delivered a dignified remonstrance, and, the king's answer being still unconciliatory, proceeded to argue the point. Just four weeks later he died in London, 21st June 1770.

Beckford, WILLIAM, son of Alderman Beckford, was born at Fonthill, Wiltshire, 1st October 1760, and on his father's death in 1770 inherited property worth a million of money. In his seventeenth year he assailed the cant of criticism in his satirical Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters. In 1777 he visited the Continent, and met Voltaire at Paris; and in 1780 made a grand tour in Flanders, Germany, and Italy. In 1784 he entered parliament as a member for Wells. In 1787 Vathek, an Arabian tale of extraordinary and gloomy imaginative splendour, appeared in French in two editions (one at Lausanne and one at Paris, slightly differing), the graceful style being modelled on Voltaire's. Beckford informs us that he wrote this tale at a single sitting of three days and two nights; Dr Garnett has shown that he worked at it for months, perhaps a year. The English translation by Dr Samuel Henley had, contrary to Beckford's wish, been published in 1786. In 1787 Beckford sought distraction from the loss of his young wife (a daughter of the Earl of Aboyne) in a visit to Portugal. In 1790 he sat for Hindon; in 1794 he accepted the Chiltern Hundreds, and, revisiting Portugal, settled in that 'paradise' near Cintra which Byron commemorates in Childe Harold. He returned to England in 1796, and in 1801-2 the splendid furniture of Fonthill and his valuable collection of pictures were sold; whereupon he began a new collection of books, pictures, furniture, curiosities, and proceeded to erect a new palace at Fonthill, its chief feature a tower 278 feet high. In 1822 he sold Fonthill and all its contents for £330,000; in 1825 the great tower fell. On the sale of Fonthill, Beckford removed to Bath, and there built Lansdowne Tower. In 1834 he published Italy, with Sketches of Spain and Portugal, and in 1835 another volume of Recollections of travel. Henceforward till his death, 2d May 1844, he lived in the deepest retirement. His library was sold in 1882-83, when 5978 lots fetched £48,368. See Life by Cyrus Redding (2 vols. 1858). Mallarmé's reprint of Vathek (Paris, 1876), the English edition by Garnett (1893), and the Life and Letters by Lewis Melville (1910).

Beckmann, JOHANN (1739-1811), in 1766 was appointed professor of Philosophy, and in 1770 of Political Economy, at Göttingen. In Germany he was the first scientific writer on agriculture; in England he is known by his History of Inventions (5 vols. 1780-1805; Eng. trans. 1814).

Beckwith, JOHN (1789-1862), served through the Peninsular war, was made C.B. and lieutenant-colonel, and devoted the last thirty-five years of his life to the Waldenses.—One uncle, SIR GEORGE BECKWITH (1753-1825), as governor of Barbadoes 1808-14, captured Martinique and Guadeloupe; another, SIR THOMAS SYDNEY BECKWITH (1772-1831), earned fame in India and the Peninsula.

Beckx, PETER JOHN (1795-1887), from 1853 general of the Jesuits, was born in Brabant.

Bacon, THOMAS (1512-67), a Protestant divine, born in Norfolk, died probably at Canterbury.

Bequerel, ANTOINE CÉSAR (1788-1878), a French physicist, distinguished chiefly in the fields of electricity and magnetism, was born at Châtillon-sur-Loing, in Loiret dep., served seven years as an officer of engineers, and in 1829 was elected to the Académie des Sciences.—His son, ALEXANDRE EDMOND (1820-91), who made important researches on light, conductivity, &c., succeeded his father as professor at the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers.—ANTOINE HENRI (1852-1905), his son, became one of the most distinguished physicists of his time, especially as discoverer of the 'Bequerel rays' (see monograph by Strutt, 1904). Like his grandfather, he was professor at the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle, and afterwards at the Ecole Polytechnique. He was admitted to the Institute in 1889. [Day-ke-rel'.]

Beddoe, JOHN, J.L.D. (1826-1911), anthropologist, born at Bewdley, was educated at Bridgnorth, University College, London, and Edinburgh University, graduating B.A. of London in 1851, and M.D. of Edinburgh in 1853. He served as a civil surgeon during the Crimean war, and afterwards practised at Clifton. He is the author of Stature and Bulk of Man in the British Isles (1870), The Races of Britain (1886), &c.

Beddoes, THOMAS, physician, born at Shiffnal, Shropshire, in 1760, passed from Bridgnorth grammar-school to Pembroke College, Oxford, and studied medicine at Edinburgh and London. In 1788, after taking his M.D. at Oxford, he was appointed reader in chemistry there, but his sympathies with the French Revolution led to his resignation (1792). During 1798-1801 he carried on at Clifton a 'pneumatic institute' for the cure of diseases by the inhalation of gases, with Humphry Davy for his assistant. He died 24th December 1808. His temperance tale, Isaac Jenkins (1793), was highly popular in its day. See Life by Dr Stock (1811).

Beddoes, THOMAS LOVELL, eldest son of the above by a sister of Maria Edgeworth, was born at Clifton, 20th July 1803. From Bath grammar-school he passed in 1817 to the Charterhouse, and thence in 1820 to Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1822 he published The Brides' Tragedy, which achieved a brilliant success. In 1825 he went to Göttingen to study medicine, and thenceforth led a strange wandering life as doctor and democrat, in Germany and Switzerland, with occasional visits to England. From 1825 he was engaged in the composition of a drama, Death's Jest-book, which, with his poems and a memoir by Kelsall, appeared in 1850-51. The story of his death by suicide at Basel (26th January 1849) was first told in Mr Gosse's memoir prefixed to his edition of the Poetical Works (2 vols. 1890). Mr Gosse, too, has edited his Letters (1894).

Bede, or BEDA, the VENERABLE, the greatest name in the ancient literature of England, was born near Monkwearmouth, in Durham, about 673 A.D. He studied at the Benedictine monastery there under Benedict Biscop, and passed ere long to the daughter-monastery at Jarrow. Here he devoted himself to study, while he was diligent in observing the discipline of his order, as well as in the daily service of the monastery church, having been successively ordained deacon and priest. His industry was enormous, and he was continually employed in reading, writing, and teaching. Besides Latin and Greek, classical as well as patristic literature, he studied Hebrew, medicine, astronomy, and prosody. He wrote homilies, lives of saints, hymns, epigrams, works on chronology and grammar, and commentaries on the Old and New Testament. He had just finished dictating a translation of St John into Anglo-Saxon, when he died, 26th May 735. He was buried at Jarrow; but in the 11th century his bones were removed to Durham. His most valuable work is the Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum, to which we are indebted for almost all our information on the ancient history of England down to 731 A.D. Bede gained the materials for this work partly from Roman writers, but chiefly from native chronicles and biographies, records and public documents, and oral and written communications from his contemporaries. King Alfred translated it into Anglo-Saxon. His De Sex Aetatibus Mundi was an important book on chronology. The History has been frequently printed since 1473—as in 1838, 1846, 1869 in England, and 1882 at Freiburg; and there are five English translations. Standard editions of Bede's complete works are by Giles (12 vols. 1844) and Migne (6 vols. Paris, 1844); of the Opera Historica by C. Plummer (1896).

Bede, CUTHBERT. See BRADLEY, EDWARD.

Bedeau, MARIE ALPHONSE (1804-63), general, was born near and died at Nantes. [Day-do'.]

Bedell, WILLIAM, from 1629 Protestant bishop of Kilmore, was born at Black Nottley, Essex, in 1571, and died at Drumlor, 7th February 1642. See the Life by his son (Camden Soc. 1872).

Bedford, JOHN, DUKE OF (1389-1435), third son of Henry IV., in 1403 was made governor of Berwick-upon-Tweed and warden of the east marches. In 1414 his brother, Henry V., created him Duke of Bedford; and during the war with France he was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom. After Henry's death (1422), Bedford became guardian of the kingdom, and regent also of France; and, Charles VI. dying two months afterwards, he had his nephew proclaimed king of France and England as Henry VI. In the wars with the dauphin which followed, Bedford displayed great generalship, and defeated the French in several battles—most disastrously at Verneuil in 1424. But, owing to the way in which men and money were doled out to him from England, and the withdrawal of the forces of the Duke of Burgundy, he could not profit fully by his victories. The appearance of Joan of Arc was followed by disaster to his arms; and in 1435 a treaty was negotiated at Rouen between Charles VII. and the Duke of Burgundy, which ruined English interests in France. Bedford's death at Rouen, fourteen days before, was mainly occasioned by anxiety and vexation.

Bedford, PAUL, vocalist and low comedian, was born at Bath about 1792, and died at Chelsea, 11th January 1871, having left the stage three years earlier. See his Recollections (1864).

Bedloe, WILLIAM (1650-80), a native of Chepstead, one of the infamous contrivers of the 'Popish Plot' (1679).

Bedmar, ALFONSO DE CUEVA, MARQUIS DE (1572-1655), was sent in 1607 as Spanish ambassador to Venice, and in 1618 plotted the destruction of the republic. The day selected was that on which the doge wedded the Adriatic; but the night before, one of the conspirators betrayed the plot, which forms the theme of Otway's Venice Preserved. Several persons were executed; but Bedmar was only dismissed. He now went to Flanders, where he became president of the council, and in 1622 was made a cardinal, and finally Bishop of Oviedo.

Bedos de Celles, DOM FRANÇOIS (1706-79), a French Benedictine monk and organ-builder.

Bedwell, WILLIAM (1562-1632), an English clergyman, an early student of Arabic.

Bee, or BEGHA, ST, an Irish princess, who about 656 founded the nunnery of St Bees in Cumberland.

Beecher, a remarkable family whose founder settled in 1638 at New Haven, Connecticut, where LYMAN BEECHER was born October 12, 1775. Having studied at Yale, he was a Presbyterian minister at Boston (1826-32), and president of Lane Theological Seminary, near Cincinnati, Ohio (1832-52). He was long a leader of the less Calvinist or New School Presbyterians. He died 10th January 1863, the father of seven sons (all of whom became clergymen) and six daughters. See his autobiography (1864).—CATHERINE ESTHER, the eldest child (1800-78), was from 1822 to 1832 principal of a seminary in Hartford, Connecticut, and wrote on female education and the duties of women.—HARRIET ELIZABETH (Mrs Harriet Beecher Stowe), author of Uncle Tom's Cabin, was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, June 14, 1811, joined her sister Catherine at her school in Hartford, and afterwards helped her to establish a school at Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1836 she married the Rev. C. E. Stowe, a theological professor in Lane Seminary, with whom she subsequently removed to Brunswick, Maine, and in 1849 she issued her first work, The Mayflower. In 1851 she contributed to the anti-slavery National Era her famous Uncle Tom's Cabin. Later works were Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands (1854); Dred (1856); The Minister's Wooing (1859); The Pearl of Orr's Island (1862); Agnes of Sorrento (1862); Oldtown Folks (1869); Lady Byron Vindicated (making a monstrous charge against Lord Byron, 1870); Pogonuc People (1878), &c. She died at Hartford, Conn., 1st July 1896. See the Life, compiled (before her mind became clouded) from her letters and journals, by her son (2 vols. 1890), and that by Mrs J. T. Fields (1898).—HENRY WARD BEECHER, born at Litchfield, Conn., June 24, 1813, graduated at Amherst College, Mass., preached for eight years at Indianapolis, and in 1847 became the (first) pastor of Plymouth (Congregational) Church, in Brooklyn, New York, and practically ignoring formal creeds, preached what he held to be the gospel of Christ, contended for temperance, and denounced slavery to an immense congregation. He favoured the free-soil party in 1852, and the republican candidates in 1856 and 1860; and on the breaking out of the civil war, his church raised and equipped a volunteer regiment. On the close of the war in 1865, Mr Beecher became an earnest advocate of reconciliation. He long wrote for The Independent; and after 1870 edited The Christian Union. A charge of adultery (1874) was not proved. He repeatedly visited Europe and lectured in Britain, and died March 8, 1887. Of his writings, largely first published in journals, the principal are Star Papers (1855), Summer in the Soul (1858), Eyes and Ears (1864), Lectures to Young Men (1844; revised ed. 1850), Aids to Prayer, Lecture-room Talks (1870), Yale Lectures on Preaching, Evolution and Religion, and Life of Jesus the Christ (1891). Besides his own Autobiographical Reminiscences, there are Lives by Scoville, Ellinwood, Lyman Abbott (1903), and half-a-dozen others.

Beechey, SIR WILLIAM, born at Burford, Oxfordshire, 12th December 1753, entered the Royal Academy as a student in 1772, and devoted himself chiefly to portrait-painting, in 1793 being made an A.R.A., and in 1798 an R.A. with a knighthood. He died at Hampstead, 28th January 1839.—His son, FREDERICK WILLIAM, born in London, 17th February 1796, entered the navy at ten, and took part in three polar expeditions (1818, 1819, and 1825-28). He was made Rear-admiral of the Blue in 1854, and died 29th November 1856.—Two other sons, GEORGE and HENRY WILLIAM, were both painters, and died one in India, the other in New Zealand; and his youngest son, ADMIRAL R. BRYDGES (1808-95), after leaving the navy in 1857, took to painting as a profession.

Beesly, EDWARD SPENCER, Positivist and Radical, born at Feckenham, Worcestershire, 23d January 1831, studied at Wadham College, Oxford, became a master at Marlborough in 1854, and professor of History at University College, London, in 1860. He has published (and white-washed) Catiline, Clodius, and Tiberius (1878), besides a sketch of Queen Elizabeth (1892).

Beethoven, LUDWIG VAN, the greatest of musical composers, was born of Flemish ancestry at Bonn, December 16, 1770. He was carefully taught music (at first by his father, who was a tenor singer in the Elector of Cologne's band at Bonn), and in 1781 played in Holland as a virtuoso on the piano. He joined the band in 1783 as accompanist, in 1784 was made second organist, and afterwards played the viola. In 1792, already one of the finest extempore players of his day, he was sent by the Elector to Vienna to study under Haydn and Albrechtsberger. And here, save for a few tours, he remained, without any official appointment, the rest of his life; spending the winters usually in the city, and the summers in some village near by, working out his compositions. From 1798 on he was afflicted with a defect in hearing which gradually became total deafness; and this and his family troubles (mainly through a graceless nephew whom he educated) partly account for the solitariness, sadness, brusqueness, and hypochondria of his later life. He died of dropsy, 26th March 1827. In 1888 his remains were translated to the Central Cemetery, Vienna. His early works can often be hardly distinguished from Mozart; he worked on the old lines until he found that he needed to enlarge or modify them. Thus he enlarged the introduction and the coda; he introduced episodes in the 'working out'; he changed the minuet into the scherzo; he multiplied the key-relations of the movements; he introduced the chorus into the finale of a symphony; he invented the 'cycle of songs'; he put variations on a new footing, which has been adopted and extended by his successors; he initiated the modern use of 'programme-music'; and everything that he did was more serious, more thoughtful, and therefore more permanent than any one else's. At the same time, it is pure music of the grandest, most touching, and beautiful sort. We often hear of 'Beethoven's three styles.' It means that he began writing as his predecessors wrote; that by degrees his own genius asserted itself and made his music stronger, broader, more deeply coloured, more beautiful than music had ever been before; and that lastly his deafness, his poverty, the troubles of life, the approach of the end, brought a peculiar and unearthly sentiment into his themes. His works include 138 with, besides many without, the opus-number. To the first style belong his works to about op. 16, including the first three trios and the symphonies in C and D; to the second, symphonies Nos. 3 to 6, Egmont, the Ruins of Athens, Fidelio (his only opera), and many chamber pieces—in all, to about op. 80; to the third style belong the 9th (and last) symphony, the Missa Solennis, the great overture, the later sonatas for the piano and the string-quartette. See works on Beethoven by Moscheles (trans. 1845), R. Wagner (trans. 1880), Nohl (trans. 1881), and Sir George Grove (1896), and that begun by the American Thayer and completed in German by Deiters and Riemann (5 vols. 1866-1908).

Beets, NICOLAUS (1814-1903), poet and writer, was born at Haarlem, and in 1874 became professor of Theology at Utrecht. [Bayts.]

Begas, KARL (1794-1854), court-painter to the king of Prussia. Of his four sons, two were painters and two sculptors.

Begg, JAMES, D.D., born 31st October 1808 at New Monkland manse, Lanarkshire, was educated at Glasgow University, and was licensed as a preacher in 1829. Minister of Liberton from 1835 to 1843, he 'came out' at the Disruption, and thenceforward to his death (29th September 1883) held the neighbouring Free Church of Newington, Edinburgh. A man of fine presence and vigorous intellect, he distinguished himself by his old-world orthodoxy, his humour and combativeness, and his efforts to improve the houses of the poor. See Memoir by Prof. T. Smith (2 vols. 1885-88).

Behaim, MARTIN (c. 1459-1506), cosmographer, born at Nuremberg, in 1480 went to Portugal, where he soon acquired a reputation as a skilful maker of maps. In 1484 he accompanied Diego Cam in a voyage of discovery along the west coast of Africa as far as the mouth of the Congo. In 1486 he sailed to Fayal, one of the Azores, but in 1490 returned to Nuremberg, where he constructed a large globe, still preserved. Again in Fayal from 1494 to 1506, he then removed to Lisbon, only to die.—MICHAEL BEHAIM (1416-74) was a German meistersänger, a native of Sülzbach, and by profession a weaver. [Bay-hime.]

Beham, two brothers, natives of Nuremberg, and both of them painters and engravers—Hans Sebald (1500-50) and Barthel (1502-40). They are reckoned amongst Dürer's seven followers, the 'Little Masters,' who form the subject of a monograph by W. B. Scott (1879). [Bay-ham.]

compiler, with H. Wagner, of the Bewölkerung der Erde (7 vols. 1872-82). [Bayml.]

Behn, AFRA, the first English professional authoress and the first literary abolitionist, was born 10th July 1640 at Wye, in Kent, the daughter of one Johnson, a barber. It is doubtful, then, who was the 'father,' lieutenant-governor of Surinam, with whom as a child she sailed for South America. He died on the voyage out, but Afra reached Surinam, and here made the acquaintance of the slave Oroonoko, the subject afterwards of one of her novels. Returning to England about 1658, she married Mr Behn, a merchant of Dutch extraction, but was a widow by 1666, when Charles II. despatched her as a spy to Antwerp. She sent word of the Dutch expedition up the Thames, but her warning was sighted, and, on her return to England, she had to betake herself to literature. Her plays and some of her poems are better than her novels, but all alike are disfigured by coarseness. She died 16th April 1689, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Behnes, WILLIAM (1794-1864), a clever but dissipated sculptor, the son of a Hanoverian piano-maker, was brought up in Dublin. [Bay-nes.]

Behring, or BERING, VITUS, a famous navigator, born in 1680 at Horsens in Denmark, early entered the newly-formed navy of Peter the Great, and for his bravery in the wars with Sweden was appointed to conduct an expedition of discovery in the Sea of Kamchatka. Sailing in 1728 from a port on the east of Kamchatka, he followed the coast northward until, from its westward trend, he believed he had reached the north-east point of Asia. In 1741 he sailed from Okhotsk towards the American continent, and sighting land about 58½° N. lat., followed the coast northward; but sickness and storms obliged him to return, and being wrecked on the desert island of Avatcha (now Behring Island), he died there, December 19, 1741. See Danish Life by Lauridsen (1885; trans. Chicago, 1889). [Bay-ring.]

Beilby, RALPH. See BEWICK, THOMAS.

Bek, ANTONY, Bishop of Durham from 1283, took a prominent part in the Scottish wars of Edward I., and held a command at the battle of Falkirk. In 1300 he became involved in ecclesiastical disputes, which lasted till his death on 3d March 1311. He was a prelate of great magnificence and unbounded ambition, but chaste and liberal.—Another Antony Bek (1279-1343) was Bishop of Norwich from 1337; a Thomas Bek (died 1293) was Bishop of St Davids from 1280; and a second Thomas Bek (1282-1347) was Bishop of Lincoln from 1342.

Beke, CHARLES TILSTONE, Abyssinian explorer, was born in London, October 10, 1800, received a commercial education, studied law in Lincoln's Inn, and applied himself to ancient history, philology, and ethnography. His Origines Biblicæ (1834) gained him a Tübingen doctorate; and in 1837-38 he acted as British consul at Leipzig. During his Abyssinian explorations (1840-43) he fixed the latitude of more than seventy stations, mapped 70,000 square miles of country, and collected fourteen vocabularies. In 1865 he undertook a fruitless mission to Abyssinia, to obtain the release of the captives; and in 1874 he had not long returned from exploring the region at the head of the Red Sea, when he died at Bromley, Kent, July 31. His works include Abyssinia (1845), The Sources of the Nile (1860), British Captives in Abyssinia (1865), King Theodore (1869), and Sinai and Midian (1878).

Bekker, BALTHASAR (1634-98), a Dutch Protestant pastor, was suspected of rationalism and Socinianism, and was promptly deposed and excommunicated on the publication of Die Betoo-verde Wereld ('The World Bewitched,' 4 vols. 1691-93), contesting the belief in witchcraft and magical powers.

Bekker, IMMANUEL (1785-1871), editor of the Greek classics, in 1811 became professor of Philology in his native city, Berlin.

Belcher, SIR EDWARD, admiral, born in 1799, entered the navy in 1812, and from 1836 to 1842 was exploring the western coast of America. Knighted in 1843, he was in 1852 appointed to the command of the unfortunate expedition sent out to search for Sir John Franklin, and in 1872 became rear-admiral. He died 18th March 1877. He published several volumes of voyages, &c. Lady Belcher (1805-90), who left him a few months after marriage, was an accomplished society woman. See her Life by L'Estrange (1891).

Belgiojoso, CRISTINA, PRINCESS OF (1808-71), Italian authoress and patriot, was the daughter of the Marquis Trivulzio. [Bel-jee-o-yo'-zo.]

Belisarius (505-565 A.D.), a great soldier under the Emperor Justinian, was an Illyrian by race and birth, defeated a great Persian army in 530, and in 532 suppressed a dangerous insurrection in Constantinople by the destruction of 30,000 of the 'Green' faction. Sent to Africa next year to recover the provinces overrun by the Vandals, he twice defeated the Vandal king, Gelimer, and brought him a prisoner to Constantinople. He next took the field in Italy against the Ostrogoths in 535, occupying successively Sicily and lower Italy, endured a siege in Rome by the Gothic king, Vitiges, and in 540 captured the Ostrogothic capital, Ravenna. In 542 he drove back the Persian king, Chosroes; in 544 made another, but less successful, campaign against the Goths in Italy; and in 559 repelled an assault of the Huns on the capital. In 562, falsely accused of conspiracy against the emperor, he was deprived of his dignities, and for a short time imprisoned; but in 563 he was again restored to honour. Lord Mahon, in his Life of Belisarius (1829), tried vainly to confirm the late tradition that Belisarius was blinded by Justinian's orders, and reduced to mendicancy—a fiction popularised by Marmontel's romance and Gérard's picture.

Bell, ALEXANDER MELVILLE (1819-1905), born at Edinburgh, established himself there as a teacher of elocution, but in 1865 removed to London, and in 1870 to Canada, settling finally at Washington. Of his numerous works connected with Phonetics may be mentioned Visible Speech (1867).—His son, ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL, the inventor of the telephone, was born at Edinburgh, 3d March 1847, and was educated at the High School there, and in Germany, taking his Ph.D. at Würzburg. He went also to Canada, and at Boston devoted himself to the teaching of deaf-mutes and to spreading his father's system of 'Visible Speech.' His inventions of the articulating Telephone in 1872-76, of the Photophone in 1880, of the Graphophone in 1887, and of kindred instruments, brought him wealth and fame.

Bell, ANDREW, D.D., founder of the 'Madras System of Education,' was born, a barber's son, at St Andrews, 27th March 1753, and educated there. After acting as a tutor in Virginia (1774-81), he took Episcopal orders, sailed for India in 1787, and within two years was holding simultaneously eight army chaplainships. In 1789 he became superintendent of the Madras military orphanage, and, finding it impossible to obtain duly qualified masters, conducted it by the aid of the scholars themselves. In 1796 he returned to England, where, on 27th January 1832, he died at Cheltenham, leaving (besides a valuable estate) £120,000 for educational purposes, half of it to go to St Andrews. His pamphlet entitled An Experiment in Education (1797) had attracted little attention, until in 1803 Joseph Lancaster (1778-1838), a Quaker, also published a tractate recommending the monitorial system. Lancasterian schools began to spread over the country; the Church grew alarmed, and in 1811 founded the 'National Society for the Education of the Poor,' of which Bell became superintendent, and whose schools soon numbered 12,000. See Life by Southey (3 vols. 1844), and Meiklejohn's An Old Educational Reformer (1881).

Bell, SIR CHARLES, famous for his discoveries in the nervous system, was born at Edinburgh in November 1774, the youngest of five sons of William Bell, an Episcopal clergyman. In 1804 he proceeded to London, where he lectured with great success on anatomy and surgery. In 1807 he distinguished between the sensory and motor nerves in the brain. In 1812 he was appointed surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital, which his clinical lectures raised to the highest repute. To study gunshot wounds, he went to Haslar Hospital after Corunna in 1809, and after Waterloo took charge of an hospital at Brussels. In 1824 he became senior professor of Anatomy and Surgery to the College of Surgeons, and in 1826 head of the new medical school (University College), but soon resigned. Knighted in 1831, and professor of Surgery at Edinburgh from 1836, he died 28th April 1842. His works include Anatomy of Expression in Painting (1806), Anatomy of the Brain (1811), Animal Mechanics (1828), Nervous System of the Human Body (1830), and The Hand (Bridgewater Treatise, 1833). See Pichot's Vie et Travaux de Sir Charles Bell (1859), and his Correspondence (1870).—To the same family belongs the Edinburgh surgeon, JOSEPH BELL (1837-1911), the original of 'Sherlock Holmes.'

Bell, CURRER. See BRONTË.

Bell, GEORGE JOSEPH, lawyer, a brother of Sir Charles, was born at Edinburgh, 26th March 1770, and passed advocate in 1791. Acknowledged a master of commercial jurisprudence and bankruptcy law, he in 1822 was made professor of Scots Law in Edinburgh University, and in 1823 a member of the commission on Scottish judicial proceedings. On the report, drawn up by Bell, was founded the Scottish Judicature Act (1825), prepared by him. Appointed in 1832 a clerk of the Court of Session, he was in 1833 chairman of the Royal Commission to examine into the state of the law in general. He died 23d Sept. 1843. His chief works are Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland (1810; 7th ed. 1870), and Principles of the Law of Scotland (1829; 10th ed. 1897).

Bell, HENRY, the father of steam-navigation in Europe, was born at Torphichen Mill, Linlithgow, April 7, 1767, and died at Helensburgh, November 14, 1830, having in 1812 successfully launched the 30-ton Comet on the Clyde.

Bell, HENRY GLASSFORD (1803-74), sheriff of Lanarkshire, vindicator of Mary Queen of Scots, and author of 'The Cork Leg,' 'The Scene was Changed,' and other less-known poems. See a Memoir by Stoddart (1892).

Bell, Sir Isaac Lowthian, was born 15th February 1816, and educated at Edinburgh and Paris. After being engaged in extensive chemical works, he founded in 1852, with his brothers, the great Clarence iron-smelting works on the Tees. He has written many papers on metallurgical and chemical subjects. M.P. for Hartlepool from 1875 till 1880, he was made a baronet in 1885, and died 20th December 1904.

Bell, James (1769-1833), a Scottish geographer.

Bell, John, of Antermony, Asiatic traveller, born in Campsie parish, Stirlingshire, in 1691, studied for the medical profession. In 1714 he went to St Petersburg, and was physician to Russian embassies to Persia (1715-18), to China through Siberia (1719-22), and again to Persia (1722). In 1737 he settled at Constantinople as a merchant, but about 1746 returned to Scotland, where he died at Antermony, July 1, 1780. His Travels were published in 1763.

Bell, John, surgeon, was born in Edinburgh, May 12, 1763, and died at Rome, April 15, 1820. His Principles of Surgery (1801-7) was re-edited by his brother, Sir Charles Bell, in 1826.

Bell, John (1745-1831), a London publisher, who started the Sunday Bell's Weekly Messenger.

Bell, John (1797-1869), an American statesman, who in 1860 was nominated for the presidency, but received only 39 electoral votes.

Bell, John (1811-95), sculptor, born at Hopton, Suffolk, produced the Guards' Memorial (1858) in Waterloo Place, and the American group in the Hyde Park Albert Memorial (1873); and to him is due the fashion of carved wooden bread-knives and trenchers.

Bell, Patrick, LL.D. (1799-1869), minister from 1843 of Carnylie, Forfarshire, and inventor in 1827 of an early reaping-machine.

Bell, Robert (1800-67), a busy litterateur, born at Cork, in 1828 came to London. He is best known by his annotated edition of the English poets from Chaucer to Cowper (24 vols. 1824-57).

Bell, Robert Charles (1806-72), an Edinburgh engraver, who worked much for the Art Journal.

Bell, Thomas, naturalist, was born at Poole, Dorsetshire, October 11, 1792, and in 1813 entered Guy's Hospital, where from 1817 till 1861 he held the post of dental surgeon, whilst also lecturing on comparative anatomy. In 1836 he became professor of Zoology in King's College, London. Elected in 1828 a Fellow of the Royal Society, and from 1840 to 1853 its secretary, he was also president of the Linnæan Society (1853-61), and first president of the Ray Society (1844). He wrote British Quadrupeds (1837; 2d ed. 1874), British Reptiles (1839), &c. Retiring from practice about 1860 to the Wakes of Selborne, which he had purchased from Gilbert White's grandnieces, he died there, March 13, 1880.

Bella, Stefano Della (1610-64), a Florentine designer and engraver.

Bellamy, Edward (1850-98), born at Chikopee Falls, Mass., studied at Union College, New York, and in Germany. Admitted to the bar, he devoted himself entirely to literature, his one tremendous success being Looking Backward, 2000-1887. Equality (1897) was quite unreadable.

Bellamy, George Anne, an English actress, born most likely at Lisbon in 1727, was the natural daughter of a Quaker school-girl and Lord Tyrawley. She came out at Covent Garden in 1744, and after many alternations of fortune, was released by a 'free benefit' from a debtors' prison in 1785, in which year she published an 'Apology' for her life (6 vols.). She died February 16, 1788.

Bellamy, Jacobus (1757-86), a Dutch poet.

Bellarmino, Robert, one of the most celebrated Catholic theologians, was born at Montepulciano, near Siena, in 1542. He entered the order of Jesuits at Rome in 1560, and studied theology at Padua and Louvain. In 1570 he was appointed to the chair of theology at Louvain, but returned to Rome in 1576 to lecture in the Roman College on controversial theology. In 1592 he became rector of the Roman College, was made a cardinal in 1599 against his own inclination, and in 1602 Archbishop of Capua. After the death of Clement VIII., he contrived to escape promotion to the papal chair, but was induced by Pius V. to hold an important place in the Vatican from 1605 till his death, September 17, 1621. Bellarmine was the chief defender of the church in the 16th century. His learning and moderation gained him the praise even of Bayle. His great work is the Disputationes de Controversiis Christianæ Fidei (3 vols. Rome, 1581). His Life was written in Italian by the Jesuit Fuliganti (Rome, 1624); a Latin autobiography, hitherto withheld by the Jesuits, was edited in 1887, with a German translation, by Döllinger and Reusch.

Bellasis, Edward (1800-73), sergeant-at-law, a great parliamentary lawyer, was born at Basilden, Berkshire, the son of an Evangelical clergyman, and in 1850 from Tractarianism passed on to Rome. See Life (1893).

Bellay, Joachim du (1525-60), French poet and prose-writer, next to Ronsard the most important member of the famous Pliade, was born at Liré in Anjou. His Dedence et Illustration de la Langue Française (1549, new ed. by Person, 1892) marks an epoch in French literature. He went to Rome as secretary to his kinsman, Cardinal du Bellay; but a diplomatic career proved to be uncongenial to him, and he lost the cardinal's favour and fell into difficulties. His poems include a series of sonnets addressed to one Mademoiselle de Virole: Regrets, Jeux Rustiques, and Les Antiquités de Rome, translated by Spenser under the title of the Ruins of Rome. A few of his poems—among them his best-known piece, the charming Vau-neur—have been admirably translated by Mr A. Lang in Ballads and Lyrics of Old France (1872). His works have been edited by Marty-Laveaux (1866-67), and his letters by P. de Nolhac (1884).

Belleau, Remi (1528-77), a French poet, sometimes included in the Pliade. See German monographs by Besser (1886) and Wagner (1890).

Belleisle, Charles Louis Fouquet, Duc de (1684-1761), marshal of France, in the war of the Austrian succession stormed Prague, and conducted the marvellous retreat to Eger. [Bel-eel.]

Bellenden (BALLANTYNE), JOHN, was born towards the close of the 15th century, and in 1508 matriculated at St Andrews as 'of the Lothian nation.' He completed his education at Paris, where he took the degree of D.D. at the Sorbonne. His translations of Boecce's Historia Gentis Scotorum, and of the first five books of Livy (both done in 1533), are interesting as early specimens of Scottish prose, remarkable for the ease and vigour of their style. The Croniklis of Scotland is a very free rendering, and contains numerous passages not to be found in Boecce, so that it is in some respects almost an original work. Bellenden enjoyed great favour at the court of James V., at whose request he executed the translations. As a reward, he received considerable grants from the treasury, and afterwards was made archdeacon of Moray and canon of Ross. Becoming involved, however, in ecclesiastical controversy, he went to Rome, where he died about 1550, or as late as 1587. Both works were published in 1821-22 by Thomas Maitland (afterwards Lord Dundreunan), the Livy by W. A. Craigie (S.T.S. 1901-3).

Bellenden, WILLIAM (c. 1555-1633), a Scottish author, who was born, it would seem, at Lasswade. Most likely a Catholic, he was a professor in the university, and an advocate in the parliament, of Paris, and was employed in a diplomatic capacity by James VI., who about 1610 made him Master of Requests. His Ciceronis Princeps (1608), Ciceronis Consul (1612), and De Statu Prisci Orbis (1615), he republished in 1616 under the title De Statu Libri tres. His crowning labour was De Tribus Luminibus Romanorum, (1634), the 'three luminaries' being Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny, out of whose works he intended to compile a digest of the civil and religious history and the moral and physical science of the Romans. His works furnished the materials for Middleton's Life of Cicero. Warton first denounced the theft, which Dr Parr made clear in his edition of the De Statu (1787).

Bellew, JOHN CHIPPENDALL MONTESQUIEU (né HIGGIN), was born at Lancaster, 3d August 1823; from the grammar-school there passed in 1842 to St Mary's Hall, Oxford; from 1848 to 1868 was an Anglican clergyman in England and Calcutta, for twelve years a most popular London preacher; and then turning Catholic, devoted himself with high success to public readings till his death in London, 19th June 1874. His works include a novel, Blount Tempest (1864).—HAROLD KYRLE BELLEW (1857-1911), actor, was his younger son.

Bellingham. See PERCEVAL.

Bellini, a Venetian painter family whose earliest member, JACOPO BELLINI (c. 1400-64), was a pupil of the celebrated Gentile da Fabriano, and was the first to bring to Venice the skill of Florence.—His elder son, GENTILE BELLINI (c. 1426-1507), was distinguished as a portrait-painter, and also for his professional groups, with fine architectural perspective. Along with his brother, he was commissioned to decorate the council-chamber of the Venetian senate; and at Constantinople in 1479 he painted the portrait of Mohammed II. The 'Preaching of St Mark' is his most famous achievement.—His more celebrated brother, GIOVANNI BELLINI (c. 1428-1516), removed about 1464 from Padua to Venice. His works are marked at first by a somewhat hard manner and severe drawing, due to the influence of his brother-in-law, Andrea Mantegna, but gradually increase in warmth and tenderness. Besides several examples in Venice and Naples, there are his 'Circumcision,' now at Castle Howard, his gorgeous 'Feast of the Gods,' at Alnwick Castle, and his 'Blood of the Redeemer,' acquired in 1887 for the National Gallery. Among his pupils were Giorgione and Titian. [Bel-lee'-nee.]

Bellini, VINCENZO, operatic composer, was born at Catania, in Sicily, November 3, 1802. An organist's son, he was sent by a Sicilian nobleman to the Conservatorio of Naples. His two earliest operas were Adelson e Salvini (1824) and Bianca e Fernando (1826). Il Pirata (1827) immediately carried the composer's name beyond Italy, and was followed by I Capuletti ed i Montecchi (1830), La Sonnambula (1831), and Norma (1832), Bellini's best and most popular work. In 1833 he went to Paris and London, whither he had accompanied the famous Pasta. After his return to Paris, he wrote I Puritani (1834), which shows the influence of the French school of music, but without servile imitation. He died at his villa in Puteaux, near Paris, 21st September 1835. See works by Pongin (Paris, 1863), Amore (Catania, 1872), Hiller (Cologne, 1880), Florimo (1885), and Lloyd (1908).

Bellman, KARL MICHAEL (1740-95), 'the Swedish Anacreon,' held a series of sinecure government posts in Stockholm.

Bellot, JOSEPH RENÉ, Arctic explorer, was born in Paris, 18th March 1826. A French naval lieutenant, he served with distinction in the expedition against Tamatave in 1845, and in 1851 joined the search expedition sent out by Lady Franklin. He discovered Bellot Strait in 1852, and was lost in an ice-crack during Inglefield's expedition, 21st August 1853. See his Journal (Eng. trans. 1855). [Bel-loh'.]

Belloy, PIERRE LAURENT BUIRETTE DE (1727-75), a French dramatist, who acted for some years at St Petersburg and other northern cities, and who was one of the first to introduce on the French stage native instead of classical heroes. His first success, Zelmire (1762), was followed by Le Siège de Calais (1765), Gaston et Bayard (1771), and Pierre le Cruel (1772). [Bel-uak'.]

Beloe, WILLIAM (1756-1817), translator, clergyman, and librarian, author of The Sexagenarian, was a native of Norwich.

Belon, PIERRE (1518-64), a French naturalist, who in 1546-49 travelled in Asia Minor, Egypt, and Arabia. He was murdered by robbers whilst gathering herbs in the Bois de Boulogne. Besides Travels, Belon wrote valuable treatises on trees, herbs, birds, and fishes. He was one of the first who established the homologies between the skeletons of different vertebrates; he planted the first cedar in France; and he formed two early botanical gardens. [Bel-on'.]

Belot, ADOLPHE (1829-90), playwright and novelist, born in Guadeloupe, died in Paris.

Belsham, THOMAS (1750-1829), a Unitarian theologian, who was born at Bedford, and died at Hampstead, having published upwards of fifty works. See his Life by Williams (1833).—His brother, WILLIAM (1752-1827), was a voluminous writer of history and Whig tracts.

Belzoni, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, traveller, was born, a poor barber's son, at Padua in 1778. He was educated at Rome for a monk, but in 1803 came to England, where, 6 feet 7 inches tall, he gained a living by exhibiting feats of strength and models of hydraulic engines. In 1812 he went to Spain, in 1815 to Egypt, and there was commissioned by Mehemet Ali to construct an hydraulic machine. He was next employed, through the traveller Burckhardt, on the exploration of Egyptian antiquities. He removed the colossal bust of the so-called 'Young Memnon' from Thebes to Alexandria, and was the first to open the temple of Abu-Simbel. In the valley of 'the tombs of the kings,' near Thebes, he discovered several important catacombs containing mummies, and from the grotto-sepulchre of Seti I. removed the splendid sarcophagus, now, like the 'Young Memnon,' in London. But his greatest undertaking was his opening of the second pyramid of Gizeh. In 1819 he returned to Europe, and in 1821 published his Excavations in Egypt and Nubia. In 1821 he opened in London a successful exhibition of his Egyptian antiquities; and in 1823 he had set out on a journey to Timbuctoo, when on 3d December he died of dysentery at Gato, Benin.

Bem, JOSEPH (1795-1850), a Polish leader of the Hungarian insurrection of 1848-49, after whose suppression he escaped into Turkey, turned Mohammedan, and received a command at Aleppo, where ten months later he died of fever.

Bembo, PIETRO, a great Italian scholar, was born at Venice, May 20, 1470, and died in Rome, January 13, 1547, having in 1513 been made secretary to Leo X., and in 1539 a cardinal by Paul III., who afterwards appointed him to the dioceses of Gubbio and Bergamo. Bembo was the restorer of good style in both Latin and Italian literature. Among his works may be mentioned the Rerum Veneticarum Libri XII. (1551; Italian ed. 1552); his little treatise on Italian prose, which marked an era in Italian grammar; and his Letters.

Benbow, JOHN, admiral, was born, the son of a Shrewsbury tanner, 10th March 1653. He entered the navy in 1678, and by 1696 had risen to be rear-admiral. The most memorable of all his exploits was his last, when in the West Indies, on 19th August 1702, he came up with a superior French force under Du Casse. For four days he kept up a running fight, almost deserted by the rest of his squadron, until, his right leg smashed by a chain-shot, he was forced to return to Jamaica, where he died at Port Royal, 4th November. Two of his captains were shot for cowardice.

Benda, GEORGE (1721-95), a Bohemian pianist, violinist, and composer.

Bendemann, EDUARD (1811-89), painter, was born in Berlin, in 1838 became professor of the Academy of Art at Dresden, and in 1858-67 was director of the Dusseldorf Academy. The frescoes at Dresden are his best-known work.

Benedek, LUDWIG VON (1804-81), an Austrian general, born at Oedenburg, in Hungary, distinguished himself in Galicia in 1846, in Italy in 1847, in Hungary in 1849, and in 1859 drove back the Piedmontese at Solferino. He was governor of Hungary in 1860. In 1866 he commanded the northern Austrian army in the war with Prussia; but after the defeat of Sadowa, he was brought to a court-martial, whose proceedings were quashed by the emperor. [Ben-eh-dek.]

Benedetti, VINCENT, COUNT (1817-1900), a French diplomatist, born at Bastia in Corsica, obtained a post in the foreign ministry in 1855, and was appointed ambassador at Turin in 1861, and at Berlin in 1864. He proposed a secret treaty with Prussia; and it was he who at Ems, in 1870, made the demand that led to the Franco-German war. On the fall of the empire he retired to Ajaccio. See his Studies in Diplomacy (Eng. trans. 1895).

Benedict is the name of fourteen popes: I. in 574; II. from 683 to 685; III. 855 to 858; IV. from 900 to 903; V. from 964 to 966, when he died in exile; VI. from 972 to 974, when he was strangled by a rebel; VII. from 974 to 983.—BENEDICT VIII., elected in 1012, and driven from Rome by the anti-pope Gregory, was restored to the papal chair by the Emperor Henry II., and afterwards defeated the Saracens and the Greeks. He was a reformer of the clergy. He died in 1024.—BENEDICT IX., a nephew of the preceding, obtained the papal throne by simony in 1033, at the age of 18; but in 1038 the Romans banished him on account of his licentiousness. By aid of bribery he was several times reinstalled, and as often deposed. He died in the convent of Grotta Ferrata in 1056.—BENEDICT XIII. is a title assumed by two popes, Peter de Luna, a Spaniard, chosen by the French cardinals in 1394, and recognised only by Spain and Scotland up to his death in 1424; and Vincenzo Marco Orsini (1724-30), a learned man of simple habits and pure morals, who unfortunately yielded himself to the guidance of the unscrupulous Cardinal Coscia.—BENEDICT XIV. (Prospero Lambertini), born at Bologna in 1675, distinguished himself by extensive learning and marked ability, and began his pontificate, in 1740, with several wise and conciliatory measures; founded chairs of physic, chemistry, and mathematics in Rome, revived the academy of Bologna, constructed fountains, rebuilt churches, and in many ways encouraged literature and science. His piety was sincere, enlightened, and tolerant, and he was extremely concerned for the morals of the clergy. Two important bulls were promulgated by him, denouncing such accommodation of Christian doctrines and rites to heathen usages as the Jesuits had practised in the East. He died May 3, 1758.

Benedict, Sr, the founder of Western monachism, was born of a wealthy family at Nursia, near Spoleto, in 480 A.D.; and convinced while yet at the schools of Rome that the only way of escaping the evil in the world was in seclusion and religious exercise, he, a boy of fourteen, withdrew to a cavern or grotto near Subiaco, where he lived three years. The fame of his piety led to his being appointed the abbot of a neighbouring monastery at Vicovaro, nominally observing the oriental rule; but he soon left it, as the morals of the half-wild monks were not strict enough. Multitudes still sought his guidance; and from the most devoted he founded twelve small monastic communities. He ultimately established a monastery on Monte Cassino, near Naples, afterwards one of the richest and most famous in Italy. In 515 he is said to have composed his Regula Monachorum, which became the common rule of all Western monachism. In addition to the usual religious exercises, the rule directs that the monks shall employ themselves in manual labours, imparting instruction to youth, copying manuscripts for the library, &c. But the founder of the most learned of all the monastic orders was himself little of a scholar. He died March 21, 543. See works on the order and its founder by Mabillon (Paris, 1703-39), Krätzing (1876), Abbot Snow (1883), Rickenbach (1884), and Canon Doyle (1887).

Benedict, SIR JULIUS (1804-85), musician and composer, born at Stuttgart, where his father was a Jewish banker, studied under Hummel and Weber, and was at twenty conductor at a Vienna opera-house, and then at the San Carlo in Naples. He became distinguished as a pianist, and in 1836 settled in London for good. Here he produced the operas The Gipsy's Warning (1838), The Brides of Venice (1844), and The Crusaders (1846). He conducted at Covent Garden Theatre in 1843-44, the Norwich Musical Festival in 1845, and thereafter the Monday Popular and numerous other concerts. In 1850 he conducted for Jenny Lind in America. His cantata, Undine (1860), was well received, and his Lily of Killarney (1862) was his greatest operatic success. Other works were Richard Cœur de Lion (1863), The Bride of Song (1864), a symphony (1873), and the cantatas St Cecilia (1866) and Graziella (1882). His oratorio, St Peter (1870), was perhaps his masterpiece. Rossini influenced him at first, and then Weber. He was knighted in 1871, and died in London, June 5, 1885.

Benedict Biscof (c. 628-690), a great Anglo-Saxon churchman, thrice journeyed to Rome, and for two years was abbot of St Peter's at Canterbury. He made yet another pilgrimage to Rome, and after his return received from Egrith of Northumbria, in 674, a grant of land between the Wear and the Tyne, where he founded a monastery and endowed it with the books he had collected in Rome. He is said to have introduced stone edifices and glass windows into England. In 682 he founded a second monastery at Jarrow. Bede (q.v.) was his pupil.

Benedix, JULIUS RODERICK (1811-73), a German actor, manager, and play-writer. His dramatic works fill 27 vols. (1846-74).

Beneke, FRIEDRICH EDUARD, philosopher, was born at Berlin in 1798, studied there and at Halle, and in 1820 began to lecture at Berlin, but his lectures were soon interdicted by the government as favouring Epicureanism. For three years he taught at Göttingen, but in 1827 his lectures at Berlin were again allowed, and in 1832, on Hegel's death, he was appointed extraordinary professor of Philosophy. In March 1854 he disappeared; in June 1856 his body was found in the canal at Charlottenburg. His chief work was in empirical psychology. [Bay'neh-ke.]

Benfey, THEODOR, a great Sanskrit scholar and comparative philologist, was born of Jewish parents near Göttingen, 28th January 1809. He studied at Göttingen, Munich, Frankfurt, and Heidelberg, and in 1848 became extra-ordinary, in 1862 ordinary, professor of Sanskrit and Comparative Philology at Göttingen. He died 26th June 1881. Bezenberger edited his minor writings (2 vols. 1890-91). [Ben-fye.]

Bengel, JOHANN ALBRECHT, theologian and commentator, was born at Winnenden, in Württemberg, June 24, 1687, and died at Stuttgart, 2d November 1752. He was the first Protestant author who treated the exegesis of the New Testament critically; he did good service also in the rectification of the text, and was the first to classify the manuscripts of the New Testament into families (Asiatic and African). See Lives by Burk (2 vols. 1831-37) and Wächter (1865), and Reiff's Bengel und seine Schule (1882). [Beng-el.]

Benjamin of TUDE'LA, a Spanish rabbi, the first European traveller who gave information respecting the distant East. Partly with commercial views, and partly to inquire into the condition of his dispersed co-religionists, he set out in 1159 from Saragossa, through Italy and Greece, to Palestine, Persia, and the borders of China, returning by way of Egypt and Sicily. He died in 1173, the year of his return. His itinerary—written in Hebrew, and often republished in Latin, English, Dutch, and French translations—is occasionally concise and valuable; but on the whole must be accepted with qualifications. Asher's edition (Lond. 1840) gives the original text, with an English translation.

Benjamin, JUDAH PHILIP, Q.C., was born in 1811 at St Croix, West Indies, the son of Jewish parents on their way from England to the United States. A lawyer in New Orleans, he early engaged in politics, serving first with the Whigs, and afterwards with the Democrats. He sat in the U.S. senate from 1852 till 1860, and in 1861 joined Jefferson Davis's cabinet as Attorney-general. He was for a few months Secretary of War, and then Secretary of State until Davis's capture in 1865, when he escaped to England. He was called to the English bar in 1866, became a Q.C. in 1872, and retired from a large practice in 1881. He died in Paris, 6th May 1884. His Treatise on the Law of Sale of Personal Property (1868) reached a fourth edition in 1894.

Bennet. See ARLINGTON.

Bennett, JAMES GORDON, founder and proprietor of the New York Herald, was born at Keith, Banffshire, September 1, 1795. Trained for the Catholic priesthood, he emigrated to America in 1819, where he became in turn teacher, proof-reader, journalist, and lecturer. He had acted as casual reporter for several journals, and had failed in one or two journalistic ventures, previous to the issue of the New York Herald, May 6, 1835, price one cent. He spared no effort and expense in securing news, and laid the foundation of its after enormous success. It was the first newspaper to publish the stock lists and a daily money article. At his death, on June 1, 1872, the Herald profits were estimated at from £100,000 to £150,000 per annum.—His son, JAMES GORDON BENNETT (b. 10th May 1841), has shown like enterprise in the conduct of the Herald. H. M. Stanley (q.v.) was sent by him to find Livingstone; and in conjunction with the Daily Telegraph, he supplied the funds for his journey across Africa (1874-78).

Bennett, JOHN HUGHES, physician, was born in London, August 31, 1812, and died at Norwich, September 25, 1875, having from 1848 to 1874 been professor of the Institutes of Medicine in Edinburgh University. His investigations are largely embodied in his Text-book of Physiology (1870-71).

Bennett, WILLIAM (1804-86), a Tractarian clergyman, incumbent from 1851 of Frome in Somerset. He is chiefly remembered through the case of Sheppard v. Bennett (1870-72), wherein his teaching on the Real Presence was pronounced to be not inconsistent with the doctrine of the Church of England.

Bennett, WILLIAM COX, LL.D. (1829-95), songwriter, was born at Greenwich.

Bennett, SIR WILLIAM STERDALE, Mus.D., D.C.L., pianist and composer, was born at Sheffield, April 13, 1816; studied at the Royal Academy, London, and at Leipzig; attracted Mendelssohn's notice at the Düsseldorf Musical Festival; appeared with success at Leipzig in the winter of 1837-38; and was received with great applause when he returned to London. In 1838 he was elected member of the Royal Society of Music; in 1856 became professor of Music at Cambridge, and in 1868 principal of the Royal Academy of Music; was knighted in 1871; and died February 1, 1875, being buried in Westminster Abbey. His compositions include a symphony, four concert overtures, the two cantatas The May Queen and The Woman of Samaria, and a few songs. But his peculiar individuality is best exemplified in his works for the piano, of whose capabilities he was a great master.

Ben'nigsen, LEVIN AUGUST THEOPHIL, COUNT (1745-1826), Russian general, was born at Brunswick; in 1773 entered the service of the Empress Catharine; fought at Pultusk (1806), Eylau (1807), Borodino and Tarutino (1812), and Leipzig (1813); and died on his paternal estate in Hanover.—His son, ALEXANDER LEVIN (1809-93), was a Hanoverian statesman.—RUDOLF VON BENNIGSEN (1824-1902), born at Lüneburg, and trained to the law, as early as 1859 stood forth as a champion of German unity under Prussian hegemony. In 1888-97 he was William II.'s chief administrator of Hanover.

Benson, EDWARD WHITE (1829-96), Archbishop of Canterbury, born near Birmingham, at Trinity, Cambridge, took a first in 1852; and was a master at Rugby, and first head-master of Wellington College 1858-72. Bishop of Truro from 1877, in 1882 he was translated to Canterbury. See Life by his son, ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER (b. 1862), who has written poems; Rossetti, Fitzgerald, and Pater in 'Men of Letters'; The Upton Letters, From a College Window, and many other works.—His third son, EDWARD FREDERIC (b. 1867), is author of Dodo (1893), The Rubicon (1894), The Babe, B.A. (1897), and The Vintage (1898).—Another son, ROBERT HUGH (b. 1871), a Roman Catholic priest, has also written much.

Bent, JAMES THEODORE (1852-97), born at Liverpool, graduated from Wadham College, Oxford, in 1875. He wrote on San Marino (1872), Genoa (1880), Garibaldi (1882), the Cyclades (1885), the ruined cities of Mashonaland (1892), Axum (1893), and South Arabia (1895).

Bentham, GEORGE, botanist (1800-84), was born at Stoke, Portsmouth, the second son of the naval architect, Sir Samuel Bentham (1757-1831), and from 1826 to 1832 was secretary to his uncle Jeremy. His Outlines of a New System of Logic (1827) anticipated Hamilton's doctrine of the qualification of the predicate. Though called to the bar, he soon abandoned law for botany. He had catalogued the plants of the Pyrenees (1824-26), and now published his Labiatarum Genera et Species (1832-36). In 1854 he presented his collections to Kew, where with Sir Joseph Hooker he produced the great Genera Plantarum (3 vols. 1862-83). President of the Linnean Society in 1863-74, he was made a C.M.G. in 1878. See a book by B. D. Jackson (1906).

Bentham, JEREMY, writer on jurisprudence and ethics, was born, an attorney's son, in London, 15th February 1748. From Westminster School he went, twelve years old, but already dubbed 'the philosopher,' to Queen's College, Oxford, where he took his B.A. in 1763. His father set him to study law at Lincoln's Inn, and he was called to the bar in 1772; but he never practised, and turning to the theory of law, became the greatest critic of legislation and government in his day. His first publication, A Fragment on Government (1776), was an acutely hypercritical examination of a passage in Blackstone's Commentaries, and contains the germs of most of his after writings. On the death of his father in 1792, he succeeded to nearly £600 a year; and, living frugally but with elegance, and employing secretaries, he got through an immense amount of work. By a life of temperance and great self-compacency, in the society of a few devoted friends, he attained the age of eighty-four, dying 6th June 1832. By his own wish, his body was dissected; and his skeleton, dressed in his accustomed garb, is preserved at University College, London. A pamphlet on The Hard Labour Bill (1778) was an excerpt from his Rationale of Punishments and Rewards (1825), which was written in 1775, but first saw the light in a French translation by Dumont (1811). He published in 1787 a Defence of Usury; in 1789, Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation; in 1802, Discourses on Civil and Penal Legislation; in 1813, A Treatise on Judicial Evidence; in 1817, Codification and Public Instruction; in 1824, The Book of Fallacies. His works were edited in 1843 by Bowring and John Hill Burton, in 11 volumes; and generous disciples like Dumont, the Mills, and Sir Samuel Romilly, diffused his principles and promoted his fame. In his early works, his style was clear, spirited, and often eloquent; but from 1810 it became overloaded with technical terms. In all Bentham's ethical and political writings, the doctrine of utility is the leading and pervading principle; 'the greatest happiness of the greatest number,' a phrase coined by Hutcheson or Priestley, owes its currency to him. In the application of the principle he demanded nothing less than the immediate remodelling of the government, and the codification and reconstruction of the laws; and insisted, among other changes, on universal suffrage, annual parliaments, vote by ballot, and paid representatives. Many of his schemes have been realised, many more are in course of realisation. The end and object of them all was the general welfare, and his chief error lay in conceiving that organic changes are possible save through the growth and modification of popular needs, ideas, and institutions. In Mill's words, 'he found the philosophy of law a chaos, and left it a science;' and he was the philosophic pioneer of Liberalism and of Radicalism. See Life by Bowring in the collected works; Burton's Benthamiana (1843); and Life by Atkinson (1905).

Bentinck, WILLIAM (1649-1709), first Earl of Portland, was born in Holland, the descendant of a noble family which in the 14th century had migrated from the Palatinate to Gelderland. The friend from boyhood of William III., he was trusted beyond all others with the secrets of his foreign policy, and after the coronation of William and Mary was created an English peer, and presented with large estates.—WILLIAM CAVENTISH BENTINCK (1738-1809), third Duke of Portland, entered Lord Rockingham's cabinet in 1765, and succeeded him as leader of the Whig party. He was twice prime-minister—April to December 1783, and 1807-9; but his best work was done as Home Secretary under Pitt, with charge of Irish affairs, throughout the eventful period 1794-1801.—His second son, LORD WILLIAM CAVENTISH BENTINCK (1774-1839), Indian statesman, after serving with distinction in Flanders and Italy, was governor of Madras (1803-7). He advocated several useful reforms; but his proscription of sepoy beards and turbans led to the massacre of Vellore, and his own immediate recall. From 1808 to 1814 he was serving in the Peninsula and Italy; in 1827 he was appointed governor-general of Bengal, and in 1833 became the first governor-general of India. His policy was pacific and popular, and his viceroyship marked by the suppression of suttee and thuggisni, the educating and employment of natives, the opening up of internal communication, and the establishment of the overland route. He returned to England in 1835, and died at Paris. See Life by Boulger (1892).

LORD GEORGE BENTINCK, sportsman and Protectionist leader, the fourth Duke of Portland's third son, was born at Welbeck Abbey, 27th February 1802, and, entering the army in 1819, attained six years afterwards the rank of major. From 1822 to 1825 he was private secretary to his uncle, Mr Caning, and in 1826 was elected member for Lynn. At first attached to no party, he voted for Catholic emancipation and for the principle of the Reform Bill, but against several of its most important details, and in favour of the celebrated Chandos clause. On the formation of Peel's ministry in December 1834, he and his friend Lord Stanley, afterwards Earl of Derby, with some adherents, formed a separate section in the House of Commons; but, on Peel's resignation in April, Lord George openly joined the Conservative party, and in 1841 received from Peel an offer of office, which he declined, being at that time too deeply engrossed in racing and field-sports. When Peel introduced his free-trade measures in 1845, a large body of his supporters formed a Protection party, Lord George assuming its leadership. A hard hitter, and a master of figures, he was no orator; yet his speeches in the session of 1846 were most damaging to Peel's government. He was always a champion of religious liberty, advocating the removal of the Jewish disabilities, and the endowment of the Irish Catholic clergy out of the land; and at the time of the potato famine he wanted government to lend £16,000,000 for reproductive works in Ireland. He was an 'Admirable Crichton' of field-sports, and though he never did win the Derby, had brilliant success on the turf, whose dishonest practices he showed the utmost zeal to suppress. He died suddenly, 21st September 1848, whilst walking near Welbeck Abbey. See his Life by Lord Beaconsfield (1851), and his Racing Life by Kent and Lawley (1892).

Bentley, RICHARD, scholar, was born of yeoman parentage at Oulton, near Leeds, January 27, 1662. After four years at Wakefield grammar-school, he entered St John's College, Cambridge, in 1676, as subsizar; and in 1682 was appointed by his college head-master of Spalding grammar-school. Within the year he resigned this situation to become tutor to the son of Dr Stillingfleet, then Dean of St Paul's, and subsequently Bishop of Worcester. In 1689 he accompanied his pupil to Oxford, where he had full scope for the cultivation of classical studies; and where he was twice appointed to deliver the Boyle Lectures on the Evidences of Religion. He had taken orders in 1690, and to Stillingfleet he owed various good ecclesiastical preferences, with the post of royal librarian at St James's. His Letter to Mill (1691) on the Greek chronicler John Maleas is itself a masterpiece; but it was the Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris (1690), an expansion of an earlier essay, that established his reputation throughout Europe, and may be said to mark a new era in scholarship. In 1700 Bentley was appointed Master of Trinity College, Cambridge; and in the following year he married Joanna Bernard, the daughter of a Huntingdonshire knight. The history of his mastership is an unbroken series of quarrels and litigations, provoked by his arrogance and rapacity, for which he was fully as well known during his lifetime as for his learning. He contrived, nevertheless, in 1717, to get himself appointed regius professor of Divinity, and by his boldness and perseverance managed to pass scathless through all his controversies. This stormy life did not impair his literary activity. He edited various classics—among others, Horace (1711) and Terence (1726)—upon which he bestowed vast labour. Emendations were at once his forte and foible—the latter conspicuously in his edition of Paradise Lost (1732). The proposal (1720) to print an edition of the Greek New Testament, in which the received text should be corrected by a careful comparison with the Vulgate and all the oldest existing Greek MSS., was then singularly bold, and evoked violent opposition. Bentley died 14th July 1742, leaving behind him one son, Richard (1708–82), who inherited much of his father's taste with none of his energy, and two daughters, one of whom was the mother of Richard Cumberland the dramatist. See Monk's Life of Bentley (2 vols. 1833); Jebb's Bentley (1882); and Dyce's unfinished edition of his works (3 vols. 1836–38).

Bentley, RICHARD (1794–1871), a London publisher, founder of Bentley's Miscellany (1837–68). The firm was absorbed by Macmillan's in 1898.

Benton, THOMAS HART (1782–1858), American statesman, known as 'Old Bullion' from his opposition to the paper currency, was born near Hillsborough, N.C. See Life by Roosevelt (1887).

Benyowsky, MAURICE AUGUSTUS, COUNT DE (c. 1746–86), a rascally Hungarian adventurer, who, while fighting for the Polish Confederation, was taken prisoner in 1769, banished to Kamchatka, and there made tutor in the governor's family. He gained the affections of the daughter of the house, and was assisted by her to escape, but not without a struggle, in which the governor was killed. Benyowsky, with ninety-six companions, set sail in a ship well-armed and provisioned, and with a considerable amount of treasure, and reached France in 1772. Invited by the French government to found a colony at Madagascar, he arrived there in 1774, and was made king in 1776 by the chiefs. His relations with the French were now not always friendly, and while in contention with the government of Mauritius, he was killed in battle. See his Memoirs (trans. by Nicholson, 1790; new ed. by Pastedil Oliver, 1893). [Ben-yof'sky.]

Beranger, PIERRE JEAN DE, the greatest songwriter of France, was born in Paris, 19th August 1780, was apprenticed to a printer in Peronne, and for a time was clerk to his father, who made (and lost) a fortune in speculation. In 1798 he took to literature in Paris, living in the garret of which he has sung so charmingly, until in 1804 distress compelled him to ask aid from Lucien Bonaparte; and in 1807–21 he held a clerkship at the university. On the publication of the first collection of his songs in 1815, he was recognised as the lyrical champion of the opposition to the Bourbons. His popularity with the working-classes was immense; his politics, a curious compound of republicanism and devotion to the Napoleonic legend, exactly hit the taste of the multitude. The political allusions in two volumes published in 1821 led to a government prosecution, which cost him his post, and brought him a fine of 500 francs and three months' imprisonment; a volume (1825) involved a fine of 10,000 francs and nine months' imprisonment. In 1830 he published Chansons Nouvelles, and in 1840 he wrote the story of his life. In 1848, elected against his will deputy of the Seine, he resigned after a few days. He rejected sundry offers of advancement from Napoleon III., and lived in retirement during his last years. He died at Paris on July 16, 1857. The vivacity and wit of the songs, their tripping lightness of movement, their gaiety which trembles into pathos, their satire which melts into laughter, their inimitable simplicity and seemingly unstudied grace of workmanship, justify their popularity. See Ma Biographie (trans. 1858), and his correspondence (1859–60); Lives by Arnauld (2 vols. Paris, 1864) and Jules Janin (Paris, 1866); Sainte Beuve's Portraits Contemporains; and Bibliographie by Brinois (1876). [Bay-ron'-zhay.]

Berchem, or BERGHEM, NICHOLAS (1620–83), a landscape-painter of vast industry, was born at Haarlem, and died at Amsterdam. [Berk-hem.]

Berengar I. succeeded his father as Duke of Friuli, and in 887 was crowned king of Italy, in 915 emperor. He was assassinated in 924.—His grandson, BERENGAR II., succeeded his father as Count of Ivrea in 925, and was crowned king in 950. In 961 he was dethroned by the emperor, and after three years' refuge in a mountain-fortress, was sent as a prisoner to Bamberg, in Bavaria, where he died in 966.

Berengarius of Tours (998-1088), scholastic theologian, was born at Tours, and in 1031 was appointed preceptor of the cathedral school there, and about 1040 archdeacon of Angers. An opponent of the doctrine of transubstantiation, he was finally, in 1078, cited to appear at Rome, where he repeatedly abjured his 'error,' but never seems to have really abandoned it. He spent the last years of his life in a cell on an island in the Loire, near Tours.

Berenice, the name of several women of the house of Ptolemy, none of them so celebrated as the Jewish Berenice—the daughter of Herod Agrippa, who, having been four times married to an uncle, her brother, &c., gained the love of Titus during the Jewish rebellion (70 A.D.), and followed him to Rome. She is the heroine of Racine's tragedy. [Ber-e-ni-see.]

Berenson, BERNHARD, 'constructive' art critic, was born at Boston, U.S., in 1865, studied at Harvard, and has written a series of original (almost revolutionary) works on Italian art.

Beresford, LORD CHARLES WILLIAM DE LA POER, was born at Philpottown, county Dublin, 10th February 1846, the second son of the fourth Marquis of Waterford. He entered the navy in 1859, and was promoted captain in 1882 for his services at the bombardment of Alexandria. He served, too, in the Nile expedition (1884), was Conservative M.P. for Co. Waterford (1874-80), Marylebone (1885-89), York (1897-1900), Woolwich (1902-3), Portsmouth (from 1910), and was a Lord of the Admiralty (1886-88). He undertook a special mission to China in 1898, as admiral commanded the Mediterranean Fleet in 1905-7, and the Channel Fleet in 1907-9. He is a trenchant critic of naval affairs. [Ber-es-ford.]

Beresford, WILLIAM CARR BERESFORD, VISCOUNT, was born in 1768, a natural son of the first Marquis of Waterford. He distinguished himself at the Cape (1806) and at Buenos Ayres (surrendering but escaping); in 1808 he did gallant service during the retreat to Corunna; and in 1809 he took the command of the Portuguese army. For his services at Busaco (1810) he was made a Knight of the Bath; and for his victory over Soult at Albuera (1811) he received the thanks of parliament. He was present at Badajoz, and at Salamanca was severely wounded. In 1814 he was created Baron, and in 1823 Viscount Beresford. He quitted Portugal in 1822; and in the Wellington administration (1828-30) he was master-general of the ordnance. He bore the title of Duke of Elvas in Spain, and of Comde de Trancoso in Portugal. He died 8th January 1854.

Berg, CHRISTEN PAULSEN (1829-91), a Danish Radical politician.

Bergenroth, GUSTAV ADOLF (1813-69), the editor of the Simancas archives, was born in East Prussia, and died at Madrid, having had to quit Germany in 1850 as a revolutionist, first for California, and then for England, where he devoted himself to the Tudor state papers. See Memoir by Cartwright (1870). [Ber-gen-roath.]

Bergerac, SAVINIEN CYRANO DE (1619-55), a French author, distinguished for his duels, more than a thousand, most of them fought on account of his monstrously large nose. His works (new ed. 1875), which are often crude, but full of invention, vigour, and wit, include the Histoire Comique des États de la Lune et du Soleil, which suggested 'Micromégas' to Voltaire, and 'Gulliver' to Swift. Rostand's play, Cyrano de Bergerac, was a great hit in 1898. [Ber-zhay-rae.]

Berghaus, HEINRICH (1797-1884), geographer, born at Cleves, and died at Stettin. [Berg-hows.]

Bergk, THEODOR (1812-81), born at Leipzig, from 1842 to 1869 was professor of Philology at Marburg, Freiburg, and Halle. His chief work is his Poetae Lyrici Graeci (3 vols. 1843).

Bergman, TORBERN OLOF (1735-84), a Swedish chemist, from 1758 a professor at Uppsala.

Bergson, HENRI, born in Paris in 1859, became professor (1900) at the Collège de France, and Member of the Institute. Matière et Mémoire appeared in 1896, Le Rire in 1900; and in 1907 he took a front rank among philosophers by his Evolution Créatrice (trans. 1911). Of the two 'ready-made garments,' mechanism and finalism, he finds that finalism 'might be recut and re-sewn, and in this new form fit less badly than the other.' He maintains the reality of time, and the concrete reality of conscious life. See books by Lindsay (1911), M'Kellar Stewart (1911), and Baisillie (1912).

Berkeley, GEORGE, born near Kilkenny, 12th March 1685, was educated at Kilkenny and Trinity College, Dublin. The Essay towards a New Theory of Vision (1709) showed that the act of seeing, which seems so immediate, is really an act of interpretation. The argument was enlarged in scope in a Treatise on the Principles of Human Knowledge (1710), followed in 1713 by Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, further illustrating his 'new principle'—that the world which we see and touch is not an abstract independent substance, of which conscious mind may be an effect, but is the very world which is presented to our senses, and which depends for its actuality on being perceived. In 1713 Berkeley went to London, and then spent the best part of seven years in travel in France and Italy, first as chaplain to the brilliant and eccentric Earl of Peterborough, and afterwards as tutor to a son of the Bishop of Clogher. On his return to Ireland in 1721 he was distressed by the social corruption and disorder occasioned by the South Sea Mania, and published a short Essay towards preventing the Ruin of Great Britain. In 1724 he was made Dean of Derry, but having received promise of a government grant in support of his romantic scheme 'of founding a college at the Bermudas for the Christian civilisation of America' (as head of which he was to have £100 a year!), he sailed for America in September 1728, taking with him his newly-married wife. To prepare for Bermuda, he made a temporary home for nearly three years in Rhode Island; and as the promised grant was in the end withdrawn, in 1731 he returned to England. Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher (1732), the most finished of his works, is a religious interpretation of nature, giving pleasant pictures of American scenes and life, while in form and ideas it resembles dialogues of Plato. Next came a Vindication (1733) of Berkeley's early visual immaterialism; and in the Analyst (1735), his theological philosophy was further unfolded. Meantime, in 1734, Berkeley was made Bishop of Cloyne, where in a beautiful home-life of eighteen years he found a channel for his ardent philanthropy in devotion to the social problems of Ireland. In 1736 and following years he issued the Querist and other pamphlets on Ireland. In 1744 he published Siris, or a chain of philosophical reflections on the virtues of tar-water, a treatise which he said cost him more research and thought than any of his other works. It suggests a connection between the resinous element in tar and the Spiritual Power by which the universe is being perpetually created, and shows Platonic and Neo-Platonic influence. In 1752 he resigned his episcopate and settled in Oxford, but died 14th January 1753. Berkeley's thought, through Hume's misapplication of the 'new principle' to disintegrate spirit as well as matter into a succession of isolated feelings, told on Kant on one side and the Scottish psychologists on the other. The 'Collected Works' (4 vols. 1871; new ed. 1901) include the Commonplace Book of 1705-6, dissertations and a Life by Campbell Fraser, who also published Selections from Berkeley (3d ed. 1884) and Berkeley (2d ed. 1885).

Berkeley, HON. GRANTLEY FITZHARDINGE (1800-81), sportsman, M.P. for West Gloucestershire, and heir for seventy years to the earldom of Berkeley, wrote several works, among them My Life and Recollections (4 vols. 1865-66).

Berlichingen, GÖTZ VON. See GÖTZ.

Berlioz, HECTOR, a musical composer of eccentric genius, was born December 11, 1803, at Côte-St-André, Isère. Sent to Paris to study medicine, he devoted himself to music, and entered the Conservatoire. He won the Grand prix de Rome in 1830, and in Italy became acquainted with Liszt and Mendelssohn. At Paris in 1832 he got a hearing for some of his compositions; but their complicated and peculiar nature failed to win popular recognition, and Berlioz was driven to support himself and his wife—he married the Irish actress, Harriet or Henrietta Smithson (1800-54), in 1833—by writing musical criticisms, which, wrung from him with the utmost pain and effort, reveal humour, style, and picturesque expression. In 1842 he set out on the first of those foreign concert tours which partly indemnified him for the indifference of his compatriots, being received with enthusiasm in Belgium, Germany, Austria, Hungary, even Russia. In 1848 he was engaged by Julien as conductor at Drury Lane, but the enterprise proved a disastrous failure; in 1855 he was conductor of the New Philharmonic Society. For some years before his death in Paris, 8th March 1869, he had practically abandoned composition. The complete list of Berlioz's works extends to twenty-six opus-numbers. After his Damnation de Faust, which is, perhaps, deservedly his most popular work, his most successful achievements are his symphonies, Roméo et Juliette, Harold en Italie, and the Symphonie Fantastique; his overtures, Carnaval Romain, Benvenuto Cellini, and Waverley; his charming opera, Béatrice et Bénédict; his sacred trilogy, L'Enfance du Christ; and finally, his great Messe des Morts and Te Deum. Much of Berlioz's best literary work is buried in the files of the Débats; but his published writings include his Soirées d'Orchestre, A travers Chants, Les Grottesques de la Musique, his Mémoires (1865), and his well-known treatise on orchestration. His conceptions were grandiose rather than great, and he delighted overmuch in extravagantly exciting effects; but his sense of orchestration was abnormally acute, and in delicate orchestral embroidery he stands alone. Berlioz was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1839, and a member of the Institute in 1856, and was librarian of the Conservatoire. See his Correspondance Inédite (Paris, 1870); his Life and Letters (trans. 1882); his Autobiography (trans. 1884); and Lives by Julien (Paris, 1888), S. R. Thompson (1895), and Miss K. F. Boulton (1903). [Berlioz, not Berlioh.]

Bernadotte. See CHARLES XIV. of Sweden.

Bernal Osborne, RALPH (1808-82), assumed the name Osborne on his marriage in 1844, and from 1841 to 1874 was Liberal M.P. for Wycombe, Middlesex, Dover, Liskeard, Nottingham, and Waterford.

Bernard, ST. of Clairvaux, was born of a noble family at Fontaines, near Dijon, in Burgundy, in 1091; in 1113 entered the Cistercian monastery of Cîteaux; and in 1115 became the first abbot of the newly-founded monastery of Clairvaux, in Champagne, where he died, August 20, 1153. He was canonised in 1174. His studious, ascetic life and stirring eloquence made him the oracle of Christendom; he founded more than seventy monasteries; and the 'Mellifluous Doctor' is regarded by the Catholic Church as the last of the fathers. He drew up the statutes of the Knights Templars in 1128; he secured the recognition of Pope Innocent II.; and it was his glowing eloquence at the council at Vézelay in 1146 that kindled the enthusiasm of France for the second crusade. The influence of St Bernard as a spiritual teacher through his fervid piety and living grasp of Christian doctrine was a wholesome antidote to the dry and cold scholasticism of the age. Yet he showed a harsh severity towards Abelard and others whose views he disapproved. His writings consist of more than 400 epistles, 340 sermons, and 12 distinct theological treatises; there are editions by Mabillon (1667-90) and Migne (1851-52). Bernard was one of the greatest of the Latin hymn-writers, many modern hymns being based on his Jesu Dulcis Memoria. The monks of his reformed branch of the Cistercians are often called Bernardines. See Lives by Morison (3d ed. 1877); Ratisbonne (9th ed. Paris, 1883); Chevalier (2d ed. Bruges, 1888); J. Mabillon (Eng. trans. by Eales, 1889); Hofmeister (2 vols. Berl. 1889-90); Eales (1890); and Storrs (1893).

Bernard of MORLAIX, a monk of Clugny about 1140, is said to have been born of English parents at Morlaix in Brittany. He is the author of the remarkable poem De Contemptu Mundi, in 3000 long rolling, 'leonine-dactylic' verses, which Dr Neale freely translated as The Rhythm of Bernard of Morlaix. From this 'Jerusalem the Golden' and other well-known hymns are taken.

Bernard of WEIMAR. See BERNHARD.

Bernard, CLAUDE, physiologist, born near Villefranche, 12th July 1813, studied medicine at Paris, and in 1841 became assistant at the Collège de France to Magendie, with whom he worked until his own appointment in 1854 to the chair of General Physiology, and whom he succeeded in 1855 as professor of Experimental Physiology. He was elected to the Academy in 1869, and died at Paris, February 10, 1878. His earliest researches were on the action of the secretions of the alimentary canal, the pancreatic juice, the connection between the liver and nervous system, &c., for which he received prizes from the Academy (1851-53.) Later researches were on the changes of temperature of the blood, the oxygen in arterial and in venous blood, the opium alkaloids, curarine, and the sympathetic nerves. His Leçons de Physiologie Expérimentale (1865) is a standard work. See works on him by Malloizel (French, 1881) and Sir M. Foster (1899).

Bernard-Beere, Mrs, the nom-de-théâtre of the widow of Captain E. C. Dering (1833-74), her maiden name being Fanny Mary Whitehead; in 1900 she married Mr H. C. S. Olivier. As actress she became famous in the School for Scandal, Fédora, &c.

Bernardin de St-Pierre. See ST-PIERRE.

Bernardino, St (1380-1444), of Siena, born at Massa-Carrara of a distinguished family, made himself famous by his rigid restoration of the primitive Franciscan rule. He entered the order in 1404, and in 1438 was appointed its vicar-general for Italy. He founded the Frates de Observantia, a branch of the Franciscan order, which already numbered over 300 monasteries in Italy during his day. Bernardino was canonised in 1450. His eminently mystical works were published at Venice in 1591, and at Paris in 1636. See Mary Allies' Three Catholic Reformers (1879).

Bernauer, AGNES, the beautiful daughter of a poor surgeon of Augsburg, was secretly married in 1432 to Duke Albrecht of Bavaria, only son of the reigning Duke Ernst, who, in her husband's absence, had her drowned as a witch at Straubing, in the Danube, October 12, 1435. Albrecht took up arms against his father; but after a year of war he consented to marry Anna of Brunswick.

Bernays, JAKOB (1824-81), Jewish classical scholar, born at Hamburg, died at Bonn.

Berners, or BARNES, DAME JULIANA, according to tradition was the daughter of Sir James Berners who was beheaded in 1388, the prioress of Sopwell nunnery near St Albans, and the author of the Treatyse perteynyng to Hawkyngge, Huntynge, Fysshynge, and Coote Armirys. Probably, however, she wrote only the treatise on hunting, and part of that on hawking; the heraldry is certainly not hers. The treatise on fishing, wanting in the St Albans edition (1486), first appears in Wynkyn de Worde's edition (1496).

Berners, JOHN BOURCHIER, LORD (1467-1533), succeeded his grandfather as second lord in 1474, and from 1520 was deputy of Calais, where in 1523-25 he translated Froissart.

Bernhard (1604-39), Duke of Weimar, general, was youngest of the eight sons of John, third Duke of Saxe-Weimar. In the Thirty Years' War he took the Protestant side, and distinguished himself in 1622 at the bloody battle of Wimpfen. In 1631 he was one of the first to support Gustavus Adolphus. He commanded the left wing at Lützen, and after the king's death had the chief command. He took a very important part in the war; but fell suddenly ill, and died at Neuburg on the Rhine. See Droysen, Bernhard von Weimar (Leip, 1885).

Bernhardt, ROSINE, called SARAH, a French actress, was born in Paris, October 22, 1844, the daughter of a milliner from Berlin by a Havre magistrate, and from seven was brought up in a convent at Versailles. Entering the Paris Conservatoire in 1859, she gained second prizes for both tragedy and comedy, and in 1862 made her début as 'Iphigénie' at the Théâtre Français, but attracted so little notice that she soon left the theatre, only to meet with still less success in burlesque at the Gymnase and Porte St Martin.

In 1867 she played minor parts at the Odéon, and became famous by her impersonation of 'Zanetto' in Coppée's Le Passant (1869), and of the 'Queen of Spain' in Ruy Blas (1872). The latter success brought about her instant recall to the Théâtre Français, and after 1876 she made frequent appearances in London. Her tours in North and South America, in Italy, Russia, Australia, &c. brought her vast sums of money; but her essay at the management of a Paris theatre involved her in heavy debt. In 1882 she married M. Jacques Daria or d'Amala (d. 1889), a Greek actor, from whom she was divorced shortly afterwards. Madame Bernhardt is probably the greatest tragédienne since Rachel, and in comedy also she ranks as a finished actress. She founded the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt in 1899. She has exhibited both paintings and statues. See a French Life by Clément (1879), and her Autobiography (1907).

Bernhardy, GOTTFRIED (1800-75), classical scholar, was born of Jewish parents near Frankfurt, and in 1829 became director of the philological seminary at Halle.

Berni, or BERNIA, FRANCESCO (c. 1497-1535), a favourite Italian poet, was born at Lamporecchio in Tuscany, and in 1517 repaired from Florence to Rome. He entered successively the service of his uncle, Cardinal Bibbiena, of Giberti, chancellor to Clement VII., and in 1532 of Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici. This he quitted a year later, and went to Florence, where, refusing to poison Cardinal Salviati, he was himself poisoned. His recast or rifacimento of Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato (1542) is still read in Italy (and justly so) in preference to the original. He had a large share in establishing Italian as a literary language. See the full Life (Florence, 1881) by Virgili, who published a volume of Berni's lyrics, letters, and Latin verses (1885). [Ber-nee.]

Bernier, FRANÇOIS, born at Angers about 1654, left France for Syria, Egypt, Arabia, and India, where for twelve years he was physician to Aurungzebe. He published a delightful account of his travels in 1670-71 (best English ed. by Constable, 1893), and died at Paris in 1688. [Ber-nay.]

Bernini, GIOVANNI LORENZO (1598-1680), sculptor, architect, and painter, was born at Naples, and died in Rome, leaving £100,000. Pope Urban VIII. employed him to embellish St Peter's, and his greatest achievement in architecture is its colossal colonnade. On Louis XIV.'s flattering invitation, he travelled in 1663 to Paris with great pomp; but his design for the Louvre was deemed inferior to Perrault's. [Ber-nee-nee.]

Bernoulli, or BERNOULLI, a Swiss family of scientists, whose founder, Jacques Bernoulli (d. 1583), fled a Protestant refugee from Antwerp to Frankfurt; his grandson, Jacques (1598-1634), in 1622 settled in Basel. Members of the family were: Jacques (1654-1705), mathematician; his brother, Jean (1667-1748), mathematician; their nephew, Nicolas (1687-1759), mathematician; Jean's two sons, Nicolas (1695-1726), mathematician, and Daniel (1700-82), mathematician, botanist, and physicist; his sons, Jean (1744-1807), astronomer, and Jacques (1759-89), mathematician; Christophe (1782-1863), naturalist, statistician, &c.; Jean Jacques (b. 1831), archaeologist; and his brother, Charles Gustave (1834-78), naturalist. [Ber-noo-ye.]

Berosus, a priest of Babylon, who flourished about 260 B.C., and wrote in Greek three books of Babylonian-Chaldean history, in which he made use of the archives in the temple of Bel at Babylon, and of which unfortunately only a few fragments have been preserved by Josephus, Eusebius, and Syncellus.

Berri, CHARLES FERDINAND, DUC DE, second son of the Comte d'Artois (afterwards Charles X.), was born at Versailles, January 24, 1778. In 1792 he fled with his father to Turin; fought with him under Condé against France; afterwards visited Russia, and lived for some time in London and Edinburgh. In 1814 he returned to France, in 1815 was appointed commander of the troops in and around Paris, and in 1816 married Caroline Ferdinande Louise (born November 5, 1798), eldest daughter of Francis, afterwards king of the Two Sicilies. Assassinated by the fanatic Louvel in front of the Opera (13th February 1820), he left only a daughter; but on 29th September 1820, the widowed duchess gave birth to the Comte de Chambord (q.v.). After the July revolution, 1830, in which the duchess exhibited great courage, she, with her son, followed Charles X. to Holyrood; in 1832 she landed from Italy near Marseilles, but, after many adventures, was betrayed by a Jew at Nantes, and imprisoned in the citadel of Blaye. Her confession that she had formed a second marriage with the Neapolitan marquis, Lucchesi-Palli, at once destroyed her political importance, and the government set her at liberty. She died in Styria, 16th April 1870. See works by Ménière (1882), Nauray (1889), Imbert de Saint Amand (1888-91; trans. 1892-93), Noel Williams (1911). [Ber-ree.]

Berry, MARY (1763-1852), was born at Kirkbridge in Yorkshire, travelled on the Continent (1785-85), and in 1788 first met Horace Walpole (q.v.), whose literary executor she became, and who induced her to settle at Little Strawberry Hill with her younger sister and life-long companion, Agnes. See her Journal and Correspondence (3 vols. 1865), and Lord Houghton's Monographs (1873).

Berryer, PIERRE ANTOINE, a distinguished French advocate and Legitimist orator, was born in Paris, 4th January 1790, and died at his country seat, La Brosse, 20th November 1868, having in 1854 been elected to the Academy. See Life by Lecannet (1893). [Berr-yay.]

Bert, PAUL, a French physiologist and republican anti-religious statesman, was born at Auxerre, 17th October 1833, and died at Tongking, 11th November 1886. See Bérillon's L'Œuvre scientifique de Paul Bert (1887). [Bayr.]

Berthelot, MARCELLIN, chemist, was born in Paris, October 25, 1827, and in 1859 became professor of Organic Chemistry in the École de Pharmacie, in 1865 in the Collège de France, in 1876 Inspector-general of higher education, in 1886-87 minister of public instruction, and in 1889 perpetual secretary of the Académie des Sciences. He did very important work in synthetic chemistry, was one of the founders of thermo-chemistry, and wrote a history of alchemy. In 1895-96 he was minister for foreign affairs. He died 18th March 1907. [Bert-lo.]

Berthier, ALEXANDRE, Prince of Neuchâtel and Wagram, and Marshal of the French empire, was born at Versailles, February 20, 1753, and, entering the army in 1770, fought with Lafayette in the American war of independence. In the French Revolution he soon rose to be chief of the staff in the army of Italy (1795), and in 1798 proclaimed the republic in Rome. He accompanied Napoleon to Egypt in the same year as chief of the staff, a post which he also held in all the subsequent campaigns. On Napoleon's fall, he had to surrender the principality of Neuchâtel, and, not to lose more, submitted to Louis XVIII., who continued him his rank as peer and marshal. Napoleon made overtures to him from Elba; but he retired to Bamberg, in Bavaria, to his father-in-law, Duke William. On 1st July 1815, as he looked from a window at a Russian division marching towards the French frontier, the sight was too much—he threw himself down into the street, and was picked up dying. His Mémoires appeared in 1826. [Ber-te-ay.]

Berthollet, COUNT CLAUDE LOUIS, chemist, was born at Talloire in Savoy, 9th December 1748. He studied at Turin, came to Paris in 1772, and in 1781 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He aided Lavoisier in his researches on gunpowder and in forming the new chemical nomenclature, and accepted his antiphlogistic doctrines; in 1785 he showed the value of chlorine for bleaching. Following Priestley, he showed ammonia to be a compound of hydrogen and nitrogen. He was made a senator and a count by Napoleon, yet voted for his deposition in 1814, and on the Bourbon restoration was created a peer. He died November 6, 1822. [Ber'to-lay.]

Bertrand, HENRI GRATIEN, COMTE (1773-1844), one of Napoleon's generals, was born and died at Châteauroux. He shared the emperor's banishment to St Helena, and, on his death, returned to France, where in 1830 he was appointed commandant of the Polytechnic School. [Ber-tron'd.]

Bervic, CHARLES CLÉMENT (1756-1822), a French engraver.

Berwick, JAMES FITZJAMES, DUKE OF, a great French general, was the natural son of James II., by Arabella Churchill, sister of the Duke of Marlborough. Born at Moulins, 21st August 1670, he was educated in France as a Catholic, served in Hungary under Duke Charles of Lorraine, in 1687 was created Duke of Berwick, and fled from England at the Revolution. He fought through his Irish campaign of 1689-91, and then in Flanders and against the Camisards. In 1706 he was created a marshal of France, and in 1707 in Spain established the throne of Philip V. by the decisive victory of Almansa. After several years of inactivity, he received the command in 1733 of an army intended to cross the Rhine. While besieging Philippsburg, he was killed by a cannon-ball, 12th June 1734. He left descendants in both Spain and France—the Dukes of Liria and Fitzjames. See his Mémoires (1778), and two works by C. T. Wilson (1876-83).

Berzelius, JOHAN JAKOB, BARON, one of the greatest of chemists, was born at a farm in East Gothland, Sweden, August 29, 1779; studied at Upsala for a doctor; and died at Stockholm—his home from 1806—on August 7, 1848. His multiplied and accurate analyses established the laws of combination on an incontrovertible basis; and to him we owe our system of chemical symbols. He discovered the elements selenium, thorium, and cerium, and first exhibited in the elementary form calcium, barium, strontium, columbium, tantalum, silicon, and zirconium.

Besant, ANNIE (née Wood), was born in London of Irish parentage, 1st October 1847, was brought up at Harrow, and at twenty married the Rev. Frank Besant, but was separated from him in 1873. From Secularism and Mr Bradlaugh she passed in 1889 to Madame Blavatsky and Theosophy, herself its high-priestess since 1891, and settled near Madras. See her Autobiography.

Besant, SIR WALTER, novelist, was born at Portsmouth in 1836. He studied at King's College, London, and at Christ's College, Cambridge, and, having abandoned the idea of taking orders, was appointed to a professorship in Mauritius. Ill-health compelling him to resign this post, he returned to England and devoted himself to literature. His first work, Studies in French Poetry, appeared in 1868; and in 1871 he entered into a literary partnership with James Rice (1844-82), a native of Northampton, and editor of Once a Week. Together they produced Ready-money Mortiboy (1872), My Little Girl, With Harp and Crown, This Son of Vulcan, The Golden Butterfly (1876, which greatly increased their popularity), The Monks of Thelema, By Celia's Arbour, The Chaplain of the Fleet, and The Seamy Side (1881); thereafter Sir Walter has written All Sorts and Conditions of Men (1882); its fruit the People's Palace in the East end of London), All in a Garden Fair, Dorothy Forster, Children of Gideon, Armored of Lyonesse, The Ivory Gate, Beyond the Dreams of Avarice, The Master Craftsman, &c. He is also the author of French Humorists (1873), of short books on Rabelais, Coligny, Whittington, King Alfred, and Prof. Palmer (1883), and a series of works on London and its history. He was secretary of the Palestine Exploration Fund (some of whose works he edited), and first chairman of the Incorporated Society of Authors. Knighted in 1895, he died 9th June 1901. See an Introduction to Ready-money Mortiboy (1887) and his Autobiography (1902).

Bessarion, or BASILIUS, JOHANNES (1395-1472), one of the earliest of those scholars who transplanted Greek literature and philosophy into the West, was born at Trebizond, and died at Ravenna. As Bishop of Nicea, he accompanied the Greek emperor, John Palaeologus, to Italy in 1439 in order to effect a union between the Greek and the Roman churches. Soon afterwards joining the Roman Church, he was made cardinal by Pope Eugenius IV. Ten years later, Nicholas V. created him Bishop of Frascati; and for five years also he was papal legate at Bologna. After the fall of Constantinople, of which he had been titular patriarch, he visited Germany, and endeavoured to promote a crusade against the Turks. Twice he was nearly elected pope.

Bessel, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1784-1846). Prussian astronomer, was born at Minden, and was in 1810 appointed director of the observatory at Königsberg, and professor of Astronomy there. See German Life by Dürge (Zür. 1861).

Bes'semer, SIR HENRY, inventor, was born at Charlton, Herts, 19th January 1813, and from artist turned engineer. For his steel-making process (patented 1856) and other discoveries he was knighted in 1879. He died 15th March 1898.

Bessières, JEAN BAPTISTE (1768-1813), Duke of Istria and Marshal of the French empire, was born of poor parents at Preissac, dep. Lot; became a private in 1792; in less than two years rose to be captain; covered himself with glory at St Jean d'Acre, Aboukir, Austerlitz, Jena,

Eylau, and Friedland, in Spain and in the Russian campaign; and fell at Lützen. [Bes-se-eh.]

Best, WILLIAM THOMAS, organist and composer, was born at Carlisle, 13th August 1826, and till 1894 (when he retired) held posts as organist in London and (1855) St George's Hall, Liverpool. He composed and edited much music, especially for the organ, and published several works on organ-playing. He died 9th May 1897.

Bestushev, ALEXANDER (1795-1837), Russian novelist, was an officer in the guards, exiled to Yakutsk for his share in the military conspiracy of 1825. In 1830 he was permitted to enter the army of the Caucasus as a private, and he fell in a skirmish with the mountaineers. His novels and sketches bear the impress of his adventures.

Bethell, RICHARD. See WESTBURY, LORD.

Bethlen-Gabor (i.e. GABRIEL BETHLEN) was born in 1580 of an ancient and distinguished Protestant family of Hungary, and in 1613 was elected prince of Transylvania. In 1619, in co-operation with the insurgent Bohemians, he invaded Hungary, and next year was chosen its king, but in 1621 concluded peace with Ferdinand II., and resigned his claims to Hungary, whilst obtaining large accessions of territory. In 1622 and 1626 he renewed hostilities with the emperor, and died 15th November 1629.

Bethune, JOHN. See DRINKWATER.

Betterton, THOMAS, actor, was born in London about 1635, and, after serving as a bookseller's apprentice, turned actor some three years before the Restoration, and in 1661 joined Davenant's theatrical company. Addison, Cibber, Dryden, Pepys, &c. bear admiring witness to his dramatic powers, which overcame the natural disadvantages of a low voice, small eyes, and an ungainly figure. His private character was highly estimable, cheerful, modest, and generous. In an unfortunate speculation in 1692 Betterton lost all his savings. He died 28th April 1710, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Mrs Betterton, whom he had married in 1662, took the same rank among actresses as her husband did among actors. Betterton's own eight dramas were adaptations. See Life by Lowe (1891).

Betty, WILLIAM HENRY WEST, better known as the Young Roscius, was born at Shrewsbury in 1791, appeared on the stage at eleven in Belfast, and for almost five years sustained the heaviest parts before enthusiastic audiences, and earned from 50 to 75 guineas nightly. In 1805 the House of Commons adjourned to witness his Hamlet. He quitted the stage in 1808, but after studying for two years at Cambridge, returned to it in 1812. He retired finally in 1824, and lived for fifty years on the ample fortune he had so early amassed. He died in London, August 24, 1874.

Beust, FRIEDRICH FERDINAND, COUNT VON, Saxon and (from 1866) Austrian statesman, was born at Dresden, January 13, 1809, and died at Schloss Altenberg, near Vienna, October 24, 1886, having been Imperial Chancellor (1867-71) and ambassador at London (1871-78), at Paris (1878-82). His chief achievement was the reconciliation of Hungary to Austria, although he afterwards disclaimed the honour of introducing dualism into the monarchy. A Protestant opponent of the Ultramontanes, he helped to remove Jewish disabilities and legalise civil marriages. See his Memoirs (Eng. trans. 2 vols. 1887). [Boyst.]

Beveridge, WILLIAM (1637-1708), Bishop of St

Asaph from 1704, was born at Barrow, Leicestershire, was educated at Oakham and St John's College, Cambridge, and died at Westminster. His works were edited in 1824 and 1842-46 (9 and 12 vols.); but Private Thoughts upon Religion (1709) is the only one now read.

Beverland, ADRIAN, a Dutch scholar, who, by his unorthodox pamphlet, Peccatum Originale (1678), and still more his De Stolatæ Virginitatis Jure (1680), gave great offence. He came to England, where he died insane, soon after 1712.

Bewick, THOMAS, wood-engraver, was born at Cherryburn House, Ovingham, Northumberland, August 12, 1753. A farmer's son, he early evinced a strong love of nature and drawing, and at fourteen was apprenticed to Ralph Beilby (1744-1817), a Newcastle engraver, who turned out work of the most miscellaneous description. For a few months in London (1776), he became then the partner of his former master, and taking his brother John Bewick (1760-95) as an apprentice, executed the woodcuts for Gay's Fables (1779), Select Fables (1784), and his History of Quadrupeds (1790), which fully established his reputation as an engraver. During the progress of the last work he executed in 1789 his 'Chillingham Bull,' a large woodcut, which some have regarded as his masterpiece. The success of the Quadrupeds led to his even finer History of British Birds (2 vols. 1797-1804). The figures of the various birds are rendered with the utmost spirit and accuracy, and as examples of powerful and finely decorative arrangements of black and white, nothing could surpass his 'Eagle Owl,' his 'Short-eared Owl,' and his 'Goldfinch.' The tailpieces are vivid renderings of landscape and of rustic life, and are frequently touched with a homely and most vigorous humour. In technical method these illustrations show an immense advance upon all previous examples of wood-engraving. Of later works need only be mentioned the Æsop's Fables (1818), on which he was engaged for six years, and in which he was assisted by William Temple, William Harvey, and his son, Robert Elliott Bewick (1788-1849), who became his partner in 1812, and also took part in the cuts for an unfinished History of British Fishes. Bewick died at Gateshead, November 8, 1828, and was buried at Ovingham. See his charming Autobiography (1862); Hugo's Bewick Collector (1866), and 'Supplement' (1868); Life, by Thomson (1882); Bewick and his Pupils, by Dobson (1884); and Miss J. Boyd's Bewick Gleanings (1887).

Boyle, MARIE-HENRI ('Stendhal'), born at Grenoble, 23d January 1783, was painter, government-clerk, soldier, and merchant by turns, and accompanied the fatal Russian campaign of 1812. After some years' residence in Milan, he returned in 1821 to Paris, where he acquired a high reputation as a writer of novels, art and literary criticisms, notes of travel, &c. He was consul at Trieste and Civita Vecchia from 1830 to 1841, and died at Paris, 23d March 1842. See works by Paton (Lond. 1874), Cordier (Evreux, 1890), Rod (Paris, 1892), and Farges (Paris, 1892). [Boyl.]

Beyschlag, WILIBALD (1823-1900), a German evangelical theologian, born at Frankfort, and a professor at Halle from 1860. [Bi-shlag.]

Beza, THEODORE, Genevese Reformer, was born of the noble family of De Béze at Vézelay, in Burgundy, 24th June 1519, and studied Greek and law at Orleans. He became known as a writer of witty (but indecent) verses, settled with brilliant prospects at Paris, and lived for a time in fashionable dissipation. But after an illness, he took a serious view of life, and in 1548 went to Geneva along with his wife; and in 1549-59 was Greek professor at Lausanne, publishing a drama on The Sacrifice of Abraham, and lecturing on the Epistle to the Romans and the Epistles of Peter. In 1559 he was appointed a theological professor and president of the college at Geneva, and became Calvin's ablest coadjutor. In a work on the punishment of heretics (1554) he had approved of the burning of Servetus. During the civil war he was chaplain to Condé, and after his capture attached himself to Coligny. In 1563 he once more returned to Geneva, and on Calvin's death (1564) the care of the Genevese church fell upon Beza's shoulders. He presided over the synods of French reformers held at Rochelle in 1571 and at Nîmes in 1572. In 1574 he was sent by Condé on a mission to the court of the Palatinate; and in 1586 measured himself with the Würtemberg divines. He died 13th October 1605, at the ripe age of 86. Among his works are a Greek text of the New Testament, a translation of it into Latin, a life of Calvin, a work on predestination, the Icones or portraits of the reformers, and his Histoire des Églises Réformées de France, 1521-1563 (3 vols. Geneva, 1580). See Lives by Schlosser (1809), Baum (1851), and Heppé (1861).

Bhartrihari, a celebrated Indian writer of apothegms, of whom little is known.

Bhavabhūti, surnamed 'Sri-kantha,' a great Indian dramatist, who flourished in 730 A.D., and wrote three plays and a domestic drama.

Blanchini, FRANCESCO (1662-1729), antiquary and astronomer, was born at Verona, and lived and died in Rome. [B'yan-kee'nee.]

Bianconi, CHARLES (1786-1875), a native of Lombardy, who about 1801 came to Dublin as an itinerant vendor of cheap prints, and who started the first public conveyance between Clonmel and Cahir in 1815, at a time when the peace and the carriage-tax had filled the market with cheap horses and jaunting-cars. Forty years later his cars were working over 4000 miles of road daily. See Life by his daughter, Mrs O'Connell (1878).

Biard, AUGUSTE FRANÇOIS (1798-1882), a painter, born at Lyons, who travelled in the Levant, Greenland and Spitzbergen, Brazil, and round the world. His wife, Léonie d'Aunet (1820-79), separated from him since 1845, was author of some novels, a play, &c. [Be-ahr'.]

Bias, one of the Seven Wise Men of Greece, a native of Priène in Ionia, flourished about 570 B.C., famous for his eloquence, his nobility of character, and his apothegms.

Bibra, BARON ERNST VON, a German chemist, South American explorer, and man of letters, was born in Franconia, June 9, 1806, and died at Nuremberg, June 5, 1878. [Bee-bra.]

Bichat, MARIE FRANÇOIS XAVIER, one of the greatest anatomists and physiologists, was born November 11, 1771, at Thoirrette, dep. Jura, and studied in Paris under Pierre Joseph Desault (1744-95), who adopted him as his son, and whose surgical works he edited. In 1797 he began giving lectures, and in 1800 was appointed physician to the Hôtel-Dieu. Worn out by his unremitting labours, he died of fever, July 22, 1802. He was the first to simplify anatomy and physiology by reducing the complex structures of the organs to the simple or elementary tissues, and marks an epoch in both sciences. [Bee-shah'.]

Bick'erstaffe, ISAAC, play-writer, was born in Ireland about 1735, and at eleven became page to Lord Chesterfield, the lord-lieutenant. He was afterwards an officer of marines, but was dismissed the service, and in 1772 had to flee the country on a capital charge. Nothing is certainly known regarding his after-life, but he is supposed to have died on the Continent in or soon after 1812. Of his numerous pieces, produced between 1766 and 1771, the best known is The Maid of the Mill.

Bickersteth, EDWARD (1786-1850), Evangelical clergyman, born at Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmorland, was fifteen years a clerk in the London Post-office and in a solicitor's office, secretary to the Church Missionary Society (1816-30), and then rector of Watton, Herts. He was a founder of the Evangelical Alliance; and his Christian Psalmody went through 59 editions in seven years.—His son, EDWARD HENRY (1825-1906), born at Islington, was vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, from 1855; in 1885 became Bishop of Exeter; and was author of Yesterday, To-day, and For Ever, and other poems. His eldest son, EDWARD (1850-97), was Bishop of Japan from 1886.—HENRY BICKERSTETH (1783-1851) in 1836 became Master of the Rolls, and was created Baron Langdale; and ROBERT BICKERSTETH (1816-84) was Bishop of Ripon from 1857.

Bidder, GEORGE PARKER (1806-78), the 'Calculating Boy,' was born a stonemason's son at Moreton-Hampstead, was educated at Camberwell and Edinburgh, became a distinguished civil engineer, and died at Dartmouth.

Biddle, JOHN, the founder of English Unitarianism, was born in 1615 at Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, and in 1634 entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1641 was elected master of the Gloucester free school, but in 1645 was thrown into jail for his teaching on the personality of the Holy Spirit. The Westminster Assembly undertook in vain to 'settle' Biddle's case; a work by him (1647) was burnt by the hangman as blasphemous; and during the Commonwealth he suffered severely for his creed, in 1655 being banished to one of the Scilly Isles. In 1658 he was released, and continued to preach in London till after the Restoration; but in June 1662 was again apprehended and fined in £100. He could not pay it, so was committed to jail, where he died 22d September.

Biddle, NICHOLAS (1786-1844), American financier, was born and died in Philadelphia.

Bidpal, also PILPAY, the reputed author of an Indian collection (now lost) of fables and stories widely circulated both in the East and West, of which the earliest extant form exists in an Arabic version of about 750 A.D.

Bierstadt, ALBERT, an American artist, born at Solingen, near Düsseldorf, 7th January 1830, was brought next year to the United States, but studied in Europe 1853-57. In 1859 he visited the Rocky Mountains, and mountain scenes were his favourite subjects. He died in 1902.

Bigelow, the name of several notable Americans: (1) ERASTUS BRIGHAM (1814-79), born in Massachusetts, invented looms for various kinds of material, a carpet-loom, and a machine for making knotted counterpanes.—(2) JACOB (1787-1879), physician and botanist, born in Massachusetts; graduated at Harvard in 1806; practised for over forty years in Boston; and filled several chairs at Harvard. His professional publications are numerous, and the single-word nomenclature of the American Pharmacopœia of 1820, afterwards adopted in England, is largely due to him.—(3) JOHN, born at Malden, New York, 25th

November 1817, was managing editor of the New York Evening Post from 1850 to 1861, when he went as consul to Paris. From 1865 to 1866 he was U.S. Minister in France; and in 1875 he was elected secretary of state for New York, but after 1877 took no part in politics. His works include Lives of Fremont (1856) and William Cullen Bryant (1890), besides editions of Franklin's Autobiography from the original MSS. which he found in France (1868; new ed. 3 vols. 1875), Franklin's Complete Works (10 vols. 1837-88), and Tilden's Writings and Speeches (2 vols. 1885). He died in December 1911. [Bigge-to.]

Bigod, a family founded by a poor Norman knight, which in 1136 acquired from Stephen the earldom of Norfolk. The second earl, Roger, took a prominent part in securing Magna Charta; in 1306 the earldom became extinct.

Bilderdijk, WILLEM, a Dutch poet and philologist, was born at Amsterdam, 7th September 1756, and died at Haarlem, 18th December 1831. See Life appended to his poems (ed. by Da Costa, 1856-59), and others by Jan te Winkel (1890) and Kolléwijn (2 vols. 1891). [Bil'der-dike.]

Billaud-Varenne, JEAN NICOLAS (1756-1819), one of the vilest Terrorists in the French Revolution, was born at La Rochelle, in 1795 was transported for twenty years to Cayenne, and died at Port au Prince, Hayti. [Be'yo Va-ran-c'.]

Billings, JOSH, the pseudonym under which Henry Wheeler Shaw (1818-85), a land-agent at Poughkeepsie, New York, published facetious almanacs and collections of witticisms, the wit, however, mainly due to deliberate misspelling.

Billings, ROBERT WILLIAM (1813-74), architect, was born in London, and for seven years apprenticed to John Britton (q.v.). He himself produced Baronial and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Scotland (4 vols. 1845-52), with 240 illustrations.

Billington, ELIZABETH (c. 1768-1818), from 1783 to 1811 a celebrated operatic singer, was born in London of mixed German and English parentage, and died at her villa near Venice, perhaps from a blow by her worthless second husband, a Frenchman, Felissent.

Binney, THOMAS, martyr, born about 1495, probably at Norwich, studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and was ordained in 1519. He was opposed to the formal 'good works' of the schoolmen, and denounced saint and relic worship; and to these mild Protestant views he converted Hugh Latimer and other young Cambridge men. In 1527 he was arraigned before Wolsey, and on recanting, absolved, but confined in the Tower for over a year. Relapsing, he was burned as a heretic at Norwich, 19th August 1531.

Bingham, JOSEPH (1668-1723), scholar and divine, was born at Wakefield, became fellow and tutor of University College, Oxford, and then held successively the Hampshire rectories of Headbournworthy and Havant, in 1720 losing everything by the South Sea Bubble. He is known by his learned Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or Christian Antiquities (10 vols. 1708-22).

Binney, THOMAS, D.D., LL.D. (1798-24th February 1874), a native of Newcastle, from 1829 Congregational preacher in London, where the new Weigh-house Chapel, near London Bridge, was erected for him in 1833. Of his numerous writings the most popular was Is it Possible to make the Best of Both Worlds? (1853). See Lives by Stoughton (1874) and Paxton Hood (1874).

Bion, second of the three Greek bucolic poets, a native of Smyrna, was poisoned in Sicily by a jealous rival some time in the 3d century B.C. Little of his work has survived save his Lament for Adonis. There are editions of Bion, Moschus, and Theocritus by Meineke (1856) and Ahrens (1855-59).—BION OF BORYSTHENES (fl. 280 B.C.), at first a slave, studied philosophy at Athens, and lived at the court of Antigonos Gonatas.

Biondi, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO (1572-1644), a tedious Italian romance-writer, was born in the Dalmatian island of Lesina, and died at Lausanne, having from 1609 to 1640 lived in England, where James I. knighted him in 1622. [B'yon-dee.]

Björnson. See BJÖRNSSON.

Biot, JEAN BAPTISTE, physicist and astronomer, was born in Paris, April 21, 1774, and died there, February 3, 1862, having served in the artillery, and in 1800 become professor of Physics in the Collège de France. Along with Arago (q.v.), he was (1806) sent to Spain to measure a degree of the meridian, and in 1817 he visited England and the Shetland Islands to make observations along the line of the British arc of meridian. He made researches on the polarisation of light and into ancient astronomy.—His son, EDOUARD CONSTANT (1803-50), was a railway engineer, until, his health failing, he devoted himself to Chinese studies. [Be'oh.]

Birch, JONATHAN (1783-1847), till 1803 a Baltic timber-merchant, translated Faust and the Nibelungenlied.—His son, CHARLES BELL BIRCH (1832-93), was a sculptor, an A.R.A. in 1880.

Birch, SAMUEL (1757-1841), pastrycook, dramatist, volunteer colonel, and Lord Mayor.

Birch, SAMUEL, Egyptologist, was born in London, 3d November 1813, the son of a City clergyman. Educated at Merchant Taylors', in 1836 he entered the British Museum, and in 1844 became assistant-keeper of antiquities, in 1861 keeper of the Egyptian and Oriental antiquities. He was LL.D. of St Andrews (1862) and Cambridge (1874). He died in London, 27th Dec. 1885.

Birch, THOMAS, D.D. (1705-66), compiler of Lives of Boyle, Tillotson, Queen Elizabeth, Prince Henry, &c., was born at Clerkenwell, the son of a Quaker, but in 1730 took Anglican orders, and received half-a-dozen preferments. He was killed by a fall from his horse in the Hampstead Road.

Birch-Pfeiffer, CHARLOTTE (1800-68), actress, dramatist, and novelist, was born at Stuttgart; made her début at Munich at thirteen; in 1825 married Dr Christian Birch of Copenhagen; and died in Berlin.—Her daughter, Wilhelmine von Hillern, born at Munich, 11th March 1836, is the author of Die Geyer-Wally (1873; Eng. trans. Elsa and her Vulture, 1876) and other novels. [Beerh-h-P'fye'fer.]

Bird, EDWARD (1772-1819), genre painter, was born at Wolverhampton, as a lad ornamented tea-trays at Birmingham with flowers and shepherds, and then became a drawing-master in Bristol. In 1809 he sent to the Academy 'Good News'; and his 'Choristers Rehearsing' and 'The Will' having won him influential patrons, in 1812 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1815 an R.A. His masterpiece was 'Chevy Chase'.

Bird, FRANCIS (1667-1731), sculptor.

Bird, ISABELLA. See BISHOP.

Bird, JAMES (1788-1839), minor poet, was first a miller, then a stationer, at Yoxford, Suffolk.

Bird, ROBERT MONTGOMERY, M.D. (1805-54), was born at Newcastle, Delaware, and died at Philadelphia. Besides two successful tragedies, he wrote Calavar, a Mexican Romance (1834); Nick of the Woods (1837), and other novels.

Bird, WILLIAM (c. 1538-1623), composer, in 1563 became organist in Lincoln Cathedral; in 1575 he and Tallis were gentlemen of the Chapel Royal, and both were organists to Queen Elizabeth. Bird was the earliest English composer of madrigals; but his fame rests on the canon Non Nobis, Domine, still sung as the grace at almost every civic banquet.

Birkbeck, GEORGE, the founder of mechanics' institutes, was born at Settle, Yorkshire, in 1776; studied medicine at Leeds, Edinburgh, and London; in 1799, as professor of Natural Philosophy at Anderson's College, Glasgow, delivered his first free lectures to the working-classes; in 1804 became a physician in London; and died there, 1st December 1841. With Brougham, Bentham, Cobbett, &c., he took a leading part in the formation of the London Mechanics' or Birkbeck Institute (1824)—the first in the kingdom. He was chosen its president for life; in 1833-84 it was rebuilt on an adjoining site. See Life by Godard (1884). [Ber'bek.]

Birks, THOMAS RAWSON (1810-83), Evangelical divine, born at Staveley, Derbyshire, in 1834 came out second wrangler at Cambridge, and from 1866 to 1877 was vicar of Trinity Church there.

Birney, JAMES GILLESPIE (1792-1857), an American anti-slavery statesman.

Biron, the title of a family that has given several marshals to France. ARMAND DE GONTAUT, BARON DE (1524-92), fought against the Huguenots at Saint-Denis and Moncontour, but early joined and rendered great service to Henry IV. He was killed at the siege of Épernay. See his Correspondance (ed. by Barthélemy, 1874).—His son, CHARLES DE GONTAUT, DUC DE (1562-1602), by his valour gained the affection of Henry IV., and the nickname of 'Fulmen Gallie'; but being convicted of correspondence with Spain, he was beheaded in the Bastille.—ARMAND LOUIS DE GONTAUT, DUC DE (1753-94), fought with Lafayette in America, joined the Revolutionists in France, and defeated the Vendéans at Parthenay in 1793; but was guillotined. See his Mémoires (new ed. by Lacour, 1858), and the monograph by Maugras (trans. 1895). [Bee-ron''.]

Biron, ERNEST JOHN DE (1690-1772), Duke of Courland, was the son of one Bühren, a Courland proprietor. He gained the favour of Anna Ivanovna, Peter the Great's niece, who, on ascending the Russian throne in 1730, loaded him with honours. He assumed the name and arms of the French dukes De Biron, and soon swayed all Russia through his royal mistress. More than a thousand persons were executed by his orders, and far more sent into banishment; still by the strength of his character he introduced vigour into every branch of the public administration. On the death of the empress (28th October 1740), Biron assumed the regency, and acted with great moderation. A conspiracy was, however, formed, and, three weeks after, he was arrested and conveyed to Siberia. On Elizabeth's accession next year, he was recalled, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement.

Birrel, ROBERT, an Edinburgh burgess, who in 1532-1605 wrote an interesting Diary (1798).

Birrell, AUGUSTINE, born at Wavertree, Liverpool, 19th January 1850, the son of a Baptist minister, was educated at Amersham and Trinity Hall, Cambridge, was called to the bar (1875), in 1889 became Liberal M.P. for West Fife, as minister of education introduced the bill of 1906, and in 1907 became Irish secretary. He is author of Obiter Dicta (1884-87) and Res Judicatae; of books on Charlotte Brontë, Sir F. Lockwood, Hazlitt, and Marvell; and of valuable treatises on copyright and the duties of trustees, which do not fall under the category of 'travelling.'

Bischof, KARL GUSTAV (1792-1870), chemist and geologist, from 1822 professor at Bonn.

Bischoff, THEODOR LUDWIG WILHELM (1807-82), embryologist, was professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Heidelberg, Giessen, and Munich.

Biscop. See BENEDICT BISCOP.

Bishop, GEORGE (1785-1861), London wine-merchant and astronomer.

Bishop, SIR HENRY ROWLEY (1786-1855), composer, was born in London, and in 1806 was appointed composer of ballet music at the Opera. Among his 88 operatic entertainments were Guy Mannering, The Miller and his Men, and Maid Marian. The opera Aladdin (1826) was a failure. The famous glee, 'The Clough and Crow,' is his; many of our most popular songs, such as 'Should he upbraid,' 'Bid me discourse,' 'My pretty Jane,' are by him; and his, too, probably, is the setting of 'Home, Sweet Home' (see PAYNE). In 1810-24 he was director of the music at Covent Garden Theatre, in 1825-30 at Drury Lane, and for three years more at Vauxhall Gardens. In 1841-43 he was professor of Music at Edinburgh, from 1848 at Oxford. He was knighted in 1842, and made Mus.Doc. in 1853. His second wife, ANN RIVIÈRE (1814-84), a brilliant vocalist, eloped from him in 1839, and married a Mr Schulz.

Bishop, ISABELLA (née Bird; 1832-1904), born in Edinburgh, from 1854 onwards visited Canada and the United States, the Sandwich Islands, the Rocky Mountains, Yezo, Persia and Kurdistan, Tibet, and Corea, when the war of 1894 broke out. Among her books are The Englishwoman in America (1858), A Lady's Life on the Rocky Mountains (1879), Unbeaten Tracks in Japan (1880), The Golden Chersonese (1883), Persia and Kurdistan (1891), Korea (1898), and The Yang-Tse Valley (1899).

Bishop, JOHN (1665-1737), church composer, from 1695 organist at Winchester.

Bismarck-Schönhausen, OTTO EDUARD LEOPOLD, PRINCE VON, chancellor of the German empire, was born of an ancient family, 1st April 1815, at Schönhausen in Brandenburg, and studied law and agriculture at Göttingen, Berlin, and Greifswald. In 1847 he became known in the new Prussian parliament as an ultra-royalist, and opposed equally the constitutional demands of 1848 and the scheme of a German empire, as proposed by the Frankfort parliament of 1849. In 1851, as Prussian member of the resuscitated German diet of Frankfort, he resented the predominance of Austria, and demanded equal rights for Prussia. In 1859 he was sent as minister to St Petersburg, and in 1862 to Paris. Recalled the same year to take the foreign portfolio and the presidency of the cabinet, and not being able to pass the military reorganisation bill and the budget, he closed the chambers, announcing that the government would be obliged to do without them. For four years the army reorganisation went on, when the death of the king of Denmark (1863) re-opened the Sleswick-Holstein question, and excited a fever of national German feeling, which led to the defeat of Denmark by Austria and Prussia, and the annexation of the duchies. This again brought about the quarrel between Prussia and Austria and the 'seven weeks' war,' which ended in the humiliation of Austria at the battle of Königgratz (1866), and the reorganisation of Germany under the leadership of Prussia. Bismarck was throughout the guiding spirit, and, from being universally disliked, became the most popular man in Germany. The action of France in regard to the candidature of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern for the throne of Spain gave Bismarck the opportunity of carrying into action the intensified feeling of unity amongst Germans. During the war of 1870-71 Bismarck was the spokesman of Germany; he it was that in February 1871 dictated the terms of peace to France. Having been made a count in 1866, he was now created a prince and chancellor of the new German empire. After the peace of Frankfurt the sole aim of Bismarck's policy, domestic and foreign, was to consolidate the young empire and secure it, through political combinations, against attack from without. The long and bitter struggle with the Vatican, called the Kulturkampf, was a failure, the most oppressive of the anti-papal Falk or May laws being ultimately repealed. Otherwise, his domestic policy was marked by a reformed coinage, codification of law, nationalisation of the Prussian railways, repeated increase of the army, a protective tariff (1879), and various attempts to combat socialism and to establish government monopolies of tobacco, &c. In 1884 he inaugurated the career of Germany as a colonising power. To counteract Russia and France, he formed in 1879 the Austro-German Treaty of Alliance (published in 1888), which Italy joined in 1886; and he presided over the Berlin Congress in 1878. The phrase, 'man of blood and iron,' was used by the 'Iron Chancellor' in a speech in 1862. Bismarck's life was twice (in 1866 at Berlin, and in 1874 at Kissingen) attempted. Disapproving the policy of the Emperor William II., he resigned the chancellorship in March 1890, becoming Duke of Lauenburg. Long a caustic critic of imperial measures, he was reconciled to his sovereign in 1894. In 1895 Bismarck's 80th birthday was celebrated as a national event. He died at Friedrichsruh, 30th July 1898. See English Life by C. Lowe (2 vols. 1886; new ed. 1898); his Bismarck's Table-talk (1896); Binsch's Bismarck: Some Secret Pages of his History (1898); and the autobiographical Bismarck, the Man and the Statesman (trans. 2 vols. 1899).

Bismark, FRIEDRICH, GRAF VON (1783-1860), spent most of his life in the Wirtemberg army, but from 1804 to 1807 was in the English service. He wrote on cavalry tactics and organisation.

Bissen, WILHEM (1798-1868), a Danish sculptor, from 1850 director of the Academy of Arts, Copenhagen. See French Life by Plon (2d ed. 1871).

Bitzius, ALBERT ('Jeremias Gotthelf'), a popular Swiss author, betrayed by Ruskin, was born at Morat, in Freiburg canton, 4th October 1797; studied at Bern; and became in 1832 pastor of Lützelfluh, in Emmenthal, where he died, 22d October 1854. Of his masterly delineations of Swiss life the best are Käthli, die Grossmutter (1847); Uli, der Knecht (1841; tr. 1888), and its continuation, Uli, der Pächter (1849); and Erzählungen aus dem Volksleben der Schweiz (5 vols. 1852-55). See German works by Brockhaus (1876) and Schäfer (1888).

Bixio, GIROLAMO NINO (1821-70), an Italian merchant captain, one of Garibaldi's most trusted followers, was born at Chiavari near Genoa, and died of cholera in the East Indies. See Italian Lives by Guerzoni (2d ed. 1875) and Delvecchio (1887).

Bizet, GEORGES, composer, was born 25th October 1838 at Paris; studied at the Conservatoire under Halévy, and in Italy; and died of heart-disease, 3d June 1875. His Wagnerian Pêcheurs de Perles (1863) and La Jolie Fille de Perth (1867) had little success; but his music to Daudet's L'Arlésienne was popular, and Carmen (1875) was not more remarkable for its originality than for its success. See French Lives by Pigot (1889) and Bellaigue (1891). [Bee-zay'.]

Björnson, BJÖRNSTJERNE, Norwegian novelist and playwright, was born 8th December 1832 at Kvikne, in Østerdalen, where his father was pastor; was educated at Molde, Christiania, and Copenhagen; and since 1857 has alternated visits to Rome (1860-62) and Paris (1882-88) with theatrical management and newspaper editing at Bergen and Christiania, whilst constantly writing and taking an active part in politics as Home Ruler and Republican. As poet and novelist he stood till his death (26th April 1910) in the first rank of Scandinavians. Some of his songs are among the chief favourites of his countrymen; and his tales, which have been compared to the old sagas for their terse and vigorous diction, are strikingly vivid pictures of Norwegian peasant-life. Many of them have been translated into English since 1866—e.g. Arne, Synnöve Solbakken, The Fisher-maiden, In God's Way, and The Heritage of the Kurts. See Brandes, Björnson og Ibsen (Copenhagen, 1882). [Byurn-son.]

Björnstjerna, MAGNUS, COUNT (1779-1847), a Swedish Liberal statesman, ambassador to Great Britain (1823-46). [Byurnst'yer-na.]

Black, ADAM, an Edinburgh publisher, was born there, 20th February 1784, and died 24th January 1874, having been twice Lord Provost, and Liberal M.P. for the burgh (1856-65). The two enterprises which, above all else, gave position, fortune, and success to his firm, were the purchase of the Encyclopædia Britannica in 1827 after Constable's failure; and that of Scott's novels from Cadell's representatives in 1851 for £27,000. See Memoirs by Nicolson (1885).

Black, JOHN, editor of the Morning Chronicle from 1817 to 1843, was born of humble parentage near Duns, Berwickshire, in 1783, and died at Snodland, Kent, 15th June 1855. His paper was celebrated for its independence and fearless advocacy of progress—a fearlessness which led to his duel with Roebuck in 1835. Dickens was one of his reporters and contributors, and James Mill helped him with almost daily advice. He wrote a Life of Tasso (1810), and translated German, French, and Italian works.

Black, JOSEPH (1728-99), chemist, was born, a Scoto-Irish wine-merchant's son, at Bordeaux, and educated at Belfast, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. In his famous M.D. thesis (1754) he showed that the causticity of lime and the alkalis is due to the absence of the 'fixed air' or carbonic acid present in limestone and the carbonates of the alkalis. On Cullen's removal in 1756 to Edinburgh, Black succeeded him as professor of Anatomy and Chemistry in Glasgow, but soon after exchanged duties with the professor of the Institutes of Medicine, practising also as a physician. Between 1756 and 1761 he evolved that theory of 'latent heat' on which his scientific fame chiefly rests. In 1766 he succeeded Cullen in the chair of Medicine and Chemistry in Edinburgh, and henceforward devoted himself to lecturing. See Prof. Robison's preface to Black's Lectures (2 vols. 1803).

Black, WILLIAM, novelist, born in Glasgow, 13th Nov. 1841, studied art with the view of becoming a landscape-painter. Instead, however, he adopted journalism, having written for the Glasgow Weekly Citizen prior to his removal to London in 1864. During the Prusso-Austrian war of 1866 he was war correspondent for the Morning Star; and in a novel, Love or Marriage (1868), he utilised some of his experiences. In Silk Attire (1869) and Kilmenny (1870) were fairly successful; but it was A Daughter of Heth (1871) that established his reputation. Later novels were The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton (1872); A Princess of Thule (1873), best perhaps of all his many romances; Madcap Violet (1876), Macleod of Dare (1878), Briseis (1896), Wild Eelin (1898), &c. In 1870-74 he was assistant-editor of the Daily News; and he died at Brighton, 10th Dec. 1898. See his Life by Sir Wemyss Reid (1902).

Blackadder, JOHN (1615-86), the Covenanted minister of Troqueer near Dumfries, died a prisoner on the Bass Rock. See Memoirs (1823). His fifth son, John (1664-1729), was colonel of the Cameronians. See his Life and Diary (1824).

Blackburn, HENRY (1830-97), art-critic, traveller, &c., was born at Portsea.

Blackburne, FRANCIS, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was born at Great Footstown, County Meath, 11th November 1782, and in 1798 entered Trinity College, Dublin. Called to the English bar in 1805, to the Irish in 1822, he was appointed Attorney-general for Ireland in 1830 and again in 1841, Master of the Rolls in 1842, Chief-justice of the Queen's Bench in 1846, and Lord Chancellor of Ireland in 1852 and 1866. He died 17th September 1867. See Life by his son (1874).

Blackburne, LANCELOT (1658-1743), in 1717 became Bishop of Exeter, and in 1724 Archbishop of York, having previously, according to his enemies, been chaplain on a buccaneer.

Black Hawk (1767-1838), a famous chief of the Sac and Fox Indians, who joined the British in 1812, and opposing the removal west of his tribe, fought against the United States in 1831-32. See Lives by Patterson (1834) and Snelling.

Blackie, JOHN STUART, a versatile writer, born in Glasgow of Kello ancestry, 28th July 1809, was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and during 1829-30 studied at Göttingen, Berlin, and Rome. In 1834 he published a good metrical translation of Goethe's Faust, and passed as advocate at the Edinburgh bar. He soon, however, began to make himself known by magazine articles on German subjects, and from 1841 to 1852 was professor of Humanity in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and then of Greek at Edinburgh till 1882. He took an active part in educational reform, and in the movement that led in 1859 to the remodelling of the Scottish universities. He always figured as the champion of Scottish nationality, and advocated with ardour the preservation of the Gaelic language. During 1874-76 he promoted throughout the country with great enthusiasm the foundation of a Celtic chair in Edinburgh University, and raised over £12,000 for its endowment. He published a fine metrical translation of Æschylus in 1850, and one of the Niad in ballad metre in 1866, as well as several volumes of verse. His prose works embrace moral and religious philosophy, the method of history, the land laws, Self Culture (1873), Horæ Hellenicæ (1874), a short life of Burns, &c. He died in Edinburgh, 2d March 1895. See Life by Miss Stoddart (2 vols. 1895), and the shorter Sketch by his nephew (1895).

Blacklock, THOMAS, D.D. (1721-91), the blind poet, was born of humble parentage at Annan, and lost his sight through smallpox before he was six months old. Educated at Edinburgh, he was minister of Kirkecudbright (1762-64), and then took pupils to board with him in Edinburgh till his death. It was a letter of his that arrested Burns on the eve of his departure for the West Indies. The first volume of his own poor poems appeared in 1746; and a collected edition in 1793.

Blackmore, SIR RICHARD, poetaster, was born at Corsham, Wilts, and educated at Westminster and Oxford, taking his B.A. in 1674. First a schoolmaster, then a London physician (1687-1722), he was knighted in 1697, and died at Boxted, Essex, in 1729. He wrote six epics in sixty books (all on the loftiest themes), besides versions of various books of the Bible, theological and medical treatises, and a poem, Creation.

Blackmore, RICHARD DODDRIDGE (1825-1900), novelist, was born at Longworth, Berkshire, and educated at Blundell's School (Tiverton) and Exeter College, Oxford. He graduated in 1847, afterwards studied law, was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1852, and practised for a time as a conveyancer. Poems by Melanther (1854) was the first of several volumes of verse; of his novels the earliest were Clara Vaughan (1864) and Cradock Nowell (1866), but his first distinct success was Lorna Doone, a Romance of Esmoor (1869), which reached a 38th edition in 1893. Blackmore's other novels, several of which reveal his love of gardening, are The Maid of Sker (1872), perhaps his second-best story; Alice Lorraine (1875); Cripps the Carrier (1876); Erema (1877); Mary Anerley (1880); Christowell, a Dartmoor Tale (1882); Tommy Upmore (1884); Springhaven (1887); Perlycross (1894); and Darrel (1897).

Black Prince. See EDWARD.

Blackstone, SIR WILLIAM, jurist, was the posthumous son of a London silk-mercator, and was born there 10th July 1723. In 1738 he obtained a scholarship from the Charterhouse to Pembroke College, Oxford; in 1741 entered the Inner Temple; in 1744 was elected a fellow of All Souls'; and in 1746 was called to the bar, but failed to attract either notice or practice. In 1749 he succeeded an uncle as recorder of Wallingford, Berkshire; and in 1753 he delivered lectures at Oxford on the law of England. In 1758, a Mr Viner having left £12,000 to endow a chair of English Law at Oxford, Blackstone was appointed first Vinerian professor. Next year he returned to Westminster; and as the doctrines which he taught had commended him to the Tory government, he was made a king's counsel in 1761. Member for Hindon, in Wiltshire, and principal of New Inn Hall, Oxford, he was in 1763 made solicitor-general to the queen. In 1765-69 he published his lectures, the celebrated Commentaries on the Laws of England, which brought him in £14,000. His practice increasing, he resigned in 1766 his Oxford appointments. In 1770 he declined the solicitor-generalship, and, having been knighted, was made a justice of the Court of Common Pleas. He died 14th February 1780, and was buried at Wallingford.

Blackwell, ALEXANDER, adventurer, seems to have been born in Aberdeen soon after 1700, and to have been a younger son of the Rev. Thomas Blackwell (1660-1728), principal of Marischal College. He may, or may not, have studied medicine under Boerhaave at Leyden; anyhow, about 1730, he was a printer in London, and becoming bankrupt in 1734, was supported in prison by his wife, who published a Herbal (2 vols. folio, 1737-39) with 500 cuts, drawn, engraved, and coloured by herself, her husband adding their Latin names and a brief description of each. Next, in 1742, Blackwell turns up in Sweden, where, having cured the king of an illness, he was appointed a royal physician, and undertook the management of a model farm. While still in the full enjoyment of court favour, he was charged with complicity in a plot against the constitution, and after being put to the torture, was beheaded, August 9, 1747, protesting his innocence to the last.

Blackwell, ELIZABETH, the first woman that obtained a medical diploma in the United States, was born at Bristol, February 3, 1821. Her father emigrated to the States in 1832, and died six years later, leaving a widow and nine children. Elizabeth helped to support the family by teaching, devoting her leisure to the study of medical books. After fruitless applications for admission to various medical schools, she entered that of Geneva, in New York State, and graduated in 1849. She next visited Europe, and after much difficulty was admitted into the Maternité hospital at Paris, and St Bartholomew's Hospital in London. In 1851 she returned to New York, and there established herself in a successful practice; after 1868 she lived in England till her death in June 1910. See her autobiography (1896).

Blackwell, GEORGE (c. 1545-1613), from Oxford passed in 1574 to Douay, and from 1598 to 1608 was archpriest over the secular clergy of England and Scotland. He died in a Southwark gaol.

Blackwell, THOMAS (1701-56), scholar, a brother most likely of Alexander Blackwell (q.v.), in 1723 was appointed professor of Greek in Marischal College, and in 1748 its principal. He was author of Life and Writings of Homer (1735), Memoirs of the Court of Augustus (3 vols. 1752-64), &c.

Blackwood, ADAM (1539-1613), an adversary of Buchanan and champion of Queen Mary, was born at Dunfermline, and lived mostly at Poitiers.

Blackwood, WILLIAM (1776-1834), Edinburgh publisher, established himself as a bookseller—principally of old books—in 1804, and in 1817 started Blackwood's Magazine, of which he was the chief manager, with Wilson ('Christopher North'), Lockhart, Hogg, &c. for contributors. His place was filled during 1834-52 by his sons, Alexander and Robert, and then by John (1818-79). 'George Eliot's' novels were all but one issued licence. See Annals of a Publishing House, by Mrs Oliphant and Mrs Gerald Porter (3 vols. 1897-98).

Blades, WILLIAM (1824-27th April 1890), a London printer, born at Clapham, was the author of the Life of Caxton (3 vols. 1861-63), The Penitence of Printing (1891, with memoir), &c.

Blaeu (spelt also Blaeuw and Blaww, Lat. Casius), WILLEM JANSZON, a Dutch map-drawer and printer, was born at Alkmaar in 1571, and died in 1638.—His son, JAN (died 1673), commenced business on his own account at Amsterdam in 1637, but afterwards entered into partnership with his brother, Cornelis (died 1650). His Atlas Major, in 11 volumes, is extremely valuable from the light the maps throw on local history. The volume on Scotland contains forty-nine maps, prepared by Timothy Pont (q.v.), and local details by Sir John Scott. Jan further published topographical plates and views of towns. Two of his sons carried on the business until 1700. [Blaa-ee.]

Blaine, JAMES GILLESPIE, journalist and statesman, born at West Brownsville, Penn., 31st Jan. 1830, and died in New York, Jan. 27, 1893. He was defeated in the Republican nominations for the presidency in 1876, 1880, 1884, and 1892.

Blainville, HENRI MARIE DUCROTAY DE (1778-1850), zoologist and anatomist, Cuvier's successor in 1832 as professor of Comparative Anatomy in the Museum of Natural History. [Blan^g-veel.]

Blair, HUGH, born at Edinburgh 7th April 1718, in 1730 entered the university, and in 1741 was licensed as a preacher. After occupying the churches of Collesie in Fife, Canongate, and Lady Yester's, he was promoted in 1758 to one of the charges of the High Church, Edinburgh. In 1759 he commenced a series of university lectures on Composition; and in 1762 he was appointed to a new regius chair of Rhetoric and Belles-lettres, with a salary of £70 a year. He resigned this post in 1783, and published his Lectures, which obtained a reputation far beyond their merits, and one that time has by no means confirmed. His Sermons (1777) enjoyed the approval not only of Dr Johnson, but of George III., who bestowed on Blair in 1780 a pension of £200 a year. Blair died December 27, 1800.

Blair, JOHN (d. 1782), compiler of a well-known Chronology (1754), was a Scotsman, but held several English incumbencies.

Blair, ROBERT, author of The Grave, was born in 1699 at Edinburgh, where his father was a clergyman. There and in Holland he was educated for the church, and in 1731 was ordained minister of Athelstaneford, Haddingtonshire, where he lived in easy circumstances till his death, 4th February 1746. He gave much attention to natural science, particularly botany. In 1742 he submitted to Watts and Doddridge the MS. of his poem, which Watts offered to two publishers. They thought it too heavy for the times, and it did not appear till 1743. It speedily attained an honoured place, and in William Blake (1808) it found a congenial illustrator. Blair was succeeded in his ministerial charge by Home, the author of Douglas. His third son, Robert Blair, of Avontoun (1741-1811), became Lord President of the Court of Session.

Blair, ROBERT, improver of the telescope, from 1785 till his death in 1828 held the sinecure professorship of Astronomy at Edinburgh.

Blaize. See BLASUIS.

Blake, ROBERT, next to Nelson the greatest of English admirals, was born at Bridgwater in August 1599, the eldest of a merchant's twelve sons. From Bridgwater grammar-school he passed in 1615 to St Alban Hall and Wadham College, Oxford, where he remained till 1625. He seems next to have continued his father's business, but may from time to time have made voyages to distant seas. Returned for Bridgwater in 1640 to the Short Parliament, he cast in his lot unhesitatingly with the parliamentarians, but did not become a member of the Long Parliament till 1645. An ardent Republican, and a man of blunt manners, devoid of fear, and of inflexible character, he was much respected by Cromwell, but they never became very intimate. He served under Popham in Somerset, and attracted notice at the siege of Bristol and by his obstinate defence of Lyme in 1644 against Prince Maurice. His defence of Taunton for nearly a year against overwhelming odds proved a turning-point in the war. In 1640 he was appointed with two others to command the fleet, then in a state of disaffection and weakness. Before two years he had blockaded Lisbon, destroyed the squadron of Prince Rupert, and forced the royalists to surrender the Scilly Isles and Jersey, their last stronghold. Early in 1652 began the struggle with the Dutch for the supremacy of the seas, and Blake found himself pitted against Van Tromp, De Ruyter, and De Witt. In the first engagement on 19th May, Van Tromp retreated under cover of darkness with the loss of two ships. On 28th September Blake gave battle to De Ruyter and De Witt off the mouth of the Thames; the fight ended with the flight of the Dutch next day. On 29th November eighty vessels under Van Tromp encountered Blake with scarcely forty off the Goodwin Sands. After a two days' hotly contested fight, victory remained with the Dutch. Blake lost six ships, but brought the remainder in a shattered state into safety. In February 1653 he was again at sea with nearly eighty ships; and on the 18th Van Tromp was sighted near Portland with about an equal force. In the long running fight from Portland to Calais, Blake was severely wounded, but gained a complete victory, sinking five ships and capturing four, as well as some thirty merchantmen. His ill-health prevented him from taking part in the engagement of 31st July, which finally shattered the naval supremacy of Holland. In 1654 he made the English flag respected in the Mediterranean; in 1655 he sailed under the guns of Tunis, a nest of pirates, and burned nine ships. The terrified dey of Algiers submitted to his terms; and in September, Stayner, one of his lieutenants, fell in with the Plate fleet and captured it—a loss to Spain of nearly two millions in treasure alone. But the crowning exploit of Blake's career was his last. Hearing in April 1657 that a fleet from America had arrived off Tenerife, he at once sailed thither, and on the 20th arrived in the bay where sixteen ships were lying at anchor. Before night he completely destroyed the fleet and the town of Santa Cruz, and drew off with a loss of 50 slain and 120 wounded; then, his health failing fast, he returned homewards to die just as his ship entered Plymouth Harbour, 7th August 1657. Cromwell buried him in Westminster Abbey, whence the body was ousted at the Restoration. See HANNAY'S Admiral Blake (1886).

Blake, WILLIAM, engraver, painter, and poet, was born in London 28th November 1757, the son of a hosier, said to be of Irish extraction. In 1771 he was apprenticed to James Basire, the engraver; and, after studying in the Antique School of the Royal Academy, he began to produce water-colour figure-subjects, and to engrave illustrations for the magazines. His first picture exhibited in the Royal Academy was 'The Death of Earl Godwin' (1780). His first book of poems, the Poetical Sketches by W. B. (1783), is full of exquisitely spontaneous lyrical power. This, the Songs of Innocence (1789), and the Songs of Experience (1794) include the finest examples of Blake's poetry; but those who admire him as 'the greatest mystic poet of the western world' set great store by the so-called 'Prophectical Books'—the Book of Thel (1789), the Marriage of Heaven and Hell (1791), the French Revolution (1791), the Song of Los (1795), Vala, and many others, which mostly have imaginative designs interwoven with their text, printed from copper treated by a peculiar process, and coloured by his own or his wife's hand. Among his designs of poetic and imaginative figure-subjects are a superb series of 537 coloured illustrations to Young's Night Thoughts (1797) and 12 to Blair's Grave (1808). Among the most important of his paintings (in a kind of tempera) is 'The Canterbury Pilgrims,' which the artist himself engraved; 'The Spiritual Form of Pitt guiding Behemoth' (now in the National Gallery); 'Jacob's Dream;' and 'The Last Judgment.' Blake's finest artistic work is to be found in the 21 'Illustrations to the Book of Job,' published in 1826, when he was verging upon seventy, but unequalled in modern religious art for imaginative force and visionary power. At his death Blake was employed on the illustrations to Dante. He is also known as a wood-engraver by cuts in Thornton's Virgil, rude in execution, but full of the very spirit of idyllic poetry. During his life Blake met with little encouragement from the public; but Hayley, Flaxman, and Samuel Palmer were faithful friends, and by John Linnell's generosity Blake was in his last days saved from pecuniary anxiety. And all through his life he was upheld by the most real and vivid faith in the unseen, guided and encouraged—as he believed—by perpetual visitations from the spiritual world. He died in London, 12th August 1827. See Swinburne's essay (1868), the Lives by Gilchrist (2d ed. 1880) and Story (1893), Ellis and Yeats's edition of his works (3 vols. 1893), and B. de Selincourt's William Blake (1909).

Blakesley, JOSEPH WILLIAMS (1808-85), from 1872 Dean of Lincoln.

Blakey, ROBERT (1795-1878), born at Morpeth, in 1848 became professor of Logic and Metaphysics in Queen's College, Belfast. Four of sixteen works by him are on angling. See Memoirs (1879).

Blamire, SUSANNA (1747-95), a Cumberland poetess, whose poems were collected in 1842.

Blanc, JEAN JOSEPH LOUIS, French Socialist and historian, was born 29th October 1811 at Madrid, where his father was inspector-general of finance under Joseph Bonaparte. In 1830 he came to study in Paris, then for two years was a private tutor at Arras, and in 1834 returned to Paris, where in 1839 he founded the Revue du Progrès. Here appeared his chief work on Socialism, the Organisation du Travail, which in book-form (1840) obtained for him a wide popularity among the French workmen, captivated by the brilliancy of the writing and the simplicity of the scheme advocated. The book denounces the principle of competitive industry, and proposes the establishment of co-operative workshops, subsidised by the state. Next, in 1841-44, Blanc published his Histoire des Dix Ans 1830-40, which had a deadly effect on the Orleans dynasty; Louis-Philippe declared afterwards that 'it acted like a battering-ram against the bulwarks of loyalty in France.' This was followed by vol. i. of a Histoire de la Révolution Française; and this by the revolution of February 1848, when Blanc was appointed a member of the Provisional Government, and placed at the head of the commission for discussing the problem of labour. But accused without reason of a share in the disturbances of the summer of 1848, he escaped to London, where he finished his Histoire de la Révolution, and wrote much for the French journals—a selection therefrom his bright Lettres sur l'Angleterre. On the fall of the Empire, Blanc returned to France, and was elected in 1871 to the National Assembly, in 1876 to the Chamber of Deputies, in both voting and acting with the extreme Left. He died at Cannes, 6th December 1882. [Blon']

Blanchard, EDWARD LAMAN, journalist, pantomime-writer, &c., a son of William Blanchard (1769-1835), the comedian, was born in London, 11th Dec. 1820, and died there, 4th Sept. 1889. See Life by Clement Scott (2 vols. 1891).

Blanchard, LAMAN, born at Yarmouth, 15th May 1804, became a journalist in London in 1831, and died by his own hand, 15th February 1845. He was a popular writer of light literature. His prose essays were collected in 1846 as Sketches of Life, and his poetry in 1876.

Blanche, AUGUST (1811-68), a Swedish dramatist and novelist. See Life by Erdmann (1893).

Blandrata, or BIANDRATA, GIORGIO (c. 1515-90), the founder of Unitarianism in Poland and Transylvania, was nobly born at Saluzzo, Piedmont. The freedom of his religious opinions compelled him to flee to Geneva in 1556, whence in 1558 Calvin's displeasure at his anti-trinitarianism drove him to Poland. Finally, in 1563, he betook himself to the court of John Sigismund, Prince of Transylvania, whose favourite physician he became. He was strangled, it was said, by his nephew as he slept. [Blan-dráht'a.]

Blandy, MARY, the 'unfortunate Miss Blandy,' for poisoning her father, a lawyer of Henley-on-Thames, was hanged at Oxford, 6th April 1752.

Blane, SIR GILBERT (1749-1834), physician, was born at Blanefield, Ayrshire, studied at Edinburgh University, and in 1779 sailed with Rodney to the West Indies. In 1783 he was elected physician to St Thomas's Hospital, London. As head of the Navy Medical Board, he was instrumental in introducing the use of lemon-juice on board ship. In 1812 he was made a baronet.

Blanqui, JÉRÔME ADOLPHE, economist, was born at Nice, 21st November 1798; studied philology and political economy at Paris; and in 1833 became a professor in the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, and one of the editors of the Dictionnaire de l'Industrie. In 1838 he was elected a member of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. He died at Paris, 28th January 1854. Blanqui was a follower of Say, and in favour of free trade. His chief work is the Histoire de l'Économie Politique en Europe (1838).—His brother, LOUIS AUGUSTE BLANQUI, was born at Puget-Théniers (Alpes Maritimes), 7th February 1805, and made himself conspicuous by his passionate advocacy of the most extreme political opinions. He was one of the foremost fighters in all the French revolutions of the century, and for his share in the Commune was sentenced (1872) to transportation to New Caledonia, a sentence commuted to life imprisonment, from which he was released in 1879. He died 1st January 1881, having spent thirty-seven years of his life in prison. [Blon^g-kee.]

Blasius, ST. Bishop of Sebaste, Cappadocia, suffered martyrdom in 316. The wool-combers claim him as their patron.

Blass, FRIEDRICH (1843-1907), greatest Greek scholar of his time, was professor at Halle from 1892 till his death.

Blavatsky, HELENA PETROVNA (1831-91), a Russian charlatan, who, as the high-priestess of 'Theosophy,' made many dupes in India and England. See works by Solov'yoff (Eng. trans. 1895) and Lillie (1895).

Blaze de Bury, HENRI (1813-88), a French writer, largely on German subjects.—His wife, MARIE PAULINE ROSE STUART (1814-94), born at Oban, but brought up from nine in France, also wrote much in French and English.

Bleek, FRIEDRICH (1793-1859), biblical critic, born at Ahrensök in Holstein, studied theology first at Kiel and Berlin, where he was appointed in 1818 a university tutor, and in 1823 an extraordinary professor of Theology. In 1829 he was called to Bonn. His chief work was his commentary on Hebrews.—His son, WILHELM BLEEK (1827-75), writer on South African philology, studied at Bonn and Berlin, went out with Bishop Colenso to Natal in 1855, and after eighteen months' study of the Kaffirs, settled at Cape Town, where in 1861 he was appointed keeper of the Grey Library. [Blayk.]

Blenker, LUDWIG (1812-63), a Federal general, who was born at Worms, and fled to the United States after the revolution of 1849.

Blessington, MARGUERITE, COUNTESS OF, was born September 1, 1789, at Knockbrit, near Clonmel, and at fourteen was forced into marrying a worthless Captain Farmer. She quitted him in three months' time, and in 1818, shortly after his death, married the Earl of Blessington. With him in 1822 she set out on a long tour on the Continent, where, as well as in London, she gathered around her all the most distinguished men of the time. In Genoa she formed an intellectual friendship with Lord Byron; afterwards she resided in Paris, until the death of her husband in 1829. He left her a large fortune; and she held a little court at her Kensington mansion, Gore House. Her connection with Count d'Orsay (q.v.), which dated from 1822, placed her in an equivocal position, and her lavish expenditure overwhelmed her in debt, though for nearly twenty years she was making an extra income of over £2000 per annum as author of a dozen most trashy novels, The Idler in France, The Idler in Italy, and Conversations with Lord Byron (1834; new ed. 1894). At length in April 1849 she and D'Orsay had to flee to Paris, where on 4th June she died of apoplexy. See Lives by Madden (3 vols. 1855) and Molloy (1896).

Blicher, STEEN STEENSEN (1782-1848), Danish poet and novelist. See Life by Kristensen and Lund (Copen. 1882). [Bleeh-her.]

Bligh, WILLIAM, born in Cornwall about 1753, sailed under Captain Cook in his second voyage round the world (1772-74), and in 1787 was sent as commander of the Bounty to Tahiti to collect plants of the bread-fruit tree with a view to acclimatisation in the West Indies. During their six months' stay on the island, his men had become completely demoralised, and in a few weeks mutinied under the harsh treatment of their commander. On 28th April 1789, Bligh, with eighteen men, was cast adrift in an open boat but 23 feet long, with a small stock of provisions, and without a chart; while the mutineers returned to Tahiti, and ultimately settled on Pitcairn Island. After almost incredible hardship, Bligh arrived at Timor, near Java, on 14th June, having sailed his frail craft for 3618 miles. 'Bread-fruit Bligh' was again sent out to collect bread-fruit plants, and in 1805 was appointed governor of New South Wales. Here, too, his conduct was so overbearing that in 1808 he was arrested, and kept in prison for two years. The officer who arrested him was tried in England and cashiered. After Bligh's return to England he was promoted admiral in 1811. He died in London, 7th December 1817.

Blind, KARL, born at Mannheim, 4th September 1826, studied law at Heidelberg. For his share in the risings in South Germany in 1848 he was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment, but while being taken to Mainz was liberated by the populace, and from 1852 found a home in England. He died 21st May 1907. He wrote on politics, history, mythology, and folklore, besides lives of Ledru-Rollin, Deak, Freiligrath.—His step-daughter, MATHILDE 'BLIND' (born 21st March 1847; died 26th Nov. 1896), was educated in Brussels, London, and Zurich. A champion of woman's rights, from 1867 she published poems (Selections, 1899), biographies, &c. [Blinnt.]

Bliss, PHILIP (1787-1857), editor of A Wood and Hearn, was registrar of Oxford University.

Bloch, JEAN DE (1836-1902), a Polish Jew of poor parentage, made a fortune in Russian railways, sought to reconcile Russian and Polish interests, and wrote to prove that war under modern conditions must become impossible.

Block, MAURICE (1816-1901), political economist, was born at Berlin of Jewish parentage, settled in Paris, and in 1880 he was elected to the Academy.

Bloemaert, ABRAHAM (1564-1651), a Dutch painter, father of the copper-engraver, CORNELIUS BLOEMAERT (1608-88). [Bloo-mahrt.]

Blomefield, FRANCIS, author of the History of Norfolk (5 vols. 1739-75; new ed. 11 vols. 1805-10), was born at Fersfield, 23d July, 1705, became rector of Hargham and Fersfield, and afterwards of Brockdish, and died in London of smallpox, 16th January 1752. [Bloom'fid.]

Blomfield, CHARLES JAMES (1786-1857), Bishop of London, was born at Bury St Edmunds, where his father was schoolmaster. Thence he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow; and taking orders in 1810, he became incumbent of St Botolph, London (1819), Archdeacon of Colchester (1822), and Bishop of Chester (1824), of London (1828). Blomfield's reputation for classical scholarship rests on his editions of Æschylus, Callimachus, Euripides, &c. See Life by his son (2 vols. 1863).—The fourth son, SIR ARTHUR WILLIAM BLOMFIELD, architect, was born at Fulham Palace, 6th March 1829, from Rugby passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1888 became an A.R.A., in 1889 was knighted, and died in 1899. [Bloom'fid.]

Blommaert, PHILIP (1809-71), author, with Conscience a reviver of the Flemish tongue, was born and died at Ghent. [Blom-mahrt.]

Blondel, a minstrel, who is said to have accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion to Palestine, and in 1193 to have found him out in the Austrian prison of Dürrenstein. The poems that have come down to us under the name of one Blondel of Nesle in Picardy are poor and uninteresting; they were edited by Tarbé (Rheims, 1862).

Blondel, DAVID (1591-1655), a Protestant theologian, author of Pseudo-Isidorus et Turrianus Vapulantes (Gen. 1628), &c.

Blondin, CHARLES (really Jean François Gravelet), rope-dancer, was born at Hesdin, near Calais, 28th February 1824, and trained at Lyons. After a four years' tour of the United States, on 30th June 1859, before 50,000 persons, he crossed Niagara on a tight-rope; on 4th July he crossed blindfold, trundling a wheelbarrow; on 19th August he carried a man on his back; on 14th September 1860 he crossed on stilts in the presence of the Prince of Wales. His engagement at the Crystal Palace in 1862, where he performed on a rope 249 yards long, and 170 feet from the ground, drew immense crowds. He died at Ealing, 10th February 1897.

Blood, THOMAS, adventurer, was born in Ireland about 1618, and in the Great Rebellion sided with the parliament. Deprived of his estate at the Restoration, he put himself in 1663 at the head of a plot to seize Dublin Castle and Ormonde, the lord-lieutenant. On its discovery his chief accomplices were executed; but he himself escaped to Holland. He soon found his way back to England, and thence proceeding to Scotland, fought for the Covenant at Rullion Green (1666). On the night of 6th December 1670, he seized the Duke of Ormonde in his coach, and attempted to hang him at Tyburn; on 9th May 1671, disguised as a clergyman, with three accomplices he entered the Tower, determined to carry off the regalia. After nearly murdering the keeper of the jewels, he actually succeeded in getting off with the crown, while one of his associates bore away the orb. They were pursued, however, and seized; but at the instigation of Buckingham, who was accused of having hired Blood to attack Ormonde, King Charles visited the miscreant in prison, pardoned him, took him to court, and restored him his estate of £500 a year. For several years Colonel Blood was an influential medium of royal patronage, until, quarrelling with Buckingham, he was committed by the King's Bench. He was bailed out, but died on 24th August 1680. See Secombe's Lives of Twelve Bad Men (1894).

Bloomer, AMELIA JENKS (1818-94), champion (1849) of women's right to wear the breeches, was born at Homer, New York, and in 1840 married a lawyer.

Bloomfield, ROBERT, author of The Farmer's Boy, was born 3d December 1766 at Honington, near Bury St Edmunds. The son of a poor tailor, he was sent at fifteen to learn shoemaking in London, where he married most foolishly in 1790, and wrote his Farmer's Boy in a garret. Through Capel Lofft it was published in 1800, and achieved extraordinary popularity. The Duke of Grafton gave a small allowance to Bloomfield, who made Æolian harps, wrote poetry, and embarked in the book-trade, but failed. Latterly he became hypochondriac and half blind, and he died in poverty at Shefford, Bedfordshire, 19th August 1823. See his Remains (1824); and Hart's selections from his Correspondence (1871).

Blore, EDWARD, a reviver of Gothic architecture, was born at Derby, 13th September 1787, the son of Thomas Blore (1764-1818), the topographer, and died in London, 4th September 1879.

Blouët, PAUL ('Max O'Rell'; 1848-1903), born in Brittany, was educated in Paris; served in the Franco-German war and against the Commune, being severely wounded; in 1873 came to England as a newspaper correspondent; was French master at St Paul's School (1876-84); and since 1887 has lectured and acted in the United Kingdom, United States, and colonies. He is author of John Bull and his Island (1883), The Dear Neighbours (1886), A Frenchman in America (1891), John Bull & Co. (1894), &c. [Blue-ay.]

Blount, CHARLES (1654-93), deist, was born at Upper Holloway, London, the son of Sir Henry Blount (1602-82), traveller in the Levant. He became noted for his contributions (often flip-pant) to the political, literary, and theological controversies of the times. Despairing of marriage with his deceased wife's sister, he died by his own hand. [Blunt.]

Blount, MARTHA (1690-1762), the friend of Pope from 1710 or earlier until his death in 1744.

Blount, THOMAS (1618-79), was called to the bar, but lived and died a country gentleman at Orleton, Herefordshire. A zealous Catholic, he was author of some sixteen works, the best known being Ancient Tenures and Jocular Customs of some Manors (1679; new ed. 1815).

Blow, JOHN (c. 1648-1708), composer, became organist of Westminster Abbey in 1669, and of the Chapel Royal in 1676. For the stage he wrote a masque, Venus and Adonis, and he was author of many birthday, New Year, and St Cecilia odes, about one hundred anthems, and fourteen services. His contemporaries thought him the greatest organist in the world.

Blowitz, HENRI GEORGES ADOLPHE OFFER DE (1825-1903), in 1871-1902 Paris correspondent of the Times, and originator of the 'Interview,' was born of Jewish ancestry at Blowitz in Bohemia, and during 1849-60 was a German teacher in various French schools.

Blücher, GEBHARD LEBERECHT VON, Prince of Wahlstadt, Field-marshal of Prussia, was born at Rostock, in Mecklenburg, December 16, 1742. After two years in the Swedish service, he distinguished himself in the Prussian cavalry, but retired from the service in disgust at troubles brought about by his own dissipation and insubordination, and for 15 years farmed his own estates. In 1793 he fought, as colonel of hussars, against the French on the Rhine, and in 1806, as lieutenant-general, at Auerstädt, and was distinguished, though not successful, at Lübeck, Stralsund, and elsewhere. When the Prussians rose against France in 1813, Blücher took chief command in Silesia, and at the battles of Lützen, Bautzen, Haynau, displayed heroic courage. At the Katzbach he cleared Silesia of the enemy; at Leipzig he won very important successes; in January 1814 he crossed the Rhine, and, though once routed by Napoleon, gained several battles, and, on 31st March, entered the French capital. In England, whither he followed the Allied Sovereigns, he received the freedom of the city of London, and Oxford made him D.C.L. After Napoleon's return in 1815, Blücher assumed the general command, suffered a severe defeat at Ligny, but completed Wellington's victory at the battle of Waterloo by his timely appearance on the field, and his Prussians pursued the fleeing enemy all through the night. On the second taking of Paris, Blücher manifested a strong desire to retaliate on Paris the spoliation that other capitals had suffered. He died September 12, 1819, at his estate of Krieblowitz, in Silesia, presented to him by the king. 'Marshal Forwards' was not a great tactician, his victories being due mainly to dash and energy; in speech and behaviour he was rough and uncultivated. See Lives by Förster (1821), Scherr (1865), and Blasendorff (1887). [Ger. nearly Blee-her.]

Blum, ROBERT, born in very humble circumstances at Cologne in 1807, was secretary and treasurer of a theatre at Cologne, and subsequently at Leipzig, until 1847, when he established himself as bookseller and publisher. His leisure was devoted to literature and politics, and when the revolutionary movement broke out in 1848, Blum was one of its most energetic leaders. Joining the Vienna insurgents, to whom he was bearer of a congratulatory address, he was arrested, and shot on 9th November. See Life by his son (Leip. 1878). [Bloom.]

Blumenbach, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, naturalist, was born at Gotha, 11th May 1752, studied at Jena and Göttingen, and at Göttingen became extra-ordinary professor in 1776, ordinary professor in 1778. Here he lectured till 1835 on natural history, comparative anatomy, physiology, and the history of medicine. He died 22d January 1840. Among his works were Institutiones Physiologicae (1787), Handbuch der Naturgeschichte (1780; 12th ed. 1830), Handbuch der Vergleichenden Anatomie und Physiologie (1804), and Collectio Cranium Diversarum Gentium (1790-1828). See Memoir by Marx (1840), and Göttinger Professoren (1872).

Blumenthal, JACQUES (1829-1908), pianist, born at Hamburg, studied under Herz, and in 1849 came to London. There he was appointed pianist to the Queen, taught music, and composed many brilliant, pretty pieces, with songs (My Queen, &c.). [Bloom-mental.]

Blumenthal, LEONHARD, COUNT VON (1810-1900), Prussian general, who greatly distinguished himself in the wars of 1866 and 1870-71.

Blundell, PETER (1520-1601), a kersey manufacturer of Tiverton, the founder of Blundell's School there.

Blunt, JOHN HENRY, D.D. (1823-11th April 1884), theologian, born at Chelsea, was for some years a manufacturing chemist, but in 1850 entered Durham University. He took orders two years later, and in 1873 received the crown living of Beverstone, Gloucestershire. Among his seven-teen works are The Atonement (1855), Annotated Book of Common Prayer (1867), History of the English Reformation (1868), Book of Church Law (1872), Dictionary of Theology (1870), Dictionary of Sects (1874), and Annotated Bible (3 vols. 1878-79).

Blunt, JOHN JAMES, divine, born in 1794 at Newcastle-under-Lyme, in 1812 entered St John's College, Cambridge, graduated fifteenth wrangler, and obtained a fellowship. Till 1834 a curate in Shropshire, then rector of Great Oakley, Essex, in 1839 he became Lady Margaret professor of Divinity at Cambridge, where he died 18th June 1855, having the year before declined the bishopric of Salisbury. His best-known work is Undesigned Coincidences (1833). See Memoir by Prof. Selwyn prefixed to his Two Introductory Lectures (1856).

Blunt, WILFRID SCAWEN, born at Crabbet Park, Sussex, 17th August 1840, was educated at Stonyhurst and Oscott; served as attaché and secretary to British embassies (1859-70); married in 1869 Anne, daughter of the Earl of Lovelace, and granddaughter of Lord Byron; and thereafter travelled through Spain, Algeria, Egypt, and the Syrian desert, as recorded in two books of travel by his wife. In 1882 he championed the cause of Arabi Pasha in Egypt; in 1887-88 was imprisoned for two months for taking part in a prohibited meeting in Galway. During his imprisonment he unsuccessfully contested Deptford. He is the author of Sonnets and Songs (1875), Love Sonnets of Proteus (1881), &c. See his Poetry selected by Henley and Wyndham (1898).

Bluntschli, JOHANN KASPAR (1808-81), jurist, born at Zurich, in 1833 became professor in its newly-founded university. In 1848 he went to Munich as professor of Civil and International Law; in 1871 removed to Heidelberg; and died at Karlsruhe. Among his works were Allgemeines Staatsrecht (1852), on which his reputation chiefly rests, and Deutsches Privatrecht (1853-54). See his Autobiography (1884). [Bloontsch'lee.]

Boabdil (properly Abu-Abdallah), the last Moorish king of Granada, dethroned his father, Abu-l-Hasan, in 1481, and two years later was defeated and taken prisoner by the Castilians near Lucena. He was set free on condition of paying tribute, and returned to Granada to struggle with his father and with his uncle for the throne. The fall of Malaga was but the prelude to the siege of the capital itself, which was finally starved out in 1491, spite of the reckless courage of the Moors and of Boabdil, whose weak and vacillating nature fell from him in the hour of battle. The spot from which he looked his last on Granada, after giving up to Ferdinand the keys of the city, still bears the name of el ultimo sospiro del Moro, 'the last sigh of the Moor.' Boabdil soon crossed to Africa and flung away his life in battle.

Boadice'a (better Boudicca or Bonduca), 'the British warrior-queen,' wife of Prasutagus, king of the Icenii, a tribe inhabiting the part of Britain now occupied by Norfolk and Suffolk. On her husband's death (c. 60 A.D.), the Romans seized her territory, and treated the inhabitants with brutal cruelty. The queen herself was scourged, her daughters were outraged, and the noblest among the Icenii were treated as slaves. Boadicea gathered a large army, destroyed the Roman colony of Camulodunum (Colchester), took Londinium and Verulamium (London and St Albans), and put to death, according to Tacitus, as many as 70,000 Romans. Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman governor of Britain, who had been absent in Mona (Anglesey), now advanced against her, and with only 10,000 men inflicted an overwhelming defeat on 200,000. The British loss is said to have been 80,000, the Roman only 400. Boadicea thereupon poisoned herself.

Boardman, GEORGE DANA (1801-31), from 1825 Baptist missionary in Burma, was born in the State of Maine, and educated at Andover. His widow married the more famous Judson.

Bobbil, TIM. See COLLIER, JOHN.

Bocage, MANOEL DU (1765-1806), a Portuguese poet, best known by his sonnets. See Life by Braga (Oporto, 1877). [Bo-kah'jeh.]

Boccaccio, GIOVANNI, was born either at Paris or at Florence in 1313. He was the illegitimate son of a merchant of Certaldo, and disliking a commercial career (during which he spent some time at Paris), he attempted but quickly abandoned the study of canon law; then at Naples he gave himself to story-writing in verse and prose, mingled in courtly society, and fell in love with the noble lady whom he made famous under the name of Fiammetta. Up to the year 1350 Boccaccio lived alternately at Florence and at Naples, producing prose tales, pastorals, and poems. The Teseide is a graceful version in ottava rima of the mediæval romance of Palamon and Arcite, which was partly translated by Chaucer in the Knight's Tale, and is the subject of Shakespeare and Fletcher's Two Noble Kinsmen. The Filostato, likewise in ottava rima, deals with the loves of Troilus and Cressida, also in great part translated by Chaucer. After 1350 Boccaccio's life is that of a diplomatist entrusted with important public affairs, of a scholar devoted to the cause of the new learning. During this period, in which he formed a lasting friendship with Petrarch, Boccaccio, as Florentine ambassador, visited Rome, Ravenna, Avignon, and Brandenburg. In 1358 he completed his great work, the Decameron, begun some ten years before. During the plague at Florence in 1348, seven ladies and three gentlemen, leaving the city and betaking themselves to a country villa, while away ten days (whence the name Decameron) by each in turn telling stories, a hundred in all, in the garden. Many of these are licentious; others are full of pathos and poetical fancy; several are masterpieces of imaginative creation; all are related in exquisitely graceful Italian. Boccaccio selected the plots of his stories from amid the floating popular fiction of the day, and especially from the fabliaux which had passed into Italy from France, the matter being mediæval, while the form is classical. Boccaccio's originality lies in his consummate narrative skill, and in the rich poetical sentiment which transforms his borrowed materials. The two great tendencies which run through European literature, the classical and the romantic, are seen working together in the Decameron as they are hardly to be seen elsewhere. The influence of the book on European literature has been lasting and profound, not merely in Italy, but in France and England, Chaucer borrowed largely from it; in less degree, Sidney, Tournour, Marston, Fletcher, and Shakespeare. None of Dryden's works have had more enduring popularity than his Tales from Boccaccio. In later days, Keats (in Isabella), Tennyson (in The Falcon and The Lover's Tale), Longfellow, Swinburne, and George Eliot are among those who have turned for their subjects to the deathless pages of the hundred tales. Boccaccio for some time held a chair founded for the elucidation of the works of Dante, on whose Divina Commedia he produced a commentary. During his last years he lived principally in retirement at Certaldo, and would have entered into holy orders, moved by repentance for the follies of his youth, had he not been dissuaded by Petrarch. He wrote in Latin an elaborate work on mythology, De Genealogia Deorum, and treatises such as De Claris Mulieribus and De Montibus. He died at Certaldo, 21st December 1375. Some of the early printed editions (of which the 15th century produced more than a dozen) are rare and costly bibliographical curiosities; a good recent one is that of Fansini (1857). See works on Boccaccio (in older English literature called John Bochas) by Baldelli (1806), Landau (Stuttgart, 1877), Koerting (Leip. 1880), Crescini (1887), J. A. Symonds (1894), and E. Hutton (1909). [Bok-katch'yo.]

Boccage, MARIE ANNE FIQUET DU (née Le Page), a beautiful French poetess, once famous, was born at Rouen, 22d October 1710, and died in Paris, 8th August 1802. Her Paradis Terrestre (1748), La Colombiade (1756), &c., are now almost forgotten; but her letters to her sister, written while travelling through England, Holland, and Italy, are still interesting. [Bok-kazh.]

Boccherini, LUIGI, composer, born at Lucca, 14th January 1740, studied at Rome, appeared with great success at Paris in 1768, and went to Madrid, where, his last years darkened by poverty and ill-health, he died 20th May 1805. He wrote 366 instrumental works, mostly trios, quartets, and quintets for strings, in which the cello is prominent. See works by Picquot (Paris, 1851) and Schletterer (Leip. 1882). [Bok-ker-ee'nee.]

Bochart, SAMUEL (1599-1667), born at Ronen, after extensive studies, especially in the Semitic languages, at Paris, Sedan, Saumur, and Leyden, became Protestant pastor at Caen. In 1646 he published his Geographia Sacra, in 1663 Hierozoicon, sive de Animalibus Scripturæ Sacre; and in 1652 visited the Swedish court. [Fr. pron. Bo-shar'.]

logical subjects, born at Basel in 1827, worked at Munich, Weimar, Florence, and Zurich; and died in 1901—a very great artist. [Nearly Bek-lin.]

Bode, JOHANN ELERT (1747-1826), astronomer, born at Hamburg, was director of Berlin observatory. The arithmetical relation subsisting between the distances of the planets from the sun is called Bode's Law. [Bo'deh.]

Bode, WILHELM, a great art critic, born in Brunswick in 1845, became general director of the Prussian royal museums in 1905, and has written much on Rembrandt and on the history of art, especially in the Renaissance period.

Bodenstedt, FRIEDRICH MARTIN VON (1819-92), born at Peine in Hanover, had lived at Moscow, travelled in the Crimea, Turkey, Greece, and Asia Minor, edited the Weser Zeitung, filled the chairs of Slav languages and Old English at Munich, and been director of the Meiningen court theatre. Bodenstedt published many translations from the Russian, English (Shakespeare), and Persian, and several volumes of poetry, including dramas and romances. His most popular work is the Lieder des Mirza Schaffy (1851; 143d ed. Berlin, 1893), feigned to be a translation from the Tartar. See his Autobiography (1890).

Bodichon, MADAME (1827-90), advocate of women's rights, a founder of Girton College, and a water-colour landscape-painter, was born Barbara Leigh Smith, the daughter of a Norwich M.P., and died in Algeria, having in 1857 married Eugène Bodichon, M.D. (1810-85). [Bod-ee-shon'.]

Bodin, JEAN (c. 1530-96), a great political thinker, was born at Angers and died of the plague at Laon, having been appointed king's attorney there in 1576. According to Bodin's greatest work, Les Six Livres de la République (1576; Latin version, 1586), property and the family form the basis of society, and a limited monarchy is the best possible form of government. In opposition to certain Protestant writers, he held that under no circumstances are citizens justified in rebelling against their ruler. One prince, however, may interfere in behalf of the oppressed subjects of another. His Methodus ad Facilem Historiarum Cognitionem (1566) is by some writers deemed the foundation of the true philosophy of history. His famous Colloquium Heptaplomeris, first published by Noack in 1857, is a conversation between a Jew, a Mohammedan, a Lutheran, a Zwinglian, a Roman Catholic, an Epicurean, and a Theist, who come to the conclusion that they will leave off disputing on religion, and live together in charity. Bodin, though so liberal in his opinions as to earn the reputation of an atheist, was not before his age in his notions about witchcraft, as is evidenced by his Demonomanie des Sorciers (1580). See Baudrillard's Jean Bodin et son Temps (1853), and Flint's Philosophy of History in Europe (1874). [Fr. pron. Bo-dan'.]

Bodley, SIR THOMAS, was born at Exeter, March 2, 1545. His family, forced to flee during the persecutions of Mary, settled at Geneva, where Bodley studied languages and divinity. In 1558 he entered Magdalen College, Oxford, gained a Merton fellowship, was elected a proctor, and officiated as public orator. He devoted himself to the study of Hebrew, and, spending the years 1576-80 in Italy, France, and Germany, became proficient in modern languages. He was now employed by the queen in diplomatic missions to Denmark, France, and Holland; married a wealthy widow in 1587; and returned to his favourite city, Oxford, in 1597, where he devoted himself to literature, especially to the extension of the university library, originally established by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and now called the Bodleian. He was knighted by King James in 1603, and died at Oxford, January 28, 1613. His Autobiography, with his letters, was published as Reliquiæ Bodleianæ (1703). See also Macray's Annals of the Bodleian Library (1868; 2d ed. 1890).

Bodmer, JOHANN JAKOB (1698-1782), poet and littérateur, was born at Greifensee, near Zurich, and died at Zurich, having been professor of History from 1725 to 1775. The study of Greek, Latin, English, French, and Italian writers having convinced him of the poverty and tastelessness of existing German literature, he attempted a reformation; but, though he was inexhaustibly active as an author, his own poems, dramas, and translations have no vigour or originality. He did better service by republishing the old German Minnesingers, and a part of the Nibelungenlied, as also by his numerous critical writings.

Bodoni, GIAMBATTISTA (1740-1813), a Parma printer. See Life by Bernardi (1873).

Bödtscher, LUDVIG (1793-1874), Danish love-lyrist. [Nearly Bet-h'yer.]

Body, GEORGE, D.D., born at Cheriton Fitzpaine, near Crediton, 7th January 1840, was educated at Tiverton, St Augustine's, Canterbury, and St John's College, Cambridge; in 1863 took orders, and in 1883 became canon-missioner of Durham. He was a High-Churchman, and an eloquent preacher. He died 5th June 1911.

Boece, or BOVIS, HECTOR (c. 1465-1536), Scottish historian, was born at Dundee, and studied at Montaigu College, Paris, where from about 1492 to 1498 he was a regent or professor of Philosophy, and where he made the friendship of Erasmus. Bishop Elphinstone then invited him to preside over his newly-founded university of Aberdeen, and Boece accepted the office, though the yearly salary was but 40 merks, or about £2, 4s. 6d. sterling. The value of money, however, was immensely greater then than now, and he was at the same time made a canon of the cathedral. In 1522 he published his lives, in Latin, of the Bishops of Mortlach and Aberdeen (Bannatyne Club, 1825; trans. by Moir for New Spalding Club, 1895); in 1527 the Latin History of Scotland, which, though proved to contain a large amount of fiction, was deemed distinctly critical at the time of its publication. The king rewarded him with a pension of £50 Scots, until he should be promoted to a benefice of 100 merks, which appears to have occurred in 1534. See BELLENDEN, JOHN; and J. Moir's edition and translation of the History (New Spalding Club, 1895).

Boeckh, PHILIPP AUGUST, classical antiquary, was born at Karlsruhe, November 24, 1785, studied at Halle, in 1805 became professor of Philology at Heidelberg, and in 1811 of Rhetoric and Ancient Literature at Berlin, where he lectured for upwards of forty years, and where he died, August 3, 1867. His four great works are his edition of Pindar (2 vols. 1811-21); Die Staatshaltung der Athener (2 vols. 1817; 3d ed. by Fränkel, 1886), translated by Sir George Cornewall Lewis as The Public Economy of Athens (1828); Metrologische Untersuchungen (1838); and das Seewesen des Attischen Staats (1840). His lesser works have been collected (7 vols. 1858-74); and his Correspondence with K. O. Müller was published in 1883. [Nearly Behk.]

Boehm, SIR JOSEPH EDGAR, sculptor, was born in Vienna, July 6, 1834. He was educated 1848-51 in England, and finally settled there in 1862. In 1867 he executed a colossal statue of the Queen; of his seated statue of Thomas Carlyle (1875), enthusiastically praised by Ruskin, a replica was erected at Chelsea. His animal studies are also noteworthy. Boehm became an A.R.A. in 1878, sculptor-in-ordinary to the Queen in 1881, an R.A. in 1882, and a baronet in 1889. The Queen's effigy on the Jubilee coinage was from his designs. On 12th December 1890 the Princess Louise found him sitting dead in his studio. [Nearly Behm or Baym.]

Boehme, JAKOB, theosophist and mystic, was born of poor parents at Altseidenberg near Görlitz, in Upper Lusatia, in 1575, and in boyhood herded cattle. He afterwards worked industriously as a shoemaker, but from his youth up devoted much of his time to meditation on divine things. About 1612 he published Aurora, containing revelations and meditations upon God, Man, and Nature, and showing a remarkable knowledge of Scripture and of the writings of alchemists. It was condemned by the ecclesiastical authorities of Görlitz, and he suffered much persecution, though he was at last protected by the Saxon court. His chief aim is to explain the origin of things, especially the existence of evil. God is the Ungrund or Urgrund, the original and undistinguished unity, at once everything and nothing, which, however, has in itself the principle of separation; all things come into existence through the principle of negation, which in a way is identified with evil. The difficulties of the great problems of philosophy and religion are rather concealed than explained under a cloud of mystical language and a system of triads, suggested by the Christian doctrine of the trinity. Boehme died at Görlitz in 1624. Collected editions of his works were published at Amsterdam in 1675 and 1730, and at Leipzig (1831-47). In England, where Boehme was generally called Behmen, all his works were translated between 1644 and 1662 (new ed. 1764). Sir Isaac Newton studied him; Henry More was influenced by him; William Law might be called a disciple; John Fordage (1608-98) and Jane Leade (1623-1704) were leaders of the Philadelphians, a Behmenist sect. Points of contact with Spinoza, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel revived interest in his speculations in Germany in the 19th century. See works by Hamberger (1844), Fechner (1857), Peip (1860), Harless (1870), Martensen (Eng. trans. from Danish, 1885), and Hartmann (Lond. 1890). [Nearly Beh-meh or Bay-meh.]

Boerhaave, HERMANN (1668-1738), the most celebrated physician of the 18th century, was born at Voorhout, near Leyden; in 1682 he went to Leyden, where he studied theology and oriental languages, and took his degree in philosophy in 1689; but in 1690 he began the study of medicine, and in 1701 was appointed lecturer on the Theory of Medicine, in 1709 professor of Medicine and Botany. The two works on which his great fame chiefly rests, Institutiones Medicæ (1708) and Aphorismi de Cognoscendis et Curandis Morbis (1709), were translated into various European languages, and even into Arabic. Though so industrious in his own profession, he also undertook in 1718 the professorship of Chemistry, and his Elementa Chimiæ (1724) occupies a high place in the history of chemistry. Meanwhile patients came from all parts of Europe to consult him, so that he made a fortune of two million florins. See Lives by Burton (2 vols. 1743) and Johnson (1834). [Boor-hah'veh.]

Boëthius, or BOËTIUS, ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS, Roman statesman and philosopher, was born between 470 and 475 A.D. of a consular family, and studied with enthusiasm philosophy, mathematics, and poetry. Soon after 500 he was appointed a court minister by the Gothic king, Theodoric, now ruling Italy from Rome; and his Roman countrymen owed it to him that the Gothic rule was so little oppressive. He was made consul in 510, and his two sons shared the same honour in 522. But his bold uprightness of conduct at last brought down upon his head the vengeance of those whom he had checked in their oppressions. He was accused of treasonable designs against Theodoric, was stripped of his dignities, and, after imprisonment at Pavia, was executed in 525. During his imprisonment he wrote his famous De Consolatione Philosophiæ, in which the author holds a conversation with Philosophy, who shows him the mutability of all earthly fortune, and the insecurity of everything save virtue. The work, which in style happily imitates the best Augustan models, is theistic in its language, but affords no indication that its writer was a Christian. Boëthius was the last great Roman writer who understood Greek; his translations of Aristotle were long the only means of studying Greek philosophy; and his manuals on arithmetic, astronomy, geometry, and music were generally used in the schools. Peiper's (1871) is a standard edition of the Consolatio, which was often translated—as by King Alfred into Anglo-Saxon, and by Chaucer into English prose (printed by Caxton in 1480). H. F. Stewart, in his monograph (1891), is confident that Boëthius was at least outwardly a Christian.

Bogardus, JAMES, American inventor, born in Catskill, New York, 14th March 1800, was apprenticed to a watchmaker, and early showed the bent of his mind by improvements in eight-day clocks, and by the invention of a delicate engraving-machine. The dry gas-meter is his invention, as is also the transfer-machine to produce bank-note plates from separate dies; and in 1839 his plan for manufacturing postage-stamps was accepted by the British government. Later he introduced improvements in india-rubber goods and machinery; and invented a pyrometer, a deep-sea sounding-machine, and a dynamometer. He died at New York, 13th April 1874.

Bogatzy, KARL HEINRICH VON (1690-1774), a German devotional writer, was born at Jankowe in Lower Silesia, and died at Halle. His chief work is Das güldene Schatzkästlein der Kinder Gottes, which in 1893 had reached its 61st edition, and which as Bogatzy's Golden Treasury was translated into English, recast, and expanded in 1775 by John Berridge (new ed. by Phinn, 1891). He wrote also many popular hymns, which were collected in 1749. See his Autobiography (new ed. 1872), and an English Life by Kelly (1889).

Bogdanovich, IPPOLYT FEDOROVICH (1744-1808), a Russian poet.

Bogermann, JOHANN (1576-1633), professor of Divinity at Franeker, president in 1618 of the famous Synod of Dort, and the chief translator of the Bible into the standard Dutch version.

Bogle, GEORGE (1746-81), born near Bothwell, in 1769 entered the service of the East India Company, and in 1774 was sent by Warren Hastings to Tibet, where he formed an intimate friendship with one of the Lamas. He returned in 1775, and died at Calcutta. See Clements R. Markham's Narrative of his Mission (1876).

Bogue, DAVID, a founder of the London Missionary Society, was born in Coldingham parish, Berwickshire, 18th February 1750; studied at Edinburgh; in 1711 went to London to teach; afterwards became an Independent minister at Gosport, and here also took a tutorship in a seminary for Independent students of theology. This became a great school of missionaries, and out of it grew the London Missionary Society. Bogue took besides an active part in the establishment of the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Religious Tract Society. He died at Brighton, 25th October 1825. In conjunction with Dr James Bennet, he wrote a History of Dissenters (3 vols. 1809).

Bohemond I. (c. 1056-1111), eldest son of Robert Guiscard (q.v.), distinguished himself in his father's war against the Byzantine emperor, Alexius Comnenus (1081-85). After his father's death he was excluded from the throne of Apulia by his brother Roger, and only gained the principality of Tarentum after a long contest. He joined the crusade of 1096, and took a prominent part in the capture of Antioch (1098). While the other crusaders advanced to storm Jerusalem, Bohemond established himself as prince in Antioch. He was made prisoner, however, in 1100 by a Turkish emir, and remained two years in captivity, Tancred meanwhile looking after his interests in Antioch. He then returned to Europe to collect troops, and after defeating Alexius was acknowledged by him as Prince of Antioch. His younger son, Bohemond II., assumed the government of Antioch in 1126, and was killed in battle (1130). From Bohemond VI. Antioch was wrested by the Mamelukes (1268).

Bohn, HENRY GEORGE, publisher, was born of German parentage in London, January 4, 1796; in 1831 started as a second-hand bookseller; and in 1841 issued his famous 'guinea catalogue,' containing 23,208 items. Next he tried the 'remainder' trade, and in 1846 began the issue of the valuable series of works with which his name is identified. He retired from business in 1864, and died August 22, 1884.

Böhtlingk, ORTO (1815-1904), Sanskrit scholar, was born of German ancestry at St Petersburg; from 1835 to 1842 studied oriental languages, especially Sanskrit, at Berlin and Bonn; and, after twenty-six years in his native city, removed in 1868 to Jena, and thence to Leipzig. Among his invaluable works are the first European edition of the Indian grammarian Panini (1839), a Sanskrit Chrestomathy (1845), and a great Sanskrit dictionary (7 vols. 1855-75). [Beh-tlingk.]

Bohun, a family founded by the Norman Humphrey de Bohun, whose fourth descendant, Henry, in 1199 was made Earl of Hereford. Humphrey, fourth Earl of Hereford (1276-1322), was taken prisoner at Bannockburn, and fell at Boroughbridge. In 1380 the heiress of the earldoms of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton married Henry Bolingbroke (Henry IV.). [Boone.]

Boiardo, MATTEO MARIA, Count of Scandiano, one of the greater Italian poets, was born about 1434 at Scandiano, a village at the foot of the Lombard Apennines. He studied at Ferrara, and in 1462 married the daughter of the Count of Novellara. He lived at the court of Ferrara on intimate terms with Dukes Borso and Ercole; by the latter he was employed on diplomatic missions, and appointed governor in 1481 of Modena, and in 1487 of Reggio. As an administrator he was distinguished for his clemency, and opposition to capital punishment. He died at Reggio, 21st December 1494. Boiardo has been called the 'Flower of Chivalry.' His fame rests on the Orlando Innamorato (1486), a long narrative poem in which the Charlemagne romances are recast into ottava rima. Full of rich and graceful fancy, this is the only work in which the spirit of chivalry is found in union with the spirit of the Renaissance. Ariosto adopted Boiardo's characters, and brought his narrative to a close in the Orlando Furioso, by which the fame of the earlier poem has been unfairly obscured. After going through sixteen editions before 1545, Boiardo's work became almost forgotten, its vigorous but rough and provincial style being ungenial to the Florentine taste. His other works comprise Latin eclogues, a versification of Lucian's Timon, translations of Herodotus, the Ass of Lucian, and the Golden Ass of Apuleius, and a series of sonnets and Canzoni (Reggio, 1499). The best edition is by Panizzi (9 vols. Lond. 1830-35).

Boieldieu, ADRIEN FRANÇOIS, composer, was born at Rouen, 15th December 1775; at eighteen brought out a one-act opera there; and two years afterwards repaired to Paris, where he produced many successful compositions. When the Conservatoire de Musique was established, Boieldieu became a professor (1797); the Calipe de Bagdad (1799) was his first brilliant success. His unhappy marriage with the celebrated dancer, Clotilde Maffleuroy, induced him to accept an invitation to St Petersburg, where from 1803 to 1810 he was imperial maître de chapelle, and produced several operas. Returning to Paris, he brought out Jean de Paris (1812), La Dame Blanche (1825), his masterpiece, and other works. His strength lies in bright and graceful melody, light but tasteful instrumentation, and pure harmony. He was elected an academicien in 1817, and on his death, 8th October 1834, received a public funeral. His native city claimed his heart, and in 1875 erected a monument to him. The government further granted a pension to his son Adrien (1816-83), who himself composed several operas. See Pouglin, Boieldieu, sa Vie, ses Œuvres (1875). [Bwahl-de-üh'.]

Boigne, COUNT BENOIT DE (really La Borgne), military adventurer, was born at Chambéry in 1751, served in the Irish Brigade in France, was in the Russian army for a time, arrived in India in 1778, took service in the East India Company's Madras army, and entering Sindhia's service, won an empire for his master. He resigned in 1795, and came home to France, dying in 1830. His last years were marked by extraordinary benevolence.

Boileau (or BOILEAU DESPRÉAUX), NICOLAS, critic, was born at Paris, 1st November 1636, studied law and theology at Beauvais, but inheriting a competence, devoted himself to literature. His first publications (1660-66) were satires, some of which brought him into trouble; in 1677 the king appointed him, along with Racine, a royal historiographer. L'Art Poétique, imitated by Pope in the Essay on Criticism, was published in 1674, along with the first part of the clever serio-comic Lutrin. In 1669-77 Boileau published nine epistles, written, like his satires, on the Horatian model. His ode on the capture of Namur (1692, burlesqued by Prior) is a glaring example of servile flattery and bad verse. In his last years Boileau retired to Auteuil, where he died on 13th March 1711. His works include several critical dissertations in prose, a collection of epigrams, a translation of Longinus On the Sublime, a Dialogue des Héros de Roman, and a series of letters (many to Racine). His verse has been and vigour, but he never rises to the level of the great satirists. His influence as a critic has been profound. The 16th century had flooded French literature with new words and new ideas. He set up good sense, sobriety, elegance, and dignity of style as the cardinal literary virtues, discountenancing the conceits of the salon coteries and the grossness and grotesqueness of the earlier writers. Through the influence of the 'lawgiver of Parnassus,' French prose became almost identical with clear, precise, and polished composition; but for more than a hundred years verse was robbed of fire and melody and suggestiveness, and the drama was divorced from real life. While he refined he impoverished the vocabulary—the language lost its old pith, colour, and flexibility. See Fournier's edition of Boileau (Paris, 1873), and works on him by Morillot (1890) and Lanson (1891). [Bwa-lo'.]

Boisgobey, FORTUNÉ DU (1824-91), a writer of innumerable 'police-novels,' was born at Granville in Normandy. [Bwah-go-bay'.]

Boisseré, SULPICE (1783-1854), born at Cologne, with his brother Melchior (1786-1851) collected at Stuttgart two hundred pictures, sold in 1827 to the king of Bavaria. He was author of Geschichte des Doms von Köln (1823-32), &c. See Life by his widow (2 vols. 1862). [Bwass-ray'.]

Boissonade, JEAN FRANÇOIS (1774-1859), Greek scholar, was born at Paris and died at Passy, having in 1828 become professor of Greek Literature in the Collège de France. [Bwass-o-nah'd'.]

Boissy d'Anglas, FRANÇOIS ANTOINE DE (1756-1826), French statesman, in 1789 became major-domo to the Count of Provence (Louis XVIII.) and a member of the States-general. During the Reign of Terror he kept quiet; but Tallien and Barère induced him to join the conspiracy against Robespierre. Two months after, he was elected secretary of the Convention, and then a member of the Committee of Public Safety, in which capacity he displayed remarkable talent. He was afterwards president of the Council of Five Hundred; was called to the Senate by Napoleon; and made a peer by Louis XVIII. His chief writings are Recherches sur Malesherbes (1819) and Études Littéraires et Politiques d'un Vieillard (1826). [Bwas-see-don'-glah'.]

Boito, ARRIGO, composer and poet, was born 24th February 1842 at Padua, and studied at the Milan Conservatorio. His first important work is the Wagnerian opera Mefistofele (1868), which, at first a dead failure, has since steadily grown in popularity. Other operas are Ero e Leandro, Nerone, Odà all'Arte. He writes his own and other libretti, and has published several songs, lyrical dramas, and novels. [Bo'ee-to'.]

Boivin, MARIE (1773-1841), a French nun, who, after the destruction of the nunnery at the Revolution, devoted herself to midwifery. Boker, GEORGE HENRY, poet, playwright, and diplomatist, was born in Philadelphia, 6th October 1823, and died 2d January 1890.

Bülckow, HENRY W. F. (1806-78), a native of Mecklenburg, an ironmaster from 1841 of Middlesbrough, its first mayor and member of parliament. [Del.-Co.]

Boldrewood, ROLF, the pseudonym of Thomas Alexander Browne, author of Robbery under Arms (1888), A Modern Buccaneer (1894), and other Australian tales of adventure. Born in London, 6th August 1826, he was taken to Australia in 1830 by his father, Captain Sylvester John Browne, a founder of Melbourne; and there, after a good education and a varied experience in stock-farming and other vocations, he became a police-magistrate and goldfields commissioner. He contributed to the Cornhill Magazine in 1865, and has written in other serials.

Boleyn, ANNE, second wife of Henry VIII., was born between 1502 and 1507, probably at Rochford Hall, Essex, and was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards Viscount Rochford and Earl of Wiltshire, by Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Duke of Norfolk. She spent some three years (1519-21) at the court of France, and soon after her return to England was wooed by Lord Henry Percy, the heir to the earldom of Northumberland, and by King Henry himself, who in the April of 1522 began to shower wealth and honours on her father, and who ere this had dishonoured her sister Mary. Not till the king's divorce from Catharine of Aragon was set afoot (in May 1527) does Anne seem to have favoured his addresses; but long before Craumer pronounced the divorce (23d May 1533) she was Henry's mistress, and in the preceding January they had been secretly married. She was crowned with great splendour in Westminster Hall on Whitsunday; but within three months Henry's passion had cooled. It was not revived by the birth, in September 1533, of a princess, the famous Elizabeth, still less by that of a still-born son, on 29th January 1536. On next May-day the king rode off abruptly from a tournament held at Greenwich, leaving the queen behind, and on the morrow she was arrested and brought to the Tower. The story runs that his jealousy was kindled by her dropping a handkerchief to one of her lovers in the lists below; anyhow, a week before, a special commission had been secretly engaged in examining into charges of Anne's adultery with her own brother, Lord Rochford, and four commoners. These on the 12th, and on the 15th Anne and her brother, were tried and convicted of high-treason. Her own father and her uncle, the Duke of Norfolk, were instrumental in her death, the latter presiding over her judges, the twenty-six peers, and pronouncing her doom. No vestige of the evidence remains. On the 19th, on Tower Green, Anne was beheaded, the others having suffered two days earlier. Henry the next day married Jane Seymour. That Anne was guilty of adultery with Henry is certain; that she was guilty of incest with her brother, or even of adultery with her other alleged paramours, remains at least not proven. See Hepworth Dixon's History of Two Queens (1874); Paul Friedmann's Anne Boleyn (2 vols. Lond. 1885); and Froude's Divorce of Catharine of Aragon (1891); with other works cited under HENRY VIII. [Boo!-Len.]

Bolingbroke, HENRY ST JOHN, VISCOUNT, one of the most gifted of English statesmen and orators, was born of good family at Battersea, on October 1, 1678, and educated at Eton (not at Oxford). After travelling on the Continent, he entered parliament in 1701 as Tory member for Wootton Bassett, became successively Secretary for War (1704) and Foreign Secretary (1710), and shared the leadership of the party with Harley. Made a peer in 1712, in 1713 he negotiated the peace of Utrecht. He estranged his followers by his morbid love of secret scheming. After intriguing successfully for Harley's downfall, he was plotting a Jacobite restoration when Queen Anne died, and George I. succeeded. Fleeing to France, he was attainted in 1715, and acted for some time as Secretary of State to the Pretender. While living abroad he wrote his Reflections on Exile. In 1723 he obtained permission to return to England, settled at Dawley, near Uxbridge, and became the associate of Pope, Swift, and other men of letters. A series of letters attacking Walpole in the Craftsman were reprinted as A Dissertation on Parties. Disappointed in his hope of readmission to political life, he returned to France, where he remained from 1735 to 1742. During these years he produced A Letter on the True Use of Retirement, and his most important contribution to literature—the Letters on the Study of History, laying down precepts for the historian's guidance. His last years were spent at Battersea, where he wrote his Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism and his Idea of a Patriot King. He died 12th December 1751. 'The Alcibiades of his time,' he was idolised for the grace of his person, the charm of his manner, and the splendour of his talents. An admirable speaker and writer, he was not a great statesman. He was the arch-triguer of his time, selfish and insincere. A pronounced Deist, he considered Christianity a fable, but held that a statesman ought to profess the doctrines of the Church of England. His philosophy is sensational. His works, philosophical and political, are models of polished, pointed, declamatory prose. Bolingbroke's collected works were published by Mallet in 1753-54. See works on him by Macknight (1863), Churton Collins (1886), and Sichel (2 vols. 1900-2).

Bolívar, SIMÓN (1783-1830), 'the Liberator' of South America from the Spanish yoke, was born in Carácas, of noble family, studied law at Madrid, and was in Paris during the closing scenes of the Revolution. After the declaration of independence by Venezuela in 1811, he obtained command of an army, and in 1813 entering Carácas as conqueror, proclaimed himself dictator of western Venezuela. Fortune, however, soon deserted him; but driven out in 1814, he made repeated descents on Venezuela from the West Indies, and in 1817 began to make head against the Spaniards. Still, owing to dissensions among the patriots, it was only in June 1821 that the victory of Carabobo virtually ended the war; while it was not till 1824 that the royalist troops were finally driven out. In 1821 Bolívar was chosen president of Colombia, comprising Venezuela, Colombia, and New Granada. In 1822 he added Ecuador to the republic, and in 1824 drove the Spaniards out of Peru, of which he was for a time dictator. Upper Peru was made a separate state, and called Bolivia in his honour, while he was named perpetual protector; but his Bolivian constitution excited great dissatisfaction, and led to the expulsion of the Colombian troops. His assumption of supreme power, after his return to Colombia in 1828, roused the apprehension of the republicans there; and in 1829 Venezuela separated itself from Colombia. Bolívar, in consequence, laid down his authority in 1830, and died the same year. See F. Loraine Petre's Life of him (1910). [Bo-lee'var.]

Bolland, JOHN (1596-1665), an Antwerp Jesuit, the first editor of the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum.

Bologna, GIOVANNI (1524-1608), Flemish sculptor and architect, was born at Douai, and died at Florence, having lived in Italy from 1551. See Life by Desjardins (Paris, 1884). [Bo-lon'ya.]

Bolsec, JEROME, an ex-Carmelite monk who opposed Calvin's doctrine of predestination at Geneva (1551), and then, returning to Catholicism, wrote a libellous Life of him (Par. 1577).

Bolzano, BERNHARD (1781-1848), a Catholic theologian, philosopher, and mathematician, was born at Prague of Italian ancestry. [Bol-tzah'no.]

Bonald, LOUIS GABRIEL AMBROISE, VICOMTE DE (1753-1840), an ultramontane and monarchical French writer, who, an émigré at the Revolution, was ennobled by Louis XVIII. He wrote Théorie Du Pouvoir Politique et Religieux (1796), Législation Primitive (1802), and Recherches Philosophiques (1818).—His son, LOUIS JACQUES MAURICE (1787-1870), became Archbishop of Lyons in 1839, and cardinal in 1841.

Bonaparte (in Ital. four syllables, in Fr. and Eng. three, and spelt Buonaparte by Napoleon till 1796) is the name of an ancient family of Ajaccio in Corsica. From it descended CHARLES BONAPARTE (1746-85), father of the Emperor Napoleon, who assisted Paoli in defending Corsica against the French, but ultimately took the French side, held various appointments in Corsica, and was ennobled by Louis XVI. As a Corsican commissioner he resided in Paris, where he gained for his son Napoleon a free admission into the military school at Brienne.—His wife, MARIA LETIZIA RAMOLINO (1750-1836), mother of Napoleon I., and step-sister of Cardinal Fesch, lived to see her family placed on the thrones of Europe, and also to witness their downfall, submitting to her change of fortune with remarkable dignity. Besides the Emperor Napoleon (q.v.) and the sons named below, she had three daughters, Maria Anna (or Elise), Princess of Lucca; Carlotta; and Caroline, wife of Murat.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE (1768-1844), eldest brother of Napoleon, was born in Corsica; studied for the bar at Marseilles; and in 1800, after he had filled several offices of state, was chosen by the First Consul as plenipotentiary to the United States. He signed the treaty of Lunéville 1801, and that of Amiens 1802; and assisted in the concordat negotiations. After the coronation of Napoleon, Joseph was made commander-in-chief of the army of Naples; in 1805, ruler of the Two Sicilies; and in 1806, king of Naples. A humane and accomplished man, but an ineffective ruler, in 1808 he was summarily transferred by his brother to the throne of Spain, but found himself unprepared to cope with the Spanish insurgents, and after the defeat of the French at Vittoria in 1813 returned to his estate at Morfontaine in France. After Waterloo he accompanied Napoleon to Rochefort, and, himself taking ship to America, became an American citizen, lived for some years at Bordentown, in New Jersey, U.S., where he employed himself in agriculture, but in 1832 returned to Europe, and died at Florence.—His wife, JULIA MARIE CLARY (1777-1845), daughter of a wealthy citizen of Marseilles, and sister-in-law of Bernadotte, king of Sweden, bore him two daughters.

LUCIEN BONAPARTE (1775-1840), Prince of Canino, and a younger brother of Napoleon, was born at Ajaccio, and was educated at Antun, Brienne, and Aix. In 1798 he was made a member of the Council of Five Hundred, and just before the 18th Brumaire he was elected its president. He was successful as Minister of the Interior; and as ambassador to Madrid (1800) undermined British influence. On condition that he would divorce his second wife (the widow of a stockbroker), the crowns of Italy and Spain were offered him; but he refused them, and lived on his estate of Canino, in the States of the Church, being created by the pope Prince of Canino. He had never wholly shaken off his early strong republicanism; and having denounced the arrogant policy of his brother towards the court of Rome, he was 'advised' to leave Roman territory, and in 1810 took ship for America, but fell into the hands of the English, and was kept in honourable captivity at Ludlow and Thornogrove, Worcestershire, till 1814. After Waterloo he advised his brother to assume the place of absolute dictator. After the second restoration Lucien lived in and near Rome, occupied with science and art, and died at Viterbo.—His eldest son, CHARLES LUCIEN JULES LAURENT BONAPARTE (1803-57), Prince of Canino and Musignano, acquired a reputation as a naturalist, signing a continuation of Wilson's Ornithology of America, and the Iconografia della Fauna Italica; his son, Lucien (1828-95), was a cardinal.—The second son, PAUL MARIE BONAPARTE (1808-27), took part in the Greek war of liberation.—The third son, LOUIS LUCIEN BONAPARTE, born in 1813 at Thornogrove, devoted himself to chemistry, mineralogy, and languages, and became an authority of the first rank in Basque, Celtic, dialectology, and comparative philology generally. He was elected to the Assembly in 1849, and made a senator in 1852. The Catalogue of 222 linguistic works (1858-88), written either by himself or with his encouragement, includes a Basque Bible, parts of the Bible in twenty-six English and Scotch dialects, in seventy-two European tongues and dialects, a treatise on the Basque verb, &c. He lived long in England, where a Civil List pension of £250 was granted to him in 1883, but died at Fano, on the Adriatic, 3d November 1891.—The fourth son, PIERRE NAPOLEON BONAPARTE (1815-81), passed through many changes of fortune in America, Italy, and Belgium. In 1870 he shot a journalist, Victor Noir, in Paris, and though acquitted of murder, had to pay 25,000 francs to the relatives.—The youngest son, ANTOINE BONAPARTE (1816-83), fled to America after an affair with the papal troops in 1836, but sat in the National Assembly in 1849.

LOUIS BONAPARTE (1778-1840), third brother of Napoleon, was educated in the artillery school at Chalons, and rose from one honour to another till in 1806 he was made king of Holland (really viceroy under his brother). Resigning in 1810, he returned to Paris in 1814, settled in Florence in 1826, and died at Leghorn. He wrote a novel, poems, a work on Dutch government, a history of the English parliament, and replies to Scott and other critics of Napoleon's career. In 1802 he married Hortense Eugénie Beauharnais (1783-1837), daughter of General Beauharnais (q.v.) by his wife Josephine, afterwards empress of the French. After the execution of her father, Hortense lived in humble circumstances until Napoleon's marriage with Josephine. In obedience to the plans of her step-father, she rejected her intended husband, General Desaix, and married Louis Bonaparte. She lived mostly apart from him, even as queen of Holland; and on the downfall of the Napoleons, passed her time in various countries, settling finally at Arenenberg, Thurgau. She was the authoress of a work of travel, of several songs, and of Partant pour la Syrie and other deservedly popular airs. Her three sons were NAPOLEON LOUIS CHARLES (1803-7); LOUIS NAPOLEON (1804-31), crown-prince of Holland; and CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON, afterwards Napoleon III. (q.v.). See article MORNAY, and Life by Miss Taylor (1907).

JEROME BONAPARTE (1784-1866), youngest brother of Napoleon, served as naval lieutenant in the expedition to Hayti, and lived in New York, where he married (1803) Elizabeth Patterson (1785-1879), daughter of a merchant in Baltimore. He served in the war against Prussia, in 1807 was made king of Westphalia, and fought at Waterloo. He lived long in Florence, but in 1848 was appointed governor of the Invalides, and in 1850 was made a French marshal. His marriage with Elizabeth Patterson having been declared null by Napoleon, the king of Westphalia was forced to marry Catharine, daughter of the king of Württemberg. By his first wife Jerome left one son, JEROME BONAPARTE-PATTERSON (1805-70), who married a wealthy wife and had one son (1830-93), a soldier. By his second wife he had three children—JEROME NAPOLEON CHARLES (1814-47), Comte de Montfort; MATHILDE, who married Prince Demidoff; and NAPOLEON JOSEPH CHARLES PAUL, who, born at Trieste, 9th September 1822, passed his youth in Italy; entered the military service of Württemberg in 1837; and was banished from France (1845) for Republicanism. In 1848 (having on his brother's death taken the name of Jerome) he was elected to the Legislative National Assembly. He commanded at the battles of Alma and Inkermann. In 1859 he married the Princess Clotilde, daughter of Victor Emmanuel of Italy, by whom he had two sons and a daughter. After the fall of the empire he took up his residence in England, but returned to France in 1872, and sat in the Chamber of Deputies. On the death of the Prince Imperial in 1879, the eldest son of Prince Napoleon became the heir of the Bonapartist hopes; and in 1886 father and son were exiled as pretenders to the throne. He died at Rome, 18th March 1891. His eldest son, Victor (b. 18th July 1862), settled at Brussels; the second entered the Russian army; the daughter married the Duke of Aosta. See NAPOLEON, NAPOLEON III.; Biogham, The Marriages of the Bonapartes (1881); Alderidge, Napoleon's Brothers (1909).

Bonar, HORATIUS, D.D., hymn-writer, was born in Edinburgh, 19th December 1808, from the High School passed to the university, and became minister at Kelso (1837-66; Free Church from 1843), and then at Edinburgh. He edited the Christian Treasury, and published many religious works, but is best known as author of Hymns of Faith and Hope, including 'I lay my sins on Jesus,' 'I heard the voice of Jesus say,' 'Thy way, not mine, O Lord.' He died in 1859, and a Memorial was published in the same year.

Bonati, GUIDO, the great Italian astrologer of his time, died in 1596. [Bo-nah'tee.]

Bonaventura, or BONAVENTURE, Sr. originally John of Fidenza, was born in 1221 near Orvieto, Tuscany. In 1243 he became a Franciscan, in 1253 a teacher at Paris, in 1256 general of his order, and in 1273 Bishop of Albano and cardinal. During the Council of Lyons he died, July 15, 1274, from sheer ascetic exhaustion. In 1482 he was canonised by Sixtus IV., and in 1587 was ranked by Sixtus V. as the sixth of the great doctors of the church. His religious fervour procured for him the title of Doctor Seraphicus, and his mysticism attracted Luther, though he promoted Mariology, celibacy, and a high view of transubstantiation. His most important works are the Breviloquium (a dogmatic); the Itinerarium Mentis in Deum, De Reductione Artium ad Theologiam, a commentary on Peter Lombard; and his Biblia Pauperum, or 'Poor Man's Bible.' See his works (8 vols. Rome, 1588-96; new ed. Freiburg, 1882-92), and books about him by Richard (1873), Da Vicenza (1874), and Prosper (1886). [Bo-na-ven-too'ra.]

Bonchamp, CHARLES, MARQUIS DE (1760-93), born at the château of Jouveteil in Anjou, fought in the American revolutionary war, but, a strong royalist, became after the French Revolution one of the bravest of the Vendean insurgents, and fell at Cholet. [Bon'-shon'].

Bond, SIR EDWARD AUGUSTUS, born at Hantwell, 31st Dec. 1815, entered the British Museum in 1838, became keeper of the MSS., and was head librarian 1878-88. He published catalogues of MSS. and facsimiles of Anglo-Saxon charters in the museum, edited works for the Hakluyt Society and in the Rolls series, and helped to edit the Facsimiles published by the Palaeographic Society. Just promoted a K.C.B., he died 2d Jan. 1898.

Bond, WILLIAM CRANCH (1789-1859), astronomer, born at Portland, Maine, and bred a watchmaker, became in 1840 director of the observatory at Harvard University. His son, George Philips Bond (1826-65), succeeded him.

Bondi, CLEMENTE (1742-1821), Italian poet, became a Jesuit, but quarrelling with the order, fled to the Tyrol. Afterwards he lived at Venice, Mantua, and Milan, where he found a patron in the Austrian Archduke Ferdinand. [Bon-dee.]

Bone, HENRY, enamel-painter, was born at Truro, 6th February 1755, worked in the Bristol china-works, and in London first enamelled watches and fans, and afterwards made enamel portraits, brooches, &c. In 1801 he became enamel-painter to George III., and A.R.A. Elected R.A. in 1811, he exhibited his large enamel, 'Bacchus and Ariadne,' after Titian, which was sold for 2200 guineas, and is now in the National Gallery. He died December 17, 1834, leaving a son, HENRY PIERCE BONE (1779-1855).

Boner, CHARLES (1815-70), born at Bath, from 1839 lived in Germany or Austria, and wrote a dozen books on chamois-hunting, Transylvania, &c. See Memoir (2 vols. 1871).

Boner, ULRICH, one of the oldest German fabulists, was a preaching friar of Bern in 1324-49. His Edelstein, a collection of fables and jokes, was the first German book printed.

Bonghi, RUGGERO (1826-95), Italian statesman and author, from 1870 professor of Ancient History at Rome, was born at Naples.

Bonheur, ROSA, animal-painter, born at Bordeaux, 16th March 1822, studied under her father, Raymond Bonheur (an artist of merit, who died in 1853), and in 1841 exhibited at the Salon 'Two Rabbits' and 'Goats and Sheep.' In 1849 she produced 'Ploughing with Oxen,' now in the Luxembourg. Her famous 'Horse Fair' (1853) was acquired for over £10,000 by Mr Vanderbilt, who presented it to the Gallery of New York. One of two smaller replicas—that from which the well-known engraving was made —is in the National Gallery, London. Holder of the Cross of the Legion of Honour, she directed an art school for girls, and died 25th May 1899. See book by Laruelle (1885). [Bon-eh'r.]

Boniface, the name of nine popes. I., in 418–22, was canonised; II., 530–32; III., 607; IV., 609–615; V., 619–625; VI., for a fortnight in 896; VII., 984–85. Boniface VIII., unlike his predecessors a famous pope, was elected in 1294. His tenure of the Roman see was marked by the most strenuous assertion of papal authority: in the bull Unam Sanctam of 1302 he claimed supreme power alike in temporal and spiritual affairs. He failed, however, to assert a feudal superiority over Sicily, and sought without success to call Edward I. of England to account. Philip the Fair of France, supported by his states and clergy, maintained the independence of his kingdom; disregarded many bulls and briefs, and even excommunication; and at last, with the aid of Italian enemies of Boniface, made him prisoner at Anagni, to which he had fled. Boniface died at Rome soon afterwards in 1303. For his simony Dante has placed him in the Inferno. —BONIFACE IX. became pope at Rome in 1389, whilst Clement VII. was pope at Avignon. He was notorious for his shameless sale of benefices, dispensations, and indulgences, and acquired a most despotic power in Rome. He died in 1404.

Boniface, Sr., 'the Apostle of Germany,' whose original name was Winfrid, was born about 680, and probably at Kirton or Crediton, in Devonshire. A Benedictine monk in Exeter from his youth, he taught in the monastery of Nursling, near Romsey, and in 716 went to convert the heathen Frisians, but was foiled by a war between them and the Frankish king. But in 718 at Rome he received a commission from Pope Gregory II. to preach the gospel to all the tribes of Germany. He laboured with great success in Thuringia, Bavaria, Friesland, Hesse, and Saxony, everywhere baptising multitudes, and was consecrated bishop (723), archbishop and primate of Germany (732). He founded the bishoprics of Ratisbon, Passau, Freising, Salzburg, Paderborn, Würzburg, Eichstätt, and Erfurt, and the abbey of Fulda. His chief life-work was less converting heathens than seeking to bring everything in the Frankish kingdom into accordance with Roman Catholic order and suppressing the irregularities of Irish or Columban christianity. In 747 Mainz became his prinatial seat; but in 754 he resigned the archbishopric, and had resumed his apostolical labours among the Frisians, when at Dokkum, near Leeuwarden, he was killed by heathens (5th June 755). His remains were taken to Fulda. His Epistolæ have been edited by Giles (2 vols. Lond. 1844), and Jaffé (Berlin, 1866), with the Life of him by Willibald. He left also sermons, canons, and some Latin verses. See German works on Boniface by Seiters (1845), Müller (1870), Werner (1875), Fischer (1881), and Ebrard (1882); also Merivale's Conversion of the West (1878).

Bonin, EDUARD VON (1793–1865), a Prussian general who fought against the Danes in 1848–9.

Bonington, RICHARD PARKES, painter, was born at Arnold, near Nottingham, 25th October 1801. His father, who had been governor of Nottingham prison, settled at Calais, and here and at Paris the son studied art, partly under Baron Gros. His water-colours sold rapidly. In 1822 he began to exhibit in the Salon, and in 1824 was awarded a medal there. He now occupied himself with lithography; but about 1825 he took to oil-painting, and visited England, accompanied by Delacroix, in whose studio he worked after his return to Paris. Next having visited Italy, he produced his splendid Venice views (1827). He also exhibited in the Royal Academy and the British Institution. His position was now fully established; but having had a sun-stroke, he fell into a decline, and visiting London for medical advice, died there, 23d September 1828. Of late years the fame of Bonington has been steadily increasing. His 'Henry III. receiving the Spanish Ambassador' was bought by Lord Hertford for 49,000 francs; and his 'Grand Canal, Venice,' and the 'Fishmarket, Boulogne,' realised £3150 each. The National Gallery possesses the 'Piazzetta, St Marks, Venice,' 'Sunset,' and three water-colours by the artist.

Bonitz, HERMANN (1814–88), classical scholar, was born at Langensalza, and died in Berlin. See monograph by Gompertz (Berlin, 1889).

Bonivard, FRANÇOIS DE (1493–1570), a younger son of a wealthy family, became in 1513 prior of St Victor at Geneva. Falling under the suspicion of the Duke of Savoy, he was kept a prisoner by him in 1519–20; in 1530 he was again seized, and taken to the Castle of Chillon at the east end of the Lake of Geneva, where he was imprisoned for six years. Byron's poem is purely imaginary. On the capture of Chillon by the Bernese and Genevese in 1536, he returned to Geneva, and received a pension in lieu of his priory. His chief works are his Chroniques de Genève (1551; new ed. 1831) and (partisan-Calvinist) De l'Ancienne et Nouvelle Police de Genève (1555).

Bonnat, LÉON JOSEPH FLORENTIN, was born at Bayonne, June 20, 1833, and studied at Madrid, in Paris, and in Italy. He became famous for religious pictures, and latterly is best known as a great portrait-painter. He is a member of the Institute. [Bon-nah'.]

Bonner, EDMUND, Bishop of London, was born about 1500, of obscure and doubtful parentage. The reputation he gained at Oxford recommended him to Wolsey, who made him his chaplain. His zeal in King Henry's service after Wolsey's fall earned him due promotion; and in 1533 he was deputed to appear before the pope at Marselles, to appeal to a general council. His language on this occasion is said to have suggested to his holiness the fitness of having him burned alive, or thrown into a caldron of molten lead, so that Bonner judged it prudent to depart. In 1540 he was made Bishop of London, and as such pronounced sentence on several Protestant martyrs, though it is certain he did his best to befriend Anne Askew. After Edward VI.'s accession, he gave proofs of his lukewarmness in the cause of reformation, and at length, in 1549, was committed to the Marshalsea, and deprived of his bishopric. The accession of Queen Mary (1553) restored him to office; and by his part in the persecution of her reign he rendered himself thoroughly unpopular. On Elizabeth's accession (1558), Bonner accompanied his episcopal brethren to salute her at Highgate, but was excepted from the honour of kissing her hand. In May 1559 he refused the oath of supremacy, so was deposed and again imprisoned in the Marshalsea, where he died in 1569.

Bonnet, CHARLES DE (1720–93), naturalist and philosopher, born at Geneva, distinguished himself by researches on parthenogenesis, polypti, the tapeworm, the respiration of insects, the use of leaves, &c. The decay of his sight led him to psychology, in which he combined sensationalism with belief in the immortality of the soul and the truth of Christianity. Collective editions of his works (8 vols. and 18 vols.) appeared in 1779 and 1788. See monographs by Lemoine (1850) and the Duc de Caraman (1859). [Bon-nay.]

Bonneval, CLAUDE ALEXANDRE, COUNT DE (1675-1747), a French adventurer, served with distinction in Italy and the Netherlands, but for extortion and insolence was condemned to death by a court-martial. Fleeing to Austria, he fought against his native country, and performed daring exploits under Prince Eugene in the war against Turkey. As master-general of ordnance in the Netherlands, he quarrelled with the governor, and was again condemned to death by a court-martial. His sentence commuted, he went to Constantinople, became a Mohammedan, and achieved success as general in the war of the Porte with Russia, and in Persia, but was ultimately banished. See works by the Prince de Ligny (1817) and Vandal (1885). [Bon-val.]

Bonneville, NICHOLAS DE (1760-1828), was one of the earliest French students of German literature, made a translation of Shakespeare, founded several newspapers, and wrote a history of modern Europe (1792). His De l'Esprit des Religions (1791) is still read. [Bon-veel.]

Bonomi, JOSEPH, A.R.A. (1739-1806), architect, was born at Rome, and settled in England in 1767.—His son, JOSEPH (1796-1878), repeatedly visited Egypt and Palestine, and illustrated important works by Wilkinson, Birch, Lepsius, and other Egyptologists, and wrote on Nineveh. He was curator of Soane's Museum. [Bo-no'mee.]

Bonpland, AIMÉ (1773-1858), botanist, born at Rochelle, travelled with Humboldt in South America in 1799-1804, and collected and described 6000 new species of plants. Named professor of Natural History at Buenos Ayres in 1816, he made an expedition up the Paraná; but Francia, dictator of Paraguay, arrested him, and kept him prisoner for nine years. See Life by Brunel (3d ed. Paris, 1872). [Bon'-plon'.]

Bonstetten, KARL VICTOR VON (1745-1832), a Swiss statesman who studied at Leyden, Cambridge, and Paris, lived much in Italy and at Copenhagen, and wrote books of travel, letters, a work on the imagination, &c.

Bonvalot, PIERRE GABRIEL, born at Épagne (Aube) in July 1853, since 1880 has travelled much in Central Asia. [Bon'-va-lot'.]

Boole, GEORGE (1815-64), mathematician and logician, was born at Lincoln, taught a school there in 1835-45, and became in 1849 professor of Mathematics in Queen's College, Cork.

Boone, DANIEL (1735-1820), pioneer, born in Pennsylvania, led an expedition into Kentucky, then almost unknown. He was captured by the Indians in 1769, but escaping, lived in the forest, and with a brother explored much country. As a land-agent he repeatedly repelled (1775-78) Indian attacks on a stockade-fort on the site now occupied by Boonesborough. In 1812 his claim to a tract of land was allowed. See Lives by Filson (1784), Flint, Bogart, and J. S. C. Abbott.

Boorde, or BORDE, ANDREW, born about 1490 near Cuckfield in Sussex, was brought up a Carthusian, after 1527 studied medicine at Orleans, Toulouse, Montpellier, and Wittenberg, visited Rome and Compostella, and for Cromwell carried through a confidential mission in France and Spain. He practised medicine in Glasgow (1536), travelled by Antwerp, Cologne, Venice, and Rhodes to Jerusalem, and in April 1549 died in the Fleet prison in London. Boorde's chief works are his Dyetary and the Fyrst Boke of the Introduction of Knowledge, edited by Dr Furnivall in 1870. His Itinerary of Europe has perished, but the Itinerary of England or Peregrination of Doctor Boorde was printed by Hearne in 1735. Many books have been fathered on the fantastic old probrute. The earliest known specimen of the Gypsy language occurs in the Introduction.

Boos, MARTIN (1762-1825), a Bavarian Catholic priest, the originator about 1790 of a religious movement closely akin to that of the Protestant Pietists. Bitterly persecuted, in 1817 he accepted an appointment at Düsseldorf, and died near Neuwied. [Boze.]

Booth, BARTON (1681-1733), actor, the son of a Lancashire squire, was educated at Westminster, but, turning actor, played with success for two seasons at Dublin, and in 1700 appeared in Betterton's company in London. His performance of Cato in 1713 brought him wealth and honour.

Booth, CHARLES, a ship-merchant, born at Liverpool, 30th March 1840, has written Labour and Life of the People in London (17 vols. 1889-1903), with statistical tables and maps coloured according to poverty, criminality, &c., The Aged Poor in England and Wales (1894), and Old Age Pensions (1899). He was made a Privy Councillor in 1904.

Booth, SIR FELIX (1775-1850), a London distiller, who furnished £17,000 for Ross's Arctic expedition (1829-33), and after whom was named Boothia Felix. He was made a baronet in 1835.

Booth, JUNIUS BRUTUS, actor, was born a lawyer's son in London, 1st May 1796, received a classical education, but went on the stage at seventeen, and suddenly became famous as Richard III. at Covent Garden. In 1821 he migrated to the United States, where for thirty years he was famous in spite of eccentricity, if not insanity. He died 12th Nov. 1852.—His son, EDWIN THOMAS BOOTH, actor, born in Harford county, Md., Nov. 13, 1833, appeared on the stage as a boy. After some years in California, and a visit to Australia, he returned to the Atlantic states in 1856, and, now recognised as a chief of his profession, visited Europe and Australia. Ruined by opening a splendid theatre in New York in 1869, he settled with his creditors in 1877. He died 7th June 1893. See Life by Winter (1894) and Recollections by his daughter (1895).—Another son, JOHN WILKES BOOTH, born at Baltimore in 1839, was an unsuccessful actor. In 1865 he shot President Lincoln (q.v.), fled, but was tracked and shot on 26th April.

Booth, WILLIAM, born at Nottingham, 10th April 1829, and in 1855-61 minister of the Methodist New Connection, began in 1856 in the East End of London the work which in 1878 culminated in the Salvation Army, of which he is 'general.' His wife (1829-90) was associated with him in the movement. See Booth's Darkest England and the Way Out (1890), Tucker-Booth's Life of Mrs Booth (1892), and A. M. Nicol's of the General (1911).

Boothby, GUY NEWELL (1867-1905), born at Adelaide, but long resident in England, wrote A Bid for Fortune, The Beautiful White Devil, Dr Nikola, The Red Rat's Daughter, Farewell Nikola (1901), &c. He crossed Australia in 1891.

Bopp, FRANZ, philologist, was born at Mainz, 14th September 1791. He studied oriental languages under Windschmann, and at Paris under Silvestre de Sacy. Here he composed The Conjugation of the Sanskrit Verb (1816), in which he demonstrated the common origin of the Indo-European languages. In London he examined

MSS. From 1821 till his death, 23d October 1867, he was professor of Oriental Languages at Berlin. His great work, A Comparative Grammar of Sanskrit, Zend, Greek, Latin, Lithuanian, Old Slavonic, Gothic, and German (6 vols. 1833-52; 3d ed. 1868-71), was translated into English by Eastwick (3d. ed. 1862). In 1841 he made an unfortunate attempt to connect the Malay-Polynesian languages with the Indo-European; he also wrote monographs on the Celtic, Caucasian, Old Prussian, and Albanian languages, as well as a Sauskrit grammar and glossary. See a monograph by Lefmann (1892-97).

Bora, KATHARINA VON (1499-1552), having adopted Lutheran doctrines, escaped from the Cistercian convent of Nimptschen, near Grimma, in 1523, and married Luther in 1525.

Borda, JEAN CHARLES DE (1733-99), mathematician and astronomer, born at Dax, served in the navy, did good service in the American war, and helped to measure the arc of the meridian and to establish the metric system.

Borde, ANDREW. See BOERDE.

Borden, ROBERT LAIRD, born at Grand Pré in 1854, practised as barrister in the Supreme Court, Canada, became leader of the Conservative party in 1901, in 1911 helped to overthrow Laurier's ministry on reciprocity with the United States, and was head of the succeeding government.

Bordone, PARIS (1500-71), a painter of the Venetian school, was born at Treviso, studied under Titian and Giorgione, and worked at Treviso, Vicenza, Paris, Augsburg, Genoa, and Venice. [Bor-dò'neh.]

Borelli, GIOVANNI ALFONSO (1608-79), mathematician and astronomer, held professorships at Pisa and Messina, but settled in Rome.

Borghese, a great family of Siena, afterwards at Rome.—CAMILLO BORGHESI ascended the papal throne in 1605 as Paul V. A marriage with an heiress of the house of Aldobrandini brought the Borghese family into the possession of great wealth.—PRINCE BORGHESI (1775-1832) joined the French army, in 1803 married Pauline, Napoleon's sister, and became governor-general of Piedmont. He sold the Borghese collection of art treasures to Napoleon for 13,000,000 francs, receiving in part-payment the Piedmontese national domains; when these were reclaimed by the king of Sardinia in 1815, he received back part of the collection. The Borghese Palace still contains one of the finest collections of paintings in Rome, though some of its treasures were sold in 1892-93. [Bor-gay'zeh.]

Borghesi, BARTOLOMMEO, COUNT (1787-1860), Italian numismatist and archæologist. His works were published by the Academy of Inscriptions at Paris (vols. i.-ix. 1862-79). [Bor-gay'zee.]

Borgia, the Italian form of BORJA, the name of an ancient family in the Spanish province of Valencia. Alfonso de Borja (1378-1458), bishop, accompanied Alfonso of Aragon to Naples, and was chosen pope as Calixtus III. Rodrigo de Borja (1431-1503), his nephew, ascended the papal throne in 1492 as Alexander VI. (q.v.). Before this he had had a number of children by a Roman girl, Giovanna Catanei, known as Vanozza. Two of these children, Cæsar, the fourth, and Lucrezia, the fifth, acquired an unhappy renown.—CÆSAR BORGIA (1476-1507), ambitious and energetic, was a brilliant general and administrator. At seventeen a cardinal, he was suspected, perhaps rightly, of procuring the assassination of his elder brother, whom he shortly after succeeded as captain-general of the Church, for which post he readily doffed the purple. In the Princess Charlotte d'Albret, sister of the king of Navarre, a bride was found for Cæsar (1499), who thereafter in two successive campaigns made himself master of Romagna, Perugia, Siena, Piombino, and Urbino; he went so far as to threaten Florence itself, and was planning the reconstruction of a kingdom of Central Italy, with himself at its head. He was menacing Bologna when, on the eve of his departure for his third campaign, both he and his father were stricken with sudden illness at a farewell banquet given by the Cardinal of Corneto. There was talk of poison. Cæsar's youth triumphed over the malady, but the old man succumbed, and Cæsar's enemies now raised their heads. The succession to the papacy of Julius II., his bitterest enemy, after Pius's brief reign of twenty-seven days, was fatal to him. Cæsar surrendered at Naples, under the promise of a safe conduct; but Gonsalvo de Cordova broke his oath, and (1504) had him carried to Valencia. In 1506, however, he made his escape to the court of Navarre, took command of the royal forces against the rebellious Constable of Navarre, and fell at the siege of the citadel of Viana, 12th May 1507. Despite attempts to rehabilitate it, his memory remains in execration. Yet amongst the peoples whom he governed he left the reputation of a just prince, upright and severe. He encouraged art, and was the friend of Pinturicchio, and the protector of Leonardo da Vinci. See Machiavelli's Prince, and the monograph by Yriarte (1888).—LUCREZIA BORGIA, born at Rome in 1480, married Sforza, Lord of Pesaro (June 1493); but her father annulled this marriage (1497), and gave her (1498) to a nephew of the king of Naples. Father and brother having secured the assassination of the new husband (1500), Lucrezia now became the wife of Alfonso, son of the Duke of Este, who inherited the duchy of Ferrara. Lucrezia has been represented as outside the pale of humanity by her wantonness, vices, and crimes; but recent historians show that in her youth she was rather the too pliant instrument in the hands of Alexander and of Cæsar Borgia. She died, 24th June 1519, enjoying the respect of her subjects, a generous patroness of learning and of art, besung by Ariosto and other poets. See the Life by Gilbert (London, 1869), and that by Gregorovius (Stutt. 1874).—Another Borgia, of the Spanish stock, Francesco (1510-72), was third general of the Jesuits, greatly furthered foreign missions, and was canonised in 1625. See Life by A. M. Clarke (1894). Cardinal Stefano (1731-1804), of the same branch, was secretary of the Propaganda and a zealous collector of MSS. and art treasures. [Bor'jah.]

Borgognone, AMBROGIO (? 1445-1523), a Milanese painter, some of whose frescoes are at the Certosa di Pavia and in Milan. See Pater's Miscellanies (1895). [Bor-gon-yo'neh.]

Boris Godunoff (1552-1605), Russian czar from 1598, an able but hated administrator.

Borlase, WILLIAM, Cornish antiquary, was born in St Just parish, February 2, 1695, and died August 31, 1772, at Ludgvan, of which he had been rector fifty years. He published The Antiquities of Cornwall (1754), The Islands of Scilly (1756), and The Natural History of Cornwall (1758).

Born, BERTRAND DE, troubadour, born about 1140 in Périgord, played a conspicuous part in the struggles of the English king Henry II. and his sons, and died a monk before 1215. Some forty of his songs of love and war and satires have been edited by Stimming (Halle, 1879).

Born, IGNAZ, born in Transylvania in 1742, died at Vienna in 1791; was trained as a Jesuit, but became famous as a mineralogist.

Börne, LUDWIG, born 18th May 1786 at Frankfurt, where his father was a Jewish money-changer, first studied medicine at Berlin under the Jewish physician Marcus Herz, to whose beautiful wife he addressed the letters published in 1861. From 1807 he studied law and political economy at Heidelberg and Giessen, and in 1809 returned to Frankfurt, where in 1818 he had himself baptised, changing his name from Löb Baruch. In various journals started or edited by him (1812-21), he established his reputation as a vigorous opponent of the government. The French Revolution of July 1830 drew him to Paris, where he finally settled in 1832, and died of consumption 12th February 1837. His views are fully developed in his Briefe aus Paris and Neue Briefe aus Paris (1832-38), which, while reproaching the German people with every kind of vice and folly, labour to incite the nation to revolution. He and Heine became bitterly hostile to each other; it was the mutual antipathy of a practical enthusiast and an æsthetic indifferentist. See his Life by Gutzkow (1840), and other works by Gervinus (1838), Beurnmann (1841), and Holzmann (1888). [Bur-neh.]

Borodin, ALEXANDER (1834-87), a Russian composer, who was born and died at St Petersburg, and was first an army doctor, then a professor of chemistry. See Habets, Borodin and Liszt (Eng. tr. 1895).

Borri, GIUSEPPE FRANCESCO (1627-95), an Italian prophet and alchemist.

Borromeo, ST CARLO, was born 2d October 1538, at his father's castle of Arona, on the Lago Maggiore. He studied law at Pavia, and in 1560, by his uncle, Pius IV., was appointed cardinal and Archbishop of Milan. The young cardinal did much to bring the Council of Trent to a successful conclusion, and had the principal part in drawing up the famous Catechismus Romanus. The saintly simplicity of his manners, his ardent piety, and his self-forgetful devotion to duty, made him the ideal bishop. But his own severe morality and his determined efforts to maintain ecclesiastical discipline drew upon him the hostility of the monastic orders, and in 1569 a wretch of the order of the Umiliati shot at the archbishop. Borromeo devoted the greater part of his revenues to the relief of the poor, and during the famine of 1570, and the plague in 1576, showed such benevolence and devotion as to make his name a proverb throughout Christendom. He founded in 1570 the Helvetic College at Milan; and he brought about an alliance of the seven Swiss Catholic cantons for the defence of the faith. Exhausted by his labours and his austerities, he died 4th November 1584. He was canonised in 1610. His theological works were published at Milan (5 vols. 1747). His Life has been written by Sailer, Dieringer, Sala (4 vols. Milan, 1857-59), Abbé Sylvain (3 vols. Bruges, 1884), Giussano (Eng. trans. 1884), Von Ah (2d ed. Einsiedeln, 1888), and E. H. Thompson (1893).—His nephew, COUNT FEDERICO BORROMEO (1562-1631), was also a cardinal, and from 1595 Archbishop of Milan, where he founded the Ambrosian Library. [Bor-ro-may-fo.]

Borrow, GEORGE HENRY, was born at East Dereham, Norfolk, 5th July 1803. His father, a captain of militia, during the war moved about with his regiment to Scotland, Ireland, and many parts of England, then settled at Norwich, where young Borrow attended the grammar-school (1816-18), and for the next five years was articled to a firm of solicitors. Already he deserved his Gypsy title Lavengro ('word-master'), having picked up a knowledge of Irish, French, German and Danish (these two under 'Taylor of Norwich'), Welsh, Latin, Greek, even of Romany, the language of that strange Gypsy race of which he was almost an adopted member. On his father's death in 1824 he came up to London to seek his fortune, and fared ill as hack-writer to Sir Richard Phillips the publisher. Anon he wandered Gypsy-wise through England, and, on his wanderings, was all but poisoned by a Romany beldame, fought and vanquished the Flaming Tinman, with Isopel Berners tented in Mumper's Dingle, and met with other moving accidents. Next—and here facts and dates are again realities, without any suspicion of fancy—as agent of the Bible Society he visited St Petersburg (1833-35), and Portugal, Spain, Morocco (1835-39). In 1840 he married a well-to-do widow, and settled down on a small estate of hers at Oulton, near Lowestoft, where, after travels in South-eastern Europe (1844), a tour in Wales (1854), and a residence of some years in London, he ended his days, 26th July 1881. The chief of his fourteen published works are: The Zincoli, or Gypsies of Spain (1840); The Bible in Spain (1843); Lavengro (1851); its sequel The Romany Rye (1857); Wild Wales (1862); and Romano Lavo-Lil, or Word-book of the English-Gypsy Language (1874)—six works, of which the first three increased, as the last three fell off, in vigour and interest. All but the first and last are autobiographical; and even the Zincoli and Lavo-Lil are full of the author's strong individuality. See Theodore Watts-Dunton's articles in the Athenæum for Sept. 1881, his Introduction to Lavengro (1893), Dutt's Borrow in East Anglia (1896), and the Lives by Knapp (1899) and Jenkins (1912).

Borthwick, PETER (1804-52), born at Borthwick, Middlethian, from 1835 to 1847 was Tory M.P. for Evesham, and from 1850 editor of the Morning Post.—His son, ALGERNON (1830-1908), succeeded him as its editor and also proprietor, as he was likewise of the well-known Owl (1864-70). Knighted in 1880, and created a baronet in 1887, he was Conservative M.P. for South Kensington (1885-95), and was then created Lord Glenesk.

Boruwlski, 'COUNT' JOSEPH (1739-1837), a Polish dwarf, at thirty only 3 feet 3 inches high, who from about 1800 lived at Durham.

Bory de Saint-Vincent, JEAN BAPTISTE (1780-1840), a French naturalist, who visited Réunion, the Morea, and Algeria.

Boscawen-Almogaver, JUAN (c. 1495-1542), Spanish poet, was a native of Barcelona.

Boscawen, EDWARD, the admiral 'Old Dreadnought,' was born 19th August 1711, the third son of Viscount Falmouth. He highly distinguished himself at the taking of Portobelo (1739) and at the siege of Carthagen (1741), and in command of the Dreadnought, in 1744, captured the French Médée, with 800 prisoners. He had an important share in the victory off Cape Finisterre (3d May 1747), where he was wounded in the shoulder; and in command of the East Indian expedition displayed high military skill in the retreat from Pondicherry. He returned in 1750. In 1755 he intercepted the French fleet off Newfoundland, capturing two 64-gun ships and 1600 men; in 1758, now admiral of the blue, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the successful expedition against Cape Breton. Boscawen crowned his career by his signal victory over the French Toulon fleet in Lagos Bay, 18th August 1759. He received the thanks of parliament, a pension of £3000 a year, a seat in the Privy-council, and the command of the marines. He died at his Surrey seat, Hatchlands Park, 10th January 1761.

Bosovich, ROGER JOSEPH (1711-87), a Jesuit mathematician and astronomer, born at Ragusa.

Bosio, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, BARON (1769-1845), sculptor, was born at Monaco, and died director of the Academy of Fine Arts in Paris.

Bosquet, PIERRE FRANÇOIS JOSEPH (1810-61), a French marshal, who in the Crimean war contributed greatly to the victories of Alma and Inkermann, and to the capture of the Malakoff, where he was severely wounded. [Bos-kay.]

Bosse, ABRAHAM (c. 1605-1678), a copper-engraver, who was born and died at Tours, after a long residence in Paris. See monograph by Valabrègue (Par. 1892).

Bossuet, JACQUES BENIGNE, churchman, controversialist, and pulpit orator, was born at Dijon, 27th September 1627, and educated in the Jesuits' School there and at the Collège de Navarre in Paris. He received a canonry at Metz in 1652, and in 1661 preached before Louis XIV. His reputation as an orator spread over France, and he became the recognised chief of the devout party at court. For his pupil the Dauphin he is said to have written his Discours sur l'Histoire Universelle (1679); as Bishop of Meaux (1681) he took a leading part in the Gallican controversy, and wrote the Doctrine de l'Eglise Catholique. He attacked with excessive violence the mysticism of Fénelon. He died at Paris, 16th April 1704. Bossuet did not protest against the king's licentiousness, oppressions, and unjust wars. His greatest works are the Histoire Universelle, regarded by many as the first attempt at a philosophy of history; the Oraisons Funèbres; and the Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes (1688). His Politique Tirée de Sainte Ecriture (1709) upholds the divine right of kings. The best edition of his works is the Benedictine (1815-19). See works by Réaume (1870), Lanson (1891), and Mrs Sidney Lear (1881).—JACQUES BOSSUET (1644-1743), his nephew, became Bishop of Troyes, and left a voluminous correspondence. [Bos-way or Bos-see-ay.]

Bossut, CHARLES (1730-1814), professor of mathematics at Mézières and Paris, wrote a famous history of mathematics, and edited Pascal's works. [Bos-see.]

Boston, THOMAS, author of The Fourfold State, was born at Duns, in Berwickshire, 17th March 1676, and educated there and at Edinburgh University. For a time minister of Simprin (1699), he was in 1707 translated to Ettrick in Selkirkshire, where he died, 20th May 1732. His Fourfold State (1720) discourses, not without flashes of insight and felicity of diction, of human nature in its fourfold state of primitive integrity (in Eden), entire depravity (by the fall), recovery begun on earth, and happiness or misery consummate hereafter, and was long recognised as a standard exposition of Calvinistic theology. The Crook in the Lot, a little book written in a quaint and striking style, and Boston's posthumous Autobiography (1776) were great favourites with the Scottish peasantry. In the ecclesiastical courts Boston distinguished himself by his zeal for the church's independence; and in the controversy regarding the Marrow of Modern Divinity, he defended the anonymous Puritan soldier's book against the charge that it was too free in its offers of salvation. See Life by Rev. A. Thomson (1895).

Boswell, JAMES, Johnson's biographer, was born at Edinburgh, 18th October 1740. The eldest son of Lord Auchinleck, a judge in the Court of Session, who took his (official) title from his Ayrshire estate, he was educated at the Edinburgh High School and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. A restless itch for writing made him, a boy of eighteen, keep an 'exact journal,' write poems and prologues, and publish, at twenty-three, a series of would-be witty letters. During his second visit to London (1763) he had the supreme happiness to make the acquaintance of Dr Johnson. The disciple's reverence seems to have touched the master's heart, and the acquaintance quickly ripened into a warm friendship. At Utrecht Boswell spent one winter between study and dissipation, and on a tour through Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, made the acquaintance of Voltaire and Rousseau. With a letter of introduction from Rousseau to Paoli (q.v.), he repaired to Corsica, and for a time played the great Englishman to his heart's content. His Account of Corsica (1768) had a great success. Soon after his return he was admitted advocate (1766). In 1769 he married his cousin, a prudent and amiable woman, who bore him seven children. The old judge allowed his son £300 a year, and from time to time paid his debts with grumbling and threats. Boswell never became a prosperous lawyer, and made visits to London almost every year. In 1773 he was elected a member of the famous Literary Club, and with Johnson made the memorable journey to the Hebrides. Boswell, by Croker's calculation, met Johnson in all on only 180 days, or 276 including the Scotch tour. In 1775 he entered the Inner Temple, and was called to the English bar in 1786; in 1782 he had succeeded, on his father's death, to an estate of £1600 a year. He now made some attempts to enter on a political career, but his sole prize was the recordership of Carlisle, which he resigned in a year. In 1789 his wife died, and henceforward his drinking habits gained the better of him; but from his drunkard's hypochondria and money difficulties he found refuge in the preparation of his Life of Johnson (1791). The book was received with delight; a second edition was issued in 1793. But his success failed to lift him out of his gloom and intemperance, his health gave way, and he died in London, 19th May 1795. Boswell's Life of Johnson is admittedly our greatest biography, and many have wondered how it could have been written by a man of such weakness and vanity as Boswell. But vanity and folly by no means made up his whole mental equipment; the man who could retain the friendship of Samuel Johnson was something more than a parasite and a fool. The Life is not nearly so much the work of memory as of artistic reproduction; he adds not one word too much, but gives us the most vivid dramatic pictures by a few simple but subtle strokes. The best editions are those by Napier (4 vols. 1884; two supplementary vols. contain Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides and 'Johnsoniana') and by Dr Birkbeck Hill (6 vols. 1887). See also Boswell's Letters to Temple (1856); Boswelliana (1874), by Charles Rogers; and Lives by Percy Fitzgerald (1891) and W. Keith Leask (1897). The famous essays by Macaulay and Carlyle contradict rather than correct each other.—Bosworth's eldest son, ALEXANDER (1775–1822), educated at Westminster and Oxford, set up at Auchinleck a private press, at which he printed many rare books in early English and Scottish literature, besides a volume of vigorous poems in the Ayrshire dialect (1803); in 1817 he contributed twelve songs to Thomson's Select Collection, of which 'Good-night, and joy be wi' ye a', 'Jenny's Bawbee,' and 'Jenny dang the Weaver' are still popular. He was created a baronet in 1821, and died, 27th March 1822, of a wound received the day before in his duel with James Stuart of Dunearn, who had challenged him as the author of anonymous political pasquinades.—James's younger son, JAMES BOSWELL (1778–1822), edited the third Variorum Shakespeare (21 vols. 1821).

Bosworth, JOSEPH, D.D., Anglo-Saxon scholar, was born in Derbyshire in 1789, and died at Oxford, 27th May 1876, having been professor of Anglo-Saxon there from 1858, and having in 1867 given £10,000 towards the establishment of a professorship of Anglo-Saxon at Cambridge. His chief works were Elements of Anglo-Saxon Grammar (1823) and An Anglo-Saxon Dictionary (1838).

Both, ANDREAS (1609–50) and JAN (1610–52), brothers, were born at Utrecht, and won a high reputation as painters in Italy. [Boat.]

Botha, LOUIS, born in 1863 at Greytown in Natal, was a member of the Transvaal Volksraad, succeeded Joubert as commander-in-chief of the Boer forces during the war, and in 1907 became prime-minister of the Transvaal colony under the new constitution. In the same year he came to England for the colonial conference, and in 1910 he became the first premier of the Union of South Africa. [Bō'ta.]

Bothwell, JAMES HEPBURN, EARL OF, born in 1536 or 1537, in 1556 succeeded his father as fourth earl and as hereditary Lord High Admiral. One of the greatest nobles in Scotland, he professed adherence to the Reformation, but stood staunchly by Mary of Guise, the Queen-regent, who in 1558 made him Warden of the Border Marches, and in 1560 sent him on a mission to France. Then it was that he first saw Queen Mary, and then that Throckmorton described him to Elizabeth as 'a glorious, rash, and hazardous young man.' In 1561, shortly after her landing at Leith, Mary made him a privy-councillor; but his own turbulence and Moray's jealousy made the next three years of his life a period of captivity or exile—captivity first at Edinburgh Castle, and then for more than a twelvemonth in England. Not till her marriage with Darnley did Mary recall him from France; but, on 20th September 1565, she restored him to all his dignities; and five months later he married at Holyrood, with Protestant rites, the Catholic sister of the Earl of Huntly. By hostile accounts, he had ere this had many mistresses, and was addicted to far fouler vices. Then came the murder of Rizzio by Darnley (9th March 1566), Bothwell's appointment as keeper of Dunbar, Mary's visit to him at Hermitage Castle, where he was lying sore wounded by the outlaw Jock Elliot (16th October), Darnley's murder by Bothwell (9th February 1567), the mock trial and acquittal (12th April), Mary's abduction to Dunbar (23d April), Bothwell's divorce (3d and 7th May), his elevation to the dukedom of Orkney (12th May), his marriage to Mary (15th May), and the last parting at Carberry Hill (15th June). On the 27th he sailed from Dunbar, and driven by a storm over to Norway, on 2d September was brought by a Danish warship into Bergen. He never regained his freedom, but from 1568 was imprisoned at Malmøe, and from 1573, more rigorously, at Dragsholm in Zealand, where he seems to have gone mad before his death, on 14th April 1578. See his Life by Professor Schiern (Danish, 1863; 2d ed. 1875; Eng. trans. 1880).

Botolph, St., is said to have founded a monastery at Boston in 654, and died in 660.

Botta, CARLO GIUSEPPE GUOLIELMO (1766–1837), an Italian poet and historian, who lived much in France. See Life by Pavesio (1874).—His son, PAUL EMILE BOTTA (1802–70), archaeologist, had travelled in the New World, Egypt, and Arabia, when in 1843 he began to explore the heaps of ruins near the Tigris, described in his magnificent Monuments de Ninive (1847–50). In 1846 he was appointed French consul-general at Jerusalem, and in 1857 at Tripoli.

Bottesini, GIOVANNI (1823–89), the greatest master of the double-bass fiddle, was born at Crema in Lombardy. [Bot-teh-zee'nee.]

Böttger, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1682–1719), the improver about 1710 of the porcelain manufacture at Meissen, Saxony. [Beh't-ger.]

Botticelli, SANDRO, originally Alessandro Filipepi, was born at Florence in 1444, a tanner's son. Botticello was the nickname of his elder brother Giovanni, a broker. Showing signs of genius for painting, he was sent about 1458 to the school of Fra Lippo Lippi. He produced many works on classical subjects—the finest his 'Birth of Venus,' in the Uffizi, and his 'Primavera' (Spring), in the Florence Academy. His numerous devotional pictures are marked by much imaginative refinement—the 'Coronation of the Virgin,' in the Florence Academy, and the large circular 'Madonna and Child,' in the Uffizi, being famous examples. The 'Assumption of the Virgin,' in the National Gallery, is not by him, but by Francesco Botticini. Other great works are 'Mars and Venus,' in the National Gallery; a 'Nativity,' also there; and three frescoes, representing the 'Life of Moses,' the 'Destruction of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram,' and the 'Temptation of Christ,' executed in 1481–82, in the Sistine Chapel at the Vatican. Botticelli was powerfully impressed by the teaching of Savonarola; and in his later years occupied himself with illustrating Dante. His eighty-four pen and silver-point drawings, illustrating the Divina Commedia, were acquired by the Berlin Museum at the Hamilton Palace sale. They have been admirably reproduced, with eight in the Vatican (Berl. 1884–89). Botticelli died 17th May 1510. See monographs by Ullmann (1894), Streeter (1903), Julia Cartwright (1904), Diehl (1906), and Horne (1908). [Bot-tee-chel'lee.] Bötticher, KARL (1806–89), writer on Greek architecture, was born at Nordhausen, and died at Berlin. See works by Blankenstein (1889) and Clarissa Lohde (1890), his wife, a novelist.

Bouch, STR THOMAS (1822–80), the engineer of the Tay Bridge (1878), whose fall the next year was his death.

Boucher, FRANÇOIS (1703–70), a painter of much industry and ability, who modelled himself on Watteau, and who was born and died in Paris, having become a member of the Academy (1734), and painter to Louis XV. See works by Mantz (1880), Michel (1886), Kahn (1905). [Boo-shayf.]

Boucher, JONATHAN (1738-1804), born in Cumberland, was a tutor and clergyman, a staunch loyalist, in America (1754-75), and in 1785 became vicar of Epsom. His projected Archaic and Provincial Glossary came practically to nought.

Boucher de Crèvecœur de Perthes, JACQUES (1788-1868), French archaeologist, whose discoveries at Moulin Quignon, evidence of the antiquity of man, were received with incredulity.

Boucicault, DION, dramatist and actor, was born at Dublin, 26th Dec. 1822, was educated at University College, London, and died in New York, 18th Sept. 1890. Among his 140 and more original pieces and adaptations, produced since 1841, were The Colleen Bawn (1860), The Octoroon (1861), Flying Scud (1866), Arrah-na-Pogue (1864), Formosa (1869), The Shaughraun (1875), and The Jilt (1886). Boué, AMI (1794-1881), geologist, was born at Hamburg, lived in Paris, and died at Vienna. He published six works in French. [Boo-ayf.]

Bouffers, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, DUC DE (1644-1711), served under Condé, Turenne, and Catinat in the wars of Louis XIV., with such distinction that he received the marshal's baton in 1693. His famous defence of Namur against William III. in 1695, and of Lille against Prince Eugene in 1708, made him a duke and peer of France. After the defeat of Malplaquet in 1709, he conducted the French retreat with admirable skill.—His son, JOSEPH MARIE, Duc de Bouffers (1706-47), was likewise a marshal of France. [Boo-fair.]

Bouffers, STANISLAS, MARQUIS DE (1737-1815), commonly styled the Chevalier de Bouffers, was born at Lunéville, the son of the witty Marquis de Bouffers, who played a brilliant part at the court of Stanislaus, the exiled king of Poland. He rose to be marshal, and was a poet and literary man much admired in French salons.

Bougainville, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, navigator, was born at Paris, 11th November 1729. In 1756 he served with distinction in Canada as Montcalm's aide-de-camp, as also in the campaign of 1761 in Germany. Then entering the naval service, he accomplished the first French circumnavigation of the world (1766-69), which he described in his valuable Voyage autour du Monde. In the American war he commanded several ships of the line, and in 1779 was made chef d'escadre, in 1780 a field-marshal in the army. After the outbreak of the Revolution he devoted himself solely to scientific pursuits. By Napoleon I. he was made a senator, count of the empire, and member of the Legion of Honour. He died 31st August 1811. [Boo-gan-veel.]

Bough, SAMUEL, landscape-painter, was born, a shoemaker's son, at Carlisle, 8th January 1822. He never received any systematic art instruction, but during 1845-49 was a scene-painter in Manchester and Glasgow. In 1855 he settled in Edinburgh, where he died 19th November 1878, having been elected an A.R.S.A. in 1857, and an R.S.A. in 1875. His water-colours are of more uniform excellence than his oil pictures; they are strongly influenced by David Cox, and are especially remarkable for the delicate gray tones of their skies. See book by S. Gilpin (1909). [Bow.]

Boughton, GEORGE HENRY (1836-1905), painter, was born near Norwich, and at three was taken to Albany, New York, but in 1861 settled definately in London. Several of his pictures represent the old Puritan life in New England.

Bouguer, PIERRE (1698-1758), physicist, born at Croisic in Brittany, in 1735 was sent with others to Peru to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator. There in 1735-42 they investigated the length of the seconds pendulum at great elevations, the deviation of the plumb-line through the attraction of a mountain, the limit of perpetual snow, the obliquity of the ecliptic, &c. Bouguer's views on the intensity of light laid the foundation of photometry; in 1748 he invented the heliometer. [Boo-gay.]

Bouguereau, WILLIAM ADOLPHE, born at La Rochelle, 30th November 1825, studied art while engaged in business at Bordeaux, and proceeding to Paris, in 1850 gained the Grand Prix de Rome. He returned from Italy in 1855, having the year before first made a distinct mark by 'The Body of St Cecilia borne to the Catacombs,' which, with his 'Mater Afflictorum' (1876, purchased by government for 12,000 francs), is now in the Luxembourg. He died in August 1905. [Boog-rô.]

Bouhours, DOMINIQUE (1628-1702), Jesuit, critic, biographer, was born and died at Paris.

Bouilhet, LOUIS (1821-69), poet and dramatist, was born at Cany in Seine Inférieure, and died at Rouen. See Lives by Angot (1885) and De la Ville de Mirmont (1888). [Boo-yayf.]

Bouillé, FRANÇOIS CLAUDE AMOUR, MARQUIS DE, French general, was born in 1739 at the castle of Cluzel in Auvergne, entered the army at fourteen, and served with distinction during the Seven Years' War. In 1768 he was appointed governor of Guadeloupe, and afterwards commander-in-chief in the West Indies. When war broke out in 1778, he took from the British Dominica, Tobago, St Eustache, Saba, St Martin, St Christopher's, and Nevis. Louis XVI. nominated him a member of the Assembly of Notables in 1787-88; in 1790 he was made commander-in-chief of the army of the Meuse, Saar, and Moselle. Forced to flee from France for his share in the attempted escape of Louis XVI., in 1791 he entered the service of Gustavus III. of Sweden, and afterwards served under the Prince of Condé. He refused in 1793 to take the chief command in La Vendée; and went to England, where he wrote his Mémoires sur la Révolution. He died in London, 14th November 1800. See Gabriel's Louis XVI., Bouillé, et Varennes (1874). [Boo-yay.]

Bouilly, JEAN NICOLAS (1762-1842), a prolific French dramatist, the 'poète lacrymal,' and writer for the young, was born at La Coudraye, near Tours, and died at Paris. See Life by Carré de Busserolles (Tours, 1875). [Boo-yeec.]

Boulainvilliers, HENRI, COMTE DE (1658-1722), born at St Saire in Normandy, resigned the military profession and devoted himself to writing (posthumous) works on the ancient families of France. [Boo-lan-vee-yay.]

Boulanger, GEORGES ERNEST JEAN MARIE, French general, was born at Rennes, 20th April 1837, and educated at St Cyr. He served in Italy, China, the Franco-German war, and against the Commune, being several times wounded, and through radical influence was minister of war from January 1886 to May 1887. As such he urged forward the expulsion of his former patron, the Duc d'Aumale, and the other Orleans princes, and through the introduction of some army reforms and the appearance of a fortunate music-hall song in his praise, was adopted as the embodiment of the 'revenge' policy by the Parisians, who for some months suffered from what was termed the Boulanger fever. In 1887, while commanding at Clermont-Ferrand, he was, for remarks on the then war minister, ordered under arrest; in 1888, for disobedience to orders, he was deprived of his command, but immediately elected deputy for Dordogne and Nord. He was wounded in a duel with M. Floquet, the minister-president, in the same year. Boulangism became really formidable in 1889, and was supported with large sums of money by leading Royalists for their own ends. But when the government prosecuted Boulanger he lost courage and fled the country. He was condemned in absence; his schemes wholly collapsed, and on 30th September 1891 he shot himself on his mistress's grave in a cemetery in Brussels. See French works by Chincholle (1889) and Verly (1893). [Boo-lon'-zhay.]

Boulay de la Meurthe, ANTOINE, COMTE (1761-1840), a French statesman, who espoused the Revolution, but opposed Jacobinism, and under the Empire had an important part in preparing the Code Civil. His chief work was Bourrienne et ses Erreurs (1830). [Boo-lay-de-la-Mert.]

Boule. See BUHL.

Boulton, MATTHEW, engineer, was born 3d September 1728, at Birmingham, where his father was a silver stamper. Matthew extended the business by the purchase of a piece of barren heath at Soho, near Birmingham, his works there being opened in 1762. He entered into partnership with James Watt (q.v.), and in 1769 they established a manufactory of steam-engines, which proved remunerative only after eighteen anxious years. They improved also coining machinery—it was only in 1882 that a Boulton press at the Mint was finally discarded. Boulton died at Soho, 18th August 1809. See Smiles's Lives of Boulton and Watt (1865).

Bourbaki, CHARLES DENIS SAUTER, French general, born at Pau, 22d April 1816, fought in the Crimea and Italy. In 1870 he commanded the Imperial Guard at Metz; and under Gambetta he organised the Army of the North, and commanded the Army of the Loire. His attempt to break the Prussian line at Belfort, though ably conceived, ended in disaster; in a series of desultory attacks on a much inferior force, Jan. 15-17, 1871, he lost 10,000 men. In the wretched retreat to Switzerland that followed he attempted suicide. He retired in 1879, and died 17th Sept. 1897. See Life by Grandin (1897). [Boor-bah-kee.]

Bourbon, a French family which for generations occupied the thrones of France and Naples, and still reigns in Spain. It derived its name from the castle of Bourbon (now Bourbon-l'Archambault, 12 miles NW. of Moulins in dep. Allier). Adhémar, sire of Bourbon in the 10th century, traced his descent from Charles Martel. After several changes the seigniorship of Bourbon devolved upon an heiress, who in 1272 married Robert, the sixth son of Louis IX. of France, and the name and possessions of the house thus passed to a branch of the royal family of the Capets. From Duke Robert sprang two lines. The elder ended with the famous Constable de Bourbon (see BOURBON, CHARLES). A representative of the younger line inherited the possessions of the Constable, and became Duke of Vendôme. His son, Antoine, obtained by marriage the throne of Navarre, and Antoine's son was the famous Henry of Navarre (Henry IV.) who in 1589, on the extinction of the male line of Valois, fell heir to the crown of France. See the articles on Henry IV., Louis XIII.—XVIII., Charles X., and Chambord (Comte de). From a younger son of Louis XIII. the Orleans branch (see ORLEANS, DUKE OF) descends. From Louis XIV. descend also the branches that held or hold the thrones of Spain, Parma, and Naples. A younger brother of Antoine (Henry IV.'s father) founded the houses of Condé (q.v.) and Conti (q.v.). The branch of Montpensier was founded in the 15th century. The sons and grandsons of Louis Philippe held titles derived from Paris, Chartres, Nemours, Eu, Joinville, Annapole, and Montpensier. See works by Achaintre (1825), Coiffier de Moret (1828), Mure (1860-68), Dussieux (1869), and Bingham (1889).

Bourbon, CHARLES (1490-1527), known as 'the Constable de Bourbon,' was son of Gilbert de Bourbon, Count of Montpensier, and the only daughter of the Duke of Bourbon. He thus united the vast estates of both these branches of the Bourbon family; and for his bravery at the battle of Marignano in 1515 he was made Constable of France. But powerful enemies strove to undermine him in the favour of Francis I.; and, threatened with the loss of some of his lands and dignities, he renounced the service of France, and concluded a private alliance with the Emperor Charles V., and with Henry VIII. of England. At the head of a force of German mercenaries he joined the Spanish army in Lombardy in 1523, and, invading France in 1524, failed at the siege of Marseilles. Next year, however, he was chief commander at the great victory of Pavia, in which Francis I. was taken prisoner. But Charles V. distrusted him, though he made him Duke of Milan and Spanish commander in Northern Italy. Along with George of Frundsberg he led the mixed army of Spanish and German mercenaries that stormed and plundered Rome in 1527. Bourbon was struck down in the fierce struggle—by a bullet fired by Benvenuto Cellini, as the latter asserted.

Bourchier, THOMAS (c. 1404-86), Archbishop of Canterbury, became Bishop of Worcester in 1434, of Ely in 1444, Archbishop in 1454, and a cardinal in 1473, having also been lord chancellor (1455-56). See vol. v. of Hook's Lives of the Archbishops.

Bourdaloue, LOUIS (1632-1704), pulpit orator, was born at Bourges, and filled in succession the chairs of Rhetoric, Philosophy, and Moral Theology in the Jesuit College of his native place, but was chiefly memorable as a powerful and eloquent preacher in Paris and at court. The year after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he was sent to Montpellier to bring back the Protestants to the Roman Catholic Church. In his later years he relinquished the pulpit, and devoted his time to hospitals, prisons, and pious institutions. See Lives of him by Lauras (1881) and Fenguère (5th ed. 1888). [Boor-da-loo.]

Bourdon de l'Oise, FRANÇOIS LOUIS (1760?-97), took part in storming the Tuileries, sat in the Convention, voted for the execution of Louis XVI., but, afterwards at enmity with the followers of Robespierre and other extremists, was in 1797 transported by the Directory to Cayenne, where he died. [Boor-don'-del-uahz'.]

Bourgelat, CLAUDE (1712-99), veterinary surgeon, was born and died in Lyons, and founded there in 1761 the first veterinary school in Europe. [Boorz-h-lah.]

Bourgeois, SIR PETER FRANCIS (1756-1811), landscape-painter, was born in London of Swiss parentage, became a R.A. in 1793. [Boorz-h-uah.]

Bourget, PAUL, novelist, was born at Amiens, September 2, 1852, and, after a brilliant course at the lycée of Clermont-Ferrand and the Collège de Sainte Barbe, graduated with the highest honours in 1872. In 1894 he was elected to the Academy. He began to write in 1873, and published three volumes of striking verse: La Vie Inquiète (1875), Edel (1878), and Les Avezu (1881). His Essais (1883) was the first indication of his true strength; the second series, Nouveaux Essais de Psychologie contemporaine (1886), was a singularly subtle inquiry into the causes of pessimism in France. Bourget's first novel, L'Irréparable (1884), was followed by Cruelle Énigme (1885), Un Crime d'Amour (1886), André Cornelis et Mensonges (1887), Notre Cœur (1890), La Terre Promise (1892), L'Idylle Tragique (1895), Voyageurs (1897), La Duchesse Bleue (1898), Un Divorce (1905), Les Deux Sœurs (1905), L'Émigré (1907), &c. Other works are Sensations d'Italie (1892) and Outre Mer (1895), on the United States. His later works (since 1892) show a marked reaction from realism and scepticism towards mysticism. [Boor-zhay.]

Bourignon, ANTOINETTE, born at Lille, 13th January 1616, believing herself called to restore the pure spirit of the gospel, fled from home, entered a convent, had charge of a hospital at Lille, at Amsterdam (1667) gathered followers and printed enthusiastic works, but was driven out, founded a hospital in East Friesland, and died at Franeker, 30th October 1680. Bourignonism about 1720 so prevailed in Scotland that till 1859 a solemn renunciation was demanded from every entrant on the ministry. Her works were edited by Poiret (25 vols. Amsterdam, 1676-84; 2d ed. 1717). See book by MacEwen (1910). [Boor-in-yon.]

Bourmont, LOUIS DE GHAINSES, COMTE DE (1773-1846), a French marshal, the conqueror of Algiers, was born and died at his paternal castle of Bourmont, in Anjou. He went into exile at the Revolution, but from 1794 to 1799 was engaged in the struggle in La Vendée. Subsequently he obtained the favour of Napoleon, and for his brilliant services in 1813-14 was made general. In 1814 he declared for the Bourbons; yet, on Napoleon's return from Elba, he went over to him, only once more to desert on the eve of Ligny. His evidence went far to bring about Ney's execution. He was appointed minister of war in 1829, and in 1830 received the command of the expedition against Algiers. His rapid success won him the marshal's baton, but on the July Revolution he was superseded, and went to England to share the exile of Charles X. In 1833 Dom Miguel of Portugal placed him at the head of his troops, but the brief campaign was unsuccessful. [Boor-mon.]

Bourne, HUGH, the founder of the Primitive Methodists, was born 3d April 1772, at Fordhays, Stoke-upon-Trent, and died at Bemersley, 11th October 1852. His zeal as a Wesleyan preacher for large open-air meetings, carried on once from 6 A.M. till 8 P.M., received no countenance from the leaders of the denomination; and in 1808 he was cut off from the Wesleyan connection. But he quickly gathered round him many devoted adherents; and in 1810 a committee of ten members was formed at Standley, near Bemersley. The title of Primitive Methodists was adopted in 1812; by the people they were sometimes called Ranters. Bourne and his brother founded the first chapel of the body at Tunstall in 1811. For the greater part of his life he worked as a carpenter and builder, but found time to visit Scotland, Ireland, and the United States. Amongst his writings was a History of the Primitive Methodists (1823). [Boorn.]

Bourne, VINCENT (1695-1747), Latin poet, from Westminster passed in 1714 to Trinity College, Cambridge, and after obtaining a fellowship in 1720, became a master in his old school. Cowper, one of his pupils, expressed his 'love for the memory of Vinny Bourne,' and actually thought him 'a better Latin poet than Tibullus, Propertius, Ausonius, and not at all inferior to Ovid,' Lamb, more happily, remarks: 'What a sweet, unpretending, pretty-mannered, matterful creature! Sucking from every flower, making a flower of everything. His diction all Latin, and his thoughts all English!' Mitford's edition (1840) of his Poemata (1734) has a memoir.

Bourrienne, LOUIS ANTOINE FAUVELET DE (1769-1834), was born at Sens, and at the military school of Brienne formed the closest intimacy with Napoleon, who in 1797 made him his secretary. He accompanied him to Italy and to Egypt, and in 1801 was nominated a councillor of state. In 1802 he was dismissed for being implicated in a dishonourable bankruptcy; but in 1804 he was appointed to a post at Hamburg. He was recalled on a charge of peculation, and had to refund 1,000,000 francs. He now decidedly joined the party which sought the restoration of the Bourbons. After their return in 1815 he sat in the Chamber of Representatives, where he figured as an opponent of Liberalism. He was also for a short time minister of state. The revolution of 1830 and the loss of his fortune (occasioned by extravagance) caused his reason to give way, and he died in an asylum at Caen. His Mémoires (10 vols. 1829; new ed. 1895; trans. 1893), an untrustworthy authority for Napoleon's life, are probably not by him. See D'Almeida's Souvenirs de Bourrienne (1894). [Boor-ri-en.]

Boussingault, JEAN BAPTISTE (1802-87), agricultural chemist, was born and died in Paris, and was professor of Chemistry at Lyons. See his Mémoires (1892). [Boos-san-gó.]

Bouterwek, FRIEDRICH (1765-1828), was born at Oker, near Goslar, and from 1797 was professor of Philosophy at Göttingen. Of his Geschichte der neuern Poesie und Beredsamkeit (12 vols. 1801-19), the part relating to Spanish literature was translated into Spanish (1828) and English (1823).

Boutwell, GEORGE SEWALL (1818-1905), an American statesman, born at Brookline, Massachusetts, was a member of the state legislature (1842-51), and governor of Massachusetts (1851 and 1852). Having joined the Republican party, in 1862 he organised the new department of internal revenue, and sat in congress from 1862 to 1869, taking a leading part in the impeachment of President Johnson (1868). He was secretary of the treasury 1869-73, and for two years after represented Massachusetts in the senate. Besides speeches, he has published Educational Topics and Institutions (1858), works on United States taxes (1863 and 1865), and The Lawyer, the Statesman, and the Soldier (1887).

Bowdich, THOMAS EDWARD, African traveller, was born at Bristol, 20th June 1791, for a year was a hatter there, but in 1814 received an African Company writhepsip. He conducted a successful mission to Ashanti (1816); and on his return (1818) studied mathematics, &c., in Paris to such purpose as to gain a Cambridge prize of £1000. Aggrieved at his treatment by the African Company, he exposed their management in a volume which led government to take over their possessions. In 1822 he began a trigonometrical survey of the Gambia, where he died of fever, 16th January 1824. See his Mission to Ashanti (1819; new ed. 1873), and the narrative of his last voyage, edited by his wife (1825).

Bowditch, NATHANIEL, LL.D. (1773-1838), mathematician and astronomer, born at Salem, Mass., died at Boston, having been a cooper, ship-chandler, clerk, supercargo, master of a merchant-ship, and from 1823 an actuary. He published New American Practical Navigator (1802) and an admirable translation of Laplace's Mécanique Céleste (1829-38). See Memoir by his son (1839).

Bowdler, THOMAS (1754-1825), editor of the 'Family Shakespeare' (1818) and of a 'bowdlerised' Gibbon (1820), was born of rich parents at Ashley, Bath, and died at Rhyddings, Swansea.

Bowdoin, JAMES (1727-90), an American statesman and scientist, of Huguenot descent, in 1785-86 governor of Massachusetts. [Bo'den.]

Bowen, CHARLES SYNGE CHRISTOPHER, LORD (1835-94), born at Woollaston rectory, Chepstow, and educated at Lille, Rugby, and Balliol, became Recorder of Penzance (1871) and a Lord Justice of Appeal (1882). See Life by Cunningham (1897).

Bowen, FRANCIS (1811-90), an American writer on philosophy and political economy, was born at Charlestown, Mass., and died at Cambridge. See his Gleanings from a Literary Life (1880).

Bowen, SIR GEORGE FERGUSON (1821-99), born at Taughboyne, Co. Donegal, from the Charterhouse passed to Trinity, Oxford, in 1844 obtained a Brasenose fellowship, and became governor of Queensland (1859), New Zealand (1868), Victoria (1873), Mauritius (1875), and Hong-kong (1883), and royal commissioner at Malta (1888). He was made a G.C.M.G. in 1860. Stanley Lane Poole has edited his Thirty Years of Colonial Government (1889). [Bo'en.]

Bower, ARCHIBALD (1686-1766), ex-Jesuit author of a History of the Popes (7 vols. 1748-66), was born at Dundee, and died in London.

Bower, or BOWMAKER, WALTER (1385-1449), abbot of Incheolm in the Firth of Forth, continued the Latin Scottichronicon of Fordun (q.v.) from 1153 to 1437. See Goodall's edition (Edin. 1759).

Bowerbank, JAMES SCOTT, LL.D., F.R.S. (1797-1877), a London distiller, geologist, naturalist, and microscopist. His speciality was sponges.

Bowes, MARJORY, the first wife of Knox (q.v.).

Bowie, COLONEL JIM (c. 1790-1836), inventor of the curved dagger or sheath-knife named after him, fell in the Texan war. [Bo'ey.]

Bowles, CAROLINE ANNE. See SOUTHEY.

Bowles, WILLIAM LISLE, D.D., poet, was born 24th September 1762, at King's Sutton vicarage, Northamptonshire. Educated at Winchester and Trinity College, Oxford, in 1804 he became a prebendary of Salisbury and rector of Bremhill, in Wiltshire. Here he spent in easy circumstances the rest of his long life, dying at Salisbury, 7th April 1850. His Fourteen Sonnets, written chiefly on Picturesque Spots during a Journey (1789), had Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey among their enthusiastic admirers; and through his influence over them Bowles may be looked on as the founder of a school of English poetry in which his own name was soon eclipsed by theirs. Of his subsequent poetical works (14 vols. 1789-1837) the longest is The Spirit of Discovery, and the best, perhaps, The Missionary of the Andes. In 1806 he published an edition of Pope, and an opinion which he expressed on Pope's poetical merits led to a rather memorable controversy (1809-25) in which Campbell and Byron were his antagonists. Of his prose writings may be mentioned a rather dry Life of Bishop Ken (2 vols. 1830). See the Memoir by Gillilan (prefixed to his collected poems (Edin. 1855)). [Boles.]

Bowman, SIR WILLIAM, Bart. (cre. 1884), oculist, was born in Nantwich, 20th July 1816, and died in London, 29th March 1892. With Todd he published Physiological Anatomy (5 vols. 1845-56), and gained a high reputation by his Lectures on Operations on the Eye (1849). His Collected Papers appeared in 1892. [Bo'man.]

Bowring, SIR JOHN, born in Exeter, 17th Oct. 1792, on leaving school entered a merchant's office, and there pursued that course of polyglot study whereby, as he afterwards boasted, he knew two hundred, and could speak a hundred, languages. The national poetry of different peoples had special attractions for him, and he translated the folk-songs of almost all the countries of Europe. In 1821 he formed a close friendship with Jeremy Bentham (q.v.), and in 1824 became the first editor of his radical Westminster Review. His Sketch of the Language and Literature of Holland (1829) procured for him the degree of Doctor of Laws from Groningen. He visited Switzerland, Italy, Egypt, Syria, and the countries of the Zollverein, and prepared valuable government reports on their commerce. He sat in parliament for Kilmarnock from 1835 to 1837, for Bolton from 1841 to 1849, and actively promoted the adoption of free trade. From 1849 to 1853 he was British consul at Hong-kong; in 1854 he was knighted and made governor. In 1856 an insult having been offered to a Chinese pirate bearing the British flag (the 'affair of the lorcha Arrow'), Bowring ordered the bombardment of Canton, a proceeding which nearly upset the Palmerston ministry. In 1855 he concluded a commercial treaty with Siam, in 1858 made a tour through the Philippines; and his accounts of those two visits are about the most readable of thirty-six works. He retired in 1859, and died at Claremont, Exeter, 23d November 1872. See his Autobiographical Reminiscences (1877).

Bowyer, SIR GEORGE, born in 1811 at Radley, near Oxford, in 1839 was called to the bar. Converted to Catholicism in 1850, he represented Dundalk 1852-68, and the county of Wexford 1874-80; his Home Rule principles estranged him from the Liberal party, and in 1876 led to his expulsion from the Reform Club. He succeeded his father as seventh baronet in 1860, and died suddenly in London, 7th June 1883. He wrote several able works on constitutional law and Catholic subjects. [Bo'yer.]

Bowyer, WILLIAM (1699-1777), London printer and classical scholar, studied at St John's College, Cambridge, and in 1722 went into partnership with his father, William Bowyer (1663-1737). In 1767 he was nominated printer to the two Houses of Parliament. He published several philological tracts, translated Rousseau's paradoxical Discourse (1751), and wrote two essays on the Origin of Printing (1774); but his chief production was a Greek New Testament.

Boxall, SIR WILLIAM (1800-79), portrait-painter, from 1865 to 1874 was director of the National Gallery. He was elected an A.R.A. in 1851, an R.A. in 1863, and was knighted in 1867.

Boyce, WILLIAM (1710-79), born in London, in 1736 was appointed composer to the Chapel-royal, in 1758 organist. He holds a high rank as a composer of church music; his works include the song 'Hearts of Oak,' the serenata of Solomon (1743), and a valuable collection of Cathedral Music (3 vols. 1760).

Boycott, CAPTAIN CHARLES C., the agent for Lord Erne in County Mayo, as one of the first victims in 1880 of Mr Parnell's system of social excommunication gave in the verb 'to boycott' a new word to most European languages. He died at Flixton, Bungay, 21st June 1897.

Boyd, ANDREW KENNEDY HUTCHISON, D.D., LL.D., born in Auchinleck manse, Ayrshire, 3d November 1825, was educated at King's College, London, and Glasgow University. He studied for the English bar, in 1851 received Presbyterian ordination, and had been minister of Newton-on-Ayr, Kirkpatrick-Irongray, and St Bernard's, Edinburgh, before his settlement in 1865 at St Andrews. He became known by his essays in Fraser's Magazine signed A.K.H.B., and reprinted as Recreations of a Country Parson (3 series, 1859-61). He poisoned himself accidentally at Bourne-mouth, March 1, 1899. See his Twenty-five Years of St Andrews (2 vols. 1892), St Andrews and Elsewhere (1895), and Last Years of St Andrews (1896).

Boyd, BENJAMIN (c. 1796-1851), from 1841 a great Australian squatter, was born at Merton Hall, Wigtownshire, failed in his scheme to make 'Boyd Town' in New South Wales a great commercial port, and disappeared in the Solomon Islands on his way back from California.

Boyd, MARK ALEXANDER (1563-1601), a Scottish Latinist and free-lance, who was born and died at Penkill Castle, Ayrshire.

Boyd, ZACHARY (c. 1585-1653), Scottish divine, was educated at Kilmarnock and at the universities of Glasgow and St Andrews, afterwards becoming a regent or professor of the Protestant college of Saumur in France. Returning to Scotland in 1621, he was two years later appointed minister of the Barony parish, Glasgow, and was thrice elected rector of the university. His principal prose work, The Last Battell of the Soule in Death (1629), was reprinted, with a life of the author, by Gabriel Neil, in 1831; of the quaint Zion's Flowers (1644)—mostly metrical versions of Scripture history, and commonly called 'Boyd's Bible'—a selection was reprinted in 1855; and the Four Letters of Comfort (1640) were reprinted in 1878. He left his MSS. and library, with a considerable legacy, to Glasgow University.

Boydell, JOHN (1719-1804), was born at Dorrington, Shropshire, in 1741 trudged up to London, where he learned engraving, started a print-shop, and in 1790 was Lord Mayor. From his 'Shakespeare Gallery' of 162 pictures by Opie, Reynolds, Northcote, West, &c., was engraved a superb volume of plates (1803) to accompany a splendid edition of Shakespeare's works (9 vols. fol., 1792-1801). The immense sums of money he spent on these illustrations brought him into difficulties.

Boye, KASPAR JOHANNES (1791-1853), a Danish poet and dramatist, born in Norway.

Boyen, LEOPOLD VON (1771-1848), Prussian general. See his Erinnerungen (3 vols. 1889-90).

Boyer, ALEXIS, BARON DE (1757-1833), a great French surgeon, was born a tailor's son at Uzerches in Limousin, and in 1805 was appointed first surgeon to Napoleon, whom he accompanied on his campaigns. [Bwah-yay.]

Boyer, JEAN PIERRE, president of Hayti, was born a mulatto, 28th February 1776, at Port-au-Prince. Sent early to France, in 1792 he entered the army, and distinguished himself against the British on their invasion of Hayti. He aided Pétion in overthrowing Dessalines in 1806, and establishing an independent republic in the western part of the island. President Pétion on his deathbed recommended him as his successor (1818). After the death of Christophe, he united the negro district with the mulatto in 1820, next year added also the eastern district, hitherto Spanish, and in 1825, for 150,000,000 francs, obtained recognition of independence from France. He governed Hayti well for fifteen years, but his partiality to the mulattoes made the pure negroes rise in insurrection in 1843. Boyer fled, and died at Paris, 9th July 1850.

Boyle, CHARLES (1676-1731), from 1703 fourth Earl of Orrery, in 1721 was imprisoned in the Tower as a Jacobite. In the great controversy on the Letters of Phalaris, he was Atterbury's stalking-horse against Bentley (q.v.); and the 'Orrery' was named in his honour by its inventor, George Graham.

Boyle, GEORGE DAVID, born in Edinburgh, 17th May 1828, the son of a Lord President, and educated at Edinburgh Academy, the Charterhouse, and Exeter College, Oxford, became vicar of Kidderminster in 1867, and in 1880 Dean of Salisbury. See his Recollections (1895).

Boyle, JOHN (1707-62), fifth Earl of Orrery (1731), and fifth Earl of Cork (1753), is remembered more by his rancorous Remarks on Swift (1751), his intimate friend, as was also Pope, than by an excellent translation of the Letters of Pliny (1751).

Boyle, RICHARD (1566-1643), the Great Earl of Cork, was born at Canterbury, of good family. After studying at Cambridge and the Middle Temple, he went over to Ireland with a few pounds in his pocket to hew his way to fortune (1588). He married an heiress, purchased large estates in Munster and improved them, promoted the immigration of English Protestants, and won the favour of Queen Elizabeth. He built bridges, founded harbours and towns, erected thirteen strong castles, and from his ironworks reaped £100,000. About 4000 persons found employment on his vast plantations. He was knighted in 1603; in 1620 became Viscount Dungarvan and Earl of Cork; and in 1631 was made lord high-treasurer, an office which remained hereditary in his family. In his old age the Munster rebels compelled him to turn his castle into a fortress, but he soon raised a little army, smote the rebels, and quenched rebellion in his borders.

Boyle, THE HON. ROBERT (1627-91), physicist, fourteenth child of the first Earl of Cork, was born at Lismore Castle in Munster, and after studying at Eton, and under the rector of Stalbridge, Dorset, went to the Continent for six years. On his return in 1644, he found himself in possession, by his father's death, of the manor of Stalbridge, where he devoted himself to chemistry and natural philosophy. He was one of the first members of the association (1645) which became the Royal Society. Settling at Oxford in 1654, he experimented in pneumatics, and improved the air-pump. As a director of the East India Company (for which he had procured the Charter) he worked for the propagation of Christianity in the East, circulated at his own expense translations of the Scriptures, and by bequest founded the 'Boyle Lectures' in defence of Christianity. In 1668 he took up residence in London with his sister, Lady Ranelagh, and gave much of his time to the Royal Society. In 1688 he shut himself up, in order to repair the loss caused by the accidental destruction of his MSS. He believed in the possibility of some of the alchemistic transmutations; but has justly been termed the true precursor of the modern chemist. He discovered 'Mariotte's law' seven years before Mariotte (q.v.). His complete works (with his correspondence and a Life by Dr Birch) were published in 5 vols. fol. (1744).

Boyle, ROGER (1621-79), soldier and statesman, was third son of the Earl of Cork, and in childhood was made Baron Broghill. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he in the Civil War first took the royalist side; but after the death of the king, came under the personal influence of Cromwell, and distinguished himself in the Irish campaign. He became one of Cromwell's special council, and a member of his House of Lords. On Cromwell's death, he tried to support Richard, but foreseeing that his cause was hopeless, crossed to Ireland, and secured it for the king. Four months after the Restoration he was made Earl of Orrery. He wrote poems, six tragedies, two comedies, a romance entitled Parthenissa (1654), and a Treatise of the Art of War (1677); and enjoyed the friendship of Davenant, Dryden, and Cowley.

Bozzaris, MARCOS (1788-1823), Greek patriot, was born at Suli in Epirus, and in 1803 was forced to retreat to the Ionian Isles by Ali Pasha (q.v.). In 1820 at the head of 800 expatriated Suliotas he gained several victories for Ali against the sultan; in 1822 he skilfully defended Missolonghi, but fell in an attack on the Turkish-Albanian army at Karpenisi. [Bot-tzah'rees.]

Brabourne, EDWARD HUGESSEN KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, LORD (1829-93), politician and writer of children's story-books, was born at Mersham Hatch, Kent, the seat of the Knatchbulls, and assumed his mother's name, Hugessen, in 1849. He was educated at Eton and Magdalene College, Oxford, entered parliament as a Liberal in 1857, and was under-secretary for the Home department and for the Colonies, but after his elevation to the peerage in 1880 turned a Conservative.

Braccio, or FORTEBRACCI, nicknames of Andrea de Montone (1368-1424), a free-lance who, born at Perugia, had given his sword to various causes, when in 1416 he obtained the sovereignty of his native city; in 1417 he held Rome for a time. Next he commanded the troops of Queen Joanna of Naples, and was created Count of Foggia and Prince of Capua. In 1423, by the queen's command, he was crowned Prince of Aquila and Capua. His ambition now soared to the throne of Naples itself. He overran Campania and Apulia, and advanced into Calabria, but in a battle before Aquila was wounded and taken prisoner. Three days later he died. [Bratch'yo.]

Brace, CHARLES LORINO, author and philanthropist, was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, 19th June 1826, and died in the Engadine, 11th August 1890. He founded the Children's Aid Society in 1853, and wrote notes of visits to Hungary (1852), Germany (1853) Norway (1857), and California (1869), besides The Races of the Old World (1863), Gesta Christi (1882), &c.

Bracegirdle, ANNE (c. 1663-1748), a lovely and virtuous actress, who played from 1688 to 1707.

Brachelli, HUO FRANZ (1824-92), statistician, was born at Brünn, and died in Vienna.

Brachet, AUGUSTE, philologist, was born at Tours, 29th July 1844, trained under Diez and Littré, and attached to the Bibliothèque Nationale in 1864. He held posts in the École des Hautes Etudes and École Polytechnique. Of his many works on philology, things Italian, and miscellaneous matters, the best known are his Grammaire Historique of French (1867; trans. 1869), which reached a 20th edition in ten years, and the Dictionnaire Étymologique (1870; trans. 1873). He died at Cannes, 31st May 1898. [Brah-shay.] Brachvogel, ALBERT EMIL (1824-78), a playwright and novelist, was born at Breslau.

Brackenbury, SIR HENRY, general, was born at Bolingbroke, Lincolnshire, 1st September 1837, and was educated at Tunbridge, Eton, and Woolwich. He entered the artillery in 1856, and served in the Indian Mutiny, the Ashanti campaign (1873-74), the Nile Expedition (1884-85), &c.; was made a member of the Council of India (1891), director-general of ordnance (1899-1904), and Privy Councillor (1904). He has published several works.

Bracton, HENRY DE, an ecclesiastic and jurist, was a 'justice itinerant,' in 1264 became arch-deacon of Barnstaple and chancellor of Exeter Cathedral, and died in 1268. His De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ, the earliest attempt at a systematic treatment of the body of English law, was first printed entire in 1569. A revised text and translation was edited by Sir Travers Twiss ('Rolls' series, 6 vols. 1878-83); and in 1887 Mr F. Maitland published a Collection of Cases, with proofs that this was the actual collection on which Bracton's treatise was founded.

Braddock, EDWARD, a British general, born in Perthshire about 1695, entered the Coldstream Guards in 1710, and, appointed to command against the French in America, on July 8, 1755, reached the Monongahela. On the 9th he pushed forward to invest Fort Duquesne (now Pittsburgh), when, 7 miles from it, he was attacked by a party of 900 French and Indians, and the dense cover exposed the British to a withering fire. After two hours' fighting, in which Braddock, whose bravery was never called in question, had four horses shot under him, and was mortally wounded, the survivors made a hasty retreat under Washington, the only one of Braddock's staff who escaped unhurt. No less than 63 out of 86 officers, and 914 out of 1373 men engaged, were killed or wounded. The French loss was trifling. Braddock died July 13, 1755, at Great Meadows, about 60 miles from the scene of his fatal surprise. See Winthrop Sargent's monograph (Philadelphia, 1855), and Parkman's Montcalm and Wolfe (1884).

Braddon, MARY ELIZABETH, novelist, was born in Soho Square, London, in 1837, the daughter of a solicitor. She early showed a turn for literature, which she indulged by sending verses, &c., to a Brighton newspaper. Neither a comedietta brought out at the Strand in 1860, a volume of verse, nor one or two novels, had had much success, when, in 1862, Lady Audley's Secret, the story of a golden-haired murderess, attained an enormous popularity, in three months reaching its eighth three-volume edition. Aurora Floyd (1863) was little less popular. Of over sixty novels by her, perhaps the best is Ishmael (1884), a tale of the Second Empire, which depends not so much on sensation as character. Several of them appeared in Temple Bar, St James's Magazine, and Belgravia, of which last magazine she was for some years editor. She married in 1874 the publisher, Mr John Maxwell (1825-95).

Bradford, JOHN (c. 1510-55), a Marian martyr, burnt at Smithfield, was born at Manchester, and in 1551 became a prebendary of St Paul's.

Bradford, WILLIAM (1590-1656), a 'Pilgrim Father', was born at Ansterfield, near Doncaster, and, having in 1608 escaped to Amsterdam, in 1620 sailed in the Mayflower, and in 1621 succeeded Carver as governor of Plymouth colony.

Bradford, WILLIAM (1663-1752), an early American printer, was a Leicestershire Quaker.

Bradlaugh, CHARLES, a social reformer, but vigorous anti-socialist, was born in London 28th September 1833. He was in turn errand-boy, small coal-merchant, and trooper at Dublin. Buying his discharge, he returned to London in 1853, became time-keeper to a builder, clerk to a solicitor, and ere long a busy secularist lecturer, and pamphleteer under the name of 'Iconoclast.' His voice was heard in all popular causes, alike on platforms throughout the country and in the pages of his National Reformer; in 1880 he was elected M.P. for Northampton. He claimed to make affirmation of allegiance in lieu of taking the parliamentary oath; but the House refused to allow him either to make oath or to affirm. He was thrice re-elected, and at length, in 1886, having taken the oath, was allowed to take his seat. In parliament he gained respect by his strong sense and debating power, and he earned wide popularity by his agitation against perpetual pensions. Of his writings the best known is the Impeachment of the House of Brunswick. His republication, in conjunction with Mrs Annie Besant (q.v.), of a pamphlet, The Fruits of Philosophy—a proposed solution of the over-population question—led in 1876 to a sentence of six months' imprisonment and a £200 fine, but the conviction was quashed on appeal. He died 30th January 1891. See Life by his daughter and J. M. Robertson (2 vols. 1894).

Bradley, EDWARD ('Cuthbert Bede,' 1827-89), was born at Kidderrminster, and educated at Durham University. His facetious description of Oxford life in Adventures of Verdant Green (1853-57) was the first and most popular of 26 works.

Bradley, FRANCIS HERBERT, half-brother of Dean Bradley, born 1846, studied at Marlborough and Merton, Oxford. He wrote Appearance and Reality (1893) and other philosophical works.

Bradley, GEORGE GRANVILLE (1821-1903), Dean Stanley's biographer, from Rugby passed to University College, Oxford, and became a fellow (1844), a Rugby master, in 1858 headmaster of Marlborough, in 1870 master of University College, and in 1881 dean of Westminster.

Bradley, JAMES, astronomer, was born at Sherborne, Gloucestershire, in 1693, and from Northleach grammar-school passed in 1711 to Balliol College, Oxford. His first discoveries were made in conjunction with his uncle, the Rev. James Pound, of Wanstead, Essex. He soon exhibited such a genius for mathematics and astronomy as won him the friendship of Halley and Sir Isaac Newton, and secured his election to the Royal Society in 1718. In 1719 he obtained the vicarage of Bridstow, and in 1720 a sinecure rectory in Pembrokeshire; but he resigned both in 1721 on his election to the Savilian professorship of Astronomy at Oxford. In 1729 he published his discovery of the aberration of light; in 1748 he discovered that the inclination of the earth's axis to the ecliptic is not constant. In 1742 he succeeded Halley as regius professor of Astronomy at Greenwich, and in 1752 he received a crown pension of £250 a year. He died at Chalford, Gloucestershire, 13th July 1762, and was buried at Minchinhampton. His 60,000 astronomical observations fill two folio vols. (1798-1805). See Rigand's Works and Correspondence of Bradley, with Memoir (1832).

Bradshaw, GEORGE (1801-53), originator in 1839 of railway guides, was a Manchester Quaker map-maker, and died of cholera at Christiania.

Bradshaw, HENRY, librarian, was born in London, 2d February 1831, of Anglo-Irish Quaker ancestry, but the son of a City banker. At Eton (1843-50) he rose to be head of the school, but from King's College, Cambridge, took only a second class. A master for two years at St Columba's College, Dublin (1854-56), he then entered the University Library, Cambridge, of which from 1867 he was head. He died 10th Feb. 1886. His published writings only partially illustrate his amazing knowledge of Celtic and ecclesiastical antiquities, Chaucer, early printing, &c. See Memoir by Prothero (1889).

Bradshaw, JOHN, regicide, born near Stockport in 1602, in 1627 was called to the bar at Gray's Inn. 'He practised,' says his friend Milton, 'with singular success;' still, he was little known when, on 13th Jan. 1649, he was appointed president at the trial of Charles I. On that solemn occasion his manners were as short as his speeches were lengthy. For reward he was made permanent president of the Council of State and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a grant of estates worth £2000 per annum. His 'stiff republicanism' embroiled him with Cromwell, who twice attempted to deprive him of his office of chief-justice of Chester; but there is no direct proof that he ever engaged in the Fifth Monarchy plots. After Oliver's death he was appointed a commissioner of the Great Seal; and his last public act was to protest against the seizure of Speaker Lenthall by the army. He died 22d November 1659, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, but was disinterred and gibbeted with Cromwell and Ireton.

Bradshaw, WILLIAM (1571-1618), a rigid Puritan, author of many treatises, was born at Market Bosworth, studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and died at Chelsea.

Bradstreet, ANN (1612-72), née Dudley, Puritan poetess, in 1628 married Simon Bradstreet (1603-97), afterwards governor of Massachusetts. In 1630 they emigrated with the Winthrops. Her Phineas-Fletcher-like poems were privately printed at New York in 1897.

Bradwardine, THOMAS, born at Chichester about 1290, studied with distinguished success at Merton College, Oxford, and in 1325 was one of the proctors of the university. His fame as a theologian was founded on his theological lectures De Causa Dei contra Pelagium (edited by Sir Henry Savile, 1618), an able defence of the Augustinian doctrines of grace, fully proving his right to the title of 'Doctor profundus.' Called about 1335 to London, he became chancellor of St Paul's, a prebendary of Lincoln, and confessor to Edward III., whom he accompanied on his campaigns in France. In 1348 Bradwardine was elected Archbishop Stratford's successor by the chapter of Canterbury, and, in spite of a dispute with the king, he had been consecrated at Avignon in July 1349, when, returning to England, he died of the Black Death at Lambeth, 26th August.

Brady, NICHOLAS (1659-1726), born at Bandon, was educated at Westminster, Christ Church (Oxford), and Dublin, and held from 1696 to his death the living of Richmond, along with Stratford-on-Avon and Clapham in succession. He also kept a school at Richmond. The metrical version of the Psalms by him and Nahum Tate (q.v.) was authorised in 1696. His tragedy, The Rape, his blank-verse Æneid, and his sermons have long since sunk into deserved oblivion.

Braga, THEOPHILO, poet, historian, &c., born in the Azores in 1845, became in October 1910 the first president of the Portuguese republic.

Bragg, BRAXTON, Confederate general, born in North Carolina, 22d March 1817, served in the artillery through the Seminole and Mexican wars, and retired in 1856. He commanded in several great battles of the civil war. He died in Galveston, Texas, 27th September 1876.—His brother, THOMAS (1810-72), was governor of North Carolina 1854-58, U.S. senator 1859-61, and attorney-general in Jefferson Davis' cabinet 1861-63.

Braham (i.e. ABRAHAM), JOHN, tenor, was born in London of German-Jewish parents about 1774, and left an orphan, hawked pencils in the streets. Leoni, a chorister of Duke's Place synagogue, gave him instruction in music and singing; he appeared at Covent Garden in 1787, but his first great success was at Drury Lane (1796). To study singing he visited France, Italy, and Austria (1797-1801), in company with one Nancy Storaice, singing at Paris, Florence, Milan, Venice, and Vienna; and for half a century he held the reputation of one of the greatest tenors. In 1809 he had an engagement at the Royal Theatre, Dublin, for fifteen nights, at 2000 guineas. He squandered a fortune by purchasing the Colosseum in Regent's Park for £40,000, and building the St James's Theatre at a cost of £30,000. He died at Brompton, 17th February 1856. In Sir Walter Scott's words, Braham 'was a beast of an actor, but an angel of a singer;' and it was as a concert-singer that he most excelled, his great declamatory power and florid execution giving a wonderful effect to his rendering of his 'Death of Nelson' (1811). Most of his operas were produced at Drury Lane; but the bulk of his own compositions were very feeble. One of his daughters, Frances, in 1840 married Earl Waldegrave. Four times married, she was for many years a leader of society, and died 5th July 1879. [Brayfam.]

Brahe, TYCHO (or TYGE), astronomer, was born of noble family at Knudstrup in South Sweden—then under the Danish crown—14th December 1546, and was sent to study law at Copenhagen, Leipzig, Wittenberg, Rostock, & d Augsburg, but privily devoted himself to astronomy. In 1563 he discovered serious errors in the astronomical tables, and in 1572 carefully observed a new star in Cassiopeia. In 1576 he received from the king, Frederick II. of Denmark, the offer of the island of Hveen in the Sound, as the site for an observatory, with an endowment; and straightway the foundation-stone of his Uraniborg (or Castle of the Heavens) was laid. Here for 20 years Brahe prosecuted his observations with unwearied industry and epoch-making success—though he rejected the Copernican theory for a modification of the Ptolemaic system. After the death of Frederick in 1588 he was involved in many disputes and quarrels, partly provoked by his neglect of the duties of some of his many appointments—notably that of prebendary of Roskilde. He became unpopular with the government, lost some of his revenues, and in 1597 left the country. After residing at Rostock and at Wandsbeck near Hamburg, he accepted in 1599 an invitation of the Emperor Rudolf II. to Benatky near Prague (where he had Kepler as assistant); and there he died, 24th October 1601. His complete works appeared at Prague in 1611; his Letters have been edited by Frijs (Copenhagen, 1876); and there are Lives of him by Gassendi (Latin, 1655), Frijs (Danish, 1871), and Dreyer (Edin. 1890). [Brah'hay.]

Brahms, JOHANNES, composer, was born in Hamburg, where his father was a musician in the theatre, on 7th May 1833, and early began the study of music. In 1853 his performance of some of his first sonatas greatly impressed Schumann; in 1863-64 he was conductor of the Singakademie in Vienna, where in 1869 he finally settled. His works (some 120 in number) are marked by ascetic earnestness and regard for pure musical form; and of all the composers of his day Brahms approached most nearly to Beethoven. His subjects touch every department but the dramatic. Over fifty of his works are vocal; as a song-writer he had no living equal in Germany. As a pianist he was unrivalled in the performance of his own works and of Bach's. He died at Vienna, 3d April 1897. See Lives by Deiters (Leip. 1881; Eng. trans. 1887), Reimann (1897), F. May (1905), and Kalbeck (1904-8).

Braid, JAMES, born in 1795 in Fife, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and settled as a surgeon in Manchester, where he died, 25th March 1850. He is noted for his researches on Hypnotism.

Braidwood, THOMAS (1715-98), after studying at Edinburgh University, opened a school there, and from 1760 onwards became famous as a teacher of the deaf and dumb. His school, which was visited by Dr Johnson in 1773, was ten years later transferred to Hackney, London, where Braidwood died.

Braille, LOUIS (1809-52), born at Coupvray, near Paris, at three became blind, and at ten entered the Institution des Jeunes Aveugles at Paris, where, as pupil and (from 1826) professor, he laboured with high success to invent a system which the blind could both read and write in relief. See article BLIND in Chambers's Encyclopaedia.

Brainard, JOHN GARDNER CALKINS (1796-1828), poet, was born and died at New London, Conn. Whittier edited his Remains (1832).

Brainerd, DAVID (1718-47), missionary from 1742 to the American Indians, was born at Hadam, Conn., studied three years in Yale College, and died at Northampton, Mass., in the house of Jonathan Edwards. See Life by latter (1749).

Bramah, JOSEPH, inventor, was born at Stainbrough, near Barnsley, Yorkshire, April 13, 1748. A farmer's son, he was lamed in his sixteenth year, so was apprenticed to the village carpenter, and presently became a cabinetmaker in London, where he distinguished himself by the number, value, and ingenuity of his inventions and improvements in water-closets (his first patent, 1778), pumps and fire-engines, boilers for steam-engines, paper-making, main-pipes, wheel carriages, the beer-machine used at the bar of public-houses, safety-lock (patented 1788), the hydrostatic press (1796), and a very ingenious machine for printing bank-notes (1806). He was one of the first to propose the application of the screw-propeller; and in all, he took out eighteen patents. He died 9th December 1814. [Brah-mah.]

Bramante, DONATO (1444-1514), architect, was born near Urbino, and, at first a painter, resided in Milan from 1472 to 1499, then went to Rome, where he was employed by Popes Alexander VI. and Julius II. The greatest work he undertook was the rebuilding of St Peter's (begun 1506). When only a small portion of his plans had been realised, he died, and succeeding architects departed widely from the original design of a grand cupola over a Greek cross. [Brah-man'teh.]

Bramhall, JOHN (1594-1663), a great anti-Puritan Irish prelate, was educated at Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge. Going to Ireland as Wentworth's chaplain in 1633, he soon became Archdeacon of Meath, and in 1634 Bishop of Derry. When the Civil War broke out, for safety's sake he crossed to England; in 1644 the royalist disasters drove him to the Continent. The Restoration gave him the see of Armagh. He imitated Laud in policy and resembled him in person, but was far his inferior in intellect. His collected works appeared in 1677.

Brampton, BARON. See HAWKINS, HENRY.

Bramwell, GEORGE WILLIAM WILSHERE, BARON (1808-92), juriconsult, the son of a London banker, was called to the bar in 1838, appointed a Baron of the Exchequer and knighted (1856), and made a Lord Justice of Appeal (1876). He retired from the bench in 1881, and was raised to the peerage in 1882. See Memoir by C. Fairfield (1899).—His brother, SIR FREDERICK JOSEPH BRAMWELL (1818-1903), engineer, was knighted 1881, and created a baronet 1889.

Brand, HENRY BOUVERIE WILLIAM, VISCOUNT HAMPDEN (1814-92), a son of Lord Dacre, was educated at Eton, and entering parliament as a Liberal in 1852, was Speaker from 1872 to 1884, when he was raised to the peerage.—His son and successor, HENRY ROBERT (1841-1906), became governor of New South Wales in 1895.

Brand, JOHN, antiquary, born at Washington, Durham county, 19th August 1744, was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Newcastle, and educated at the grammar-school there, and at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1775. He had been ordained some years previously, and in 1784 was presented to a rectory in the City of London; in the same year he was elected resident secretary of the Society of Antiquaries, which office he held until his death, 11th September 1806. His Popular Antiquities (1777; expanded by Ellis, 1813) was re-edited by W. C. Hazlitt in 1870, and re-arranged by him as Faiths and Folklore in 1905.

Brand, SIR JOHN HENRY (1823-88), President of the Orange Free State from 1863, was born in Capetown, but educated in England, and practised as a barrister at the Cape.

Brandan, St. See BRENDAN.

Brande, WILLIAM THOMAS, chemist, born in London 11th February 1788, died 11th February 1866, having become an F.R.S. in 1809, professor of Chemistry to the Apothecaries' Company in 1812, Davy's successor at the Royal Institution in 1813, and head of the coinage department of the Mint in 1854. He published a Manual of Chemistry (1819; 6th ed. 1848), a Dictionary of Materia Medica (1839), and a Dictionary of Science and Art (1842; new ed. 1875).

Brandes, GEORGE, literary critic, was born of Jewish parentage, 4th February 1842, in Copenhagen, where he graduated at the university in 1864. Several aesthetic and philosophic books raised a charge of scepticism, which was not removed by his Main Currents of Nineteenth-century Literature (6 vols. 1872-90; trans. 1901-5). His

Danish Poets appeared in 1877; and the same year he left Denmark, and settled in Berlin, where he wrote lives of Lassalle (1877), Tegnér (1878), and Beaconsfield (1878). Among his works, 34 vols. in Danish and German, are French Romanticism (1882), Holberg (1885), Poland and Russia (1888), Shakespeare (trans. 1898), Recollections of my Childhood (1906). [Brand-er.]

Brandis, CHRISTIAN AUGUST (1790-1867), born at Hildesheim, from 1822 was professor at Bonn, edited Aristotle, and wrote on ancient philosophy.—His son, SIR DIETRICH BRANDIS (1824-1907), organised forestry in Pegu, and was inspector-general of forestry to the Indian government.

Brandl, ALOIS, born at Innsbruck in 1855, became professor of English Philology at Berlin in 1895, and has written on English romanticism, on Old and Middle English literature, and on the pre-Shakespearean drama.

Brandon, CHARLES (c. 1484-1545), was the son of Henry VII.'s standard-bearer who fell at Bosworth (1485), and by Henry VIII. was in 1514 created Duke of Suffolk. Next year he married Mary, sister to the king, and widow of Louis XII. of France, and so was the grandfather of Lady Jane Grey.

Brandon, RICHARD, the executioner of Charles I., as well as of Strafford, Laud, &c., succeeded his father, Gregory Brandon, in 1640, and died, full of remorse, 20th June 1649.

Brandram, SAMUEL (1824-92), public reader, from Trinity College, Oxford, proceeded to Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar.

Brandt, SEBASTIAN, was born at Strasburg in 1458; studied and lectured at Basel; and died in his native city, 16th May 1521. His Narrenschiff (Basel, 1494), or 'Ship of Fools,' a satire on the follies and vices of his times, is not very poetical, but is full of sound sense and good moral teaching. The best editions are by Zarnicke (1854) and Goedeke (1872). Locher translated it into Latin (1497), and Henry Watson into English, The Grete Schyppe of Fooles of the Worlde (1509). See also BARCLAY (ALEXANDER).

Brangwyn, FRANK, A.R.A., painter, born at Bruges in 1867, of Welsh extraction. See Liste by Shaw-Sparrow (1910).

Brant, JOSEPH (1742-1807), Mohawk chief, fought for the British in the Indian and Revolutionary wars, exerting his immense influence to bring about a general Indian peace. In later years an earnest Christian, he translated St Mark's Gospel and the Prayer Book into Mohawk, and in 1786 visited England. A colossal bronze statue of him was unveiled at Brantford in 1886.

Brantôme, PIERRE DE BOURDELLES, SEIGNEUR DE, was born about 1540 in Périgord, the third son of François, Comte de Bourdelles, and was educated at Paris and at Poitiers. In his sixteenth year the abbacy of Brantôme was bestowed on him by Henry II., but he never took orders, and spent most of his life as a courtier and free-lance. In 1561 he accompanied Mary Stuart to Scotland, and in 1565 he joined the expedition sent to Malta to assist the Knights of St John against the sultan. He served in Italy under the Maréchal de Brissac, in Africa under the Spaniards, and in Hungary as a volunteer against the Turks. He was made chamberlain to Charles IX. and Henry III., and fought against the Huguenots. About 1594 he began to write his memoirs, and thenceforth lived in retirement until his death on the 15th of July 1614. His works, first published in 1659, comprise Vies des Grands Capitaines, Vies des Dames Galantes, and Vies des Dames Illustres. Their literary merit and historical interest are very considerable. Their matter is often of the most scandalous description, but they give a wonderfully vivid picture of their author's times. There are editions by Lacour and Méricime (13 vols. 1859-94), and by Lalanne (12 vols. 1865-96).

Brasidas, the great Spartan general who from 431 B.C. distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and who in 422 at Amphipolis, with a handful of helots and mercenaries, had to encounter the flower of the Athenian army under Cleon. In the battle both generals were killed, but the Athenians were completely beaten.

Brasseur de Bourbourg, CHARLES ÉTIENNE (1814-74), a French priest who wrote much on the antiquities of Central America. He was born at Bourbourg in Nord, and died at Nice.

Brassey, THOMAS, born, a farmer's son, at Buerton near Chester, 7th November 1805, was articulated to a land-surveyor; in 1834 obtained, through George Stephenson, contracts for a viaduct; and in 1836 settled in London as a railway-contractor. His operations soon extended to all parts of the world; for his contract of the Great Northern Railway (1847-51) he employed between 5000 and 6000 men. He died at Hastings, 8th December 1870. See Helps's Life and Labours of Brassey (1872). — His eldest son, THOMAS, EARL BRASSEY, was born at Stafford, 11th February 1836, educated at Rugby and University College, Oxford, and called to the bar in 1866. He was Liberal M.P. for Devonport (1865) and Hastings (1868-86). As Civil Lord of the Admiralty (1880-84), and Secretary (1884-85), he made his influence felt in naval questions; and he was made K.C.B. in 1880, baron in 1886, earl in 1911, and in 1895-1900 was governor of Victoria. He is a veteran yachtsman; and the first Lady Brassey (1840-87) published pleasant records of their yacht voyage round the world in 1876-77, and of succeeding trips of the Sunbeam. Lord Brassey himself is author of Work and Wages (1872), British Seamen (1877), The Eastern Question (1878), Foreign Work and English Wages (1879), The British Navy (5 vols. 1882-83), The Naval Annual (since 1886), Collected Papers (5 vols. 1894-95), &c. See his Voyages and Travels, edited by Captain Eardley Wilmot (2 vols. 1895).

Brathwaite, RICHARD, minor poet, was probably born near Kendal in 1588; entered Orbel College, Oxford, in 1604; passed afterwards to Cambridge, and thence to London. In 1611 he published The Golden Fleece, a collection of poems; in 1614 three works, one of them a book of pastorals, entitled The Poet's Willow; and in 1615 the collection of satires, A Strappado for the Devil, in imitation of The Abuses Whipt and Stript of George Wither, his 'bonnie brother.' After his first marriage, Brathwaite lived the life of a country gentleman in Westmorland, and after his second in Yorkshire. He died near Richmond, 4th May 1673. Of his twenty-four books, the Barnabæ Itinerarium, or Barnabee's Journal, published in 1638 under the pseudonym 'Corymbæus,' has been often reprinted under the title of 'Drunken Barnaby's Four Journeys'—a lively book in rhymed Latin and doggerel English verse. In the seventh edition (by Haslewood, 1818) its authorship was first made known. See the life prefixed to the ninth edition (1820). An eleventh edition appeared in 1876.

Brauer, ADRIAN. See BROUWER.

Braun, ALEXANDER (1805-77), born at Ratisbon, from 1852 was professor of Botany at Berlin. See Life by Mettenius (Berlin, 1882). [Brown.]

Braun, AUGUST EMIL (1809-56), archaeologist, was born at Gotha, and in 1833 settled in Rome.

Braun, KARL (1822-93), a Liberal politician and author, was born in Nassau.

Brawne, FANNY. See KEATS.

Braxfield, LORD, the 'paper' title of Robert Macqueen (1722-99), a Scottish judge, hard-headed, hard-hearted, hard-drinking, who was born near Lanark, and died in Edinburgh.

Bray, ANNA ELIZA (née Kempe), author, was born in London, 25th December 1790, and was intended for the stage, but in 1818 married the artist, Charles Alfred Stothard (q.v., 1786-1821). In 1825 she married the Rev. E. A. Bray (1778-1857), vicar of Tavistock; and after his death she settled in London, where she died, 21st January 1883. Between 1820 and 1874 she published a score of romances, books of travel, &c., the best being The Borders of the Tamar and the Tavy (1836; 2d ed. 1879); Life of Thomas Stothard, R.A. (1851); and A Peep at the Pizies (1854). Her Autobiography was edited by Mr Kempe in 1884, in which year also appeared a 12 vol. edition of her romances.

Bray, THOMAS (1656-1730), divine and philanthropist, born at Marton, in Shropshire, and died incumbent of St Botolph Without, Aldgate, having published Catechetical Lectures, &c., and been the means of establishing eighty parochial libraries in England, and thirty-nine in America—his home from 1699 to 1706. Out of his library scheme grew the S.P.C.K.; and he may also be regarded as the founder of the S.P.G.

Brayley, EDWARD WEDLAKE. See BRITTON.

Brazza, PIERRE SAVORGNA DE, explorer, was born of Italian descent at Rio de Janeiro, 26th January 1852. He entered the French navy in 1870, served on the Gaboon, and in 1876-78 explored the Ogoway. In 1878 the French government gave him 100,000 francs for exploring the country north of the Congo, where he secured vast grants of land for France, and founded several stations—that of Brazzaville on the N. shore of Stanley Pool. In 1883 he returned, largely subsidised by the French government; and by 1886 he had established twenty-six stations. He continued to explore till 1897, being in 1890-91 governor of French Congo. He died 15th September 1905. See works by Neuville (1884) and Ney (1888). [Brat-za.]

Bréal, MICHEL, French comparative philologist and mythologist, born in Rhenish Bavaria, 26th March 1832, in 1859 settled in Paris.

Breckinridge, JOHN CABELL, vice-president of the United States, was born 21st January 1821, near Lexington, Kentucky, where he practised law until 1847, when he was chosen major of a volunteer regiment for the Mexican war. He sat in congress 1851-55, and in 1856 was elected vice-president, with Buchanan as president. In 1860 he was the pro-slavery candidate for the presidency, but was defeated by Lincoln. A U.S. senator from March to December 1861, he then was appointed a Confederate major-general in 1862, held important commands, was secretary of war in Jeff Davis's cabinet, and escaped to Europe, whence he returned in 1868. He died at Lexington, 17th May 1875.

Bredahl, CHRISTIAN HVIID (1784-1860), a Danish dramatic poet, a follower of Rousseau's.

Broderode, HENRY, COUNT OF (1531-68), a leader of the nobility in the struggle of the Netherlands against Spain. [Bray-del-ro'deh.]

Bree, MATTHIAS IGNATIUS VAN (1773-1839), a Flemish historical painter, sculptor, and architect.—His brother, PHILIPP JACOB (1786-1871), was also an historical painter. [Bray.]

Brehm, ALFRED EDMUND (1829-84), naturalist, was the son of C. L. Brehm (1787-1864), ornithologist and pastor of Renthendorf, in Thuringia. He studied at Jena and Vienna, travelled in Africa, Spain, Norway, Lapland, Siberia, and Turkestan, and became keeper of the Hamburg Zoological Garden in 1863. His magnum opus is the Illustriertes Thierleben (new ed. 13 vols. in progress 1912), on which many other natural histories are largely based. [Braym.]

Breitmann, HANS. See LELAND, C. G.

Bremer, FREDRIKA (1801-65), Swedish novelist, was born near Abo in Finland, and was brought up near Stockholm. In 1828 appeared the first volume of her Sketches of Every-day Life, but the second volume, The H. Family (1833; trans. 1844), first revealed her power. She varied her literary labour by long journeys in Italy, England, the United States, Greece, Palestine, which supplied the materials for her Homes of the New World (1853) and Life in the Old World (1862). Latterly she devoted herself to the education and emancipation of women, and the aim is rather too apparent in her later novels, Bertha and Father and Daughter (1859). Her religious views she set forth in her Morning Watches (1842). Of the stories perhaps the most perfect is The Neighbours (1837; Eng. 1844). The Diary, The President's Daughters, Brothers and Sisters, Strife and Peace, and Scenes in Dalecarlia are only less popular. See her Life and Letters, edited by her sister (trans. 1868). Mary Howitt was responsible for the English translations. [Bray-mer.]

Brenchley, JULIUS LUCIUS (1817-73), a native of Maidstone, who travelled much in America, Japan, the South Sea Islands, &c., made valuable collections, and published two or three works.

Brendan, St (484-577), an Irish saint, who, after seven years' fruitless voyaging in search of 'the mysterious land far from human ken,' once more set sail with sixty friends, and at length reached 'that paradise amid the waves of the sea.' He afterwards founded the monastery of Clonfert. The Navigation of St Brendan was a very popular book in Western Europe as early as the 11th century. In old maps 'St Brendan's country' is placed west of the Cape Verd Islands. See books by Schröder (1871), Novati (Bergamo, 1892), and O'Donoghue (1894), and the Marquis of Bute in the Scottish Review (1893).

Brennus, the Latinised form of a Celtic royal title, is the name by which we know the leader of the Senonian Gauls who, in 390 B.C., crossed the Apennines, overthrew the Roman army at the Allia, and plundered Rome, but were ultimately driven away by Camillus. Also the Gallic chief who invaded Greece, 279 B.C., at the head of 150,000 foot and 20,000 horse, but was repelled from Delphi by Greek valour, earthquake, and the supernatural help of Apollo.

Brentano, CLEMENS, romanticist, the brother of Bettina von Arnim (q.v.), was born at Ehren-breitstein, 8th September 1778. Save for the six years (1818-24) that he passed with the 'Nun of Dülmen,' recording her revelations, he led a restless, unsettled life, and showed plain signs of derangement some years before his death at Aschaffenburg on 28th July 1842. His collected works (9 vols. 1852-55) include poems, plays, stories, &c., the best Die Geschichte vom braven Kaspar. There is a good selection by Diel (1873), who has also written his Life (1878).—His nephew, LUJO BRENTANO, political economist, was born at Aschaffenburg, in Bavaria, 18th December 1844. He studied at Dublin, and at four German universities; and in 1868 went to England to study the condition of the working-classes, and especially trades' associations and unions. The outcome of this was his English Guilds (1870) and Die Arbeitergilden der Gegenwart (2 vols. 1871-72). He became professor of his subject at Breslau (1873), Strasburg (1882), Vienna (1888), Leipzig (1889), and Munich (1891). He gave his support to the 'Socialists of the chair' (Kathedersozialisten) against the German free-trade school, and has written works on wages (1877), labour in relation to land (1877), compulsory insurance for workmen (1881), &c. [Bren-tak'no.]

Brenz, JOHANN, the Reformer of Württemberg, was born 24th June 1499, at Weil in Swabia, and died superintendent at Stuttgart, 11th September 1570. He was co-author of the Württemberg Confession of Faith, and his Catechism (1551) has held the next place to Luther's in Protestant Germany. See Life by Hartmann (1862). [Brentz.]

Breton, JULES ADOLPHE, a French painter of peasant life, was born at Courrières, near Arras, 1st May 1827, was educated at St Omer and at Douai, and trained as a painter under Félix Devigne at Ghent, and Drölling at Paris. He was also a poet. See his autobiographical Life of an Artist (Eng. trans. 1892) and his treatise La Peinture (1904); also Muther's Modern Painting (1896). He died 5th July 1906. [Breh-ton'.]

Breton, NICHOLAS (1558-1626), poet. Little is known of his life save that he studied at Oriel College, Oxford. Forty-two of his pastorals, satires, &c., in verse and prose, were edited by Dr Grosart in 1877 and 1893. [Brit-ton.]

Breton de los Herreros, DON MANUEL (1800-73), Spanish dramatist. [Er-ray'roas.]

Bretschneider, KARL GOTTLIEB (1776-1848), theologian, was born at Gersdorf in Saxony, and died at Gotha. See autobiography (Gotha, 1851).

Brett, JOHN (1830-1902), painter of landscape and sea-pieces, became A.R.A. in 1881.

Brett, ROBERT (1808-74), a Stoke Newington surgeon who took an active part in the Tractarian movement. See Life by Belcher (1890).

Brueghel, PIETER (c. 1520-69), the founder of a family of Dutch painters, was born in the village of Brueghel, near Breda, and died at Brussels. He painted chiefly the pleasures of rustic life.—His son, PIETER (c. 1564-1637), is called 'Hellish Brueghel'—because he loved to paint scenes with devils, hags, or robbers.—A younger son, JAN (1568-1625), called 'Velvet Brueghel,' was chiefly a flower-painter, but was also distinguished for his landscapes and for his minute finish of small figures. His son, JAN (1601-78), followed him closely. See a French monograph by Michel (1892). [Brek'hel.]

Brewer, EBENEZER COBHAM (1810-97), born in London, took a first class in the law tripos from Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1835, and the year before received orders. He then became a London schoolmaster. Of thirty compilations by him the best known is his Dictionary of Phrase and Fable (1870; 100,000th, 1895).

Brewer, JOHN SHERREN, born at Norwich in 1810, graduated with classical honours at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1833, took orders, and was appointed professor of English in King's College, London, in 1841. For nearly twenty years he laboured in the Record-office, editing the Monumenta Franciscana (1858), Roger Bacon (1859), Giraldus Cambrensis (1861), vols. i.-iv. of the Calendar of Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII. (1862-72), &c. He became Honorary Fellow of Queen's College in 1870, and in 1877 rector of Toppesfield in Essex, where he died, February 16, 1879. See Memoir prefixed to his English Studies, edited by Dr Wace (1880).

Brewster, SIR DAVID, physicist, was born at Jedburgh, December 11, 1781. He was educated for the Church of Scotland at the university of Edinburgh; but a constitutional nervousness disinclining him for a clerical life, he became editor in 1802 of the Edinburgh Magazine, and in 1808 of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. Previous to this he had entered deeply on the study of optics. The kaleidoscope was invented by him in 1816, and years after he improved Wheatstone's stereoscope by introducing refracting lenses. In 1819 the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal took the place of the Magazine; and in 1831 Brewster was one of the chief originators of the British Association. In 1815 he was elected an F.R.S. and Copley medallist; in 1818 the Rumford gold and silver medals were awarded him for his discoveries on the polarisation of light; in 1825 he became corresponding member of the Institute of France; in 1832 he was knighted, and had a pension conferred upon him; in 1838 he was appointed principal of St Salvador and St Leonard's, St Andrews; in 1849 he was elected one of the eight Foreign Associates of the French Institute. He was principal of Edinburgh University from 1859 till close on his death at Allerly, Melrose, February 10, 1868. Among his works were an edition of Legendre's Geometry, translated by Thomas Carlyle (1822), a Life of Newton (1828; enlarged ed. 1855), Letters on Natural Magic, addressed to Sir Walter Scott (1831), Martyrs of Science (1841), More Worlds than One (1854), treatises on the Kaleidoscope, Optics, &c. See Home Life of Brewster, by his daughter, Mrs Gordon (1869; 3d ed. 1881).

Brialmont, HENRY ALEXIS, a Belgian general, engineer, and writer on fortification, &c., was born at Venloo, 25th May 1821, and died in 1903.

Brian, a famous king of Ireland, the Brian Boroinhe or Boru ('Brian of the tribute') of the annals, was born in 926; in 976 succeeded his murdered elder brother as chief of the Dal Cais; and, after much fighting, made himself king of Cashel two years later. Having established his rule over all Munster, he marched into Leinster, and was acknowledged as king by its chiefs in 984. He formed an alliance with Maelsechlainn Mac Domhnaill, chief king of Ireland, crushed with his help an outbreak of the Leinster men in 1000, next made terms with the Danes of Dublin, and with their help overpowered his late ally. He then subdued the Connaghtmen, and the men of the north; and, after marching from Meath to Armagh, made a circuit of Ireland, taking hostages from all the territories through which he passed. Thus he had become Airdrig na Erenn, chief king of Ireland. In 1013 war broke out again with the Danes of Dublin, who at Clontarf, on the north side of Dublin Bay, were routed with great slaughter; but the aged hero perished in the battle, April 23, 1014.

Brianchon, CHARLES JULIEN (1785-1865), a mathematician, born at Sèvres. [Bree-on^o shon^o.]

Brice, Sr, Bishop of Tours in the beginning of the 5th century.

Bride, Sr. See BRIDGET.

Bridge, SIR JOHN FREDERICK, composer, born at Oldbury, Worcestershire, 5th Dec. 1844, became deputy organist of Westminster Abbey in 1875, full organist in 1882, professor of music in London University in 1902. He was knighted in 1897.

Bridges, CHARLES (1794-1869), an evangelical clergyman, author of An Exposition of Psalm cxix. (1827). His son, John Henry Bridges (1835-1906), was a leading Positivist.

Bridges, ROBERT SEYMOUR, poet and critic, born 23d Oct. 1844, from Etton passed to Corpus College, Oxford, then studied medicine, and practised for awhile. Among his works, published since 1873, are Prometheus the Fire-giver, Eros and Psyche, Nero, and an Essay on Milton's Prosody.

Bridget, Sr, born of noble family at Finstad in 1302 or 1303, married a judge, by whom she had eight children, was for some years mistress of the Swedish royal household; and after pilgrimages to Compostella and elsewhere, and the death of her husband, founded the monastery of Wadstena, in East Gothland, the cradle of a new order (of St Bridget or of St Salvator), which flourished in Sweden until the Reformation. It had seventy-four establishments scattered throughout Europe, and has still a few representatives in Spain, Bavaria, and Belgium. In 1349 St Bridget went to Rome, where she founded a Swedish hospice, and having made a pilgrimage to Palestine, died at Rome on her return, 23d July 1373. She was canonised in 1391. Her daughter, 'St Catharine of Sweden' (1335-81), was canonised in 1489. The Revelationes Ste. Brigittæ, written by her confessors, has passed through many editions. See F. Partridge, Life of St Bridget (1888).

The Irish St Brigit or Bride of Kildare (453-523) entered a convent at Meath in her fourteenth year, and founded four monasteries, the chief at Kildare, where she was buried. Her legendary history is a mass of astonishing miracles, some of which were apparently transferred to St Brigit from the Celtic goddess Ceridwen. She was regarded as one of the three great saints of Ireland, the others being St Patrick and St Columba, and was held in great reverence in Scotland.

Bridgewater, FRANCIS EGERTON, DUKE OF (1736-1803), the 'father of British inland navigation,' succeeded his elder brother as third and last duke in 1748. In 1762-72 he constructed, after the plans of the celebrated Brindley, the earliest canal in England, 42 miles long, uniting Worsley with Manchester and Runcorn on the Mersey above Liverpool.

Bridgewater, FRANCIS HENRY EGERTON, EARL OF (1758-1829), son of John Egerton, Bishop of Durham, and a grandnephew of the first Duke of Bridgewater, succeeded his brother as eighth and last earl in 1823. He was a prebendary of Durham, but lived many years in Paris, his house full of cats and dogs, dressed up like mannikins, and his garden of rabbits and clipped birds, for he was fond of shooting. By his last will, dated February 25, 1825, he left £8000, to be paid to the author of the best treatise 'On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation.' The president of the Royal Society, Davies Gilbert, to whom the selection of the author was left, resolved that the money should be allotted to eight different persons—Dr Chalmers, William Prout, M.D., Kirby, Dean Buckland, Sir Charles Bell, J. Kidd, M.D., Whewell, and P. M. Roget, M.D.

Bridgman, FREDERICK ARTHUR, figure-painter, was born at Tuskegee, Alabama, 10th November 1847; for a time was a bank-note engraver at New York, but meanwhile studied art; and in 1866 went to Paris. He has painted much in Brittany, the Pyrenees, Algiers, Egypt, &c.

Bridgman, LAURA, the famous blind-mute, was born in Hanover, New Hampshire, U.S., 21st December 1829. She was a bright, intelligent child, but at two was seized with a violent fever, which utterly destroyed sight, hearing, smell, and in some degree taste. Dr Samuel Howe (q.v.) of Boston undertook her education at the Perkins Institution, and here from the age of eight she learned reading, writing, geography, algebra, and history, as well as needlework and household duties. She became a skilful teacher of blind deaf-mutes, and died at Boston, 24th May 1859. See Dickens's American Notes, and Life by her teacher, Miss Lamson (Boston, 1878).

Bridport, LORD. See HOOD, ALEXANDER.

Brierley, BENJAMIN, was born, a weaver's son, at Failsforth, near Manchester, 26th June 1825, and himself was a Manchester silk-weaver till 1855, after which date as 'Ab-o'-th'-Yate' he published some forty tales, sketches, &c., in the Lancashire dialect. He died in January 1896.

Briggs, HENRY, mathematician, was born in 1561 at Warley Wood, near Halifax, Yorkshire, and in 1588 became a fellow of St John's College, Cambridge. In 1592 he was appointed reader of the Physic Lecture, in 1596 first reader in geometry at Gresham House, London, and in 1619 first Savilian professor of Astronomy in Oxford. He died January 26, 1631. Briggs made an important contribution to the theory of logarithms.

Brigham Young. See YOUNG.

Bright, HENRY (1814-73), a water-colour landscape-painter, was born at Saxmundham, and died at Ipswich.

Bright, JAMES FRANCK. See BRIGHT, RICHARD.

Bright, JOHN, son of Jacob Bright, a Quaker cotton-spinner at Rochdale, was born there, November 16, 1811, and educated at a Friends' school at Ackworth, and afterwards at York and Newton. While in his father's factory he took a great interest in public questions; and after a foreign tour (1835), which took in Palestine, he lectured at Rochdale on his travels, as well as on commerce and political economy. When the Anti-Corn-Law League was formed in 1839 he was a leading member, and, with Cobden, engaged in Free-trade agitation throughout the kingdom. In 1843 he became M.P. for Durham, and strongly opposed the Corn Laws until they were repealed. In 1845 he obtained the appointment of select committees on the Game Laws, and on cotton cultivation in India. In 1847 he was elected a member for Manchester; in 1852 aided in the temporary reorganisation of the Corn-Law League. Like Cobden a member of the Peace Society, he energetically denounced the Crimean war (1854). In his absence on the Continent through illness, he was rejected by Manchester. Elected in 1857 for Birmingham, he seconded the motion (against the Conspiracy Bill) which led to the overthrow of Palmerston's government; and he advocated the transference of India to the direct government of the crown. During the civil war in America he warmly supported the cause of the North. His name was closely associated with the Reform Act of 1867. In 1868 he accepted office as President of the Board of Trade, but in 1870 retired through illness. He supported the disestablishing of the Irish Church (1869) and the Irish Land Act of 1870. He took office in 1873, and again in 1881, as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but retired from the Gladstone ministry in 1882, being unable to support the government in its Egyptian policy. In 1886-88 he strenuously opposed Gladstone's Home Rule policy, and was a great power in the Unionist party, being then as always recognised as one of the most eloquent speakers of his time. He was Lord Rector of Glasgow University in 1880. He died 27th March 1889. See his Speeches (1868) and Letters (with memoir by Leech, 1885; new ed. 1895), and Lives by Robertson (1877), Barnett Smith (1881), Vince (1898), and O'Brien.

Bright, RICHARD, physician, was born at Bristol, 28th September 1789, and studied at Edinburgh, London, Berlin, and Vienna, and from 1820 was connected with Guy's Hospital. He died 16th December 1858. He made many important medical observations ('Bright's disease' of the kidneys is named after him) and wrote numerous dissertations. His Travels through Lower Hungary (1818) contains a valuable account of the Gypsies.—His son, JAMES FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D., born 29th May 1832, was from 1881 to 1906 master of University College, Oxford. He is author of a History of England (5 vols. 1875-1904).

Bright, TIMOTHY (c. 1551-1615), a Yorkshire doctor and clergyman, the originator in 1588 of modern shorthand.

Brigitta. See BRIDGET.

Bril, two landscape-painters, brothers, who were both born in Antwerp, and both died in Rome—MATTYS BRIL (1550-84), and the more celebrated PAUL BRIL (1556-1626).

Brillat-Savarin, ANTHELME (1755-1826), French gastronome, born at Belley, was a deputy in 1789, and mayor of Belley in 1793; took refuge in Switzerland, and afterwards in America, where he played in the orchestra of a New York theatre; and from 1796 until his death was a member of the Court of Cassation. His Physiologie du Goût (1825), an elegant and witty compendium of the art of dining, has been repeatedly republished and translated; a late English form is A Handbook of Gastronomy, with 52 engravings by Lalauze (1884). [Bree-yah'-Sa-ra-ran'.]

Brindley, JAMES, engineer, was humbly born at Thornsett, near Chapel-en-le-Firth, Derbyshire, in 1716. Apprenticed to a millwright, he became an engineer, and in 1752 contrived a water-engine for draining a coal-mine. A silk-mill on a new plan, and several others of his works, recommended him to the Duke of Bridgewater (q.v.), who employed him (1759) to execute the canal between Worsley and Manchester—a difficult enterprise crowned with complete success (1772). He also commenced the Grand Trunk Canal, and completed the Birmingham, Chesterfield, and others; in all, constructing 365 miles of canals. Up till the last he remained illiterate; most of his problems were solved without writings or drawings; and when anything specially difficult had to be considered, he would go to bed and think it out there. He died at Turnhurst, Staffordshire, 30th September 1772.

Brink, JAN TEN (1834-1901), a Dutch critic, born at Appingadam, after a short residence at Batavia, became in 1862 Dutch master at the Hague, and in 1884 professor of Dutch Literature at Leyden, having earned for himself a foremost place as a critic of acuteness and insight, especially in the department of fiction and belles-lettres.—BERNARD TEN BRINK (1841-92), philologist, was born at Amsterdam, and became professor in 1870 of Modern Languages and Literature at Marburg, in 1873 of English at Strasburg. Invaluable to English philologists are his Chaucer-Studien (1870), Geschichte der englischen Literatur (1874; Eng. trans. 1883-93), Chaucer's Sprache und Verskunst (1884), Beowulf (1888), and five lectures on Shakespeare (1895).

Brinkley, JOHN (1763-1835), born at Woodbridge, graduated from Caius College, Cambridge, as senior wrangler, and became in 1792 Irish Astronomer-Royal, in 1826 Bishop of Cloyne.

Brinton, DANIEL GARRISON, writer on North American ethnology, was born at Thornbury, Penn., 13th May 1837, and died 31st July 1899.

Brinvilliers, MARIE MADELEINE, MARQUISE DE, poisoner, was the daughter of Dreux d'Aubray, lieutenant of Paris, and in 1651 married the Marquis de Brinvilliers. A gay and careless spendthrift, he allowed her to do as she pleased, and even introduced to her a handsome young officer, Sainte Croix, who inspired her with a violent passion. Her father had Sainte Croix sent to the Bastille, where he learned from an Italian the properties of arsenic. On his release he imparted the fatal knowledge to his mistress, who, during his incarceration, had affected the greatest piety, spending most of her time in visiting the hospitals and in attending the sick. She now resolved to destroy her father, and, to test the efficacy of the poison, tried it on patients in the Hôtel Dieu. Having satisfied herself, she commenced operations on her parent, kissing and poisoning him continually for eight months, until her patience was exhausted, and she at last administered a very violent dose. He died, and no one suspected his daughter, who next poisoned her two brothers and her sisters; her object being to find means of supporting her extravagant style of living with her paramour. She made several attempts to poison her husband; but Sainte Croix is said to have given him antidotes, fearing he would have to wed the widow. Sainte Croix died suddenly in 1672—his glass mask having fallen off while he was preparing a poison—and left documents inculcating the marchioness. She fled to England and Germany, and next to a convent at Liège. From this, however, she was decoyed by an officer of justice disguised as an abbé, and conveyed to Paris. Among her papers was found a confession of her crimes, and after having been put to the torture, on 16th July 1676 she was beheaded and burned. Scribe made her the subject of a comic opera, and Albert Smith of a romance (1856). See also works by Bauplein (1871), Toiseleur (1883), and H. Stokes (1911). [Fr. pron. Branv'-ree-yoy'.]

Brinz, ALOYS VON (1820-87), a professor at Erlangen, Prague, Tübingen, and Munich, who was a great authority on the Pandects.

Brion, FRIEDERIKE ELISABETH (1752-1813), the pastor's daughter at Sesenheim, near Strasburg, who in 1770-71 was loved by, and still more loved, Goethe. She never married. See work by Düntzer (Stuttg. 1893).

Brisbane, GENERAL SIR THOMAS MAKDOUGALL, soldier and astronomer, was born at Brisbane House, Largs, Ayrshire, July 23, 1773; at sixteen entered the army, and served with distinction in Flanders, the West Indies, Spain, and North America; from 1821 to 1825 was governor of New South Wales; in 1836 was made a baronet, in 1837 a G.C.B.; and died January 27, 1860. He catalogued in Australia 7385 stars, and received the Copley medal from the Royal Society.

Brissac, CHARLES DE COSSÉ, COMTE DE (1505-63), a celebrated French marshal, whose brother and two sons were also soldiers. See Life by Marchand (Par. 1889).

Brissot, JEAN PIERRE, born near Chartres, 14th January 1754, after completing his studies at Paris, abandoned the legal profession for that of authorship. His Théorie des Loix Criminelles (1780) was followed by his Bibliothèque des Loix Criminelles (1782-86), which established his reputation as a jurist. He was imprisoned for four months in the Bastille on the false charge of having written a brochure against the queen; to escape from a new term there he retired in 1787 to London, and next year visited North America as representative of the Société des Amis des Noirs. In 1789 he was elected representative for Paris in the National Assembly, where he exercised a predominant influence over all the early movements of the Revolution. He also established Le Patriote Français, which became the organ of the earliest Republicans. As the Revolution proceeded, Brissot was recognised as the head of the Girondists or Brissotins. He contributed powerfully to the fall of the monarchy, strongly enjoining war against Austria and England, and the diffusion of republican principles. In the Convention his moderation made him suspected, and, with twenty other Girondists, he was guillotined, October 31, 1793. See his Memoirs (ed. by Lesure, 1885). [Brees-soh'.]

Bristow, HENRY WILLIAM (1817-89), from 1872 was senior director of the Geological Survey.

Britannicus, or in full, Claudius Tiberius Britannicus Caesar, was the son of the Emperor Claudius and Messalina, and was born 42 A.D. Claudius' second wife, Agrippina, caused her husband to adopt her son Nero, and treat Britannicus as an imbecile; and Nero, after his accession, had his half-brother poisoned in 55.

Britton, JOHN, topographer and antiquary, the son of a small farmer and village shopkeeper, was born 7th July 1771, at Kington St Michael, near Chippenham. At sixteen he went to London, and was in turn cellarman, clerk, and compiler of a song-book. Some contributions to a dramatic miscellany led the publisher to employ him, with Edward Wedlake Brayley (1773-1854), to compile the Beauties of Wiltshire (1801); its success led up to the Beauties of England and Wales (15 vols. 1803-14), which cost £50,000. He died 1st January 1857. The Cathedral Antiquities of England (14 vols. 1814-35) has over 300 highly finished plates. See his Autobiography (1850).

Britton, THOMAS (1654?-1714), 'the musical small-coal man,' founded a fashionable musical club, collected books, and studied chemistry and occult sciences.

Broadhurst, HENRY (1840-1911), born at Littlemore, Oxford, was a stonemason, like his father, till 1872, when he became secretary of the Labour Representation League. He sat in parliament as an Advanced Liberal in 1880-92, 1894-1906. See Autobiography (1901).

Broadwood, JOHN (1732-1812), founder, with the Swiss Burkhardt Tschudi, of the great London pianoforte house, was born at Cockburnspath, Berwickshire, and walked up to London to become a cabinet-maker there.—His grandson, HENRY FOWLER BROADWOOD (1811-93), was likewise a great improver of the piano.

Broca, PAUL, surgeon and anthropologist, was born at Sainte-Foy-le-Grande, Gironde, 28th June 1824, and died in Paris, 9th July 1880.

Brocchi, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1772-1820), poet, mineralogist, and traveller, born at Bergamo, died at Khartoum. See Life by Stoppani (1874).

Brock, SIR ISAAC (1769-1812), major-general, had served in the West Indies and Holland, when, on 16th August 1812, the American general Hull surrendered to him with an army of 2000 men who had invaded Canada. He was shot in the battle at Queenston, Ontario, on 13th October. See Life by Lady Edgar (1905).

Brock, SIR THOMAS, sculptor, born at Worcester in 1847, was elected an A.R.A. in 1883 and an R.A. in 1891, and created K.C.B. in 1911.

Brockes, BARTHOLD HEINRICH (1680-1747), a German poet, was born and died at Hamburg. See Life by Brandl (Innsb. 1878).

Brockhaus, FRIEDRICH ARNOLD (1772-1823), the founder of the well-known firm of Brockhaus in Leipzig, and publisher of the Conversations-Lexikon, was born at Dortmund, and from 1811 to 1817 carried on business in Altenburg. See his Life and Letters (3 vols. 1872-81). The business was afterwards carried on by his sons Friedrich (1800-65) and Heinrich (1804-74); from 1850 by the latter alone, and till 1895 by Heinrich-Eduard (b. 7th August 1829) and Heinrich-Rudolf (b. 16th July 1838), his sons.—HERMANN BROCKHAUS, orientalist, third son of the founder Brockhaus, was born at Amsterdam, 28th January 1806; studied at Leipzig, Göttingen, and Bonn, and lived successively in Copenhagen, Paris, London, and Oxford. From 1848 till his death, 5th January 1877, he was professor of Sanskrit at Leipzig. [Brockhouse.]

Brodie, SIR BENJAMIN COLLINS, surgeon, was born at Winterslow Rectory, Wiltshire, in 1788. He studied at St George's Hospital, of which he became assistant-surgeon and surgeon. In 1810 he was elected F.R.S., in 1811 received the Copley medal, and in 1834 was created a baronet. He died at his Surrey seat, Broome Park, 21st Oct. 1862. See Autobiography, in his Collected Works (3 vols. 1865), and Life by T. Holmes (1898).—His son, SIR B. C. BRODIE (1817-80), the discoverer of graphitic acid, in 1855 became professor of Chemistry at Oxford.

Brodie, WILLIAM, R.S.A. (1815-81), sculptor, was born at Banff, and died in Edinburgh.

Brogie, a prominent French family, of Piedmontese origin; its most important members have been: (1) FRANÇOIS MARIE (1671-1745), first Duc de, marshal of France, took part in every campaign from 1689.—(2) VICTOR FRANÇOIS (1718-1804), his son, the most capable French commander in the Seven Years' War. Made a marshal in 1759, he entered the Russian service after the Revolution.—(3) ACHILLE CHARLES LÉONCE VICTOR (1785-1870), grandson of the last, and son of Prince Claude Victor (born 1757, guillotined 1794), was distinguished as a Liberal politician and an earnest advocate of the abolition of slavery. He was foreign secretary (1832-34) and prime-minister (1835-36) under Louis-Philippe; after 1851 he lived in retirement. He was a member of the Academy, and published Écrits et Discours (3 vols. 1863). See his Souvenirs (4 vols. 1886).—(4) JACQUES VICTOR ALBERT (1821-1901), his eldest son, early entered the field of literature, and was elected an Academician in 1862. Ambassador at London (1871-72), he then became leader of the Conservative right centre, and with a view to force a monarchical government on France, he brought about the resignation of Thiers, and the election of MacMahon, in 1873. He was twice premier—in 1873-74 and in 1877—resignation being on both occasions forced on him by Gambetta's exposure of his reactionary tactics. His most important works are his orthodox L'Église et L'Empire Romain au IV. Siècle (6 vols. 1856-69), Le Secret du Roi Louis XV. (2d ed. 2 vols. 1879), two hostile works on Frederick the Great (1882 and 1884), Maurice de Saxe et le Marquis d'Argenson (1891), and La Paix d'Aix la Chapelle (1892). [Broll'ye or Brogg'ly.]

Broke, SIR PHILIP BOWES VERE, rear-admiral, born at Broke Hall, Ipswich, 9th September 1776, entered the service in 1792, was made captain in 1801, and appointed to the Shannon frigate, 38 guns, in 1806. In her he fought the memorable duel with the American Chesapeake frigate, off Boston, 1st June 1813, which has made 'brave Broke' ever since a hero in popular English song. The Americans were confident of success, but proved no match for Broke's thoroughly disciplined men, who, after delivering two terrific broadsides, sprang across the bulwarks, and ran up the English colours fifteen minutes after the commencement of the action. A blow received in boarding seriously affected Broke's health, and he retired from active service with a baronetcy. He died in London, 2d January 1841. See Life by Dr Brighton (1866). [Brook.]

Brome, RICHARD, a minor dramatist, of whose life but little is known save that he was of humble origin, having been in his earlier days servant to Ben Jonson, that he lived in familiar friendship with Dekker, Ford, and Shirley, wrote as many as twenty-four popular plays, was a devout believer, though a hater of Presbyterians and Puritans, and died about 1652. His best plays are The Northern Lass, a comedy, written mostly in prose, and The Jovial Crew. Other plays are The Lancashire Witches, written in collaboration with Heywood, The Court Beggar, and The Queen and Concubine. Brome's dramatic works were reprinted in 3 vols. in 1873. See article by A. C. Swinburne in Fortnightly, April 1892.

Brøndsted, PETER OLUF (1780-1842), a Danish archaeologist, author of Reisen und Untersuchungen in Griechenland (1826-30).

Brongniart, ALEXANDRE (1770-1847), a naturalist and geologist, from 1800 director of the porcelain manufactory at Sèvres, was born and died in Paris.—His son, ADOLPHE THÉODORE (1801-76), was a botanist. [Brong-n'yahr'].

Bronn, HEINRICH GEORG (1800-62), naturalist, was born at Ziegelhansen, near Heidelberg.

Brontë, CHARLOTTE, one of the most gifted English novelists, was born at Thornton, Yorkshire, 21st April 1816. Her father, originally Patrick Prunty (1777-1861), who was a clergyman, belonged to Ireland; her mother was a native of Cornwall. Her life almost to its close was one of sorrow and struggle. In 1821 the family removed to Haworth, a village situated amid the Yorkshire moors, and in 1822 the mother died. In her eighth year Charlotte was sent to Cowan's Bridge School, the Lowood of which she has given so dark a picture in Jane Eyre. After the deaths of two of her sisters there, Charlotte, whose own health had broken down, was taken back to Haworth, and remained there until 1831, when she was sent to a school at Roehead kept by Miss Wooler, with whom she formed a life-long friendship. Mr Brontë's austere and gloomy nature cast a shadow over his children's lives. His means were narrow, and his daughters, Charlotte, Emily (born 20th August 1818), and Anne (born 25th March 1820), were forced to seek a livelihood as governesses. To fit themselves for higher educational work, Charlotte and Emily studied at Brussels from 1842 to 1844. In 1846 the three sisters published a volume of poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell—Currer Bell being the pseudonym of Charlotte. The book attracted little notice. Its authors then turned to prose fiction; Charlotte writing The Professor; Anne, Agnes Grey; and Emily ('Ellis Bell'), the strange, moving romance of Wuthering Heights. The Professor having been rejected on the score of deficiency in plot-interest, Charlotte set to work upon Jane Eyre (1847), which gained a great but not an uncontested success. Her brother Branwell died in September 1848, her sister Emily on 19th December, and after the death of Anne (28th May 1849), Charlotte was left alone with her father in the gloomy Haworth parsonage. A third novel, Shirley, appeared in 1849, and in 1852 Villette, which was her own favourite. She married in 1854 Mr Nicholls, who had been her father's curate at Haworth. Her brief married life was a happy one, though her husband would have wished her to abandon her literary work. A new story, Emma, had been begun, however, before her death, which occurred at Haworth, 31st March 1855. See Life of Charlotte Brontë, by Mrs Gaskell (1857); A Note on Charlotte Brontë, by A. C. Swinburne (1877); Charlotte Brontë, by Sir Wemyss Reid (1877); Mary Robinson's study on Emily (1883), and Augustine Birrell's on Charlotte (1887); Leyland's Brontë Family (1886); Dr Wright's The Brontës in Ireland (1893); the bibliography, &c., of the Brontë Society (1894 et seq.); and other works by Ramsden (1897), A. M. Mackay (1897), Bonnell (1903), and Clement Shorter (1896, 1905, and 1908).

Bronzino, IL, a name given to Agnolo di Cosimo (1502-72), to his pupil and nephew Alessandro Allori (1535-1607), and the latter's son and pupil Cristofano Allori (1577-1621), Florentine painters.

Brooke, LORD. See GREVILLE, FULKE.

Brooke, EMMA, author of A Superfluous Woman (1894), Transition (1895), &c., is the daughter of a landlord and capitalist. An early girl student at Cambridge, about 1882 she settled at Hampstead, and there became interested in Socialism, being a prominent member of the Fabian Society.

Brooke, HENRY, dramatist and novelist, was born in 1708, at Rantavan, County Cavan, the son of a wealthy clergyman. In 1720 he entered Trinity College, Dublin; in 1724 went to study law in London, where he became the chosen friend of Pope and Lyttelton; in 1728 married his cousin and ward, a girl of fifteen; in 1740 returned in ill-health to Rantavan, and in 1745 was made barrack-master of Mullingar, a post worth £400 a year. He died in Dublin, 10th October 1783. His poem, Universal Beauty (1735), is supposed to have suggested Erasmus Darwin's Botanic Garden. Gustavus Vasa (1739), the acting of which was prohibited at Drury Lane, was afterwards produced in Dublin as the Patriot. His plays are forgotten; and his novel, The Fool of Quality (5 vols. 1766; new ed. with biographical preface by Kingsley, 1859), is the sole survivor of his numerous works. See also Brookiana (2 vols. 1804).

Brooke, SIR JAMES, Rajah of Sarawak, was born at Benares, 29th April 1803, and educated at Norwich. He entered the East India army (1819), was seriously wounded in the Burmese war, and, quitting the service in 1830, conceived the idea of putting down piracy in the Eastern Archipelago. Having at his father's death (1835) inherited £30,000, he sailed in 1838 in a schooner-yacht from London for Sarawak, a province on the north-west coast of Borneo. When he arrived there (1839), for assistance given to the uncle of the sultan of Borneo against rebel tribes, he was by the sultan made Rajah of Sarawak (1841). Brooke instituted free trade, framed a new code of laws, declared the Dyak custom of head-hunting a capital crime, and vigorously set about the extirpation of piracy. Revisiting England in 1847, he was created K.C.B.; and made governor of the island of Labuan, near Sarawak, which had been purchased by the British government. In 1857 Brooke superseded in the governorship of Labuan, but still acting as Rajah of Sarawak, sustained successfully, with his native forces, a series of attacks by a large body of Chinese, who were irritated at his efforts to prevent opium-smuggling. The country prospered greatly under his regime; he raised the chief town from 1000 to 25,000 inhabitants; and the exports to Singapore, which in 1840 amounted to £25,000, were in 1858 £300,000. Brooke, who had repeatedly visited England, died at Burrator, in Devonshire, 11th June 1868, and was succeeded at Sarawak by his nephew, Sir Charles Johnson Brooke (b. 3d June 1829). Since 1888 Sarawak is a British protectorate. See Brooke's own Letters (1853), and Lives by Jacob (1876) and St John (1879).

Brooke, STOFFORD AUGUSTUS, born in Letterkenny, Donegal, in 1832, after a brilliant course at Trinity College, Dublin, took orders, held two London curacies, and in 1866 became incumbent of St James's Chapel, in 1875 of Bedford Chapel, Bloomsbury, where his sermons, at once rich in thought and graceful in literary form, made him one of the chief preachers in London. In 1872 he was appointed a royal chaplain; in 1880, through inability any longer to believe in miracles, he seceded from the Church of England, but continued to preach in his proprietary chapel. He has published Life of Robertson of Brighton (1865), Theology in the English Poets (1874), Primer of English Literature (1876), Milton (1879), History of Early English Literature (1892), Tennyson (1894), Sermons (9 vols. 1868-94), English Literature to the Conquest (1898), Poetry of Browning (1902), Studies in Poetry (1907), &c.

Brookfield, WILLIAM HENRY (1809-74), the friend of Tennyson and Thackeray, was born at Sheffield, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and became a school inspector, rector of Somerby, and a royal chaplain. See memoir by Lord Lyttelton prefixed to his Sermons (1875).

Brooks, CHARLES WILLIAM SHIRLEY, editor of Punch, was born in London, an architect's son, 29th April 1816. He was articled in 1832 to an Oswestry attorney, but turning reporter, and settling in London, wrote dramas, newspaper articles, and magazine work; in 1870 he succeeded Mark Lemon as editor of Punch. Of his novels the chief are Aspen Court (1855), The Gordian Knot (1860), The Silver Cord (1861), and Sooner or Later (1868). He died 23d February 1874. See Lives by Johnson (1897) and Layard (1907).

Brooks, PHILLIPS (1835-93), Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born at Boston, studied at Harvard, and after serving cures in Philadelphia and Boston, was consecrated Bishop of Massachusetts in 1891. A keen thinker and powerful preacher, he published several volumes. See his Life by Allen (1901).

Broome, SIR FREDERICK NAPIER, was born in Canada, 18th November 1842, emigrated to New Zealand in 1857, and in 1864, while on a visit to England, married Lady Barker, the widow of Colonel Sir G. R. Barker, R.A. (1817-61). She, whose maiden name was Mary Ann Stewart, was born in Jamaica, and is the author of Station Life in New Zealand (1869) and nearly a score more works. In 1869 they returned to London; but in 1875 Broome was appointed Colonial Secretary of Natal, in 1877 of Mauritius, in 1882 Governor of Western Australia, and in 1891 of Trinidad. Knighted in 1877, he died 26th Nov. 1896.

Broome, WILLIAM (1689-1745), born at Haslington, Cheshire, from Eton passed to St John's College, Cambridge, held four livings in Suffolk and Norfolk, and wrote six books of Pope's Odyssey.

Broschi, CARLO (1705-82), under the name 'Farinelli' was the most famous of 'castrato' singers. He was born at Naples, and died at Bologna; visited London in 1734; and in Spain was made a grandee, with a pension of £2000 a year.

Brosses, CHARLES DE, historian, was born at Dijon, 17th February 1709, and died president of the parliament of Burgundy, 7th May 1777. Among his works were: Lettres sur Herculaneum (1750); Histoire des Navigations aux Terres Australes (1756); Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches (1760, the word fetich being first used by him in the sense now usual); the ingenious Formation Mécanique des Langues (1765); and Histoire de la République Romaine (1777). Colomb edited his Lettres écrites d'Italie en 1739-40 in 1885, and Lord R. Gower translated selections from his Lettres (1897). See Life by Mariet (1875). [Bross.]

Brothers, RICHARD (1757-1824), the originator of the Anglo-Israelite craze, was born in Newfoundland, and from 1772 to 1789 served in the British navy. Refusing to take the oath requisite to enable him to draw his lieutenant's half-pay, he came at last to the workhouse. In 1793 he announced himself as the apostle of a new religion, 'the Nephew of the Almighty,' and 'Prince of the Hebrews, appointed to lead them to the Land of Canaan;' and in 1794 he published A Revealed Knowledge of the Prophecies and Times. For prophesying the death of the king and the destruction of the monarchy he was committed in 1795 to Newgate, and thence for eleven years to a lunatic asylum. His disciples included Nathaniel Halded (1751-1830), the M.P. and orientalist, William Sharp (q.v.), the engraver, and John Finlayson (1770-1854), a lawyer from Fife.

Brough, LIONEL, comedian, was born at Pontypool, 10th March 1836, and first took regularly to the stage in 1864. He died 8th November 1909. —His elder brother, ROBERT BARNABAS BROUGH (1828-60), wrote burlesques, romances, &c. [Brough.]

Brougham, HENRY, LORD BROUGHAM AND VAUX, was born in Edinburgh, 19th September

1778, his father being of an old Westmorland family, and his mother a niece of Robertson the historian. Educated at the High School and university of Edinburgh, in 1800 he was admitted to the Scotch bar; and in 1802 helped to found the Edinburgh Review, to whose first twenty numbers he contributed eighty articles. His Liberal views shut him out from the hope of promotion in Scotland; in 1805 he settled in London; in 1806 was secretary to a mission to Lisbon; and in 1808 was called to the English bar. Entering parliament in 1810 he carried an act making participation in the slave-trade felony. In 1812 he carried the repeal of the Orders in Council; but contesting Liverpool against Canning, was defeated, and remained without a seat till 1816, when he was returned for Winchelsea. He never acquired a very large practice at the bar, but he repeatedly distinguished himself by speeches of great vigour and ability—his most famous appearance being in defence of Queen Caroline (1820). His eloquence and boldness, though they forfeited for him the favour of the crown, gained him that of the people, and in 1820-30 Brougham was the popular idol. In 1822 he used his power, though in vain, in support of a scheme of national education; and he did much for the establishment of the London University, of the first Mechanics' Institute, and of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. In 1830 he was returned for the county of York. The aristocratic Whigs would, had they dared, have excluded Brougham from the Reform ministry, but found him indispensable; he was persuaded to accept a peerage and the chancellorship (1830), and assisted materially in carrying the Reform Bill. But his arrogance, self-confidence, and eccentricities rendered him as unpopular with his colleagues as he was on the bench. He went out with the Whig government in 1834, and on its reconstruction was shelved, never to hold office again. He was founder of the Social Science Association (1857); but it is as a law-reformer that Brougham will be best remembered. In 1816 he introduced a bill amending the law of libel, and in 1827 made proposals for dealing with law-reform on a large scale. After he left office, he secured great changes in the law of evidence. As an orator and as a debater in parliament, Brougham was inferior only to Canning, though fiery declamation and fierce invective were carried beyond bounds. His miscellaneous writings are upon an almost incredible variety of subjects, including mathematical and physical science, metaphysics, history, theology, and even romance, and, numbering 133, have but little permanent value (11 vols. 1855-61; 2d ed. 1873). Rogers remarked of him, 'There goes Solon, Lycurgus, Demosthenes, Archimedes, Sir Isaac Newton, Lord Chesterfield, and a great many more in one post-chaise;' and O'Connell's gibe ran, 'If Brougham knew a little of law, he would know a little of everything.' While not engaged in parliament, Brougham chiefly resided at Cannes; there he died, 7th May 1868, and was buried. His own Life and Times (3 vols. 1871), written in extreme old age, is very untrustworthy. See Atlay's Victorian Chancellors (vol. 1. 1906). [Broughm or Brougham.]

Broughton, LORD. See HOBHOUSE.

Broughton, JOHN (1705-87), pugilist.

Broughton, RHODA, novelist, was born, a clergyman's daughter, near Denbigh, 29th November 1840. Her first, and perhaps her best, novel, Not Wisely but Too Well (1867), has been followed by Cometh up as a Flower (1867), Red as a Rose is She (1870), Nancy (1873), Joan (1876), Belinda (1883), Doctor Cupid (1886), Alas! (1890), Scylla or Charybdis? (1895), Lavinia (1902), &c.

Broussais, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH VICTOR (1772-1838), founder of a theory of medicine which strongly resembles the Brunonian system of John Brown, was born at St Malo and died at Vitry, having served as a surgeon in the navy and army, and in 1820 been appointed a professor at Val-de-Grace, in 1830 in the Academy of Medicine in Paris. See monograph by Reis (Par. 1860). [Broos-say.]

Brouwer, or BRAUWER, ADRIAN, painter, was born at Oudenarde in 1605 or 1606, studied at Haarlem under Franz Hals, and about 1630 settled at Antwerp, where he died of the plague in January 1638. His favourite subjects were scenes from tavern life, country merry-makings, card-players, smoking and drinking groups, and roisters generally. See Lives by Schmidt (Leip. 1873) and Bode (Vienna, 1884). [Brow-uer.]

Brown, ALEXANDER CRUM. See BROWN, JOHN.

Brown, CHARLES BROCKDEN, novelist, was born of Quaker ancestry at Philadelphia, January 17, 1771, and died of consumption, February 22, 1810. After abortive studies in law, he was the first American to adopt literature as a profession. Wieland (1798) was followed by Ormund (1799), Arthur Mervyn (1800), Edgar Huntly, or The Adventures of a Sleep-walker (1801), Clara Howard (1801), and Jane Talbot (1804), novels full of incident and subtle analysis, but extravagant and Godwinesque. See Life by W. H. Prescott (1834).

Brown, FORD MADOX, historical painter, a grandson of the founder of the Brunonian system, was born at Calais, 16th April 1821. His earlier studies were conducted at Bruges, Ghent, and Antwerp; and during a three years' residence in Paris he produced his 'Manfred in the Jungfrau' (1841), and 'Parisina's Sleep' (1842), works intensely dramatic in feeling, but sombre in colouring. In 1844-45 he contributed three subjects to the Westminster cartoon competitions; one of them was carried out in 1861 as an oil-picture, 'Willelmus Conquistator.' A visit to Italy (1845) led him to seek greater variety and richness of colouring, and its results were seen in 'Wyclif reading his Translation of the Scriptures to John of Gaunt' (1848), and 'Chaucer reciting his Poetry' (1851). In 1850 he was a contributor of verse, prose, and design to the Pre-Raphaelite Germ, and in his youth Rossetti worked in his studio. Among the most important works in his fully developed manner are 'Cordelia and Lear,' 'Christ washing Peter's Feet,' 'Work,' 'The Last of England,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' 'The Entombment,' 'Cromwell dictating the Vaudois Despatch to Milton,' and, in landscape, the 'English Summer Afternoon.' In 1865 he held an exhibition of his collected works in London. In 1879 he engaged on a great series of twelve frescoes depicting the history of Manchester for the town-hall of that city. He had just completed it, when he died, 6th October 1893. See Life by Ford Madox Hueffer (1896).

His son, OLIVER MADOX BROWN, author and artist, was born at Finchley, 20th January 1855, and died of blood-poisoning, 5th November 1874. At twelve he executed a water-colour—'Margaret of Anjou and the Robber'—of considerable merit; and in 1870 his equestrian 'Exercise' found a place on the line in the Royal Academy. In 1871-72 he wrote his first novel, published in an altered and mutilated form in 1873 as Gabriel Denver, and reprinted in original form and under its first title of The Black Swan in his Literary Remains (1876). See Life by Ingram (1883).

Brown, SIR GEORGE (1790-1865), British general, was born and died at Linkwood, near Elgin. He served in the Peninsula (1808-13); was wounded at Bladensburg in 1814; and in the Crimean war (1854-55) commanded the Light Division, being severely wounded at Inkermann. In 1855 he was created a G.C.B., in 1856 was gazetted 'general for distinguished service in the field,' and in 1860 became commander-in-chief in Ireland.

Brown, GEORGE LORING, American artist, born in Boston, 2d Feb. 1814, spent more than twenty years in the art-centres of Europe, and returned to America in 1860 with a high reputation as a landscape-painter. He died 25th June 1889.

Brown, HENRY KIRKE (1814-86), American sculptor, from Italy returned in 1846 to Brooklyn.

Brown, JOHN (c. 1627-85), the 'Christian carrier,' of Priesthill, Ayrshire, shot by Claverhouse.

Brown, JOHN (1715-66), a clergyman, born at Rothbury, who wrote poems, tragedies, essays, &c., and finally cut his throat.

Brown, JOHN, of Haddington, author of the Self-interpreting Bible, was born in 1722 at Carpow, near Abernethy, Perthshire. A poor weaver's child, early orphaned, he had but scanty schooling; but, as a herd-boy on the Tayside hills, he studied Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. For a time he was a pedlar; during the '45 served in the Fife militia; taught in several schools; and having studied theology in connection with the Associate Burgher Synod, was in 1751 called to the congregation of Haddington. He was a man of great learning; open-handed, on a stipend of £50 a year; a kindly humorist, though harrowing self-doubts tormented him all his life through; and a powerful preacher. In 1768 he accepted the unsalaried Burgher chair of Divinity; and on 19th June 1787 he died at Haddington. Of his twenty-seven ponderous works, the most widely known are the Dictionary of the Bible (1768) and the Self-interpreting Bible (2 vols. 1778). See his Memoirs and Select Remains (1856).

—JOHN BROWN, D.D., his grandson, was son of the Rev. John Brown of Whitburn (1754-1832). Born in 1784, he studied at Edinburgh University (1797-1800), and kept school for three years at Elie, meantime attending, during the summer vacations, the Burgher Theological Hall. In 1806 he was ordained to a pastorate at Biggar, and in 1822 called to Edinburgh, where from 1834 he was also professor of Exegetical Theology, revered for saintliness and learning. He died 13th October 1858. He published close upon twenty religious works. See Dr Cairns's Memoir of him (1860).—His son, again, DR JOHN BROWN, the essayist, was born at Biggar, 22d September 1810, attended the High School at Edinburgh, and studied arts and medicine at the university there, becoming M.D. in 1833. His practice was never large, his life was quiet and uneventful (though some years were clouded by fits of depression). He died 11th May 1882. Almost all Dr John Brown's writings are comprised within three volumes—the two Hours Subsecivæ ('leisure hours,' 1858-61) and John Leech and other Papers (1882). Humour is the chief feature of his genius—humour with its twin-sister pathos; we find them both at their highest perfection in his sketches of 'Rab' and 'Marjorie'—the uncontent mastiff and the dear dead child. Writing of nothing that he did not know, he wrote, too, of nothing that he did not love or greatly care for.

Hence both the lucidity and the tenderness of his essays, which rank with Lamb's, and with Lamb's alone in the language. See Peddie's Recollections of him (1893), Taylor Brown's Life of him (1903), and his own Letters (1907).—ALEXANDER CRUM BROWN, half-brother of Dr John Brown, was born in Edinburgh in 1838, and in 1869-1908 was professor of Chemistry there.—SAMUEL BROWN, chemist (1817-1856), was a grandson of John Brown of Haddington, and son of Samuel Brown, provost of that burgh (1779-1839), and was educated at Edinburgh High School and University, where he graduated M.D. in 1839, but immediately surrendered himself to the fascination of chemistry. The dream of his life was the possibility of reconstructing the whole science of atomics, and in 1843 he delivered in Edinburgh four memorable lectures on the atomic theory. He was author of the Tragedy of Galileo (1850), and two volumes of Essays, Scientific and Literary (1858).

Brown, JOHN, founder of the Brunonian system of medicine, born in 1736, of poor parents, in Bunkle parish, Berwickshire, taught at Duns and in Edinburgh, and after studying medicine became assistant to Professor Cullen (q.v.). Conceiving himself slighted by Cullen, he commenced giving lectures himself upon a new system of medicine, according to which all diseases are divided into the sthenic, or those depending on an excess of excitement, and the asthenic, the former to be removed by debilitating medicines, as opium, and the latter by stimulants, such as wine and brandy. His system found strong support in Germany and Italy. In 1779 he took his M.D. at St Andrews, and in 1780 published Elementa Medicinæ (English version, with Life by Dr Beddoes; 2d ed. 1795). Overwhelmed with debt, in 1786 he removed to London, where he died, 17th October 1788. His works were edited, with a memoir, by his son (3 vols. 1804).

Brown, JOHN, abolitionist, was born in Torrington, Connecticut, May 9, 1800, of pilgrim descent. He was successively tanner and land-surveyor, shepherd and farmer, in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New York; and, a strong abolitionist, wandered much through the country on anti-slavery enterprises. He was twice married and had twenty children. In 1854 five of his sons removed to Kansas, and joining them after the border conflict had begun, Brown became a leader in the strife. In reprisal, he once ordered five pro-slavery men at Pottawatomie to be shot. Ossawatimie, Brown's home, was burned in 1856, and a son killed. When the war in Kansas ceased, Brown began to drill men in Iowa. His scheme next was to establish a stronghold in the mountains of Virginia as a refuge for runaway slaves, and in order to force attention and secure recruits he made his harebrained attack on the U.S. armoury at Harper's Ferry in Virginia. In 1859 he had assembled twenty-two men (six of them coloured) and boxes of rifles and pikes on his farm near the town; and on the night of the 18th October, with eighteen men, he broke into the armoury and took several citizens prisoners. The citizens shot some of the invaders, and next day Colonel Robert E. Lee (afterwards famous), with a company of marines, arrived from Washington. Brown and six men, barricading themselves in an engine-house, continued to fight until his two sons were killed and himself severely wounded. Tried by a Virginia court for insurrection, treason, and murder, he was convicted and hanged at Charlottesville, Virginia, December 2, 1859. Four of his men were executed with him, and two others later. See the Lives by Redpath (1860), Sanborn (1885), Von Holst (Boston, 1888), and Villard (1910).

Brown, JOHN (1826-83), for thirty-four years personal attendant of Queen Victoria, born at Craithenaird, Balmoral, died at Windsor Castle.

Brown, SIR JOHN (1816-96), founder of the Atlas Works at Sheffield, employing 4500 hands, invented the method of rolling plate-armour for war-ships, and first made steel rails.

Brown, LANCELOT (1715-83), the landscape-gardener, famous as 'Capability Brown,' was born at Kirkharle, Northumberland.

Brown, OLIVER M. See BROWN, FORD MADOX.

Brown, PETER HUME, LL.D., historian, was born in Haddingtonshire, 17th Dec. 1850, and studied at Edinburgh. He is author of Lives of Buchanan (1890) and John Knox (2 vols. 1895), a History of Scotland (3 vols. 1898-1909), &c. In 1898 he became editor of the Privy Council Register of Scotland, and, in 1901, professor of ancient Scottish history at Edinburgh.

Brown, RAWDON LUBBOCK (1803-83), explorer of the archives of Venice, his home from 1833.

Brown, ROBERT (1773-1858), botanist, son of the Episcopal clergyman at Montrose, was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and served in a Scottish regiment. In 1798 he visited London, and in 1801 went as naturalist with Captain Flinders to the Australian coasts; in 1805 he brought home nearly four thousand species of plants. Appointed librarian to the Linnean Society, he published the Prodromus Floræ Novæ Hollandiæ (1810). His adoption of Jussieu's natural system led to its general substitution in place of the Linnean method; Humboldt called him 'facile princeps botanicorum.' In 1810 Brown received charge of Banks's library and splendid collections; and when, in 1827, they were transferred to the British Museum, he became botanical keeper there. The Ray Society in 1866-68 reprinted his works, except the Prodromus.

Brown, ROBERT (1842-95), botanist and geographer, born at Caupster in Caithness, studied at Edinburgh University, travelled in Greenland, sub-arctic Canada, the West Indies, and the Barbary States, and wrote The Countries of the World (6 vols.), Our Earth (3 vols.), Science for All (5 vols.), and The Story of Africa and its Explorers (4 vols.).

Brown, SAMUEL. See BROWN, JOHN.

Brown, THOMAS (1778-1820), a Scottish metaphysician, born at Kirkcubreck manse, Kirkcubrightshire, in 1792 entered Edinburgh University, and, abandoning law for medicine, became in 1806 Dr Gregory's partner in his large practice. His bent, however, was for literature and philosophy. He contributed to the Edinburgh Review; and in 1804 appeared his Cause and Effect. In 1810 he became colleague to Dugald Stewart, professor of Moral Philosophy. Brown's chief contribution to psychology is the establishment of a sixth or muscular sense; his Lectures (with a memoir by Welsh) reached a 20th edition in 1860.

Brown, Rev. T. E. (1831-97), second master of Clifton College, author of Betsy Lee, Fo'c's'le Yarns, and other Manx poems.

Brown, TOM, 'of facetious memory' in Addison's phrase, was born at Shifnal, Shropshire, in 1663. His studies at Christ Church, Oxford, were most probably cut short by his irregularities, but are remembered by his clever extempore adaptation of Martial's epigram, 'Non amo te, Sabidi': 'I do not love thee, Dr Fell.' After a few years of teaching at Kingston-on-Thames, he settled in London, where he made an uncertain living by writing satirical poems and pamphlets, many of them remarkable more for their scurrility than their wit. He is principally interesting now as the assailant of Dryden, Sherlock, Durfey, Sir Richard Blackmore, &c. He lived a shifty and disreputable life, and dying 16th June 1704, was buried in the Westminster cloisters near his friend, Mrs Afra Behn.

Brown, Ulysses. See BROWNE.

Brown, Sir William (1784-1864), was born at Ballymena, County Antrim, and after spending some years in the United States, established at Liverpool a branch of his father's linen business. A Liberal reformer and advocate of a decimal coinage, he was four times M.P. for South Lancashire. In 1857, at a cost of £40,000, he founded the Free Public Library of Liverpool, was made a baronet in 1863, and left a fortune of £900,000.

Brown, William Haig, LL.D. (1823-1907), born at Bromley, Middlesex, graduated with high honours from Pembroke Col., Cambridge, in 1846, and became head-master of Kensington grammar-school in 1857, of the Charterhouse in 1863.

Browne, Charles Farrar, 'Artemus Ward,' was born at Waterford, Maine, 26th April 1834. He worked at Boston and elsewhere as a compositor, became a reporter, and in 1858, under the style of 'Artemus Ward, showman,' wrote for the Cleveland Plaindealer a description of an imaginary travelling menagerie. This was followed by letters in which grotesque spelling and an inextricable interweaving of business puffery and moralising served to convey sound sense and shrewd satire. In 1861 'Artemus Ward' entered the lecture field, and started a panorama, whose artistic wretchedness furnished occasion for countless jokes. In 1864 he was disabled by pulmonary consumption; but in 1866, having rallied somewhat, he went to London, where he contributed to Punch, and was very popular as 'the genial showman,' exhibiting his panorama at the Egyptian Hall. After a short sojourn in Jersey, he returned to England, to die at Southampton, 6th March 1867. His publications were Artemus Ward, His Book (1862); Artemus Ward, His Panorama (1865); Artemus Ward among the Mormons (1866); Artemus Ward in England (1867).

Browne, Edward Harold, born 6th March 1811, at Morton House, Bucks, from Eton passed to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he became fellow and tutor. Professor of Hebrew at Lampeter (1841), and Norrisian professor of Divinity at Cambridge (1854), he was consecrated Bishop of Ely in 1864, and translated to Winchester in 1873. He died 17th December 1891. Besides sermons, he wrote a book on the Pentateuch, and an Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles (1850; 13th ed. 1887). See Life by Dean Kitchin (1895).

Browne, Felicia Dorothea. See HEMANS.

Browne, George, Count de (1698-1792), an Irish soldier of fortune, entered the service of Russia in 1730, and for thirty years was governor of Livonia and Esthonia.

Browne, Hablo Knight, 'Phiz,' was born at Kennington, London, 15th June 1815. He was apprenticed to a line-engraver, but soon took to etching and water-colour painting, and in 1833 gained a medal from the Society of Arts for an etching of 'John Gilpin.' In 1836 he succeeded Seymour and R. W. Buss as illustrator of Dickens's Pickwick; and his reputation was maintained by his designs to Nicholas Nickleby, Master Humphrey's Clock, Martin Chuzzlewit, Dombey, David Copper- field, Bleak House, Little Dorrit, and A Tale of Two Cities. He also illustrated many of Lever's and several of Ainsworth's novels. He laboured for thirty years with unceasing activity, save for occasional breaks during the hunting-season, and a little travel. Struck with paralysis in 1867, he died at West Brighton, 8th July 1882. His son, W. Gordon Browne, is also known as a book-illustrator. See Life, by D. C. Thomson (1884).

Browne, James, LL.D. (1793-1841), 'stickit minister,' editor, book-compiler—his best-known work A History of the Highland Clans—and convert to Catholicism, was born near Coupar-Angus, and died near Edinburgh.

Browne, John Ross (1817-75), American traveller and humorist, was born in Ireland, but was brought as a child to the States, and died at Oakland, California.

Browne, Robert (c. 1550-1633), founder of the Brownists, was born at Tolethorpe, Rutland, and after graduating at Cambridge in 1572, was a schoolmaster in London, and an open-air preacher. In 1580 he began to attack the Established Church, and soon after formed a distinct church on congregational principles at Norwich. Committed to the custody of the sheriff, he was released through the influence of his kinsman, Lord Burghley; but in 1581, with his followers, was obliged to take refuge at Middleburg, in Holland. In 1584 he returned, via Scotland, to England, and reconciling himself to the Church, in 1586 became master of Stamford grammar-school, in 1591 rector of Achurch, Northamptonshire. Of a very violent temper, he was, when eighty years old, sent to Northampton jail for an assault on a constable, and in jail he died. The Brownists may be said to have given birth to the Independents or Congregationalists.

Browne, Sir Samuel James, an Indian general (1824-1901), who lost an arm and gained the V.C. in the Mutiny, and served before in the Punjab campaign of 1848-49, as afterwards in the Afghan one of 1878-79. He was made a K.C.S.I. in 1876, a K.C.B. in 1879.

Browne, Sir Thomas, author of the Religio Medici, was born in London, October 19, 1605, and educated at Winchester College and at Broadgate Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford. He next studied medicine, travelled in Ireland, France, and Italy, continued his medical studies at Montpellier and Padua, graduated as Doctor of Medicine at Leyden and at Oxford, and settled in 1637 at Norwich. He lived calmly throughout the troubles of the Civil War, maintained an active correspondence with antiquaries and scientists, and was knighted by Charles II. on his visit to Norwich in 1671. He died October 19, 1682, and was buried in the church of St Peter's Mancroft, whence in 1840 his skull was 'knaw'd out of its grave' and placed in the hospital-museum. His greatest work is his earliest, the Religio Medici, written about 1635—a kind of confession of faith, revealing a deep insight into the dim mysteries of the spiritual life. The surreptitious publication of two editions in 1642 obliged him to issue an authorised edition in 1643; it was translated into Latin, and had the honour of insertion in the Index Expurgatorius. Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Enquiries into . . . Vulgar and Common Errors (1646), a strange and discursive amalgam of humour, acuteness, learning, and credulity, is by far the most elaborate of his works. Hydrotaphia; Urn Burial (1658), mainly a discussion of burial-customs, shows all the author's vast and curious learning set in language of *rich and gorgeous eloquence. The Garden of Cyrus (1658), the most fantastic of Browne's writings, aims to show that the number five pervaded not only all the horticulture of antiquity, but that it recurs throughout all plant-life, as well as the 'figurations' of animals. After his death appeared Miscellany Tracts (1683), Letter to a Friend (1690), and Christian Morals (1716), an incomplete work, evidently intended to be a continuation of the Religio Medici. Browne's works are unsystematic and unequal: his thought is strikingly original, often expressed with quaint humour or searching pathos. His favourite theme is ever the mystery of death. His style is too idiomatic and difficult to be popular, and his studied brevity often falls into obscurity. Charles Lamb boasted that he was the first 'among the moderns' to discover Sir Thomas Browne's excellences, De Quincey ranks him with Jeremy Taylor as the most dazzling of rhetoricians, and Lowell calls him 'our most imaginative mind since Shakespeare.' There are editions of the works by Simon Wilkin (4 vols. 1835-36), and Sayle (3 vols. 1904-7). See Greenhill's editions of the Religio and Hydriotaphia (1881 and 1896), and Gosse's monograph ('Men of Letters,' 1905).

Browne, THOMAS A. See BOLDREWOOD, ROLF.

Browne, SIR THOMAS GORE (1807-87), British general, fought in the Afghan campaign of 1842, and was afterwards governor of St Helena, New Zealand, Tasmania, and Bermuda. He was made a K.G.M.G. in 1869.

Browne, ULYSSES MAXIMILIAN, COUNT, born at Basel, 23d October 1705, of an Irish Jacobite family, became one of the foremost field-marshal in the army of Maria Theresa. As governor of Silesia (1739-42) he had to face the first of Frederick the Great's attacks, and in the Seven Years' War he commanded the Austrians at Lobositz (1756). He was mortally wounded at the battle of Prague, and died June 26, 1757.

Browne, WILLIAM, pastoral poet, was born at Tavistock in 1591; from Exeter College, Oxford, proceeded to the Inner Temple; and then was tutor to Robert Dormer, the future Earl of Carnarvon. According to Wood, he was taken into the household of the Herberts at Wilton, and there 'got wealth and purchased an estate.' He was living at Dorking about the close of 1640, and seems to have died about 1643. His great work was Britannia's Pastorals (books i, ii, 1613-16; book iii. first printed by the Percy Soc., 1852). His works have been edited by W. C. Hazlitt (2 vols. Roxburghe Club, 1868) and Gordon Goodwin (2 vols. 1894).

Browne, WILLIAM GEORGE (1768-1813), born in London, studied at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1792-98 travelled in Egypt, Dar-Fur, and Asia Minor, in 1800-2 in Turkey and the Levant, and in 1812 set out for Turkey, but was murdered in Persia. His Travels are valuable, but dull.

Browning, ROBERT, born at Camberwell, May 7, 1812, attended lectures at University College, and then travelled abroad. Pauline, a dramatic poem, written at the age of nineteen, was published in 1833; Paracelsus (1835) revealed its author's energy, boldness of thought, lofty aspirations, and grip of human passion. In 1837 he wrote (for Macready) his first tragedy, Strafford. Sordello (1840) traces, not without much crabbed writing and elliptical thinking, the soul's development of an Italian poet named by Dante. Bells and Pomegranates (1841-46) included the plays Pippa Passes, King Victor and King Charles, and Colombe's Birthday; the tragedies The Return of the Druses, A Blot on the Scutcheon (produced at Drury Lane), Luria, and A Soul's Tragedy; and the dramatic lyrics How they Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, Saul, The Lost Leader, and The Pied Piper of Hamelin—poems which still remain the most popular of all Browning's writings. In 1846 he married Elizabeth Barrett, and with her he settled at Florence; their son, R. B. Browning, the sculptor, was born there in 1849. In 1850 he published Christmas Eve and Easter Day; Men and Women (1855) contained some of its author's finest work—Fra Lippo, Childe Roland, Andrea del Sarto, Evelyn Hope, Holy Cross Day, and Up at a Villa. After the death of his wife (1861) he settled permanently in London with his only son. Dramatis Personæ (1864) included Abt Vogler, Caliban, A Death in the Desert, and Rabbi ben Ezra, in which the writer unfolded his views upon music, philosophy, and immortality. His masterpiece, The Ring and the Book (1869), is an epic dealing most searchingly with the passions of humanity, and has for its basis the narrative of a murder by an Italian count, as related by the various persons concerned. Hervé Riel (1871) is a poem upon a French sailor hero. Balaustion's Adventure (1871) includes a 'Transcript' from the Alcestis of Euripides; Prince Hohenstiel-Schwangau, Saviour of Society (1871), deals with the career of Louis-Napoleon; Fifine at the Fair (1872) handles a question in morals; Red-cotton Night-cap Country (1873) tells the story of a famous Norman law case; Aristophanes' Apology (1875) was a second venture amongst the great Greek poets; The Inn Album (1875) is a graphic story of a deeply-wronged woman; Pacchiarotto (1876) gave the author an opportunity of defending his poetic methods; Agamemnon (1877) is a graphic transcript of Æschylus; La Saisiaz, the Two Poets of Croisic (1878), vindicates faith in a future life; and Dramatic Idylls (1879-80) are vigorous character sketches. Jocoseria (1883) consists of narrative poems. Ferishtah's Fancies (1884) discusses the relation of man with the divine. Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Day (1887) indicates Browning's views upon philosophical, literary, artistic, and other questions. As a poet, Browning is distinguished for the depth of his spiritual insight, his dramatic energy, and power of psychological analysis. His style is too frequently obscure and difficult, his versification hard and rugged, and his rhymes forced. On 12th December 1889—the very day his last volume of poems, Asolando; Fancies and Facts, was published—Browning died at Venice. See Furnivall's Browning Bibliography (1883), Mrs Sutherland Orr's Handbook to Browning (1885); works by Symons (1887), Fotheringham (1887 and 1898), Gosse (1890), Sharp (1890), J. T. Nettlehip (1868; 2d ed. 1896), Chesterton (1903), Dowden (1904), Griffin and Muirchín (1910); Berdoe's Browning Cyclopædia (1892); the Life by Mrs Sutherland Orr (1891; partly rewritten by Kenyon, 1908); Stopford Brooke's The Poetry of Robert Browning (1902).

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING, poetess, was born at Coxhoe Hall, Durlham, March 6, 1806, but spent her girlhood mostly on her father's estate, near Ledbury, in Herefordshire. At ten she read Homer in the original, and at fourteen wrote an epic on The Battle of Marathon. About 1824 she seriously injured her spine, the result of an accident while endeavouring to saddle her horse, and was long an invalid. The family ultimately settled in London. Her Essay on Mind, and other Poems, was published when she was nineteen,

In 1833 she issued a translation of the Prometheus Bound. This was succeeded by The Seraphim, and other Poems (1838), in which volume was republished the fine poem on Cowper's grave. When staying at Torquay, her brother and a party of friends were drowned in a boating expedition, and the shock confined her for many years to a sickroom. In 1844 appeared the Poems, which contained The Cry of the Children, a noble outburst over the wrongs of young children employed in factories. In 1846 she first saw Robert Browning, and next autumn they were married. The Poems of 1850 contained an entirely new translation of the Prometheus Bound. In Casa Guidi Windows (1851) she expressed her sympathy with the regeneration of Italy. Aurora Leigh (1856) is a poem into which all the treasures of its writer's mind and heart have been poured. In Poems before Congress (1860) she again manifested her interest in Italian freedom. She died at Florence, 30th June 1861. The Last Poems (1862) included several translations written in early life. Greek Christian Poets and the English Poets (1863) consisted of prose essays and translations, from the Athenaeum of 1842. Her so-called Sonnets from the Portuguese are the best love-poems in the language. See her Letters to R. H. Horne (1876); her Letters, edited by Kenyon (1897); her and her husband's Letters 1845-46 (1899); P. Bayne's Two Great Englishwomen (1880); and J. H. Ingram's short Life of her (1889).

Brownrigg, ELIZABETH, a midwife hanged at Tyburn, in 1767, for the barbarous murder of a workhouse apprentice, Mary Clifford.

Brownrigg, SIR ROBERT (1759-1833), conquered in 1814-15 the Kandyan kingdom in Ceylon.

Brown-Séguard, ÉDOUARD, physiologist, was born at Port Louis, Mauritius, 8th April 1817, the son of a Philadelphia sea-captain and a lady called Séguard. He studied at Paris, graduated M.D. in 1846, devoted himself to physiological research, and received many prizes for his experiments on blood, muscular irritability, animal heat, the spinal cord, and the nervous system. In 1864 he became professor of Physiology at Harvard, in 1869 returned to Paris as professor of Pathology in the School of Medicine, in 1873 became a medical practitioner in New York, and in 1878 succeeded Claude Bernard as professor of Experimental Medicine at the Collège de France. He repeatedly lectured in England also. He published lectures on Physiology and Pathology of the Nervous System (Phila. 1860), Paralysis of the Lower Extremities (1860), Nervous Affections (1873), Dual Character of the Brain (1877), &c. He died in Paris, 2d April 1894. See Eloy, La Méthode de Brown-Séguard (Paris, 1893). [Brown-Say-kahr'.]

Brownson, ORESTES AUGUSTUS (1803-76), a versatile American writer, was born at Stockbridge, Vermont, and died at Detroit, having in turn been a Presbyterian, a Universalist, a Unitarian pastor, and from 1844 a Catholic.

Bruce, a family illustrious in Scottish history, descended from Robert de Bruis, a Norman knight, who accompanied William the Conqueror to England in 1066. The name is traced to the domain of Bruis, near Cherbourg. The first Robert de Bruis received extensive lands chiefly in Yorkshire. His son, the second Robert, was a companion in arms of Prince David of Scotland, afterwards David I., from whom he got the lordship of Annandale. On the war in England between Stephen and Matilda, niece of the king of Scots, Robert de Bruis adhered to Stephen, and renounced his allegiance to David, resigning his lands in Annandale to his son Robert. In the battle of the Standard tradition relates that he took prisoner his son Robert, who, then fourteen years of age, fought on the Scottish side. He died in 1141. His English estates were inherited by his eldest son, Adam, whose male line terminated in Peter Bruce of Skelton, Constable of Scarborough Castle in 1271. Robert Bruce, second lord of Annandale, had two sons: Robert, who died without issue before 1191, and William, whose son, Robert, fourth lord of Annandale, married Isabel, second daughter of David, Earl of Huntingdon and Chester, brother of William the Lion, and thus founded the royal House of Bruce. He died in 1245.—ROBERT DE BRUCE (1210-95), fifth lord of Annandale, son of the fourth lord, did homage to Henry III. in 1251 on the death of his mother for her lands in England, and was made Sheriff of Cumberland and Constable of Carlisle. On the Scottish throne becoming vacant at the death, in 1290, of the 'Maid of Norway,' granddaughter of Alexander III., Baliol and Bruce claimed the succession, the former as great-grandson of David, Earl of Huntingdon, by his eldest daughter, Margaret; the latter as grandson, by his second daughter, Isabel. Edward I. of England as umpire decided in favour of Baliol in 1292. To avoid swearing fealty to his successful rival, Bruce resigned Annandale to his eldest son, ROBERT DE BRUCE (1253-1304), who is said to have accompanied Edward I. of England to Palestine in 1269. In 1271 he married Marjory, Countess of Carrick, and in her right became Earl of Carrick. In 1292 he resigned the earldom to his eldest son, Robert, the future king. On the death of his father in 1295 he did homage to Edward for his English lands, was made Constable of Carlisle, and fought for the English king against Baliol. On Baliol's defeat he applied to Edward for the crown, but was refused it.

His eldest son, ROBERT BRUCE, hero of the Scottish War of Independence, was born in 1274 at Lochmaben or Turnberry or in Essex. In 1296, as Earl of Carrick, he swore fealty to Edward I. at Berwick, and in 1297 renewed his oath of homage at Carlisle. Shortly after, with his Carrick vassals, he joined the Scottish revolt under Wallace, but by the Capitulation of Irvine made his peace with the English monarch. In 1298 Bruce again rose against Edward, and after Falkirk had his lands wasted by the English. He was one of the four regents of Scotland in 1299, but did not again fight against Edward till the final rising in 1306. With John Comyn, the nephew of Baliol, he seems to have made an agreement as to their rival claims to the throne. They met in the church of the Minorite Friars, Dumfries (10th February 1306); a quarrel took place; and Bruce in passion stabbed Comyn, who was despatched by Kirkpatrick. Bruce now assembled his vassals and asserted his rights to the throne, and two months later was crowned king at Scone. An English army under the Earl of Pembroke took Perth and drove Bruce into the wilds of Athole. At Dalry, near Tyndrum, Bruce was defeated by Macdougall, the Lord of Lorn, Comyn's uncle, and by and by took refuge in Rathlin, off the north coast of Ireland. In the spring of 1307 he landed in Carrick, surprised the English garrison in his own castle of Turnberry, and later in the year defeated the English under the Earl of Pembroke at London Hill. After the death of King Edward in 1307, the English were cleared out of the country and all the great castles recovered except Stirling, which the governor promised to surrender if not relieved before the 24th June. This led to the memorable battle of Bannockburn, 24th June 1314, when the English under Edward II., amounting, it is said, to 100,000 men, were totally routed by Bruce with 30,000. In 1317 Bruce passed over to Ireland to assist his brother Edward, and defeated the Anglo-Irish at Slane. Up to a truce (1323) the Scots repeatedly invaded England; and on the accession of Edward III. in 1327 hostilities recommenced with a great Scottish inroad into the northern counties. The war was at last closed by the Treaty of Northampton (1328), recognising the independence of Scotland, and Bruce's right to the throne. In 1329 Bruce died of leprosy at Cardross Castle, on the Firth of Clyde. His heart was to be carried to Palestine and buried in Jerusalem, but Douglas, who bore it, was killed fighting against the Moors in Spain, and the sacred relic was brought to Scotland, and buried in Melrose Abbey. Bruce's body was interred in the Abbey of Dunfermline, where in 1818 his bones were discovered. Marjory, his daughter by his first wife (a daughter of the Earl of Mar), married Walter the High Steward, and their son afterwards ascended the throne as Robert II. His immediate successor, David II. (q.v.), was the son of his second wife, a daughter of the Earl of Ulster. See Sir Herbert Maxwell's Robert the Bruce (1897).—His brother, EDWARD, was actively engaged in the struggle for Scotland's independence. In 1315 the chieftains of Ulster tendered to him the crown of Ireland. With 6000 men he embarked at Ayr, and by a series of victories over the English made himself master of Ulster. He was crowned king of Ireland in 1316, but was slain at the battle of Dundalk in 1318.

Bruce, JAMES, 'the Abyssinian', was born at Kinnaird House, Stirlingshire, December 14, 1730, studied at Harrow and Edinburgh University, and in 1754-61 was a wine-merchant in London. In 1763-65 he was consul-general at Algiers. In 1768 he set out from Cairo on his famous journey to Abyssinia by the Nile, Assouan, the Red Sea, and Massowah. In 1770 he was at Gondar, had many adventures, and held for a time a government appointment. He reached the source of the Abai, or head-stream of the Blue Nile, then considered the main stream of the Nile (14th Nov. 1770); and having remained till the end of 1771, he returned, through great hardships, by way of Sennaar, Assouan, Alexandria, and Marseilles. In France he visited Buffon and other distinguished men, and in 1774 he was back in Scotland. His long-expected Travels to Discover the Sources of the Nile were published in 1790, in five large quartos with plates and charts. The work contained such curious accounts of the manners of the Abyssinians that by many—as by Dr Johnson—his tales were set down as fabrications. Modern travellers have strongly confirmed his general accuracy. Bruce, who was a huge, self-assertive, dictatorial man, died April 27, 1794, at Kinnaird, of a fall down-stairs. See the Life by Murray in the later editions of the Travels; and that by Sir Francis Head (1844).

Bruce, JAMES. See ELGIN, EARL OF.

Bruce, JOHN COLLINGWOOD, antiquary, was born at Newcastle in 1805, and died there, 5th April 1892, having graduated at Glasgow in 1826, and been trained for the Presbyterian ministry, but devoted himself to teaching. His works include The Roman Wall (1851; 3d ed. 1866); The Bayeux Tapestry Elucidated (1856); Lapidarium

Septentrionale (1875), an account of all the Roman monuments in the north of England; and a Handbook to the Roman Wall (1863; 3d ed. 1885).

Bruce, MICHAEL, Scottish poet, was born 27th March 1746, at Kinnesswood, near the eastern shore of Loch Leven. A weaver's son, he tended sheep in his boyhood, but in 1762 was sent to Edinburgh University to study for the ministry. He had all his life to struggle with poverty; and after he left the university in 1765, and settled as a schoolmaster, first at Gairney Bridge, then near Tillyculter, to poverty were added sickness and melancholy. He died of consumption, 5th July 1767, aged twenty-one. His tender and pathetic Poems on Several Occasions were published by the Rev. John Logan (q.v.), his college friend, in 1770. Logan has been charged with publishing poems by Bruce, including the Ode to the Cuckoo, as his own. Logan's claim is defended by David Laing, J. Small (1873-78), and R. Small (British and Foreign Evan. Rev. 1879); Bruce's by his biographers Mackelvie (1837), Grosart (1865-86), and Mackenzie (1906), and by T. Bayne (N. and Q., 1902).

Bruce, ROBERT. See BRUCE, FAMILY OF.

Bruce, ROBERT (1554-1631), from 1587 to 1600 was a Presbyterian minister in Edinburgh, and thereafter suffered much for his opposition to James VI.'s attempts to introduce Episcopacy.

Bruce, SIR WILLIAM, of Kinross, Scottish architect, the rebuilder of Holyrood in 1671-79, died at a great age in 1710.

Bruce-Joy, ALBERT, sculptor, born at Dublin, 21st August 1842, studied under Foley.

Bruce, MAX, composer, was born at Cologne, 6th January 1838. [Broogh.]

Brucker, JOHANN JAKOB (1696-1770), historian and biographer, was born and died at Augsburg. He is chiefly remembered by his Historia Critica Philosophica (5 vols. 1742-44). [Brook'er.]

Bruckner, ANTON (1824-96), Austrian composer.

Brucey, DAVID AUGUSTIN DE (1640-1723), playwright and theologian, converted in 1682 by Bossuet to Catholicism, was born at Aix, and died at Montpellier. [Bree-ay.]

Brugmann, KARL, born at Wiesbaden, 16th March 1849, became professor of Comparative Philology at Leipzig in 1887. Of his many works on Greek grammar, classical antiquities, &c., the best known is the Indo-Germanic Grammar (trans. 1888-95). [Broog'man.]

Brugsch, HEINRICH KARL, Egyptologist, was born at Berlin, February 18, 1827. In 1853 he first visited Egypt, and subsequently spent his time till his death (10th September 1894) at Charlottenburg, alternately in Egypt, as head of the khedival School of Egyptology, or fulfilling missions for Germany—and in Germany, where he lectured at Göttingen, Berlin, and elsewhere. He was also attached to a German mission to Persia. He was successively Bey and Pasha. Of over thirty books on Egyptology, including a grammar, dictionary, &c., and written in French, German, and Latin, the best-known in England is Egypt under the Pharaohs (1879). [Broogsh.]

Brühl, HEINRICH, COUNT VON (1700-63), the unworthy prime-minister of Augustus III., king of Poland and Elector of Saxony. With the basest sycophancy, he honoured the whims of his luxurious master, draining the coffers of the state, and burdening the country with debt. He himself meanwhile maintained a most splendid and costly establishment. [Nearly Breal.]

Brummell, GEORGE BRYAN, 'Beau Brummell,' was born in London, 7th June 1778, the son of Lord North's private secretary, and grandson of a gentleman's gentleman. At Eton, and during a brief sojourn at Oxford, he was less distinguished for studiousness than for the exquisiteness of his dress and manners; and after four years in the army, having come into a fortune of £30,000, he entered on his true vocation of arbiter of elegancies. His success was brilliant; but the pace was too hot, and his wit was, moreover, too fine for his twenty years' patron and admirer, the Prince Regent. They quarrelled in 1813, and gambling debts three years later forced Brummell to flee to Calais. He struggled on there reckless as before for fourteen years; from 1830 to 1832 held a sinecure consulate at Caen; and, after three years of drivelling imbecility, died in the pauper lunatic asylum of that old Norman city, 30th March 1840. See Lives by Jesse (1844; new ed. 1886) and De Monval (1906).

Brunck, RICHARD FRANÇOIS PHILIPPE (1729-1803), classical scholar, was born and died at Strasburg, having been educated under the Jesuits in Paris, a military commissary during the Seven Years' War, and a prisoner during the Terror. His Analecta Veterum Poëtarum Græcorum (1772-76) was followed by editions of Anacreon (1778), Apollonius Rhodius (1780), Aristophanes (1781-83), Poeta Gnomici (1784), Virgil (1785), and Sophocles (1786). Brune, GUILLAUME MARIE ANNE, a French marshal of the First Empire, was born at Brivela-Gaillardie, 13th March 1763. Appointed in 1799 to the command of the army in Holland, he defeated the Duke of York at Bergen, and forced him to capitulate at Alkmaar. On the return from Elba he had joined the emperor, and on 2d August 1815 was brutally murdered by a royalist mob at Avignon. See Life (Paris, 1821), and Conchard-Verneil's monograph on Brune's murder (1887). [Nearly Breene].

Brunel', SIR MARC ISAMBARD, engineer, was born, a farmer's son, at Haqueville, near Rouen, April 25, 1769, and in 1786 entered the French navy. In the revolutionary period of 1793 he escaped from Paris to the United States; in 1794 he was appointed to survey for the canal from Lake Champlain to the Hudson at Albany. He was afterwards an architect in New York, and chief-engineer for the city. On his return to Europe in 1799, he married the daughter of William Kingdon, Plymouth, and settled in England. A plan submitted by him to government for making block-pulleys by machinery was adopted in 1803, and on its completion in 1806 the saving on the first year was about £24,000. He received £17,000 as a reward. He constructed public works in Woolwich arsenal, Chatham dockyard, &c., and made experiments in steam-navigation on the Thames in 1812, but his scheme for stean-tugs was declined by the navy board. The destruction of his sawmills at Battersea by fire (1814) led to his bankruptcy (1821), when he was thrown into prison for debt. He was released on a grant of £5000 being made by government. His most remarkable undertaking was the Thames Tunnel (1825-43). He was knighted in 1841; and died in London, December 12, 1849. See Life by Beamish (1862).—His only son, ISAMBARD KINGDON BRUNEL, was born at Portsmouth, 9th April 1806, and in 1823, after two years spent at the Collège Henri Quatre in Paris, entered his father's office. He helped him in the Thames Tunnel, and himself, in 1829-31, planned the Clifton Suspension Bridge, which was completed only in 1864 with the materials of his own Hungerford Suspension Bridge (1811-45) over the Thames at Charing Cross. He designed the Great Western (1838), the first steamship built to cross the Atlantic, and the Great Britain (1845), the first ocean screw-steamer. The Great Eastern, the largest vessel ever built, was built under his sole direction in 1853-58. In 1833 he was appointed engineer to the Great Western Railway, and constructed all the tunnels, bridges, and viaducts on that line. Among docks constructed or improved by him were those of Bristol, Monkwearmouth, Cardiff, and Milford Haven. He died suddenly, 15th September 1859. See Life by his son (1870).

Brunelleschi, FILIPPO (1377-1446), one of the greatest Italian architects, was born and died at Florence. A goldsmith first, then a sculptor, he finally devoted himself to architecture, at Rome became imbued with classical traditions, and, soon after his return to Florence in 1407, offered his plan for completing the cathedral, founded in 1296, and now wanting only a dome. Brunelleschi's dome (1420-61) is, measured diametrically, the largest in the world, and served as a model to Michaelangelo for that of St Peter's. Besides this masterpiece he also executed the churches of Spirito Santo and San Lorenzo, the designs for the Pitti Palace, &c. See Lives by his contemporary, Antonio Manetti (ed. by Frey, Berl. 1887), and Fabriczy (Stuttg. 1892). [Broo-nel-tes'kee.]

Brunet, JACQUES CHARLES (1780-1867), bibliographer, was born and died in Paris. [Bree-nay'.]

Brunetiére, FERDINAND, critic, was born at Toulon, 19th July 1849, wrote much for the Revue des Deux Mondes (its editor from 1893), became professor at the École Normale, and in 1894 a member of the Academy. Besides Études Critiques and Questions de Critique, he published Histoire et Littérature (1884-87), Le Roman Naturaliste (1833), History of French Literature (trans. 1898), &c. He died 9th Dec. 1906. [Breent-yehr.]

Brunhilda, the daughter of the Visigothic king Athanagild, married King Sigbert of Austrasia in 507, and afterwards as regent for her two grandsons, Theodebert II., king of Austrasia, and Theodoric II., king of Burgundy, divided the government of the whole Frankish world with her rival Fredegond, who governed Neustria for the youthful Clotaire II. On Fredegond's death in 598 she seized on Neustria, and for a while united under her rule the whole Merovingian dominions, but was overthrown in 613 by the Austrasian nobles under Clotaire II., and put to death by being dragged at the heels of a wild horse.

Bruni, LEONARDO (1369-1444), a famous humanist, a native of Arezzo, and hence styled Aretino. In 1405 he obtained the office of papal secretary. His Historia Florentina procured for him the rights of citizenship, and at a later period, through the favour of the Medicæan family, he was appointed state secretary. Bruni aided in advancing the study of Greek literature mainly by his literal translations into Latin of Aristotle, Demosthenes, Plato, and Plutarch. Among his original works were Lives of Petrarch and Dante in the vernacular. [Broo-nee.]

Brunne, ROBERT DE, the name by which Robert Manning, or Mannyng, is usually designated from his birthplace Bourn, in Lincolnshire, which is 6 miles from the Gilbertine monastery of Sempringham that he entered in 1288. He died about 1338. His chief work is his Handlyng Synne (1303), a free and amplified translation into English verse of William of Waddington's Manuel des Pechiez, with such judicious omissions and excellent additions as made his version much more entertaining than the original. It is one of our best landmarks in the transition from early to later Middle English. He also made a new version in octosyllabic rhyme of Wace's Brut d'Angleterre, and added to it a translation of the French rhyming chronicle of Peter Langtoft.

Brunnow, PHILIPP, COUNT VON (1797-1875), born at Dresden, entered the Russian service in 1818, and was Russian ambassador in London both before and after the Crimean war. [Broon-no.]

Bruno THE GREAT (925-65), the third son of Henry the Fowler, became Archbishop of Cologne in 953, and Duke of Lorraine in 954, and was distinguished alike for piety and learning. See a work by Pfeiffer (Cologne, 1870).

Bruno, ST. (c. 1040-1101), founder of the Carthusian order, was born at Cologne, became rector of the cathedral school at Rheims, but, oppressed by the wickedness of his time, withdrew in 1086 to the wild mountain of Chartreuse, near Grenoble. Here with six friends he founded the austere Carthusians. In 1094 he established a second Carthusian monastery at Della Torre in Calabria, where he died. An earlier St Bruno (970-1009) was martyred by the heathen Prussians.

Bruno, GIORDANO, a restless speculative thinker, was born at Nola, near Naples, in 1548, was trained a Dominican, but doubting the dogmas, fled to Geneva, whence Calvinist suspicion of his scepticism drove him to Paris, where he lectured. Here the zeal of the orthodox Aristotelians forced him to withdraw to London (1583), where he knew Henry, and Oxford, where he repeatedly gave lectures. In 1585 he was in Paris again, in 1586 in Wittenberg, in 1588 in Prague, then in Helmstedt, Frankfurt, Padua; and in 1592 in Venice he was arrested by the officers of the Inquisition and conveyed to Rome in 1593. There, on 17th February 1600, he was burnt as an obstinate heretic. His philosophy, which was strongly anti-Aristotelian, was a pantheistic, poetic, fantastic system based on the Copernican astronomy, Nicolaus von Cusa, Neoplatonism, Stoicism, Epicureanism. Of his works (mostly written in Italian) the most famous is the Spaccio della Bestia Trionfante. See works by Bartholmess (1846), Berti, Sigwart (1880), G. Louis, Brunhofer, and MacIntyre (1903).

Brunswick, CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, DUKE OF (1735-1806), fought in the Seven Years' War, commanded the Prussian and Austrian troops in France and at Valmy, and died from his wounds soon after his sore defeat by Napoleon at Austerlitz in 1806 (see Life by Lord E. Fitzmaurice, 1901).—His son and successor, FREDERICK-WILLIAM (1771-1815), came to England in 1809, and with his 'Black Brunswickers'—so called from their uniform, in mourning for the losses at Austerlitz—entered the British service, fighting in the Peninsular war; he died a soldier's death at Quatre Bras. See Life by Spehr (Brunsw. 2d ed. 1861).

Brunton, MARY (née Balfour; 1778-1818), novelist, was born in Burray, Orkney, and about 1798 married Alexander Brunton (1772-1854), minister then of Bolton, near Haddington, and from 1803 in Edinburgh. She wrote Self-Con- trol (1810) and Discipline (1814). See Life by her husband (1819).

Brunton, WILLIAM (1777-1851), engineer, a chief introducer of steam navigation, was born at Dalkeith, and died at Camborne in Cornwall.

Brutus, LUCIUS JUNIUS, the legendary hero who established republican government at Rome. The son of a rich Roman, on whose death Tarquin the Proud seized the property and killed an elder brother, he himself escaped only by feigning idiocy, whence the name Brutus ('stupid'). When popular indignation was roused at the outrage on Lucretia, he drove the royal family from Rome. He was elected one of the first two consuls (509 B.C.). He sentenced to death his own two sons for conspiring to restore the monarchy, and fell repelling an attack led by one of Tarquin's sons.

Brutus, MARCUS JUNIUS (85-42 B.C.), sided with Pompey when the civil war broke out, but after Pharsalia submitted to Caesar, and was appointed governor of Cisalpine Gaul. He divorced his wife to marry Portia, the daughter of Cato, his master. Cassius prevailed on him to join the conspiracy against Caesar (44 B.C.); and, defeated by Antony and Octavian at Philippi, he killed himself.

Bry, THEODORUS DE (1528-98), engraver and geographer, born at Liège, died at Frankfort.

Bryan, MICHAEL (1757-1821), born at Newcastle, published a Dictionary of Painters and Engravers (2 vols. 1813-16; new ed. by Graves, 1886).

Bryan, WILLIAM. See O'BRYAN.

Bryan, WILLIAM JENNINGS, born at Salem, Ill., 19th March 1860, graduated from Illinois College with the highest classical honours in 1881, studied law at Chicago, and practised at Jacksonville and in Nebraska. He was elected to Congress in 1890 and 1892, and in 1896 and 1900 as Democratic candidate for the presidency was crushingly defeated by M'Kinley (q.v.), and again by Mr Taft in 1908. See his The First Battle (1897).

Bryant, JACOB (1715-1804), born at Plymouth, from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, and in 1756 became secretary to his old pupil the Duke of Marlborough. He accompanied him to Germany, and on the duke's death there in 1758 found himself left in easy circumstances. He died near Windsor. The chief of his many works is the Analysis of Ancient Mythology (3 vols. 1774-76), which, largely based upon the Abbé Banier, suggests Mr Casaubon's 'Key' in Middlemarch.

Bryant, WILLIAM CULLEN, poet and journalist, was born of good New England stock at Cummington, Massachusetts, November 3, 1794, and at thirteen published The Embargo, a satirical poem. The majestic blank verse of Thanatopsis (1817) surpassed anything previously written by an American. Meantime Bryant had studied law, and been admitted to the bar, but continued to contribute prose and verse to the North American Review. In 1825 he became editor of The New York Review, when it failed (1826) assistant-editor of the Evening Post, and in 1829 editor-in-chief. The paper was democratic, but inclining to anti-slavery views assisted in 1856 in forming the Republican party. Bryant's public addresses and letters to his paper on his visits to Europe and the West Indies were published in volume form; his poetry meantime had sunk deep into the minds of his countrymen. At seventy-two he commenced a blank-verse translation of Homer. He died at New York, June 12, 1878. His complete works were published in 4 vols. (1883-84). See the Life by his son-in-law, Parke Godwin (2 vols. 1853), that by Bigelow (1890), and that by W. A. Bradley (1905).

Bryce, DAVID (1803-76), an Edinburgh architect, whose specialty was 'Scottish Baronial.'

Bryce, JAMES (1806-77), geologist, was a schoolmaster in Belfast and Glasgow.

Bryce, JAMES, author and politician, was born at Belfast, 10th May 1838, and educated at Glasgow High School and University, and Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1862 as double first. Elected a fellow of Oriol, and called to the bar in 1867, he was regius professor of Civil Law at Oxford from 1870 to 1893, and entered parliament in 1880 for the city of Aberdeen. In 1905 he was made Irish secretary, and in 1907 ambassador to the United States. A strong Home-Ruler, he has been active in connection with university reform, the Eastern question, commons and access to mountains, and copyright; and is author of The Holy Roman Empire (1864), Transcaucasia and Ararat (1877), The American Commonwealth (1888; new ed. 1910), Impressions of South Africa (1897), Studies in Contemporary Biography (1903), &c.

Brydges, SIR SAMUEL EGERTON, antiquary, was born at Wootton House, Kent, 30th November 1762. Educated at Maidstone, Canterbury, and Queen's College, Cambridge, he was called to the bar in 1787, but retired five years later to his books at his country house in Kent. Among these are his edition of Philip's Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum (1800); his Censura Litteraria, containing Titles and Opinions of old English Books (10 vols. 1805-9); and his edition of Collins' Peccage of England (9 vols. 1812). The claim of his family to the barony of Chandos broke down, but Brydges was gratified with a Swedish knighthood in 1808 and an English baronetcy in 1814. He represented Maidstone in 1812-18, and printed privately at the 'Lee Priory Press' small editions of many rare Elizabethan books. After 1818 he lived abroad until his death near Geneva, 8th September 1837. See his Autobiography (2 vols. 1834).

Brydone, PATRICK (1741-1818), of Lennel House, Coldstream, wrote a well-known Tour through Sicily and Malta (1773).

Bryennios, PHILOTHEOS, theologian, born at Constantinople, 26th March 1833, studied three years in Germany, and presided over the great Greek school in Constantinople from 1867 to 1874. In 1875 chosen Metropolitan of Serrae in Macedonia, in 1877 he was translated to Nicomedia. Author of several minor works, he is chiefly known in the west as the discoverer of the Epistles of Clement and of the Didaché.

Buache, PHILIPPE (1700-73), a French geographer, like his nephew Jean Nicolas Buache (1741-1821). [Bee-ahsh.]

Buccleuch, DUKE OF. See SCOTT.

Bucer, or BUTZER, MARTIN, reformer, was born in 1491 at Schletstadt, in Alsace, at fourteen entered the Dominican order, and went to Heidelberg to study theology, Greek, and Hebrew. In 1521 he quitted the order, and was appointed chaplain to the Elector-Palatine. He married a former nun in 1522, and next year settled in Strasburg. In the disputes between Luther and Zwingli, Bucer adopted a middle course; but his view of the sacraments exposed him to Luther's harsh reprobation. At the Diet of Augsburg he declined to subscribe to the proposed Confession of Faith, and afterwards drew up the Confessio Tetrapolitana (1530); at Wittenberg, however, an agreement was in 1536 entered into between Bucer and the Lutherans. Assailed for his refusal to sign the Interim in 1548, Bucer, on Cramer's invitation (1549), came to England to teach theology at Cambridge. His modesty, blameless life, and great learning gained him many friends in England; but he died, February 27, 1551. In Mary's reign his remains were exhumed and burned. His chief work was a translation and exposition of the Psalms (1529). Lenz has edited (1880) his correspondence with the Landgrave of Hesse, whose 'second' marriage Bucer defended. See Baum, Capito und Butzer (1860); Tollin, Servet und Bucer (1880); and a long article by Professor Ward in the Dict. Nat. Biog. (vol. vii. 1886).

Buch, LEOPOLD VON (1774-1853), a German geologist and traveller. [Boohh.]

Buchan, ALEXANDER, LL.D. and F.R.S. (1829-1907), was born at Kinnesswood, near Kinross, studied at Edinburgh, and became secretary of the Scottish Meteorological Society in 1860.

Buchan, DAVID, explorer, born in 1800, was a naval lieutenant in 1806. He explored the river Exploit for 160 miles (1811), and in 1818 was appointed to the command of a Polar expedition when Ross and Parry started on their voyage in search of a north-west passage. Buchan reached Spitzbergen with the Dorothea and Trent, but all attempts to pierce the gigantic icy barrier were in vain. In 1825 he was high-sheriff of Newfoundland, and in 1837 sailed on another arctic voyage, from which he never returned.

Buchan, ELSPETH (née Simpson; 1738-91), the daughter of a Banffshire innkeeper, and the wife of a potter, in 1784 founded at Irvine an absurd sect, announcing herself to her forty-six followers as the Woman of Rev. xii. See Train's Buchanites from First to Last (Edin. 1846). [Büh'han.]

Buchan, PETER (1790-1854), collector of Scottish ballads, in 1816 set up a printing-press at his birthplace, Peterhead. He wrote many books.

Buchan, WILLIAM (1729-1805), physician, was born at Ancrum, Roxburghshire, studied divinity and medicine in Edinburgh, settled in Sheffield, but removed to Edinburgh about 1766, and in 1778 to London. Of his Domestic Medicine (1769) 80,000 copies were sold during Buchan's lifetime. He also wrote Cold Bathing (1786), Diet (1797), and Offices and Duties of a Mother (1800).

Buchanan, CLAUDIUS, born at Cambuslang, near Glasgow, 12th March 1766, studied at Glasgow University, and, through the influence of the Rev. John Newton, at Cambridge (1791-95). From 1797 he was a chaplain to the East India Company at Barrackpur; in 1799 he became vice-provost of the college founded by Lord Wellesley at Fort William. He translated the Gospels into Persian and Hindustani, and made two tours through southern and western India; but debarred as a chaplain from direct missionary enterprise, he returned in 1808 to England. There, by his sermons and his periodical, The Star of the East, he excited so much interest that the government took his side, and before his death, 9th February 1815, the first English bishop had been appointed to Calcutta. See his Life by Pearson (3d ed. 1819), and his Christian Researches in India (1858). [Bu-kan'nan.]

Buchanan, DUGALD (1716-68), a Gaelic poet, born in Balquhigger parish, Perthshire.

Buchanan, GEORGE, humanist and reformer, was born of poor parents, at Killearn, Stirlingshire, in February 1506; received the rudiments of his education in Scotland; but at fourteen was sent by an uncle for two years to the university of Paris. In 1524 he matriculated as a 'poor' student at St Andrews, in 1525 took his B.A., in 1526 returned to France, graduated M.A., and was appointed professor in the college of Ste Barbe. He returned to Scotland about 1535 as tutor to the son of the Earl of Cassilis; and soon after James V. entrusted him with the education of one of his illegitimate sons. To this period belong Buchanan's two satires against the Franciscans, the Somnium and Franciscanus. At the instance of Cardinal Beaton, Buchanan was imprisoned in the castle of St Andrews; but escaping, fled to England and Paris (1539). Till 1542 he was a professor at Bordeaux, then in Paris, and in 1547 at Coimbra in Portugal, where ere long he was arrested by the Inquisition as a suspected heretic. During his confinement he began his Latin paraphrase of the Psalms. On his release he came to England, and thence again returned to France in 1552. In 1555-60 he was tutor to the son of the famous Maréchal de Brissac. Now he returned to Scotland, to be made classical tutor to Queen Mary; and to her he dedicated his completed version of the Psalms. In 1566 Moray appointed him principal of St Leonard's College at St Andrews; and in 1567 he was moderator of the General Assembly. In his Detectio Mariæ Reginae Buchanan stated with undue violence the case of the insurgent lords against Mary. He now became tutor to the young king, James VI., and in 1570-78 was keeper of the Privy Seal. His last years he gave to the completion of his Latin History of Scotland, published just before his death, 28th September 1582. In his own day, his European reputation rested mainly on his skill in Latin poetry, as also on his History of Scotland, still valuable for its (partisan, but acute) view of his own time. Buchanan's influence after his death was chiefly through his tract De Jure Regni, in which he states with boldness the doctrine that kings exist by the will, and for the good, of the people. He had the reverence and affection of men themselves eminent for genius and virtue; while, to those opposed to him in politics and religion, he was a monster of vice and ingratitude. See Lives by Irving (1817) and P. Hume Brown (1890 and 1906), Wallace (1900), Macmillan (1906).

Buchanan, James, fifteenth president of the United States, was born at Stony Batter, near Mercersburg, Pennsylvania, April 23, 1791, the son of an immigrant Irish farmer. He was educated at Dickinson College, and in 1812 was admitted to the bar, where he enjoyed a large practice. He served in the state legislature (1814-16), and in congress (1820-31). He was sent in 1832 to negotiate the first commercial treaty with Russia; from 1833 to 1845 was a member of the United States senate; and, secretary of state then till the close of Polk's presidency in 1849, succeeded in settling the Oregon boundary question. He was ambassador to England from 1853 to 1856, and in the latter year, on the nomination of the Democratic party, he was elected president. During his administration the slavery question drew to a head. Buchanan himself was strongly in favour of the maintenance of slavery; and he freely supported the attempt to establish Kansas as a slave state. As the close of his term approached, it became evident that a conflict was impending, and the election of Lincoln precipitated the outbreak. After his retirement in March 1861, Buchanan took no part in public affairs; but he published in 1866 a defence of his administration. He died at his home, Wheatland, Lancaster, June 1, 1868. See his Life by G. T. Curtis (2 vols. New York, 1883).

Buchanan, Robert, D.D. (1802-75), a leader in the Free Church Disruption, was born at St Ninians, near Stirling, and died in Rome, after a forty-two years' ministry in Glasgow. See his History of the Ten Years' Conflict (2 vols. 1849), and his Life by the Rev. N. L. Walker (1877).

Buchanan, Robert Williams, poet, novelist, playwright, was born at Caverswall, Staffordshire, 18th August 1841, the son of Robert Buchanan (1813-66), schoolmaster, Socialist lecturer, and author, who was a native of Ayr, and lived in Manchester and Glasgow. He was educated at Glasgow High School and University, where his closest friend was David Gray (q.v., 1838-61). In 1860 the two set out for London; but gloom and poverty hung over their steps, and fame came too late for the elder. Buchanan's Undertones (1863) was followed by Idylls and Legends of Inverburn (1865) and London Poems (1866), the latter his first distinct success. Later volumes of verse are Wayside Poets (1866); North Coast Poems (1867); Napoleon Fallen: a Lyrical Drama (1871); The Drama of Kings (1871); Ballads of Love, Life, and Humour (1882); The City of Dream (1888), and The Wandering Jew (1893). He has besides contributed to the magazines, and one of his articles earned an unhappy notoriety, that under the pseudonym of 'Thomas Maitland,' on 'The Fleishy School of Poetry,' in the Contemporary for Oct. 1871. Among his novels are The Shadow of the Sword (1876), A Child of Nature (1879), God and the Man (1881), The Martyrdom of Madeline (1882), Woman and the Man (1893), and Effie Hetherington (1896); among his plays, A Nine Days' Queen, Lady Clare, Storm-beaten, Sophia, A Man's Shadow, and Dick Sheridan. He died 10th June 1901. See his Life by Harriett Jay (1902). An edition of his Poetical Works appeared in 1902 (2 vols.).

Buche, Philippe Benjamin Joseph (1796-1865), French physician and publicist, published works on social science, history, and philosophy, striving to weld Communism and Catholicism, and began the Histoire Parlementaire de la Révolution Française (40 vols. 1833-38). In 1848 he was president of the National Assembly. [Bee-shay.]

Büchner, Ludwig (1824-99), physician and materialist philosopher, was born at Darmstadt.—His brother, George (1813-37), also a doctor by profession, made a name for himself as a poet; and his sister, Lutse (1823-77), was a poetess and novelist. [Beehh'ner.]

Buck, Dudley, organist and composer, was born at Hartford, Conn., 10th March 1839, and studied at Leipzig, Dresden, and Paris, returning to America in 1862. He died 7th October 1909.

Buckhurst, Lord. See SACKVILLE.

Buckingham, George Villiers, Duke of, second son of Sir George Villiers, was born at his father's seat of Brooksby, Leicestershire, 20th August 1592. In 1614 he was brought under the notice of James I., and was soon received into high favour, as successor to the Earl of Somerset. He was knighted, raised to the peerage as Viscount Villiers in 1616, and became Earl of Buckingham in 1617, Marquis in 1618. Offices and lands were heaped on him so profusely, that, from a threadbare hanger-on at court, 'Steenie' became, with a single exception, the wealthiest noble in England. In 1623 while the Spanish match was in progress, Buckingham persuaded Charles to go to Madrid and prosecute his suit in person; the ultimate failure of the negotiations was largely owing to his arrogance. On his return Buckingham, now a duke, was made Lord-Warden of the Cinque Ports. He negotiated the marriage of Charles with Henrietta Maria of France, and maintained his ascendancy after Charles's accession in 1625. But the abortive expedition against Cadiz exposed him to impeachment by the Commons, and only a dislocation rescued him. His insolence in making love to the queen of France next made mischief. In 1627 he appeared with an armament before Rochelle; but the Huguenots refused him admission within the harbour; and when his troops made an ill-supported descent on the neighbouring Ile de Rhé, they were defeated, spite of his brave conduct. For a second expedition to Rochelle he had gone down to Portsmouth, when on 23d August 1628 he was assassinated by a discontented subaltern, John Felton. See Gibbs, The Romance of George Villiers (1908).—GEORGE VILLIERS, second DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, was born at Wallingford House (on the site of the Admiralty), 30th January 1627, and, after his father's assassination, was brought up with Charles I.'s children. On the outbreak of the Civil War, he hurried from Cambridge to the royalist camp, and lost, recovered, and once more lost his estates—almost his life, too, during Lord Holland's unfortunate rising in Surrey (1648), when his younger brother did meet a hero's death. He attended Charles II. to Scotland, and after the battle of Worcester and an escape more marvellous even than his master's, went again into exile. Returning secretly to England, he married, in 1657, the daughter of Lord Fairfax, to whom his forfeited estates had been assigned. The Restoration gave them back to Buckingham, and brought Buckingham to court, where for twenty-five years he was the wildest and wickedest roué of them all. In 1667 he killed in a duel the Earl of Shrewsbury, whose countess, his paramour, looked on, disguised as a page. When sated with pleasure, he would turn for a change to ambition, and four times his mad freaks lodged him in the Tower. He was mainly instrumental in Clarendon's downfall; was a member of the infamous 'Cabal'; and on its break-up in 1673 passed over, like Shaftesbury, to the popular side. But crippled with debt, he retired, after Charles's death in 1685, to his manor of Helmsley, in Yorkshire, and amused himself with the chase. He died on 16th April 1687 at Kirkby-Moorside, miserably, if not, indeed, 'in the worst inn's worst room.' The wittiest of his comedies, The Rehearsal (1671), was a travesty of Dryden's tragedies; but Buckingham himself is best remembered as the 'Ziuri' of Dryden's Abraham and Achitophel, a portraiture of merciless fidelity. See the copious Life of him by Lady Burghelere (1903).—GEORGE NUGENT-TEMPLE-GRENVILLE (1753-1812), who in 1779 succeeded his uncle as Earl Temple, was in 1784 created Marquis of Buckingham; and his elder son, RICHARD (1776-1839), was in 1822 elevated to the dukedom of Buckingham and Chandos. The second duke, RICHARD PLANTAGENET (1797-1861), went bankrupt for over a million in 1847, and thereafter turned author, publishing 13 vols., chiefly of court history.

Buckingham, JAMES SILK, traveller and lecturer, was born, a farmer's son, at Flushing, near Falmouth, 25th August 1786, and went to sea before he was ten. After years of wandering, he in 1818 started a journal at Calcutta, whose strictures on the Indian government led to its suppression (1823). In London he established the Oriental Herald (1824) and the Athenæum (1828). From 1832 to 1837 he was member for Sheffield, and then travelled for four years in North America. He was projector of the British and Foreign Institute (1843-46), and president of the London Temperance League (1851). Besides eighteen books of travel, &c., he had published two volumes of his Autobiography, when he died, 30th June 1855.—His youngest son, LEICESTER (1827-65), was a skilful dramatic adapter.

Buckinghamshire, DUKE OF. See SHEFFIELD.

Buckland, WILLIAM, D.D., geologist, was born at Tiverton, Devonshire, 12th March 1784. From Winchester he passed in 1801 to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow (1808); and in 1813 he was appointed Oxford reader in Mineralogy. In 1818 he became reader in Geology at Oxford, and was elected an F.R.S.; in 1822 he received the Copley medal for his account of the Kirkdale Cave, which in 1823 he supplemented with Reliquiæ Diluvianæ. In 1825 he was made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1845 Dean of Westminster; but under his great and continuous labours his mental faculties gave way seven years before his death, which took place at Clapham, 14th August 1856. See Life by his daughter, Mrs Gordon (1894).—His son, FRANCIS TREVELYAN BUCKLAND, born 17th December 1826, at Christ Church College, Oxford, was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, and after five years studying medicine at St George's Hospital, London, was assistant surgeon to the 2d Life Guards (1854-63). From his boyhood a zealous naturalist, he contributed largely to the Times, Field, Queen, and Land and Water, which last he started in 1866; and he was also author of Curiosities of Natural History (4 vols. 1857-72), Fish-hatching (1863), Logbook of a Fisherman and Zoologist (1876), Natural History of British Fishes (1881), and Notes and Jottings from Animal Life (1882). In 1867 he was appointed inspector of salmon-fisheries, in 1870 special commissioner on salmon-fisheries in Scotland, and in 1877 on the Scotch herring-fisheries. He died December 19, 1880. See Life by G. C. Bompas (1885).

Buckle, GEORGE EARLE, editor of the Times from 1884, was born at Twerton vicarage, Bath, 10th June 1854, and from Winchester passed in 1872 to New College, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate, took a double first, and was elected a fellow of All Souls.

Buckle, HENRY THOMAS, was born at Lee, in Kent, 24th November 1821, the son of a London shipowner, a Tory and staunch churchman. A sickly child, he was for a very short time at an academy in Kentish-Town; no other school and no university claims credit for his education, which yet was liberal in the highest degree. In 1840 he found himself master of £1500 a year; by 1850 he knew eighteen foreign languages, and had amassed a library of 22,000 volumes, chosen mostly to help him in a magnum opus, of which all that was ever published was but a fragment, An Introduction to the History of Civilisation in England (2 vols. 1857-61). His health was shattered by the loss of an idolised mother; and on 29th May 1862, after six months' wandering in Egypt and Palestine, he died of typhoid fever at Damascus. For twenty years he was accounted one of the first chess players of the world. Buckle's Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works were edited by Miss Helen Taylor (1872; new ed. by Grant Allen, 1885). See his Life by A. H. Huth (2 vols. 1880); and Buckle and his Critics, by J. M. Robertson (1896).

Buckley, WILLIAM (1780-1856), born near

Macclesfield, was a bricklayer first, then a private, and, for conspiring at Gibraltar to shoot the Duke of Kent, was transported in 1802, but escaped, and lived thirty-two years with the black fellows of Victoria. See Life by J. Morgan (1852).

Buckstone, JOHN BALDWIN, comedian and dramatic writer, was born at Hoxton, London, 14th September 1802, and, having in 1822 exchanged an attorney's office for the provincial stage, appeared next year at the Surrey Theatre. His success secured him an engagement (1827) at the Adelphi, where he continued till 1833 as leading low comedian. Except for a visit to the United States in 1840, and short engagements at Drury Lane and the Lyceum, he thenceforward played chiefly at the Haymarket, of which he was lessee from 1853 till 1878. He died 31st October 1879. He wrote 150 pieces for the stage.

Budæus (Latinised from Guillaume Budé), the greatest French scholar of his age, was born in Paris in 1467. Of his works on philology, philosophy, and jurisprudence, the two best known are one on ancient coins (1514) and the Commentarii Linguae Graecae (1519). Louis XII. and Francis I. also employed him in diplomacy. At his suggestion Francis founded the Collège de France. Though suspected of a leaning towards Lutheranism, he was royal librarian at his death, 23d August 1540. See his collected works (4 vols. Basel, 1557); Lives of him by Rebitté (1846) and De Budé (1884); and his Lettres inédites (1887).

Budd, GEORGE (1808-82) and WILLIAM (1811-80), two brothers, born at North Tawton, Devonshire, were both of them celebrated physicians, the one in London, the other in Bristol.

Budde, KARL FERDINAND REINHARD (born 1850), was from 1900 professor at Marburg, and has published Die Biblische Urgeschichte (1883), works on Samuel and Judges, &c. [Bood-deh.]

Buddha ('the enlightened'), the founder of Buddhism, was the son of the rajah of the Sakya tribe ruling at Kapilavastu, 100 miles north of Benares, and was born in the later part of the 6th or the earlier part of the 5th century B.C. His personal name was Siddhartha; but he was also known by his family name of Gautama, and by many epithets, such as Sakya Muni, &c. When about thirty years old he left the luxuries of the court, his beautiful wife, and all earthly ambitions for the life of an ascetic; but after six years of self-torture saw in the contemplative life the perfect way. For some forty years he taught, securing the devotion of multitudes, and died about eighty years old at Kusinagara in Oudh. His system was perhaps rather a revolutionary reformation of Brahmanism than a new faith; the key-note of it being that existence is necessarily miserable, and that 'Nirvana,' or non-existence, the chief good, is to be attained by diligent devotion to Buddhistic rules. The death of the body does not bring Nirvana: the unholy are condemned to transmigration through many existences. Buddhism spread steadily over India, and in the 3d century B.C. was dominant from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin. In the earlier centuries of our epoch it began to decline, was relentlessly persecuted by triumphant Brahmanism in the 7th and 8th centuries, and stamped out of continental India (except Nepal) by invading Mohammedanism. But it had spread to Tibet, Ceylon, Burma, and Siam, where it is still the dominant faith; and in China and Japan it is perhaps the chief of the several religions professed. See works on Buddhism by Rhys-Davids (2d ed. 1887) Monier Williams (1869), and Bishop Copleston (1892), and the Life of Buddha by Oldenberg (2d ed. Berlin, 1890).

Budgell, EUSTACE (1686-1737), was born at Exeter, a cousin of Addison's, and from Trinity College, Oxford, proceeded to the Inner Temple. He lost £20,000 by the South Sea Bubble, from a contributor to the Spectator degenerated to a Grub Street writer, and at last drowned himself in the Thames.

Buffon, GEORGE LOUIS LECLERC, COMTE DE, was born at Montbard, in Burgundy, September 7, 1707, the son of a wealthy lawyer. After studying law at the Jesuit college in Dijon, he devoted himself to science, travelled for eighteen months with young Lord Kingston in Switzerland and Italy, and while on a visit to England (1733) translated into French Newton's Fluxions. Admitted to the Academy, he was in 1739 appointed director of the Jardin du Roi, and formed the design of his Histoire Naturelle, in which all the known facts of natural science were to be discussed in language of the loftiest eloquence. In producing the fifteen volumes of the Histoire (1749-67), which brought him an immense reputation, he was assisted by several less-known naturalists. Though he may be ranked among the philosophes, Buffon was not one of the leaders or militant members of the party. After receiving various high honours, he was made Comte de Buffon by Louis XV. He died at Paris, April 16, 1788. He was over-confident in his speculations; much that passed for eloquence is now recognised as fustian; but he invested natural science with new dignity and interest. He claims a place in the history of the doctrine of evolution, having taught that an unbroken succession of forms can be traced through the animal kingdom. See Richard's edition of his Œuvres complètes (1825-28), his Correspondance (2 vols. 1860), and works on him by Flourens (1844), Nadauld de Buffon (1863), and Lebasteur (1889).

Bugeaud, THOMAS (1784-1849), French marshal, was born at Limoges, and served in the Napoleonic campaigns, and with great distinction in Algeria and Morocco (1836-44), his victory at Isly gaining him the title Duc d'Isly. He died of cholera in Paris. See works by Count d'Ideville (Eng. trans. 2 vols. 1882) and Roches (1885). [Bee-zhō.]

Bugenhagen, JOHANN (1485-1558), one of Luther's helpers in the Reformation. See Lives by Bellermann (1859), Vogt (1868), Zitzlaff (1896), and Hering (1888). [Boo-gen-hah'gen; g's hard.]

Bugge, SOPHUS (1833-1907), born at Laurvik, studied at Christiania, Copenhagen, and Berlin, and in 1866 was appointed professor of Comparative Philology and Old Norse at the university of Christiania. [Boog-geh.]

Buhl, or, properly, BOULE, CHARLES ANDRÉ (1642-1732), a Parisian cabinet-maker in the service of Louis XIV.

Bulgarin, THADDEUS (1789-1859), Russian author and journalist, a zealous supporter of reaction and of absolutism. See his Memoirs (Ger. trans. 6 vols. 1858-61). [Bool-gah'reen.]

Bull, GEORGE, D. D., divine, was born at Wells, 25th March 1634, and studied at Exeter College, Oxford, whence he retired in 1649, having refused to take the commonwealth oath. Ordained in 1655, he took the small parish of St George's, Bristol, and subsequently obtained the rectory of Siddington, Cirencester (1658), that of Avening, Stroud (1685), the archdeaconry of Llandaff (1686), and the bishopric of St Davids (1705). He died at Brecknock, 17th February 1710. His Harmonia

Apostolica (1670), designed to reconcile Paul and James as to justification, occasioned controversy, and, in answer, Bull published his Examen Censuræ and Apologia pro Harmonia. His greatest work, the Defensio Fidei Nicenæ (1685), was directed against Ariens and Socinians; for his Judicium Ecclesiæ Catholicæ (1694) the thanks of the French clergy were sent to him through Bossuet. These are included in Dr Burton's edition of his works (8 vols. Oxford, 1827), with a Life by R. Nelson; and they are translated in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology (Oxford, 1842-55).

Bull, JOHN, musician, born in Somerset about 1563, was appointed organist in the Queen's Chapel in 1591, first music lecturer at Gresham College in 1596, and organist to James I. in 1607. A Catholic, he fled beyond seas in 1613, and at Brussels entered the archduke's service; in 1617 he became organist of Antwerp Cathedral, and there he died, 12th March 1628. He seems to have been, appropriately, the composer of the air of 'God save the King.'

Bull, OLE BORNEMANN, violinist, was born, 5th February 1810, at Bergen, in Norway. In 1829 he went to Cassel, to study under Spohr, but was so coldly received that he took himself to Göttingen to study law; in 1831 he accompanied Paganini to Paris, but here his fortune sunk so low that he thought of drowning himself in the Seine. The patronage of a lady of rank saved him, and soon he rose to fame as a violinist. He was received in Italy with prodigious enthusiasm, and after visiting England, Scotland, and Ireland, made a tour of triumph through Russia, Germany, and Norway. In 1843-45, 1852-57, 1867-72, &c. he was in America, making enormous sums by his concerts, but losing heavily by land speculations, especially an attempt to found a Scandinavian colony in Pennsylvania. He died at his villa near Bergen, 17th August 1880. If he was half charlatan, half genius, assuredly he was quite as much a bizarre virtuoso as a great artist. See Memoir by Sara C. Bull (1886). [O'leh Bor'neh-mann Bool.]

Buller, CHARLES (1806-48), born in Calcutta, was educated partly at Harrow and at Cambridge, but during 1822-25 was Carlyle's pupil at Edinburgh and elsewhere. He was called to the bar in 1831, and sat in parliament as a philosophical Radical from 1830 till his untimely death.

Buller, SIR REDVERS HENRY (1839-1908), entered the army in 1858, and was promoted lieutenant-general in 1894, having served in the Chinese war of 1860, the Red River expedition, the Ashanti and Kaffir wars, the Zulu war (winning a V.C.), the Egyptian war, and the Soudan expedition. C.B. (1874), K.C.M.G. (1882), and K.C.B. (1885), he held chief command at Aldershot in 1898, and in 1899-1900 in Natal during the South African war, where he raised the siege of Ladysmith. He returned in 1901 to his command at Aldershot, but was retired in same year.

Bullinger, HEINRICH (1504-75), a Swiss Reformer, who was the son of a priest, and himself married in 1529 a former nun, two years later becoming pastor of the principal church at Zurich, and Zwingli's successor as leader of the reformed party in its struggle with the Catholics, as well as with the Zealots and the Lutherans. His History of the Reformation was edited by Hottinger and Vögeli (3 vols. 1838-40). See Lives by Pestalozzi (1858) and Christoffel (1875). [Boo-ling-er; g as in ring.]

Bülów, PRINCE BERNARD VON, born at Flottbeck, Holstein, in 1849, served in the Franco-Prussian War, held important diplomatic posts, and was Chancellor of the German Empire in 1900-9.

Bülów, FRIEDRICH WILHELM, BARON VON (1755-1816), Prussian general, in 1813 commanded in the first successful encounter with the French at Möckern, and revived the self-confidence of the army after Lützen. His victories at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz saved Berlin; he was prominent in the battle of Leipzig, and by taking Mountmartre finished the campaign of 1814. In 1815 he joined Blücher by forced marches, and came to Wellington's aid at Waterloo. See Life by Varnhagen von Ense (Berl. 1854). [Bee-lō.]

Bülów, HANS GUIDO VON, pianist and composer, was born at Dresden, 8th January 1830, the son of Karl Eduard von Bülow (1803-53), poet and author. After studying for the law at Leipzig and Berlin, he resolved to give himself to music, spent some time with Wagner, and in 1857 became the pupil of Liszt, whose daughter he married. In 1854 he became Prussian court-pianist, in 1864 pianist to the Bavarian court, and head of a music-school at Munich. In 1869 family troubles led him to resign. Subsequently he undertook the great concert tours through which he became known in England and America. Court music-director at Meiningen 1880-85, he died at Cairo, 13th Feb. 1894. See his Early Correspondence (trans. 1897).

Bulwer, HENRY LYTTON, diplomatist and author, was born in London, 13th February 1801, the elder brother of Lord Lytton (q.v.). Educated at Harrow and Cambridge, he entered the diplomatic service in 1827, and was attaché at Berlin, Brussels, and the Hague. During 1830-37 he successively represented, as an Advanced Liberal, Wilton, Coventry, and Marylebone. In 1837 he became secretary of embassy at Constantinople, where he negotiated a very important commercial treaty. In 1843 he was made minister plenipotentiary at Madrid, and, as arbitrator, negotiated the peace between Spain and Morocco next year. His firmness and candour offended Narvaez, the Spanish marshal-dictator, who, pretending to have discovered Bulwer's complicity in certain plots, ordered him to leave Madrid. The House of Commons indorsed his conduct, and he was made a K.C.B. in 1848, a G.C.B. in 1851. In 1849 he proceeded to Washington, where he concluded the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty; in 1852 to Florence, and in 1856 to Bucharest. From 1858 to 1865 he was ambassador to the Ottoman Porte, and ably carried out Palmerston's policy on the Eastern Question. Created Lord Dalling and Bulwer in 1871, he died at Naples, 23d May 1872. Among his works were An Autumn in Greece (1826); France, Social, Literary, and Political (1834-36); a Life of Byron (1835); Historical Characters (1868-70); and an unfinished Life of Palmerston (1870-74).

Bulwer Lytton, SIR EDWARD. See LYTTON.

Bunbury, HENRY WILLIAM (1750-1811), caricaturist, was born at Mildenhall, Suffolk, the son of the Rev. Sir William Bunbury. Educated at Westminster and Cambridge, he early became distinguished for his humorous designs, which entitle him to rank after Rowlandson and Gillray.—His son, SIR HENRY EDWARD BUNBURY (1778-1860), succeeded his uncle as seventh baronet in 1820, having previously served in the army. He wrote several historical works on the Peninsular war, &c. See memoir by his son (1868).—His second son, SIR EDWARD HERBERT BUNBURY (1811-95), who succeeded as ninth baronet in 1886, published an admirable History of Ancient Geography (2 vols. 1879).

Bungay, THOMAS, a Franciscan mathematician and philosopher of about 1290, who was accounted a magician. He was born at Bungay, and buried at Northampton.

Bungerer, LOUIS FELIX (1814-74), Protestant writer, was born at Marseilles of German ancestry, and died at Geneva. [Ben^z-nayr.]

Bunn, ALFRED (c. 1796-1860), the 'Poet Bunn,' from 1833 to 1840-48 was the quarrelsome manager of Covent Garden and Drury Lane theatres. He married, unhappily, in 1819, the tragic actress, Margaret Agnes Somerville (1799-1883), a native of Lanark. He wrote libretti.

Bunsen, CHRISTIAN KARL JOSIAS, BARON, diplomatist and scholar, was born, 25th August 1791, at Korbach, in Waldeck, and studied at Marburg, Göttingen, Copenhagen, Berlin, Paris (for Persian and Arabic), and Rome, where he was appointed (1818) secretary to the Prussian embassy at the papal court (Niebuhr being ambassador), and in 1827 resident minister. He gave much time to Plato, Egyptology, church history, liturgical history, and biblical criticism, and was a great supporter of the Archaeological Institute. Becoming involved in the disputes between the Prussian government and the Archbishop of Cologne, he was recalled from Rome in 1838, and in 1839 appointed Prussian ambassador at Bern. In 1841 he was sent to London on a special mission about an Anglo-Prussian bishopric in Jerusalem, and next year was appointed ambassador at the English court. In 1844 he drew up a constitution for Prussia closely resembling the English. In the Schleswig-Holstein question Bunsen strongly advocated the German view. Differing from the court on the Eastern Question, he resigned in 1854, and lived at Heidelberg and Cannes. He died at Bonn, 28th November 1860. His chief works are: The Church of the Future (1845; Eng. ed. 1847); two works on Ignatius of Antioch (1847); Egypt's place in Universal History (6 vols. 1844-47; 2d ed. 1867); Hippolytus and his Age (2 vols. 1852), written for English readers, and in its second edition forming part of Christianity and Mankind (7 vols. 1854); Signs of the Times (Leip. 1855; Eng. trans. 1856); God in History (3 vols. Leip. 1857-58; Eng. trans. 1870); and the Bibelwerk (9 vols. 1858-70). See his Memoir (1868) by his widow, Frances Waddington (1791-1876), and her own Life and Letters by Hare (1879). His five sons were Heinrich (1818-85), rector of Donington, Shropshire; Ernst (1819-1903), author of Bible Chronology, Islam, &c.; Georg (1824-96), Prussian statesman; and the diplomatists, Karl (1821-87) and Theodor (1832-92). [Boon'sen.]

Bunsen, ROBERT WILHELM (1811-99), chemist and physicist, was born at Göttingen, and studied there and at Paris, Berlin, and Vienna. After lecturing at Göttingen and Cassel, he filled the chair of Chemistry at Marburg, at Breslau, and from 1852 till 1889, when he retired, at Heidelberg. He wrote many papers on chemistry, physics, and geology; invented the charcoal pile, the Bunsen burner, and the magnesium light, first producing magnesium on a large scale; and with Kirchhoff (q.v.) originated spectrum analysis. He wrote on hygrometry (1830), the properties of the hydrated oxide of iron (1837), Gasometry (1857; trans. by Roscoe), the analysis of ashes and mineral waters, flame-reaction, &c. See Nature for 1881.

Bunting, JABEZ (1779-1858), Wesleyan minister, and president from 1835 of the Wesleyan Theological Institute, was born at Manchester. See the Life by his son (1887).

Bunyan, JOHN, author of the Pilgrim's Progress, was born at Elstow, near Bedford, in 1628, son of a 'braseyer' or tinker, in which craft John (baptised 30th November) was duly trained. In 1644 he was drafted into the army, in June 1645 returned to Elstow, and there about 1649 married a poor girl who brought with her two books which had belonged to her father, the Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven and the Practice of Piety. About this time Bunyan began to pass through those deep religious experiences which he has described so vividly in his Grace Abounding. In 1653 he joined a Christian fellowship incorrectly described as a Baptist church (as baptism and other matters were left to the individual conscience), which had been organised by a converted royalist major, and about 1655 he was asked by the brethren to address them. This led to his preaching in the villages round Bedford; and in 1656 he was brought into discussions with the followers of George Fox, which led to his first book, Some Gospel Truths Opened (1656), a vigorous attack on Quakerism. To this Edward Burrough, the Quaker, replied, and Bunyan gave rejoinder in A Vindication of Gospel Truths Opened. In November 1660 he was arrested while preaching in a farmhouse near Ampthill. During the twelve years imprisonment in Bedford county gaol which followed, Bunyan wrote Profitable Meditations, Praying in the Spirit, Christian Behaviour, The Holy City, The Resurrection of the Dead, Grace Abounding, and some smaller works. He was released after the Declaration of Indulgence of 1672, under which he became a licensed preacher, and pastor of the church to which he belonged; but in February 1675 the Declaration of Indulgence was cancelled, and on 4th March a warrant, signed by thirteen magistrates, was issued for his arrest. Brought to trial under the Conventicle Act, Bunyan was sent to prison for six months in the town gaol. It was during this later and briefer imprisonment, and not during the twelve years in the county gaol, that he wrote the first part of the Pilgrim's Progress. When first issued (February 1678) it contained no Mr Worldly Wiseman. Many passages were added in the second and third editions (autumn of 1678 and spring of 1679). There followed the Life and Death of Mr Badman (1680), the Holy War (1682), and the second part of the Pilgrim, containing the story of Christiana and her children (1684). Bunyan had been pastor at Bedford for sixteen years, when, after a ride through the rain from Reading to London, he was seized with a fatal illness at the house of a friend. Here, in Holborn, he died, 31st August 1688, and was buried in Bunhill Fields, the Campo Santo of the Nonconformists. Bunyan wrote something like sixty books, but he is best remembered by the Grace Abounding, the Holy War, and the Pilgrim's Progress. The Pilgrim's Progress sprang at once into fame, 100,000 copies being sold in ten years. It was reprinted at Boston in New England in 1681; it was translated into Dutch, Welsh, Walloon French, German, Polish, and Swedish between 1682 and 1743, and since then into eighty-four languages and dialects. An incomplete folio edition of Bunyan's general works was published in one volume in 1692; complete editions in two volumes folio were issued in 1736-37 and 1767. See Lives by Southey (1830), Offor (1862), Froude (1880), Brown (1885; new ed. 1888), and Hale White (1904).

Buondelmonti, a Guelph leader at Florence in the first half of the 13th century.

Buononcini, or BONONCINI, three Italian composers. Giovanni Maria (1640-78) wrote instrumental pieces, songs, and church music; his sons, Marc Antonio (1660-1726) and Giovanni Battista (1672-1750), composed operas. The latter settled in London in 1720, and was Handel's rival in popularity. [Bon-on-chee'nee.]

Burbage, RICHARD (c. 1567-1619), actor, the son of James Burbage, himself an actor, and the builder of the Shoreditch and Blackfriars theatres. Richard made his debut early, and had earned the title of "Roscius," when the death of his father in 1597 brought him a share in the Blackfriars Theatre. In 1599, together with his brother Cuthbert, he pulled down the Shoreditch house, and built the famous Globe Theatre as a summer playhouse, while the Blackfriars was to be a winter one. For the expenses of building he had to borrow money, and took as partners Shakespeare, Hemming, Condell, and others. Burbage was a not unskilful painter, and an undoubted picture of his is preserved at Dulwich College.

Burchell, WILLIAM JOHN (c. 1782-1863), a botanist and naturalist, born at Fulham, who travelled in South Africa (1810-15) and South America (1826-29).

Burckhardt, JOHN LEWIS, traveller, born at Lausanne, November 24, 1784, was educated at Neuchâtel, Leipzig, and Göttingen. In 1806 he brought an introduction from Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks, of the African Association, and was sent to explore the interior of Africa. By way of Malta he proceeded, disguised as an oriental, to Aleppo, where he studied more than two years; then he visited Palmyra, Damascus, Lebanon, and in 1812 Cairo. But hindered from going by Fezzan to the Niger, he went to Nubia, and thence in 1814 to Mecca, where he was accepted not only as a true believer, but as a great Moslem scholar. In 1815 he returned to Cairo, and in 1816 ascended Mount Sinai. When at last on the point of joining the Fezzan caravan, for which he had waited so long, he was carried off by dysentery at Cairo, October 15, 1817. His collection of oriental MSS., in 350 volumes, was left to Cambridge University. His journals of travel were published in 1819-30 by the African Association. [Boork-hart.]

Burder, GEORGE (1752-1832), Congregationalist minister in Lancaster, Coventry, and from 1803 London. His Village Sermons had a vast circulation. See Life by H. Burder (1833).

Burdett, SIR FRANCIS, Bart., the most popular English politician of his time, was born 25th January 1770. Educated at Westminster and Oxford, he spent three years (1790-93) on the Continent, and was a witness of the French Revolution. In 1793 he married Sophia, youngest daughter of Countess, the great banker; in 1796 was elected M.P. for Boroughbridge, Yorkshire, and in 1797 succeeded to the baronetcy. In the House of Commons he made himself conspicuous by his opposition to the war, and his advocacy of parliamentary reform, Catholic emancipation, freedom of speech, prison reform, and other liberal measures. His candidature for Middlesex in 1802 involved him in four years' costly and fruitless litigation; but in May 1807, in which same month he fought a duel with a Mr Paul, he was returned for Westminster, and represented it till 1837. Burdett having in 1810 published, in Cobbett's Political Register, a Letter to his Constituents, declaring the conduct of the House of Commons illegal in imprisoning a radical orator, the Speaker's warrant was issued for his apprehension. For two days he barricaded his house; the populace supported him, and in a street contest between them and the military one life was lost; but after two days an entry was forced, and Burdett conveyed to the Tower. The prorogation restored him to liberty. In 1820 a letter on the 'Peterloo massacre' involved him in three months' imprisonment and a fine of £1000. In 1835 he joined the Conservatives; in 1837 was returned for Wiltshire, which he represented till his death, on 23d January 1844.

Burdett-Coutts, ANGELA GEORGINA, BARONESS, daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, was born 21st April 1814. In 1837 she inherited much of the property of her grandfather, Thomas Coutts (q.v.). The use she made of this wealth, to mitigate the sufferings of her fellow-creatures and of the lower animals, made her deservedly popular. In 1871 she received a peerage, in 1872 the freedom of the City of London; and she died 28th December 1906. In 1881 she married William Ashmead-Bartlett, who in 1882 assumed her name, and in 1885 was elected Conservative member for Westminster. [Bur-det't'-Kootts.]

Burdon-Sanderson, SIR JOHN (1828-1905), born at Jesmond, Newcastle, held chairs of Physiology and Medicine in London and Oxford, and did much to advance pathology and physiology. See his Life by Lady Burdon-Sanderson (1911).

Bürger, GOTTFRIED AUGUST, lyric poet, was born 31st December 1747, at Molmerswende, near Halberstadt, the son of the Lutheran pastor. In boyhood he displayed no inclination to study, and Latin he especially abhorred; but he showed a relish for verse, though his only model was the hymn-book. He was educated at Aschersleben and Halle, where in 1764 he began to study theology; but in 1768 he migrated to Göttingen, and entered on a course of jurisprudence. His life here was wild and extravagant, and he might have sunk into obscurity but for the intimacy which he happily formed with Voss, the two Stolbergs, and others of that youthful poet band. He studied closely the ancient and modern classics; Shakespeare and Percy's Reliques had the strongest influence of all. As these inspired him, so he in turn inspired Sir Walter Scott, whose earliest production was a translation of Bürger's Lenore. Thrice Bürger married, and thrice unhappily—first in 1774, Dora Leonhart; next in 1785, her sister Auguste, the 'Molly' of his poems, who had borne him a son in Dora's lifetime; and lastly, in 1790, his 'Swabian maiden,' Elise Hahn (1769-1833), whom he divorced in 1792. Unfortunate speculations involved him in embarrassment; and, favourite poet though he was of the German nation, he was left to earn his bread by translations and similar hack-work. He died at Göttingen, 8th June 1794. Of his poems, the first collection of which appeared in 1778, there have been numerous editions, the best being Reinhard's (4 vols. 1796-98), Tittmann's (1809), Grisebach's (2 vols. 1873), and Sauer's (1884). See his Life by Döring (1826), Pröhle (1856), and Von Wurzbach (1900), and his Letters (1802-74). [Byr-ger; g hard.]

Burges, WILLIAM, A.R.A. (1827-81), a London architect, his speciality French Gothic.

Burgess, JOHN BAGNOLD, a painter, largely of Spanish subjects, was born at Chelsea, 21st October 1830, and in 1877 was elected an A.R.A., in 1889 an R.A. He died 12th November 1897.

Burgh, HUBERT DE, from 1215 to 1232 was the patriotic Justiciar of England, the virtual ruler for the last four years of the realm, but now is chiefly remembered as the gaoler of Prince Arthur (q.v.). He was created Earl of Kent in 1227, and died at Banstead, Surrey, 12th May 1243. Walter de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, who died at Galway in 1291, was his grand-nephew.

Burghley, WILLIAM CECIL, LORD, one of England's greatest statesmen, was born at Bourn, Lincolnshire, 13th September 1520, the son of Richard Cecil of Burghley, Northamptonshire, who rose high in favour with Henry VIII., and left large estates at his death in 1552. Educated at Stamford and Grantham, young Cecil passed in 1535 to St John's College, Cambridge, where he was remarkable for his diligence and aptitude, but where he formed an attachment for a wine-seller's daughter, Mary Cheke, the sister of the great Greek scholar. They were married in 1541, two months after his entering Gray's Inn, but she died three years later, leaving him one son. At Gray's Inn he studied not merely law, but history, genealogy, and theology. In 1547 Henry VIII. appointed him custos brevium. His second marriage (1545), to the daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, procured him the patronage of the Protector Somerset, who made him Master of Requests (1547), and his secretary (1548). He shared in Somerset's disgrace, even to two months' imprisonment in the Tower; but in 1550 his pre-eminent abilities secured for him the post of secretary of state, and in 1551 the honour of knighthood. With a sagacity far beyond the spirit of his age, he endeavoured to throw trade open, and did succeed in abolishing some monopolies. During Mary's reign he conformed to Catholicism. Prior to Mary's death, he had entered into correspondence with Elizabeth, who in 1558 appointed him chief secretary of state. A life of Cecil from this time until his death would be a forty years' history of England when England was greatest. His policy at home and abroad was at once shrewd and cautious, liberal and comprehensive, while he displayed decision, ready and stern, when necessity demanded. He was above animosities and favouritism. Had he been less just, history might have been more generous to his memory, whose darkest blot is his employment of a whole army of spies. The queen created him Baron Burghley (1571), K.G. (1572), and lord high treasurer (1572)—an office he held till his death). His emoluments were as nothing to his expenditure, which was lavish in the building and beautifying of his mansions—Burghley, Theobalds in Herts, and Cecil House in the Strand. He died 4th August 1598, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His first-born, Thomas, was created Earl of Exeter in 1605 (the marquise dates from 1801). The second son, Robert, was created Earl of Salisbury in 1605 (marquise 1789). See Lives by Nares (1823-31), Martin Hume (1898), and Jessopp (1900), and works cited under ELIZABETH. [Bur-ley.]

Burgkmair, HANS (1473-1531), painter and wood-engraver, was born and died at Augsburg. The father-in-law of the elder Holbein and the friend of Dürer, he is best known by his woodcuts, amounting to nearly 700. See monograph by Alfred Schmid (Mun. 1888). [Boork-maire.]

Burton, JOHN WILLIAM (1819-88), born at Smyrna, entered Worcester College, Oxford, in 1841, gained the Newdigate (1845) and an Oriel fellowship (1848), and was vicar of St Mary's, Oxford (1863-76), professor of Divinity at Gresham College, London (1868-75), and Dean of Chichester from 1876. Of his forty-five works may be mentioned Lives of Twelve Good Men (1888). See his own Life by Goulburn (1891).

Burgoynne, JOHN, general and dramatist, born 24th Feb. 1723, entered the army in 1740, eloped three years later with a daughter of the Earl of Derby, and resided nine years in France (1747-56). Then he distinguished himself in Portugal by the capture of Alcantara (1762), and sat in parliament as a Tory, till in 1774 he was sent out to America. In 1777 he led an expedition from Canada; on 6th July he took Ticonderoga; but on 17th October, after two engagements, was forced to surrender to General Gates (q.v.) at Saratoga. Having gone over to the Whigs, he was commander-in-chief in Ireland in 1782-83. He was the author of pamphlets in his own defence, of The Maid of the Oaks (1775), and of The Heiress (1786), a most successful comedy; and he died on 3d June 1792. See his Life by E. B. de Fonblanque (1876).—His natural son, SIR JOHN FOX BURGOYNE (1782-1871), engineer officer, was with Moore at Corunna in 1809, and served under Wellington through all the Peninsular war, well earning the K.C.B. (1838). In the Crimean war he was chief of the British engineering department, was unjustly recalled, but was made a baronet (1856), constable of the Tower (1865), and a field-marshal (1868). See his Life by Wrottesley (1873).

Buridan, JEAN, schoolman, born at Béthune in Artois about 1300, studied at Paris under Occam, became himself a teacher of the Nominalist philosophy, and was rector of the university of Paris in 1327. He was alive in 1358. His works treat of logic, metaphysics, physics, ethics, and politics—almost every subject save theology. The sophism known as 'Buridan's ass' (which is bound to starve between two bundles of hay of exactly equal size and attractiveness) does not occur in his works, but is suggested in Aristotle and in Dante.

Burke, EDMUND, was born, an attorney's son, at Dublin, 12th January 1729, and in 1743 entered Trinity College, where he devoted himself to very extensive and desultory reading, graduating B.A. in 1748. Two years later he entered the Middle Temple, London, but soon abandoned law for literary work. His Vindication of Natural Society, in which, with well-concealed irony, he confutes Bolingbroke's views of society by a reductio ad absurdum, was published anonymously in 1756, as also was his Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful. The same year Burke made a happy marriage with the daughter of a Bath physician, Dr Nugent. From 1759 till 1788 he contributed largely to the Annual Register. In 1761-63 he was back in Dublin as private secretary to 'Single-speech Hamilton,' then Secretary for Ireland. In 1765 he became private secretary to the Marquis of Rockingham, at that time premier, and entered parliament for the pocket borough of Wendover. His eloquence at once gained him a high position in the Whig party. The Rockingham administration lived only about a year; but though he held no office till the downfall of the North ministry in 1782, Burke's public activity never ceased till his death. His eloquence, political knowledge, and force of character gave him a foremost place. Lord North's long administration (1770-82) was marked by the unsuccessful coercion of the American colonies, by corruption, extravagance, and reaction. Against this policy Burke and his Whig friends could only raise a strong protest. The best of Burke's writings and speeches belong to this period, and may be described as a defence of sound constitutional statesmanship against prevailing abuse and misgovernment. Observations on the Present State of the Nation (1769) was a reply to George Grenville; On the Causes of the Present Discontents (1770) treats of the Wilkes controversy. Perhaps the finest of his many efforts are the speech on American Taxation (1774), the speech on Conciliation with America (1775), and the Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol (1777)—all advocating wise and liberal measures, which would have averted the mischief that ensued. In 1773 Burke visited Paris, in 1774 he had to retire from his seat for Wendover, but was elected by Bristol. But his support of the proposals for relaxing the restrictions on the trade of Ireland with Great Britain, and for alleviating the laws against Catholics, cost him the seat (1780), and from that time till 1794 he represented Malton. When the disasters of the American war brought Lord North's government to a close, Burke was Paymaster of the Forces under Rockingham (1782), as also under Portland (1783). After the fall of the Whig ministry in 1783 Burke was never again in office, and, misled by party feeling, he opposed Pitt's measure for Free Trade with Ireland and the Commercial Treaty with France. In 1788 he opened the trial of Warren Hastings by the speech which will always rank among the masterpieces of English eloquence. His Reflections on the French Revolution (1790) reached an eleventh edition in a year, was read all over Europe, and powerfully encouraged its rulers in strenuous resistance to the Revolution. Burke, alienated on this subject from Fox and the Whigs, became more and more vehement in his denunciations of the French innovations. The Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs, Thoughts on French Affairs, and Letters on a Regicidal Peace urge the government not only to fight the Revolution but to suppress free opinions at home. Burke died 9th July 1797, and was buried in the little church at Beaconsfield, where in 1768 he had purchased the estate of Gregories. During his whole political life Burke's private affairs were sadly embarrassed; he had to borrow money to buy that estate, and he was always deep in debt. Two pensions were granted him in 1794, when a proposal to raise him to the peerage as Lord Beaconsfield was arrested by the death of his only son. Burke ranks as one of the foremost orators and political thinkers of England. He had vast knowledge of affairs, a glowing imagination, passionate sympathies, and an inexhaustible wealth of powerful and cultured expression; but his delivery was awkward and ungainly, and speeches which captivate the reader only served to empty the benches of the House of Commons. A collected edition of his works appeared in 1792-1827; another with his Correspondence in 1852 (8 vols.); the Select Works in 1874-78 (3 vols. ed. Payne); his writings on Irish affairs in 1881 (ed. Matthew Arnold). See the Life by Prior (1824); 5th ed. 1854; J. Morley's longer (1867) and shorter (1879) monographs; and Lecky's History of England in the Eighteenth Century.

Burke, Sir John Bernard (1815-92), herald and genealogist, was the son of John Burke (1787-1848), who came from Tipperary, settled in London as a literary man, and in 1826 published the Peerage and Baronetage of the United Kingdom. Called to the bar in 1839, the son was appointed Ulster King-of-Arms in 1853, knighted in 1854, and made keeper of the Irish state papers in 1867. Besides editing successive issues of the Peerage (72d ed. 1910), he published The Landed Gentry (1846), Extinct Peerages (1846), Anecdotes of the Aristocracy (1849), Family Romance (1853), Vicissitudes of Great Families (1859), Rise of Great Families (1873), and Reminiscences (1882).

Burke, Robert O'Hara (1820-61), one of the first to cross the Australian continent from south to north, was born at St Cleran, County Galway, and educated in Belgium, served in the Austrian army (1840), joined the Irish Constabulary (1848), and emigrated to Australia in 1853. While inspector of police in Victoria he accepted the leadership of an expedition, and after many hardships, reached with Wills the tidal waters of the Flinders River. Burke died of starvation on his return journey, 28th June 1861. An expedition brought his remains and Wills's to Melbourne. See Wills's Exploration of Australia (1863).

Burke, Thomas (1829-82), from 1868 permanent Irish under-secretary, was brutally murdered with Lord Frederick Cavendish (q.v.).

Burke, Thomas Nicholas (1830-83), a witty and eloquent Dominican, born at Galway, visited the States in 1872, and published lectures and sermons. See Life by Fitzpatrick (new ed. 1894).

Burke, William (1792-1829), was an Irishman, like William Hare, his partner in a series of infamous murders, committed at Edinburgh, to supply dissection subjects to Dr Robert Knox. Hare, the more execrable wretch of the two, was admitted king's evidence, and, according to Serjeant Ballantine, died some time in the sixties a blind beggar in London; while Burke was hanged, amid the execrations of the crowd.

Burkitt, William (1650-1703), Biblical commentator, was born at Hitcham, Suffolk, and died vicar of Dedham.

Burleigh. See BURGLEY, and BALFOUR (JOHN).

Burlingame, Anson (1820-70), diplomatist, born at New Berlin, New York, was educated at Harvard, became a lawyer at Boston, and entered congress in 1854. He was sent as U.S. minister to China by Lincoln; and when returning was made Chinese envoy to the U.S. and Europe. He negotiated the Burlingame treaty between China and the U.S. (1868).

Burlington, Richard Boyle, Earl of (1695-1753), was an enthusiastic architect, a great admirer of Palladio.

Burmans, a Dutch family of scholars, originally from Cologne.—(1) Peter 'the elder' (1668-1741) studied law at Utrecht and Leyden, and became professor of History and Rhetoric at Utrecht, afterwards of Greek at Leyden. His chief works are editions of the Latin classics.—(2) His nephew, Peter 'the younger' (1714-78), studied at Utrecht, and became professor at Francker, then at Amsterdam, and keeper of the public library there. He edited Virgil, Aristophanes, Claudian, Propertius, and a Latin anthology. [Boor'mann.] Burmeister, Hermann (1807-92), naturalist, was born at Stralsund, and died in Buenos Ayres.

Burn, Richard (1709-85), born at Winton, in Westmorland, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and from 1736 was vicar of Orton, in his native county. Among his eight works were the Justice of the Peace and Ecclesiastical Law, both of which passed through many editions; a History of the Poor-laws; and a History of Cumberland.

Burn, WILLIAM (1789-1870), architect, was born in Edinburgh, and trained under Smirke in London. He founded a successful business first in Edinburgh, and then, after 1844, in London. Specimens of his work are scattered over the whole kingdom. His unhappy 'restoration' of St Giles', Edinburgh (1829-33), has been as far as possible undone.

Burnaby, FREDERICK GUSTAVUS, a daring traveller and dashing sabreur, was born at Bedford, 3d March 1842. The son of the 'squarson' of Somersby Hall in Leicestershire, he was educated at Bedford, Harrow, and privately in Germany, and early became a capital linguist. He joined the Royal Horse Guards Blue in 1859, and was promoted captain in 1866, lieutenant-colonel in 1880, and colonel in 1881. His experiences in Central and South America, in the Carlist camp in 1874, and with Gordon in the Soudan in 1875, prepared him for the great exploit of his life—his ride in the winter of 1875 across the steppes of Tartary. His brightly written Ride to Khiva (1876) at once made him famous; and indeed his stature of 6 ft. 4 in., immense strength, reckless courage, outspoken frankness, and uncompromising Jingoism were exactly the kind of qualities for a hero of the English people. He contested Birmingham without success in 1880, but polled 15,735 votes. In 1876-78 he travelled in Asia Minor and Armenia, his On Horseback through Asia Minor being no less successful than his earlier book. In Graham's expedition to the Eastern Soudan he was badly wounded at El Teb; and in 1884 he made his way without leave to join Sir Herbert Stewart's column in the Nile expedition, and was killed by an Arab spear-thrust at Abu Klea, 17th January 1885. Burnaby was a daring aeronaut, and crossed the Channel to Normandy in 1882 in a balloon. See Life by Ware and Mann (1885).

Burnand, SIR FRANCIS COWLEY, born in 1836 and knighted in 1902, was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge (1854-58), and afterwards went to Cuddesdon with a view to Anglican orders. In December 1858 he joined the Catholic Church, and for four months continued his theological studies at the house of the Oblate Fathers at Bayswater. A farce by him had been produced at Eton in 1851, and at Cambridge he had founded the 'A.D.C.', of which he published a history in 1879. He was called to the bar in 1862, but the success of some early dramatic ventures altered his plans; and he has produced a hundred and odd pieces, chiefly extravaganzas and burlesques. He joined Mr H. J. Byron in starting Fun, but in 1863 left that paper for Punch, of which he was editor 1880-1906. His first contribution to Punch was Mokeanna, a burlesque on sensational romance writing; to this succeeded Happy Thoughts (1868), New History of Sandford and Merton (1872), Strapmore, by 'Weeder' (1878), &c. See his Records and Reminiscences (1903).

Burnard, NEVILL NORTHEY (1818-78), a self-taught Cornish sculptor, whose later years were unfortunate, was born at Alternon, and died in Redruth Infirmary.

Burne-Jones, SIR EDWARD, was born of Welsh ancestry at Birmingham, 28th August 1833, and from King Edward's School there passed in 1853 to Exeter College, Oxford, where William Morris, the poet, was his friend. He left without taking a degree, having relinquished orders for art; and about 1857 submitting some pen-drawings to Rossetti, whose work had powerfully influenced him, he received from him encouragement and guidance in his attempts as a painter. From the first he was a fascinating colourist, and his earlier works, as 'The Merciful Knight' (1864) and 'The Wine of Circe' (1867), attain, in water-colour, greater brilliancy and purity of hue than is usual even in works executed in oil, and are sometimes, as in 'Love among the Ruins' (1873), on such an extended scale as we usually associate with the more dignified medium. About 1870 he began to be known as an oil-painter, and his works henceforth are inspired by the earlier art of the Italian Renaissance, and show more of grace and less of emphasis than his former paintings. Among his pictures are 'The Days of Creation', 'The Beguiling of Merlin' (sold in 1892 for £3780) and 'The Mirror of Venus' (1877), 'Laus Veneris' (painted 1873-75), 'Le Chant d'Amour' and 'Pan and Psyche' (1878), 'The Golden Stairs' (1880), 'The Wheel of Fortune' (1883), 'King Cophetua' (1884), 'The Brazen Tower' (1888), and 'Briar Rose' (1890). He furnished striking designs for stained glass, e.g. at Christ Church, Oxford. He became D.C.L. of Oxford 1881, A.R.A. 1885 (resigned 1893), and a baronet 1894. He died 16th June 1898; and at the sale of his works 'Love the Pilgrim' brought £5250. See monograph by Malcolm Bell (1892; 4th ed. 1898), the Art Annual by Julia Cartwright (1894), and the Memorials by his wife (1904).

Burnell, ARTHUR COKE (1840-82), Sanskrit scholar, born at St Briavels, Gloucestershire, during 1860-68 was a civil servant in India.

Burnes, SIR ALEXANDER, was born 16th May 1805 at Moutrose, a son of the provost, whose father was Robert Burns's cousin. In 1821 he entered the Indian army, and his knowledge of oriental languages gained him rapid promotion. After some important missions, he was, at his own suggestion, sent on a twelve-months' expedition into Central Asia. Starting from Lahore in 1832, and adopting the Afghan dress, he passed through Peshawur and Kabul, and crossed the Hindu Kush to Balkh. Thence he passed on to Bokhara, Astrabad, and Teheran, and journeying through Ispahan and Shiraz, embarked at Bushire for India. On his return to England in 1833, he was received with high honours; and in 1839, having previously been knighted, he was appointed political resident at Kabul, where he was murdered by the Afghan mob, 2d November 1841. See his Travels into Bokhara (1834), and Kabul (1842); and Kaye's Lives of Indian Officers (1869).

Burnet, GILBERT, the Whig broad-church Bishop of Salisbury, was born at Edinburgh, 18th Sept. 1643. At ten he entered Marischal College, Aberdeen, and, four years later taking his M.A., applied himself first to law and then to divinity with such diligence that in 1661 he was admitted a probationer. In 1663 he visited Cambridge, Oxford, and London, and next year perfected his Hebrew under a rabbi of Amsterdam. In 1665 he became minister of Salton, Haddingtonshire, in 1669 professor of Divinity at Glasgow; but in 1674, having brought on himself the enmity of his old patron Landerdale, he resigned his chair, and settled in London, where he was made chaplain to the Rolls Chapel, and afterwards lecturer at St Clement's. In 1677 he published his Memoirs of two Dukes of Hamilton; in 1679-81 the first two volumes of his History of the Reformation; in 1680 Some Passages in the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester; and in 1682 his Life of Sir Matthew Hale. In 1680 he declined the bishopric of Chichester; in 1683 he attended the execution of his friend Russell. Charles II. exhibited his unkingly spite by depriving him of his lectureship; and on James's accession Burnet went to the Continent, and travelled through France, Italy, Switzerland, and Germany. In 1684 he was introduced to the Prince of Orange, with whom he became a great favourite. When William came over, Burnet accompanied him as royal chaplain, and in 1689 was appointed Bishop of Salisbury. His first pastoral letter, founding William's right to the throne on conquest, gave so much offence to parliament that it was burned by the hangman. In 1698 he was appointed preceptor to the Duke of Gloucester; in 1699 he published his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, which was condemned as heterodox by the Lower House of Convocation. In 1714 appeared vol. iii. of his History of the Reformation; and on 17th March 1715 he died at Clerkenwell. His first wife was remarkable for her beauty, the second for her fortune, and the third for her piety. See his History of My Own Time (1724-34), the essential Supplement (1902), and the Life by Clarke and Foxcroft (1907).

Burnet, JOHN (1784-1868), painter, was born at Musselburgh, and died at Stoke Newington. He is better known by his admirable engravings of Wilkie than by his own paintings; of them the best is the 'Greenwich Pensioners' (1837).

Burnet, THOMAS (c. 1635-1715), born at Croft, N.R. Yorkshire, studied at Cambridge, and in 1685 was elected Master of the Charterhouse. He became clerk of the closet to William III., but had to resign the post in 1692 on account of his Archæologia Philosophica (also in English), which treated the Mosaic account of the Fall as an allegory. His Telluris Theoria Sacra (1680-89), also translated or rather recomposed in English by the author, is a mere cosmogony, but abounds in sublime conceptions. See Life by Heathcote prefixed to its seventh edition (1759).

Burnett, FRANCES HODGSON, novelist, was born at Manchester in 1849, and in 1865 emigrated with her parents to Tennessee. She married Dr Burnett in 1873, divorced him in 1898, and in 1900 married Stephen Townesend, a London surgeon and author. Her first literary success was That Lass o' Lourie's (1877), first published in Scribner's Magazine. Haworth's (1879) was also a powerful study of Lancashire manufacturing life. Later works have been Louisiana (1880), Through One Administration (1883), Little Lord Fauntleroy (1886), Sarah Creve (1888), The One I knew best of all (1893, autobiographical), A Lady of Quality (1896), and His Grace the Duke of Osmonde (1897).

Burnett, JAMES. See MONBODDO.

Burnett, JOHN (1729-84), an Aberdeen merchant who founded two theological premiums.

Burnett, SIR WILLIAM (1779-1861), physician-general of the navy, was born at Montrose, and died at Chichester.

Burney, DR CHARLES, musician and author, was born at Shrewsbury, 12th April 1726, and having studied music there, at Chester, and under Dr Arne in London, commenced giving lessons in music himself. After composing three pieces—Alfred, Robin Hood, and Queen Mab—for Drury Lane (1745-50), he settled as organist at Lynn, in Norfolk (1751-60), where he planned his History of Music (4 vols. 1776-89), to collect materials for which he travelled (1770-72) in France, Italy, Germany, and Austria. Beside minor works, and accounts of his two tours, Burney wrote a Life of Metastasio, and nearly all the musical articles in Rees's Cyclopædia. In 1783 he became organist to Chelsea Hospital, where he died 12th April 1814. He knew intimately many of the most eminent men of the day, including Burke, Dr Johnson, Reynolds, and Garrick. See the Life (1832) by his famous daughter Fanny, Madame D'Arbly (q.v.)—His son, CHARLES BURNEY, D.D. (1757-1817), was a schoolmaster and classical critic; another son, JAMES (1750-1821), was a captain in the navy, and wrote Voyages; and a daughter of his second marriage, SARAH HARRIET (c. 1770-1844), published four or five novels.

Burnouf, JEAN LOUIS (1775-1844), philologist, was professor of Rhetoric at the Collège de France (1817), inspector and librarian of the university, and member of the Académie des Inscriptions (1836). He was the author of grammars of Greek and Latin, and of a translation of Tacitus.—His son, EUGÈNE, a great orientalist, was born at Paris, 1st April 1801. He became a member of the Académie des Inscriptions in 1832, and from then till his death (28th May 1852) was professor of Sanskrit at the Collège de France. His first works were on Pali (1826-27), Zend MSS., and the Zendavesta (1829-43); his Commentaire sur le Yaçna (1833) revealed the language and doctrine of Zoroaster to the western world. He attempted to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis (1836). In 1840 he published text and translation of the Bhāgavata Purāna, a system of Indian mythology, and in 1844 his Histoire du Bouddhisme. See his Correspondence (1891), and Lives by Barthélemy Saint-Hilaire (1892) and Berger (1893).—His cousin, EMILE LOUIS (born 25th August 1821), philologist, directed the French school at Athens, and wrote on Sanskrit, Greek, the Science of Religion, Japanese mythology, and Latin hymnology.

Burns, SIR GEORGE (1795-1890), a Glasgow philanthropist and founder of the Cunard (q.v.) Company, was created a baronet in 1889; see Life by Hodder (1890).—His son, JOHN (1829-1901), was created Baron Inverclyde in 1897, and was succeeded by his son, GEORGE (1861-1905)—both of them chairmen of the Cunard Company.

Burns, JABEZ, D.D. (1805-76), born at Oldham, was a minister of the Methodist New Connection at London (1826) and at Perth (1830-35), and returned to London to become minister of a General Baptist congregation in Marylebone. He lectured up and down the kingdom on temperance, peace, abolition of capital punishment, &c., and wrote some thirty works, including The Christian Sketch-book, The Spiritual Cabinet, Sketches and Skeletons of Sermons (15 vols.), and the Pulpit Cyclopædia (4 vols. 1846-60).

Burns, JOHN, labour agitator, was born of Scotch parentage in Wandsworth Road, London, in 1858, worked as an engineer, took to Socialism, and, elected M.P. for Battersea in 1892, became President of the Local Government Board in 1905.

Burns, ROBERT, was born at Alloway, near Ayr, January 25, 1759, the son of a small farmer. In 1766, the father, an intelligent man with a great belief in education, moved to Mount Oliphant, four miles south-east of Ayr; in 1777 there was another move to Lochlea. The boy's education, begun at a school at Alloway Mill, and continued by one John Murdoch, was thoroughly literary; he was exercised in turning verse into prose, selecting synonyms, and so forth. Unlike Hogg, Burns had always more or less consciously studied the technique of his art. Among early influences ought to be reckoned the popular tales and ballads and songs of Betty Davidson, an old woman who lived with the poet's family. He read Allan Ramsay, and began to write a little. Acquaintance with sailors and smugglers widened his moral ideas, and he became a kind of rural Don Juan, though he had too much heart for the rôle. The death of Burns's father in 1784 left him to try to farm for himself. Farming without capital was, even then, like gambling without capital—one reverse meant ruin. Burns's husbandry went ill; he met Jean Armour (1767-1834); the entanglement began (he was then twenty-five); and out of his poverty, his passion, his despair, and his desperate mirth, came the extraordinary poetic harvest of 1785. To this year belong the Epistle to Davie, Death and Dr Hornbook, The Twa Herds, The Jolly Beggars, Hallow E'en, The Cotter's Saturday Night, Holy Willie's Prayer, The Holy Fair, and The Address to a Mouse. If we had only the verses of this year, Burns would remain the greatest of known popular poets. His topics were topics at which, probably, dozens of other rural rhymers were hammering. But then Burns touched them with the hand of a master; and no poet perhaps of any language has ever attained such a wild perfection as he reaches in the reckless merriment of The Jolly Beggars. The next year found Burns still busy; it was another annus mirabilis, though much of the verse is satirical, and necessarily less interesting. The Twa Dogs is a masterpiece of humour; The Lament and Despondency remind one of Regnier. In this year there was abundant trouble with Jean Armour; there was the Highland Mary (Mary Campbell) episode, and her death. Looking about him for money, that he might emigrate to Jamaica, Burns published the famous and much-sought-after Kilmarnock edition of his poems (600 copies, 1786). Their fame spread, Burns got a few pounds, and was just about to sail, when the praises and promises of admirers induced him to stay in Scotland. In winter he went to Edinburgh, met the wits and the great, and was a lion. The poems were reprinted in 1787, and some money came in (about £500 ultimately). On returning to the country, he was much made of, and 'fell to his old love again,' Jean Armour; then, after a Highland tour, went back to Edinburgh, and began the epistolary flirtations with Mrs M'Lehose (Clarinda). By this date Johnson had set about publishing his Scots Musical Museum, to which we owe all that is briefest and brightest of Burns. He contributed an astonishing number of the most beautiful, tender, passionate, and vivacious songs in any language, chiefly adapted to old Scotch airs, and moulded now and then on old Scotch words. In 1788 Burns married Jean Armour. He took a lease of Ellisland farm, on the Nith, above Dumfries, and next year received an appointment in the Excise. Tam o' Shanter (1790) was written in one day; by this time Ellisland, like all Burns's worldly enterprises, had proved a failure. He left his farm, withdrew to Dumfries and to gauging, flirted with the French Revolution, drank, wrote songs, expressed opinions then thought Radical, and made himself unpopular with the local lairds. In 1795 he turned patriot again, and wrote songs against the French. He died on July 21, 1796, at Dumfries, and there is buried.

Burns is so much the greatest of Scottish poets that no other comes into the reckoning. Scott is a genius more universal, more genial; but for the mere essence of poetry and spirit of song, Burns has no equal, not in Scotch poetry only, but in the literature of the world. He is not merely a lyric poet of unsurpassed energy, and of an art usually unerring, but he is a satirist and a descriptive poet second to few. He takes our hearts by storm; he rushes in with the fifes and pipes playing gloriously; he wins us at once by a natural intrepid gallantry of art. It is for this gay courage, or again for his brief natural sadness, that he is so esteemed, and for an art simple, unaffected, completely appropriate, and classically clear. It is not the faults of Burns, on the whole, nor his shamefaced glorying in them that remain in the memory and the imagination. It is the good element in him, the tender heart and proud courage and sound humour that survive. On the rest the righteousness of Oblivion scatters his poppy, and leaves us only the memory of a great poet.

Stevenson (Men and Books). A Life and Works in French by Angelier was published in 1893; and there are more or less full German translations by Freiligrath, Ruete, Bartsch, and others, as well as Flemish and other versions. See William Jacks' Burns in other Tongues (1896).

Burns, WILLIAM CHALMERS (1813-68), born at Dun manse, near Brechin, from 1846 was a Presbyterian missionary in China. See Memoir (1870), by his brother ISLAY (1817-72), who from 1864 was Free Church professor of Theology at Glasgow. See Memoir of him by Prof. Blaikie prefixed to his Remains (1874).

Burnside, AMBROSE EVERETT, American general, born at Liberty, Indiana, 23d May 1824, served an apprenticeship to a tailor, but graduated at West Point in 1847. He left the army as first-lieutenant in 1852, but returned as colonel of volunteers in 1861, commanded a brigade at Bull Run, and in February 1862 captured Roanoke Island. Having rendered important services at South Mountain and Antietam, he in November reluctantly superseded M'Clellan. On 13th December he crossed the Rappahannock, and attacked Lee near Fredericksburg, but was repulsed with a loss of over 10,000 men. In 1863 he successfully held Knoxville, and in 1864 led a corps under Grant through the battles of the Wilderness and Cold Harbour. Resigning in April 1865, he was elected Governor of Rhode Island (1866-68), and U.S. senator in 1875 and 1881. He died at Bristol, R.I., 3d September 1881. See Life by Poore (Prov. 1882).

Burr, AARON, an American statesman, born at Newark, New Jersey, 6th February 1756, graduated at Princeton, where his father and grandfather (Jonathan Edwards) had been president of the college, and in 1775, joining the patriot army, gained a high reputation. Called to the bar in 1782, he was attorney-general 1788-90, U.S.

senator 1791-96, and vice-president of the U.S. 1800-4. His defeat in a contest for the governorship of New York led him to force a duel (11th July 1804) on Alexander Hamilton, his personal rival, who fell mortally wounded. Burr fled to South Carolina, and though indicted for murder, returned and completed his term as vice-president. He now prepared to raise a force to conquer Texas, and establish there a republic, which might detach the western states from the Union. This enterprise was proclaimed by the president, and Burr tried for treason (1807). Acquitted, but bankrupt in reputation, he spent some wretched years in Europe, and in 1812 resumed his law practice in New York. Here, shunned by society, he died, 14th September 1836. See Lives by Davis (1838), Parton (1864), Merwin (1900), and Tompkins' Burr Bibliography (1892).

Burrirt, ELIHU, 'the learned blacksmith,' was born at New Britain, Conn., December 8, 1810. He worked as a blacksmith in his native place and at Worcester, Mass., but devoted all his leisure to mathematics and languages—Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and most of the modern European languages. He was best known to the world as an earnest apostle of peace, through his Christian Citizen and his travels over Europe and the United States. His chief works are Sparks from the Anvil (1848), Olive Leaves (1853), Peace Papers (1869), and A Walk from John o' Groat's to Land's End (1865). He took a prominent part in advocating an ocean penny-postage. For many years he lived in England, in 1865-70 as U.S. consul at Birmingham. He died at New Britain, 6th March 1879. See Life by Charles Northend (1879).

Burroughs, JOHN, born at Roxbury, New York, April 3, 1837, was brought up on a farm, and after some years of teaching, journalism, and clerking in the treasury department at Washington, settled down in 1874 on a farm in New York, to divide his time between literature, fruit-culture, and periodic duties as a bank-examiner. His books mostly deal with country life, and include Wake Robin (1871), Winter Sunshine (1875), Birds and Poets (1877), Locusts and Wild Honey (1879), Pepacton (1881), Fresh Fields (1884), Signs and Seasons (1886), Riverby (1894), Whitman (1896), The Light of Day (1900), Literary Values (1902), and Far and Near (1904).

Burrows, SIR GEORGE (1801-87), physician, was in 1874 created a baronet.

Burrows, MONTAGU (1819-1905), born at Hadley, near Barnet, rose in the navy to commander (1852), and then, going up to Oxford, took a double first, and in 1862 became Chichele professor of Modern History. Among his works are Worthies of All Souls (1874), Wielif's Place in History (1882), Life of Hawke (1883), The Cinque Ports (1888), Commentaries on the History of England (1893), and Autobiography (1908).

Burt, EDWARD, General Wade's agent in road-making through the Highlands (1725-26), in 1754 published his Letters from the North of Scotland, and died in London, 4th February 1755.

Burt, THOMAS, miners' Liberal M.P. for Morpeth since 1874, was born at Murton Row in Tynemouth parish, 12th November 1837. He became a Privy-Councillor in 1905. See Life by Watson (1908).

Burton, SIR FREDERIC WILLIAM (1816-1900), water-colour painter, was born at Clifden, County Clare, and educated at Dublin. From 1874 to 1894 he was director of the National Gallery.

Burton, JOHN HILL, historian, was born at Aberdeen 22d August 1809. Having graduated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, he was articled to a lawyer, but soon came to the Edinburgh bar, where, however, he mainly devoted himself to study and letters. He was in 1854 appointed Secretary to the Prison Board of Scotland, and was a Prison Commissioner, Historiographer Royal for Scotland, an LL.D. of Edinburgh, and D.C.L. of Oxford. He died near Edinburgh, 10th August 1881. From 1833 he contributed to the Westminster Review on law, history, and political economy; to Blackwood's Magazine, the Scotsman, &c., he furnished many literary sketches; and he published a Life of Hume (1846), Lives of Simon Lord Lovat and Duncan Forbes of Culloden (1847), Political Economy (1849), Narratives from Criminal Trials in Scotland (1852), The Book-Hunter (1862), The Scot Abroad (2 vols. 1864), The Cairngorm Mountains (1864), History of Scotland (7 vols. 1867-70; revised ed. 8 vols. 1873), History of the Reign of Queen Anne (1880), &c. See Memoir by his wife, prefixed to a new edition of The Book-Hunter (1882).

Burton, LORD. See BASS.

Burton, SIR RICHARD FRANCIS, traveller, was born, the son of Colonel Burton, 19th March 1821, at Barham House, Hertfordshire, and educated in France and England. In 1842 he served in Sind under Sir Charles Napier; and having mastered Hindustani, Persian, and Arabic, made (disguised as an Afghan pilgrim) the daring journey described in his Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecca (1855). After visiting Somaliland and service in the Crimea, he in 1856 set out with Speke (q.v.) on the journey which led to the discovery (1858) of Lake Tanganyika, and afterwards travelled in North America. In 1861 he was consul at Fernando Po, and went on a mission to Dahomey. He was subsequently consul at Santos in Brazil, at Damascus, and (1872) at Trieste. In 1876-78 he visited Midian, and in 1882 Guinea; and he was knighted in 1886. He died at Trieste 20th October 1890. Among Burton's many works are: First Footsteps in East Africa (1856), Lake Regions of Central Africa (1860), City of the Saints (1861), Wanderings in West Africa (1863), The Nile Basin, Vikram and the Vampire (1869). He also wrote on Sind, Goa, Abbeokuta, Paraguay, Brazil, Syria, Zanzibar, Iceland (Ultima Thule, 1875), Bologna, and Midian; on Falconry, Sword and Bayonet Exercise; and translated Camoens (1880), with a Life and Commentary (1881). The master of thirty-five languages, he published in 1885-88 a literal translation of the Arabian Nights (10 vols. and 6 of supplement), of which his wife issued an expurgated edition. Lady Burton, the companion of his wanderings since 1861, wrote Inner Life of Syria (1875); Arabia, Egypt, India (1879), &c.; and died 22d March 1896. See her Life of Sir Richard (1895), the counterblast by Miss Stisted (1897), and the Life by T. Wright (1906).

Burton, ROBERT, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, was born at Lindley, Leicestershire, in 1577, was educated at Nuneaton, Sutton Coldfield, and Brasenose College, Oxford, and in 1599 was elected a student of Christ Church. In 1616 he was presented to the Oxford vicarage of St Thomas, and about 1630 to the rectory of Segrave. Both livings he kept, but spent his life at Christ Church, where he died, 25th January 1639. Little is known of the life of 'Democritus Junior'; but according to Anthony à Wood: 'He was an exact mathemician, a curious calculator of nativities, a general read scholar, a thro' paced philologist, and one that understood the surveying of lands well. . . . His company was very merry, faceté, and juvenile.' Not unnaturally, it was rumoured—falsely—that the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy died a suicide's death. The first edition of the great work appeared in quarto in 1621. Four more editions in folio were published within the author's lifetime, each with successive alterations and additions; the final form of the book was the sixth edition (1651-52). One of the most interesting parts of the book is the long preface, 'Democritus to the Reader,' in which Burton gives indirectly an account of himself and his studies. This strange book is a farrago from all, even the most out-of-the-way classical and medieval writers, yet not one quotation but lends strength or illustration to his argument. Every page is marked by keen irony, profound and often gloomy humour, and by strong and excellent sense; while throughout there runs a deep undertone of earnestness that at times rises into a grave eloquence of quite singular charm. Milton, Dr Johnson, Sterne, Byron, and Lamb were all influenced or impressed by the book. See the edition by Shilleto, with introd. by Bullen (3 vols. 1893).

Bury, BLAZE DE. See BLAZE.

Bury, LADY CHARLOTTE SUSAN MARIA (1775-1861), youngest child of the fifth Duke of Argyll, married in 1796 Colonel John Campbell (d. 1809), and in 1818 the Rev. Edward John Bury (1790-32). Beautiful and accomplished, she published sixteen novels and other works, including probably the anonymous Diary illustrative of the Times of George IV. (2 vols. 1838).

Bury, RICHARD DE. See AUNGERVILLE.

Busbecq, OGIER GHISELIN DE (1522-92), a Flemish diplomatist, in 1556-62 the Emperor Ferdinand's ambassador at Constantinople. He wrote two works on Turkey. See his Life and Letters by Forster and Daniell (2 vols. 1880). [Bys-bek'.]

Busby, RICHARD (1606-95), born at Lutton-Bowine, Lincolnshire, from Westminster School passed to Christ Church, Oxford, and from 1640 till his death was head-master of Westminster. He is the type of pedagogues alike for learning, assiduity, and unsparring application of the birch; none the less for his own loyalty and piety, and the grateful affection of his pupils. Among them were Dryden, Locke, South, and Atterbury. See Life by Russell Barker (1895).

Busch, MORITZ (1821-99), a German publicist, born at Dresden, who from a Radical became an adherent of Bismarck's.

Busch, WILHELM (1832-1908), comic artist, was born near Hanover, and began in 1859 to draw for the Fliegende Blätter. [Boosh.]

Büsching, ANTON FRIEDRICH (1724-93), geographer, was born in Schaumburg-Lippe, and died the director of a gymnasiu in Berlin.—His son, JOHANN GUSTAV (1733-1829), published many works on German antiquities, literature, and art. [Bysh-ing.]

Busenbaum, HERMANN (1600-68), was born in Westphalia, and died rector of the Jesuit College at Münster. His Medulla Theologiae Moralís (1645) became a standard authority in Jesuit seminaries, though several of its propositions were condemned by the popes. 'When the end is lawful, the means also are lawful' is perhaps its most famous maxim. [Boo-sen-bowm.]

Bush, JOSEPH, Wesleyan minister, was born at Ashly, near Spilsby, Lincolnshire, 8th March 1826.

Bushnell, HORACE, divine, was born at New Preston, Conn., 14th April 1802, and died 17th February 1876 at Hartford, where from 1833 to 1859 he was a famous Congregational pastor. His works include Christ in Theology (1851), Nature and the Supernatural (1858), The Vicarious Sacrifice (1865), Women Suffrage (1869), &c. See Life by his daughter (1880).

Busk, HANS, one of the chief originators of the volunteer movement, was born 11th May 1815, and educated at King's College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar in 1841, and in 1847 was high-sheriff of Radnorshire. Even as an undergraduate he urged the government to establish rifle clubs as a defence against invasion. In spite of Lord Melbourne's discouraging reply, he founded a rifle club at the university, and helped in 1853 to revive the only existing volunteer corps, the Victoria Rifles. He was one of the first to advocate life-ship stations, fitting out a model at his own expense; and assisted in founding the South Kensington School of Cookery. He died 11th March 1882.—His sister, RACHEL HARRIETTE BUSK (1818-1907), folklorist and traveller, published Folk-songs of Italy (1886), and collections from Spain, the Tyrol, and the East.

Buss, FRANCES MARY (1828-95), promoter of the higher education of women and founder of the North London Collegiate School for Ladies. See Life by Ridley (1896).

Bussy-Rabutin, ROGER, COMTE DE (1618-93), a French courtier and soldier, author of the celebrated Histoire amoureuse des Gaules (1666; with introd. by Sainte-Beuve, 2 vols. 1868). His Mémoires were edited by Lalané (1857). See his Letters to his cousin Madame de Sévigné and others (5 vols. 1859), and his Life by Gailly (1910).

Butcher, SAMUEL HENRY (1850-1910), M.P. for Cambridge University from 1906, was born in Dublin, the eldest son of the Bishop of Meath. Educated at Marlborough and Trinity College, Cambridge, he was senior classic and chancellor's medallist in 1873, gained a fellowship, resigned it on his marriage in 1876 to the youngest daughter of Archbishop Trench, and then was elected to an extraordinary fellowship at University College, Oxford. In 1882 he succeeded Blackie as Greek professor at Edinburgh, but resigned in 1903.

Bute, JOHN STUART, third EARL OF (1713-92), succeeded his father in 1723, and about 1737 was made one of his Lords of the Bedchamber by Frederick, Prince of Wales. On the prince's death (1751), Bute became Groom of the Stole to his son, afterwards George III., over whose mind he obtained a strong influence. In 1761 he was appointed one of the principal secretaries of state; and from 29th May 1762 to 8th April 1763 he was prime-minister. His government was one of the most unpopular that ever held office, its fundamental principle being the supremacy of the royal prerogative. Bute was incapable; but, worse than that, he was deemed by the popular verdict 'unfit to be prime-minister of England, as (1) a Scotchman, (2) the king's friend, and (3) an honest man.' For some time he retained his influence over the king, but the last twenty-four years of his life were chiefly spent in retirement in the country, where he engaged in botany and other scientific pursuits.—His fourth descendant, JOHN-PATRICK CRICHTON-STUART (1847-1900), born at Mount-Stuart, Bute, in 1848 succeeded his father as third Marquis of Bute. Educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, in 1868 he was admitted into the Catholic Church by Monsignor Capel. He was author of several works, including a translation of the Roman Breviary (2 vols. 1879).

Butler, ALBAN (1711-73), Catholic hagiographer, was born at Appletree, Northampton; was educated at Douai, and became professor there; was for some time chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk; and at his death was head of the English College at St Omer. His great work is the Lives of the Saints (4 vols. 1756-59).—His nephew, CHARLES BUTLER (1750-1832), a lawyer, wrote on legal and theological subjects.

Butler, BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, lawyer, general, and congressman, was born at Deerfield, New Hampshire, 5th November 1818. Graduating at Waterville College, Maine, in 1838, and admitted to the bar in 1840, he became noted as a criminal lawyer, a champion of the working-classes, and an ardent Democrat, both in the legislature and in the state senate. In 1861 he was appointed major-general of volunteers, and in 1862 took possession of New Orleans (1st May), where prompt and severe measures crushed all opposition. In December 'Beast Butler,' as the Confederates called him, was superseded, but in November 1863 received a command in Virginia, and next year made an expedition against Fort Fisher, near Wilmington. Elected to Congress in 1866, he was prominent in the Republican efforts for the reconstruction of the southern states and the impeachment of President Johnson. In 1878 and 1879 he was nominated for governor of Massachusetts by the National party, and endorsed by Democrats, in 1882 elected, but in 1883 again defeated. His nomination for president in 1884 was not taken seriously. He died at Washington, 11th January 1893. See his Autobiography (1892).

Butler, LADY ELEANOR (1745-1829), and MISS SARAH PONSONBY (1755-1831), two Irish recluses, known as the 'Maid of Llangollen' or 'Ladies of the Vale.' They settled about 1774 at Plas Newydd, Llangollen, and were visited here by Mme. de Genlis, Miss Seward, De Quincey, &c.

Butler, GEORGE, D.D. (1774-1853), born in London, from a school kept by his father in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, proceeded to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow. He was head-master of Harrow 1805-29, when he retired to the Northamptonshire rectory of Gayton, and Dean of Peterborough from 1842.—His eldest son, GEORGE BUTLER, D.D., born in 1819, was educated at Harrow, at Trinity, Cambridge, and at Exeter College, Oxford, where in 1841 he gained the Hertford, and in 1843 took a first in classics. He married Josephine (1830-1906), daughter of John Grey (q.v.), a prominent advocate of Women's Rights; became vice-principal of Cheltenham College; and was principal of Liverpool College 1867-82, when Mr Gladstone gave him a Winchester canonry. Author of religious, educational, and other works, he died 14th March 1890. See Recollections by his wife (1892) and her Personal Reminiscences of a Great Crusade (on behalf of social purity, 1896).—His brother, HENRY MONTAGU BUTLER, D.D., born at Gayton, 2d July 1833, was educated at Harrow and Trinity, Cambridge, where he was senior classic in 1855. He was head-master of Harrow 1859-85, when he accepted the deanery of Gloucester, to exchange it, however, next year for the mastership of Trinity. In 1888 he married the senior classic of the year before, Miss Ramsay, of Girton College, daughter of Sir James Ramsay of Bamff.

Butler, JAMES. See ORMONDE.

Butler, JOSEPH, one of the most eminent of English divines, was born 18th May 1692 at Wantage, in Berkshire, the youngest of the eight children of a retired draper. With a view to the Presbyterian ministry, he attended a dissenting academy at Gloucester, afterwards at Tewkesbury, where the future Archbishop Secker was his schoolfellow. At twenty-two he gave proof of high metaphysical ability in a letter to Dr Samuel Clarke, and about the same time joined the Church of England, and entered Oriel College, Oxford. He graduated in 1718, and took orders; in the same year he was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel, where he preached those remarkable sermons which he published in 1726. The first three, On Human Nature, constitute one of the most important contributions ever made to moral science—the scope of the reasoning, briefly, that virtue is consonant with, and vice a violation of, man's nature. He became prebendary of Salisbury (1721), and rector of Haughton-le-Skerne near Darlington (1722); in 1725 he was presented to the 'golden rectory' of Stanhope, also in Durham. Here he resided in great retirement till 1733, busy on his Analogy. Secker desired to see him promoted to some more important position, and mentioned his name once to Queen Caroline. The queen thought he had been dead, and asked Archbishop Blackburne. 'No, madam,' said the Archbishop, 'he is not dead, but he is buried.' In 1733 Butler became chaplain to his friend Lord Chancellor Talbot, and in 1736 a prebendary of Rochester, and clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline. In 1736 he published the Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, whose germs were contained in his three sermons, and which has entitled him, in the words of Chalmers, to be called the 'Bacon of theology.' In 1738 he was made Bishop of Bristol, in 1740 Dean of St Paul's; in 1747 he declined the primacy; and in 1750 he was translated to Durham. He died at Bath, 16th June 1752, and was buried in Bristol Cathedral. See the splendid edition of his Works by Mr Gladstone (2 vols. 1896), his Subsidiary Studies on him (1896), and Lives by Bartlett (1839), W. L. Collins (1881), and W. A. Spooner (1902).

Butler, JOSEPHINE. See BUTLER, GEORGE.

Butler, SAMUEL, author of Hudibras, the son of a small farmer, was baptised at Strensham, Worcestershire, 8th February 1612. He was educated at Worcester grammar-school, and 'thence went,' says Wood, 'as his brother, now living, affirms, to the university of Cambridge; yet others of the neighbourhood say to Oxon, but whether true I cannot tell.' As secretary to a Mr Jeffrey, a justice of the Peace, of Earls-Croome, Worcestershire, he is said to have occupied his leisure with music and painting. He was afterwards in the service of the Countess of Kent, and became intimate with Selden. Later, he is said to have been clerk to a Puritan gentleman, Sir Samuel Luke, of Cople Hoo, near Bedford, who is supposed to have sat for Hudibras. After the Restoration he became secretary to the Earl of Carbery, Lord President of Wales, by whom he was appointed steward of Ludlow Castle. About this time he took a wife, whose fortune was lost in ill securities. The first part of Hudibras appeared in 1663, the second in 1664, and the third in 1678. The poem secured immediate popularity, and was a special favourite of Charles II.'s, who, however, rewarded its author with only a solitary grant of three hundred pounds, by Butler distributed among his creditors. From the Earl of Dorset, who introduced Hudibras to the king, he received some kindness; but his best friend was William Longueville of the Temple. He died in Rose Street, Covent Garden, of a consumption, on 25th September 1680, and was buried, at Longueville's expense, in the churchyard of St Paul's, Covent Garden. In 1721 a monument was erected to Butler in Westminster Abbey at the expense of John Barber, a citizen of London. The Posthumous Works (1716) are mainly spurious, but his Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose (1759) were genuine. There is an edition of Butler's works, including his Characters, by A. R. Waller (1905 et seq.).

Butler, SAMUEL (1774-1839), born at Kenilworth, from Rugby passed to St John's College, Cambridge. In 1798-1836 he was head-master of Shrewsbury, then Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. See Life (1896) by his grandson, SAMUEL BUTLER (1835-1902), philosophical satirist, writer on evolution, novelist, painter, and composer, author of Erewhon (1872; 9th ed. 1901), Erewhon Revisited, The Way of All Flesh, &c.

Butler, WALTER (c. 1600-34), an Irish soldier of fortune, the chief agent in Wallenstein's murder, seven months after which he himself died at Schorndorf in Swabia.

Butler, WILLIAM ARCHER (1814-48), religious and philosophical writer, was born at Annerville, near Clonmel. The child of a mixed marriage, he turned Protestant while still a schoolboy at Clonmel, and two years later entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he was appointed professor of Moral Philosophy in 1837.

Butler, SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS (1838-1910), born at Suirville, Tipperary, was educated at Dublin, and became ensign of the 69th regiment in 1858, captain in 1872, a C.B. in 1874, lieutenant-colonel in 1880, a lieutenant-general in 1900, G.C.B. in 1906, and P.C. in 1909. He served on the Red River Expedition (1870-71), on the Ashanti Expedition (1873), in the Sudan (1884-86), and commanded in South Africa in the years 1898-99. He published The Great Lone Land (1872), Wild North Land (1873), Far Out (1880), The Campaign of the Cataracts (1887), Sir Charles Napier (1890), and Sir George Colley (1899). See his Autobiography (1911). In 1877 he married ELIZABETH SOUTHERDEN THOMPSON, battle-painter, born at Lausanne about 1843. She studied drawing at home, in Florence, and in the School of Art, Kensington, from five to sixteen, when she began to paint in oil. After several rejections, her first Academy picture, 'Missing,' was hung in 1873, and in 1874 the 'Roll Call' made her reputation. Later pictures are 'Quatre Bras' (1875), 'Balaklava' (1876), 'Inkermann' (1877, purchased by the Fine Art Society for £3000), 'Listed' (1878), 'Floreat Etona,' 'Scots Greys at Waterloo' (1882), 'The Camel Corps' (1894), and 'On the Morrow of Talavera' (1898). She has illustrated Preludes (1875) by her younger sister, Mrs Alice Meynell. See Art Annual for 1898 by Wilfrid Meynell.

Butt, ISAAC, the first 'Home Ruler,' was the son of the Protestant rector of Stranorlar, and was born at Glenfin, County Donegal, 6th September 1813. Educated at Raphoe and at Trinity College, Dublin, he gained a brilliant reputation for his accomplished scholarship, edited the Dublin University Magazine from 1834 to 1838, and filled the chair of Political Economy from 1836 to 1841. He was called to the Irish bar in 1838, and ere long became a foremost champion of the Conservative cause, actively opposing O'Connell's Repeal Association in 1843. But from 1852 to 1865 he represented Youghal as a 'Liberal Conservative,' and he defended Smith O'Brien and others in the state trials of 1848, as all the Fenian prisoners between 1865 and 1869. In 1871 he was returned for Limerick to lead the Home Rule party in the House of Commons, but soon found, to his mortification, that he could not control the forces he had formed. He died near Dundrum, in County Dublin, 5th May 1879.

Butterfield, WILLIAM (1814-1900), was the architect of Keble College, Oxford; St Augustine's College, Canterbury; the chapel and quadrangle of Rugby; All Saints', Margaret Street, London; and St Albans, Holborn.

Buttmann, PHILIPP (1764-1829), born at Frankfurt, is best known by his Greek grammar (1792; 22d ed. 1869) and Lexilogus (2 vols. 1818-25), both of them translated into English. [Boott'man.]

Butzer, MARTIN. See BUCER.

Buxton, SIR THOMAS FOWELL, philanthropist, was born at Earls Colne, Essex, 1st April 1786. Educated at Kingston, and under Dr Burney at Greenwich, from 1803 to 1807 he studied with brilliant success at Trinity College, Dublin, whilst eagerly following the country sports that were natural to a young Englishman of 6 feet 4. In 1807 he married a sister of Mrs Fry, and in 1808 entered business as a brewer with an energy which in due time was crowned with splendid prosperity. As M.P. for Weymouth from 1818 to 1837 he took a prominent part in every debate on the amelioration of criminal law and prison discipline, suttee abolition, and slave emancipation. In 1824, at Wilberforce's request, he succeeded him as head of the anti-slavery party. Created a baronet in 1840, he died 19th February 1845. See his Memoirs (1848), edited by his third son, CHARLES (1823-71), who sat in parliament as an independent Liberal from 1857, and who, like his father, was a partner in the brewery of Truman, Hanbury, Buxton & Co.

Buxtorf, JOHANN (1564-1629), Hebraist, was born at Kamen, in Westphalia; in 1591 became professor of Hebrew at Basel, and died there of the plague. His Lexicon Chaldaicum, Talmudicum, et Rabbincum was completed by his son (1639), and has been recast by Fischer and Gelbe (2 vols. 1866-74). See Life by Kautzsch (1879).—That son, JOHANN (1599-1664), succeeded to the Hebrew chair, as also did his son, JAKOB (1645-1704), and his nephew, JOHANN (1663-1732). [Boox-torf.]

Byss-Ballot, CHRISTOPH HENRIK DIDRIK (1817-90), meteorologist, the inventor of the aeroklinoscope and of a system of weather signals, was born at Kloetingen in Zealand, and died at Utrecht. [Dize-Bal-lot.]

Byles, SIR JOHN BARNARD (1801-84), judge and legal writer, was born at Stowmarket.

Byng, GEORGE, VISCOUNT TORRINGTON (1668-1733), admiral, was born at Wrotham, Kent, at fifteen entered the navy, and in 1688 recommended himself to William of Orange by his zeal in the cause of the Revolution. Made rear-admiral in 1703, he next year captured Gibraltar, and for his gallant conduct at the sea-fight of Malaga was knighted by Queen Anne. In 1708 he commanded a squadron fitted out to oppose invasion by the Pretender. He pursued the French fleet to the Firth of Forth, took one ship, and forced the rest back to Dunkirk. For his services during the '15 he was created a baronet; and in 1718 he commanded the fleet sent to Sicily, on 31st July utterly destroying the Spanish fleet off Messina. In 1721 he was created Viscount Torrington.—His fourth son, JOHN BYNG, was born in 1704, in 1727 was appointed to a frigate, and served in the Mediterranean. Rear-admiral in 1745, he went in 1747 to the Mediterranean, where the death of Vice-admiral Medley gave him the chief command. In 1756 he was sent with a poorly equipped squadron to relieve Minorca, at that time blockaded by a French fleet. Off the Castle of St Philip on 20th May, he gave the signal to engage the enemy's fleet, almost equal to his own. The van under Rear-admiral West at once bore down on the French ships, but the rear, under Byng, got into some disorder and hardly came within gunshot. The van suffered great loss, and Byng, feeling himself unable to renew the action, sailed away to Gibraltar and left Minorca to its fate. In England the public was furious, and the ministers ordered Byng to be at once brought home under arrest. Acquitted of cowardice or disaffection, he was found guilty of neglect of duty, and condemned to death, but recommended to mercy. The king refused to pardon him, and Byng was shot on board the Monarque at Portsmouth, 14th March 1757, 'to encourage the others,' in Voltaire's phrase.

Byrd, or BIRDE, WILLIAM (1538-1623), composer, studied under Tallis, became organist of Lincoln in 1563, and was appointed a gentleman of Queen Elizabeth's Chapel-royal in 1569. The composer of the first English madrigals (1588), he wrote much sacred music (including the well-known canon Non Nobis, Domine), as well as largely for the virginal.

Byrgius, JUSTUS, or JOST BÜRGI (1552-1633), inventor of celestial globes, was born in the Swiss canton of St Gall, and lived in the service of the learned Landgrave of Hesse and of the Emperor Rudolf II. See Life by Gieswald (Danzig, 1856). [Beer-gi-oos; g hard.]

Byrom, JOHN (1692-1763), poet and stenographer, was born at Broughton, near Manchester. From Merchant Taylors' School he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected a fellow in 1714. He studied medicine at Montpellier, and returned to London to make his bread by teaching a new system of shorthand, but in 1740 he succeeded to the family estates. He was a strong Jacobite. His diary (2 vols. Chetham Soc. 1854-7) gives glimpses of Bentley, Bishop Butler, Samuel Clarke, Wesley, and William Law. His Poems have been edited by A. W. Ward (4 vols. Chetham Soc. 1894-95).

Byron, GEORGE GORDON, sixth Lord Byron of Rochdale, was born in London, 22d January 1788. His mother was Catherine Gordon, heiress of the Gordons of Gight; his father was John Byron, nephew of the fifth or 'wicked' Lord Byron, and son of Admiral John Byron (1723-86), who, sailing with Anson, was wrecked in the Wager, and wrote a classical account of the disaster. The Buruns, or Byrons, appear immediately after the Conquest as holding lands in Lancashire, Nottingham, and Derby; Newstead Abbey was given to Sir John Byron by Henry VIII. at the dissolution. In the 17th century the Byrons were strong royalists, and the Sir John Byron of the day was created Lord Byron of Rochdale in 1643. The fifth or 'wicked' lord (1722-98) killed his cousin, Mr Chaworth, in a duel, sold the great Lancashire estates, was generally unpopular, and seems to have been mad. Captain John Byron, his heir and the poet's father, was at least as great a rascal. He seduced, borrowed money from, eloped with, married, and ill-treated the Marchioness of Carnarthen; the only offspring of this marriage who lived being Augusta, afterwards Mrs Leigh (1782-1851). Next he married Catherine Gordon, whose fortune he spent, and whom he would probably have ill-treated if she had not been at least as great a vixen as he was a rascal.

The poet's early life was mostly passed at Aberdeen. At his grandfather's death in 1798 (the father had fortunately died seven years before), Mrs Byron and her son removed to England, and in 1801 Byron was sent to Harrow. Thence in 1805 he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he spent nearly three years and perpetrated not a few follies. His first work, Hours of Idleness (1807), is probably the worst first book ever written by a considerable poet, and it was savagely 'cut up' in the Edinburgh Review. He published next year a rejoinder, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, an imitative but, in its way, capital Popian satire, and soon afterwards (in June 1809) started for a grand tour. After brief visits to Spain and Malta, he made his way to Greece and the Ægean, where he spent the greater part of two years. This voyage 'made' Byron; it required something absolutely new to awaken his powerful and original faculties. On his return, he found his affairs wretchedly involved. He spoke sometimes in the House of Lords, and went much into society; but he never liked England, where the life was too uniform to suit him. Childe Harold, appearing 20th February 1812, had, before the end of March, run through seven whole editions. Besides smaller pieces, the Giaour and the Bride of Abydos appeared in 1813, the Corsair, Lara, and the Hebrew Melodies in 1814, the Bride of Corinth and Parisina in 1815. During these years he was the darling of society, and the object of the maddest devotion from many women, notably Lady Caroline Lamb. On 2d January 1815, to the surprise of all, he married Anne Isabella Milbanke (1792-1860), heiress in her own right of the barony of Wentworth. His daughter Ada was born in December 1815, and in January 1816 Lady Byron left her husband's house for ever.

Forty-five years after the poet's death, Mrs Beecher Stowe informed the world that Lady Byron (then dead) had informed her that the separation was due to her discovery of a more than sisterly affection between the poet and his sister Augusta. But proof is wholly wanting; and the relations between Lady Byron and Mrs Leigh subsequent to the separation are hopelessly incompatible with the story. Anyhow, Byron was now held up to such obloquy in newspapers and by society, that he left England never to return. He first went up the Rhine to Switzerland, where he met the Shelleys, with whom he connected himself by friendship with the poet, and by a liaison with Jane or Claire Clairmont, Godwin's stepdaughter. Venice was his headquarters for some two years. Here in 1819 he became the accepted lover of the Countess Teresa Guiccioli; and till 1820 he was much in her society at Ravenna. In 1820 he removed to Pisa, and in 1822 to Genoa. Hence he set out in July 1822 to join the movement for recovering the independence of Greece. Weary months, spent chiefly in the Ionian Islands, passed before he could get into active work; at last he landed at Missolonghi on 5th January 1824; laboured against bad weather, disunion among the Greeks, and other checks; caught rheumatic fever, and died on 19th April. His body was brought to England, and buried in the church of Hucknall-Torkard, near Newstead. Allegra (1817-22), Byron's illegitimate daughter by Claire Clairmont, died in a convent to his great grief; his daughter Ada (1815-52) married in 1835 the Earl of Lovelace, and left two children, Lord Wentworth and Lady Anne Blunt.

Byron's literary activity since he left England had been very great. His wife's desertion called forth two short poems, The Dream and Darkness, which were, perhaps, his very finest achievements. In the course of the seven years he completed Childe Harold; wrote a series of dramas or dramatic poems (Manfred, Cain, Marino Faliero, Sardanapalus, &c.), which contain much of his most characteristic work; and produced besides the wonderful bravura of Mazeppa, the cleverness of Beppo, and the vast satiric medley of Don Juan. In his own day, his 'morality' was the principal subject of discussion, and was most harshly judged. More recently the poet's pride and vanity of birth, his alternations of ostentatious prodigality and sharp business practice, his childish vanity of all kinds, have received severe treatment. The English estimate of his literary genius sank from the date of his death. Every competent critic admits Byron's power. For passion of a certain kind, and for picturesqueness of a certain kind, he is almost unequalled. But his work fails utterly when he portrayed anything besides his own personal emotions and experiences, and displays insincerity and theatricality when, in default of actual emotion and experience, he endeavoured to simulate them. The monotony of the Byronic hero is universally admitted. A second great defect is Byron's extraordinary weakness as regards poetic form. Hardly a long passage, certainly no long poem, can be cited which, after brilliant images, forcible expressions, and melodious verse, does not break down into commonplace thought and phrase, inharmonious rhythm, even into sheer bellman's rhyme. This strikes one less in his satirical work. Byron had no humour; but he had a keen and versatile wit. His letters, though somewhat artificial, are of singular excellence. His poetical influence in his own country for a time swept all before it, but it gradually declined, and is now almost non-existent. Abroad it maintained itself. The whole Romantic school in France, Heine to a certain extent in Germany, Pushkin and Lermontoff in Russia, Espronceda in Spain, and Leopardi in Italy, Byronised very markedly. Mr Coleridge has recorded (1900) 113 editions of the poetical works, including 13 German, 7 French, and 2 Russian editions, besides selections. The Life by Thomas Moore (2 vols. 1830) is still the standard one; in it was utilised much of Byron's own Memoirs, the MS. of which had been carefully burnt in 1824. See too, besides works cited under Beecher, Blessington, Guiccioli, Hobhouse, Leigh Hunt, Shelley, and Trelawny, Byron, by Prof. Nichol (1879), and The Real Lord Byron, by J. C. Jeffreys (1883); and the definitive edition of the Works by Prothero and Coleridge (13 vols. 1897-1904).

Byron, HENRY JAMES (1834-84), dramatist, born in Manchester, entered the Middle Temple in 1858, and was for many years a prolific and popular writer of burlesques and extravaganzas. He was the first editor of Fun, and leased several theatres, where he produced more ambitious plays, in which he himself occasionally appeared. The best was Cyril's Success (1868); the most successful Our Boys (1875).

Byström, JOHANN NIKLAS (1783-1848), Swedish sculptor, lived and died in Rome. [Bees-trem.]

CABALLERO, FERNAN, the pen-name of the daughter of Nikolaus Böhl von Faber (1770-1836), a German merchant in Spain, who had married a Spanish wife, and wrote on the history of Spanish literature. Born at Morges, on the Lake of Geneva, in 1797, she spent great part of her childhood in Germany, but returned to Spain in 1813, and in 1814 married a merchant named Planell, whom she accompanied to America. Widowed, she married the Marqués de Arco Hermoso, two years after whose death in 1835 she married an advocate named Arroun, to become a third time a widow in 1863. She died at Seville, April 7, 1877. The first of her fifty romances was La Gaviola (1849); others are Elia, Clemencia, La Familia de Alvareda. Her works (17 vols.) include a collection of Spanish folk-tales and songs. [Ca-val-yai-ro.]

Cabanel, ALEXANDRE (1823-89), painter, was born at Montpellier, and died in Paris.

Cabanis, PIERRE JEAN GEORGES (1757-1808), physician and philosophical writer, born at Cosnac, Charente-Inférieure, attached himself to the popular side in the Revolution. He furnished Mirabeau with material for his speeches on public education; and Mirabeau died in his arms. During the Terror he lived in retirement, and was afterwards a teacher in the medical school at Paris, a member of the Council of Five Hundred, then of the senate. He died near Meulan. His chief work is his once-famous Rapports du Physique et du Moral de l'Homme (1802). [Ca-ba-neess.]

Cabet, ÉTIENNE (1788-1856), communist, was born at Dijon, and died at St Louis, having gone out to Texas in 1847 to found an 'Icarian community,' so named after his Voyage en Icarie (1840), a 'philosophical and social romance,' describing a communistic Utopia. [Ca-bay.]

Cable, GEORGE WASHINGTON, author, was born in New Orleans, October 12, 1844, and at nineteen volunteered into the Confederate service. After the war he earned for some time a precarious living, and, laid up with malarial fever caught at survey work on the Atchafalaya River, began to write for the New Orleans papers. His Creole sketches in Scribner's made his reputation. Among his books are Old Creole Days (1879), The Grandissimes (1880), Madame Delphine (1881), Creoles of Louisiana (1884), The Silent South (1885), The Negro Question (1890), John March, Southerner (1895), The Cavalier (1901), Bylow Hill (1902), and Kincaid's Battery (1908).

Cabot, OF CABOTTO, GIOVANNI, discoverer of the mainland of North America, was a Genoese pilot, who was naturalised at Venice in 1476, and about 1490 settled in Bristol. Under letters-patent from Henry VII. he set sail from Bristol in 1497, with two ships, accompanied by his three sons, and on 24th June sighted Cape Breton Island and Nova Scotia.—His second son, SEBASTIAN, was born probably at Venice in 1474, and is commonly said to have sailed in 1499 with two ships in search of a North-west Passage, following the American coast from 60° to 30° N. lat. According, however, to HARRISSE, this expedition was really commanded by the elder Cabot, for the whole of whose work Sebastian calmly took credit. In 1512 he entered the service of Ferdinand V. of Spain as a cartographer, but returned to England in 1517, where he appears to have been offered by Henry VIII., through Wolsey, the command of an expedition which 'took none effect.' In 1519 Cabot returned to Spain, and, as pilot-major for Charles V., examined in 1526 the coast of Brazil and the Plate River. An attempt to colonise ending in failure, he was imprisoned, and banished for two years to Africa. In 1533 he obtained his former post in Spain; but in 1548, again in England, he was made inspector of the navy by Edward VI., to whom he explained the variation of the magnetic needle. He seems to have died in London in 1557. Of his famous map (1544) a copy exists in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. See Winsor's History of America (1885), and works on the Cabots by Nicholl (1869), HARRISSE (1882-96), STEVENS (1896), DAWSON (1894), WEARE (1897), and BEAZLEY (1898).

Cabral, of CABRERA, PEDRO ALVAREZ, the Portuguese discoverer, in the same year as Pinzon, of Brazil, was born about 1460, and, after Vasco da Gama's first voyage, commanded a fleet of 13 vessels bound for the East Indies. On 9th March 1500 he sailed from Lisbon. To avoid beaching off the coast of Africa, he took a course too far westerly, fell into the South American current of the Atlantic, and was carried to the unknown coast of Brazil, of which, on 25th April, he claimed possession for the king of Portugal. He now sailed for India; but on 29th May four of his vessels foundered, and soon afterwards three more were lost. Cabral therefore landed at Mozambique, on the east coast of Africa, of which he first gave clear information, and, sailing thence to Calicut, established the first commercial treaty between Portugal and India. He returned with a considerable booty to Lisbon, 31st July 1501.

Cabrera, DON RAMON (1810-77), a Carlist leader in 1833-40 and 1848-49, was born at Tortosa, and died at Wentworth, near Staines, having married a wealthy English lady. In 1839 Don Carlos created him Count of Morella. [Ca-bral'ra.]

Cadbury, the name of a firm of cocoa-manufacturers who began business in 1860 with 12 workmen, and now employ several thousand hands, at Bourneville, a suburb of Birmingham, amply provided with libraries, baths, reading-rooms, girls' gardens, sick-homes, &c. for the Cocoa Colony.

Cade, JACK, leader of the insurrection of 1450, was by birth an Irishman. He had murdered a woman in Sussex, had fled to France, and served awhile against England, and then had settled in Kent as a physician, and married a squire's daughter. Assuming the name of Mortimer, and the title of Captain of Kent, he marched on London with upwards of 15,000 followers, and encamped at Blackheath. On 2d July he entered London, where for two days he maintained strict order, though he forced the Lord Mayor to pass judgment on Lord Say, one of the king's detested favourites, whose head Cade's men straightway cut off in Cheapside. On the third day some houses were plundered; and that night the citizens held London Bridge. A promise of pardon now sowed dissension among the insurgents; they dispersed, and a price was set upon Cade's head. He attempted to reach the coast, but was followed by one Alexander Iden, a squire of Kent, who on 12th July killed him in a garden near Heathfield in Sussex. See an English monograph by KRIEHN (Strasb. 1892).

Cadell, FRANCIS (1822-79), born at Cockenzie, became an East India midshipman, and in 1850-59 explored the Murray River and its tributaries. He was murdered by a mutinous crew when sailing from Amboyna to the Kei Islands.

Cadell, ROBERT (1788-1849), from 1811 partner in the Edinburgh publishing-house of Constable & Co., after whose failure in 1825 he began business again, and realised a handsome fortune by his editions of Scott's works.

Cademosto, ALOYS DA (c. 1432-80), who was born and died in Venice, in 1455, for Prince Henry the Navigator, undertook a voyage to the Canaries and as far as the mouth of the Gambia; in 1456 he made a second voyage to Senegambia.

Cadogan, WILLIAM (1675-1726), an Irish general, who served under Marlborough, and was created Baron Cadogan in 1716, Earl Cadogan in 1718.—GEORGE HENRY, the fifth Earl (b. 12th May 1840), in 1895-1902 was the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland. [Kad-ugan.]

Cad'oudal, GEORGES (1771-1804), was born, a miller's son, near Auray in Lower Brittany, from 1793 to 1800 led the royalist Chouans against the republicans, and was guillotined for conspiring, with Pichegru, against Napoleon. See a work by his nephew (Par. 1887).

Cadwaladr, a Welsh prince, who, blinded by Irish pirates, resisted Henry II., and died in 1172.

Cædmon, the first English poet of known name, died about 680 A.D. Bede tells us that, unlearned till mature in years (later accounts make him a cowherd), he became aware in a semi-miraculous manner that he was called to exercise the gift of religious poetry, was educated, became a monk at Whitby, and spent the rest of his life in composing poems on the Bible histories and on religious subjects. The 'Paraphrase' ascribed to Cædmon is extant in a single MS. of the 10th century in the Bodleian, consisting of 229 folio pages, 212 of which contain the account of the creation and the story of Genesis down to the offering of Isaac, the Exodus of Israel, and part of the book of Daniel; the remaining pages comprise a poem of Christ and Satan. It is certain that this poetry, at least in its present form, is due to various authors, and probably to different times. The extant MS. was presented by Archbishop Ussher to Francis Junius, by whom it was printed at Amsterdam in 1655. Whether any part of the extant paraphrase is the work of Bede's poet is extremely doubtful. The fine Northumbrian poem known as 'The Dream of the Holy Rood,' part of which is inscribed in runic letters on the Ruthwell cross, the whole being found in a MS. at Vercelli, was formerly ascribed to Cædmon. The Paraphrase has been edited by Thorpe (1832-33), by Bouterwek (1849-54), and in Grimm-Walker's Bibliothek der angelsächsischen Poesie (vol. ii. Leip. 1894). [Kad'mon.]

Cæsalpinus. See CESALPINO.

Cæsar, CAIUS (OR GAIUS) JULIUS, son of a Roman prætor, was born 12th July 102 B.C. His aunt was wife of Marius; and in 83 B.C. Julius himself married Cornelia, daughter of Cinna, and thus incurring the wrath of Cinna's enemy, Sulla, went to Asia (81) till Sulla's death (78). Elected pontifex in 74, he became the leader of the democratic party in overthrowing Sulla's constitution (70). After a year in Spain as quaestor, he married Pompeia (67), a relative of Pompey. In 65, as curule ædile, he lavished vast sums of money on games and public buildings, and was subsequently pontifex maximus and prætor. There is some ground for believing he was indirectly concerned in Catiline's conspiracy. In 61 he obtained the province of Hispania Ulterior, and on his return he was elected consul. With rare tact and sagacity he reconciled Pompey and Crassus, and formed with them the First Triumvirate (60 B.C.). Cæsar gave Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage, while he married Calpurnia. Next he obtained the province of Gallia Cisalpina, Gallia Transalpina, and Illyricum; and passing into Gaul (58) for nine years conducted those splendid campaigns by which he completed the subjugation of the West to Rome. In his first campaign he vanquished the Helvetii and Ariovistus; in 57 the Belgic confederacy and the Nervii; and in 56 the Veneti and other peoples of Brittany and Normandy. He next drove two invading German tribes across the Rhine; and (55 B.C.) invaded Britain. In 54, on a second invasion of Britain, he crossed the Thames, and enforced at least the nominal submission of the south-east of the island. On his return to Gaul, he was himself defeated by the rebellious Eburones, but exacted a terrible vengeance on their leaders. Visiting northern Italy, he had hastily to return in midwinter to quell a general rebellion, headed by young Vercingetorix. The struggle was severe; at Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, Cæsar was defeated. But by the capture of Alesia (52) he crushed the united armies of the Gauls. In the meantime Crassus had fallen in Asia (53), and Pompey gone over to the aristocrats. Under his direction the senate called upon Cæsar, now in Cisalpine Gaul, to resign his command and disband his army, and intrusted Pompey with large powers. His forces far outnumbered Cæsar's legions, but they were scattered over the empire. Enthusiastically supported by his victorious troops, Cæsar crossed the Rubicon (a small stream which separated his province from Italy Proper), and moved swiftly southwards. Pompey fled to Brundisium, pursued by Cæsar, and thence to Greece (49); and in three months Cæsar was master of all Italy. After subduing Pompey's legates in Spain, he was appointed dictator. Pompey had gathered in Egypt, Greece, and the East a powerful army, while his fleet swept the sea. Cæsar, crossing the Adriatic, was driven back with heavy loss from Dyrrhachium. But in a second battle at Pharsalia, 9th August 48 B.C., the senatorial army was utterly routed, and Pompey himself fled to Egypt, where he was murdered.

Cæsar, again appointed dictator for a year, and consul for five years, instead of returning to Rome, went to Egypt, where out of love for Cleopatra (who subsequently bore him a son) he engaged in the successful 'Alexandrine War' (47). He overthrew a son of Mithridates in Pontus, and, after a short stay in Rome, routed the Pompeian generals, Scipio and Cato, at Thapsus (April 6, 46 B.C.) in Africa. After his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa had been celebrated by four great triumphs, he had still, spite of his wise and noble generosity, to quell an insurrection in Spain by Pompey's sons.

He now received the title of 'Father of his Country,' and also of imperator, was made dictator for life, and consul for ten years; his person was declared sacred, and even divine; his statue was placed in the temples; his portrait was struck on coins; and the month Quintilis was called Julius in his honour. He proposed to make a digest of the whole Roman law, to found libraries, to drain the Pontine Marshes, to enlarge the harbour of Ostia, to dig a canal through the Isthmus of Corinth, and to quell the inroads of the barbarians on the eastern frontiers; but in the midst of these vast designs he was cut off by assassination on the Ides (15th) of March 44 B.C. The alleged motive of the sixty conspirators—mostly aristocrats, headed by Brutus and Cassius—was that Cæsar was aiming at a hereditary monarchy. Cæsar was of a noble presence, tall, thin-featured, bald, and close-shaven. As general and statesman he takes a foremost place in the annals of the world; and excepting Cicero, he was the greatest orator of his time. As a historian, he has never been surpassed in simplicity, directness, and dignity. He was, in addition, a mathematician, philologist, jurist, and architect. The main outcome of his life-work was the transformation of the Roman republic into a government under a single ruler. Of Cæsar's works the Commentaries on the Gallic and Civil wars alone have been preserved. See the Roman histories of Merivale, Arnold, Mommsen, and Ihne, and works on Cæsar by Napoleon III. (1865-66), Froude (1879), Stoffel (Par. 1888-91), W. W. Fowler (1892), and T. G. Dodge (1893).

Cæsar, SIR JULIUS (1558-1636), judge, was born at Tottenham, the son of Cesare Adelmare, physician to Queen Mary. He was appointed judge of the Admiralty Court in 1584, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1606, and Master of the Rolls in 1614. He sat in six parliaments, and was knighted in 1603.

Caffarelli, the stage name of Gaetano Majorano (1703-83), a great Neapolitan castrato singer.

Caffyn, KATHLEEN MANNINGTON ('Iota'), author of A Yellow Aster (1894) and other novels.

Cagliari, PAOLO. See VERONESE. [Cal'ya.]

Cagliostro, COUNT ALESSANDRO DI, charlatan, was born at Palermo, 8th June 1743, of poor parentage, his true name Giuseppe Balsamo. When thirteen years old he ran away from school, and was afterwards sent to the monastery of Caltagirone, where he became assistant to the apothecary, and picked up his scanty knowledge of chemistry and medicine. He soon made the monastery too hot for him, and, after leading for a time the loosest life in Palermo, in 1769 he set out to seek his fortune, and, in company with the Greek sage Althotas, is vaguely represented as travelling in parts of Greece, Egypt, and Asia. At Rome he married a very pretty woman, Lorenza Feliciani, who became a skilful accomplice in his schemes; and in 1771 the pair set out on their wanderings, visiting Germany, London, Paris, Spain, Courland, St Petersburg, Warsaw, and where not else. Successful alike as physician, philosopher, alchemist, and necromancer, he carried on a lively business in his 'elixir of immortal youth,' founded lodges of 'Egyptian freemasons,' and at Paris in 1785 played a part in the affair of the Diamond Necklace, which lodged him for a while in the Bastille. In May 1789 he revisited Rome; on 20th December the Inquisition detected him founding 'some feeble ghost of an Egyptian lodge.' He was imprisoned, and condemned to death for freemasonry. His sentence was commuted to life-imprisonment in the fortress of San Leone, near Urbino. He died 28th August 1795. Such is the ordinarily received account, made familiar by Carlyle's Miscellanies; but for difficulties in identifying Cagliostro with Balsamo and other points, see Trowbridge's Cagliostro (1910). His Mémoires (1785) are not authentic. [Cal-yos'tro.]

Cagniard de la Tour, BARON CHARLES (1777-1859), a French physicist. [Can-yar'.]

Cagnola, LUIGI, MARCHESE (1762-1833), an architect, born at Milan, whose masterwork is the triumphal Arco della Pace (1807-38), of white marble, in Milan. [Can-yo-la.]

Calliaud, FRÉDÉRIC (1787-1869), traveller in Egypt, the White Nile region, &c., was born and died at Nantes, where in 1827 he became keeper of the Natural History Museum. [Ca-ee-yo'.]

Callié, RENÉ (1799-1839), who in 1827-28 by his adventurous journey from Sierra Leone to Timbuctoo and Tangier gained a prize of 10,000 francs and a yearly pension of 1000, was born at Mauzé in Poitou, and died near Paris. See Life by Goepf (Par. 1885). [Ca-yay.]

Cain, AUGUSTE NICOLAS (1822-94), animal sculptor, was born and died in Paris. [Ca-an'.]

Caine, THOMAS HENRY HALL, novelist, was born (of Manx blood on his father's side) at Runcorn, 14th May 1853, and was trained as an architect, but gradually passed to journalism (on the Liverpool Mercury) and literature. His works include Recollections of Rossetti (1882), Shadow of a Crime (1885), Son of Hagar (1886), The Deemster: a Romance of the Isle of Man (1887; dramatised as Ben-my-Chree), The Bondman (1890), The Scapegoat (1891; a tale of Jews in Morocco), The Manxman (1894), The Christian (1897; dramatised), The Eternal City (1901), and The Prodigal Son (1904).

Caine, WILLIAM SPROSTON (1842-1903), temperance reformer and (from 1886) Liberal M.P., was born at Seacombe, Cheshire.

Caird, SIR JAMES, born at Stranraer in 1816, published High Farming the Best Substitute for Protection (1849) and English Agriculture in 1850-51 (1852), which has been translated into German, French, and Swedish. He sat in parliament as a Liberal 1857-65, and in 1864 obtained a grant for the publication of agricultural statistics. Appointed chairman of the Royal Commission on Sea Fisheries in 1863, he was made a K.C.B. in 1882. He died 9th February 1892.

Caird, JOHN, a great Scottish preacher, born at Greenock in Dec. 1820, studied at Glasgow, and became minister at Newton-upon-Ayr (1845), Edinburgh (1847), Errol in Perthshire (1849), and Glasgow (1857). His Religion in Common Life, preached before the Queen at Crathie in 1855, quickly carried his fame throughout the Protestant world; Dean Stanley said it was the greatest single sermon of the century. He received the degree of D.D. in 1860, was appointed professor of Divinity in 1862, and was Principal of Glasgow University 1873-98. He died 30th July 1898. He published Sermons (1858); An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion (1880), which revealed a strong Neo-Hegelian leaning; Spinoza (1888).—His brother, EDWARD, was born 22d March 1835. From Glasgow he passed as a Snell exhibitioner to Balliol College, Oxford, and became in 1864 fellow and tutor at Merton. In 1866 he was appointed professor of Moral Philosophy at Glasgow University; from 1893 to 1907, when he resigned, he was master of Balliol. His works are a Critical Account of the Philosophy of Kant (1877), Hegel (1883), The Social Philosophy and Religion of Comte (1885), The Evolution of Religion (1893), &c. He died 1st November 1908.

Cairnes, JOHN ELLIOT, economist, was born at Castle Bellingham, County Louth, 26th December 1823. He was placed in his father's brewery; but, much against his father's will, went to Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1848. In 1856 he was appointed professor of Political Economy at Dublin, in 1859 at Queen's College, Galway, and in 1866 at University College, London. An accident in the hunting-field in 1860 led to a breakdown in health; and, having resigned his chair in 1872, he died at Blackheath, 8th July 1875. His ten works include Character and Logical Method of Political Economy (1857), The Slave Power (1862), Essays on Political Economy (1873), and Some Leading Principles of Political Economy (1874). Cairnes may be regarded as a disciple of Mill, though differing from him on many points; he is second only to him among recent English economists.

Cairns, HUGH MACCALMONT CAIRNS, EARL, was born in County Down, Ireland, in December 1819, and educated at Belfast and Trinity College, Dublin. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1844, entered parliament for Belfast in 1852, and quickly made his mark in the House as a debater. He became Q.C. in 1856, in 1858 Solicitor-general, in 1866 Attorney-general under Lord Derby and a judge of appeal, and in 1867 Baron Cairns. Under Disraeli he was made Lord Chancellor in 1868, and again in 1874, and was created Viscount Garmoye and Earl Cairns in 1878. For some years he led the Conservatives in the Upper House. He died at Bournemouth, 2d April 1885. He prepared measures for simplifying the transfer of land, and projected that fusion of law and equity which was carried out by Lord Selborne. He took an active interest in all philanthropic schemes.

Cairns, JOHN, D.D., L.L.D., theologian, was born at Aytun Law, Berwickshire, 23d August 1818, was a distinguished student at Edinburgh, and was ordained at Berwick in 1845, where he remained till 1876, having from 1867 been professor of Theology in the United Presbyterian Church. He became principal in 1879. Dr Cairns, who was an eminent preacher, published the Memoir of Dr John Brown (1860), and Unbelief in the 18th Century (1881). He died 12th March 1892. See Life by MacEwen (1895).

Caroli, BENEDETTO (1825-89), Italian statesman, born in Pavia. In youth a revolutionary and a Garibaldian, he was in 1878 and 1879 radical prime-minister of Italy.

Caius, DR JOHN, physician and scholar, was born at Norwich, 6th October 1510, Caius (pronounced Keys) being a Latinised form of Kayes or Keys. He entered Gonville Hall, Cambridge, in 1529, and in 1533 was elected a fellow thereof, having just before been appointed principal of Fiswick's Hostel. In 1539 he went abroad, in 1541 was created an M.D. of Padua; returning to England in 1544, he lectured on anatomy in London, then practised at Shrewsbury and Norwich. In 1547 he was admitted a fellow of the College of Physicians, of which he was subsequently nine times elected president. He also became physician to Edward VI., Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. Gonville Hall, founded in 1348 by Edmund Gonville, rector of Thelmetham, Suffolk (d. 1351), was by Caius in 1557 elevated into a college, which took the name of Gonville and Caius College, and of which in 1559 he became master. A loyal Catholic, he had great trouble with his Protestant fellows, who buried his mass vestments, and whom in return he put in the stocks. He died 29th July 1573. He was author of A Boke or Councell against the Sweatyng Sicknesse (1552), and of other works (collected in 1912) on subjects critical, antiquarian, and scientific.

Cajetan, CARDINAL (1469-1534), properly Thomas de Vio, born at Gaeta, in 1508 became general of the Dominicans, in 1517 cardinal, in 1519 bishop of Gaeta, and in 1523 legate to Hungary. In 1518 he sought to induce Luther to recant at Augsburg. He died at Rome.

Calamé, ALEXANDRE (1810-64), a Swiss painter of Alpine scenery, born at Vevay, died at Mentone. See monograph by Rambert (Par. 1884).

Calamy, EDMUND, Puritan divine, was born in London in 1600; studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (1616-19); and afterwards became domestic chaplain to Felton, Bishop of Ely. In 1626 he was appointed lecturer at Bury St Edmunds, but resigned when the order to read the Book of Sports was enforced (1636); in 1639 he was chosen minister of St Mary Aldermanbury, London. He had a principal share in Smectymnus (1641), a reply to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy. He disapproved of the execution of Charles, and of Cromwell's protectorate, and was one of the deputation to Charles II. in Holland. His services were recognised by a royal chaplaincy and the offer of the bishopric of Coventry and Lichfield, which he refused through conscientious scruples (his wife's, according to Tillotson). Ejected for nonconformity in 1662, he continued to attend service in his old church, till heart-broken by the Great Fire, he died 29th October 1666. He published nineteen sermons, &c.—One of his five sons, Dr BENJAMIN CALAMY (1642-86), rose to be a prebendary of St Paul's, and published A Discourse about a Scrupulous Conscience, dedicated to Judge Jeffreys; another, EDMUND (1635-85), was ejected for nonconformity. His son, EDMUND CALAMY, D.D. (1671-1732), studied three years at Utrecht, and, declining Carstares' offer of a Scotch professorship, from 1694 was a Nonconformist minister in London. He visited Scotland in 1709, when Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Aberdeen all conferred degrees on him. His forty-one works include Account of the Ejected Ministers (1702) and an interesting Autobiography, first published in 1829.

Calas, JEAN (1698-1762), a tradesman of Toulouse, who was broken on the wheel on the monstrous charge of having murdered his eldest son (who had hanged himself), 'because he had contemplated conversion to Catholicism.' A revision of the trial followed, and the parliament at Paris in 1765 declared Calas and all his family innocent. Louis XV. gave them 30,000 livres, but neither the parliament of Toulouse nor the fanatical monks were ever brought to account. See Voltaire's Sur la Tolérance; a French monograph by Coquerel (2d ed. 1870), a German one by Dryander (1887); and essays by Mark Pattison (1889) and Kegan Paul (1891). [Ca-lah']

Calcraft, WILLIAM (1800-79), shoemaker and, from 1829 to 1874, hangman, was born at Baddow, near Chelmsford.

Caldara, ANTONIO (1670-1736), composer, was born in Venice, and died in Vienna. [Cal-dah'ra.]

Caldara, POLIDORO. See CARAVAGGIO.

Caldecott, RANDOLPH, an artist and book-illustrator, unrivalled as an exponent of the humours of animal life and the joys of the country-house and hunting-field, was born at Chester, 22d March 1846. A clerk in a bank, first at Hitchchurch (1861-67) and then at Manchester (1867-72), he had early developed a talent for art, and was encouraged by his success in the London illustrated papers to remove to the metropolis. His health, however, gave way, and after vain attempts to restore it by trips abroad, he died at St Augustine, Florida, 12th February 1886. See Memoir by Blackburn (1886).

Calderon, DON SERAFIN ESTÉBANEZ (1801-67), Spanish poet and historian, a native of Malaga. See Life by his nephew (2 vols. Madr. 1883).

Calderon, PHILIP HERMOGENES (1833-98), painter, was born at Poitiers, the son of a Spanish Protestant refugee who wrote Cervantes Vindicado (1854), &c. Brought to England in 1846, he studied in London and Paris, and regularly contributed to the Royal Academy from 1853, his subjects being chiefly historical or imaginative. Elected an A.R.A. in 1864, an R.A. in 1867, he became in 1887 keeper of the Royal Academy.

Calderon de la Barca, PEDRO, Spain's greatest dramatist, was born of good family at Madrid, 17th January 1600. After schooling under the Jesuits, he studied law and philosophy at Salamanca (1613-19), and during ten years' service in the Milanese and in Flanders saw much of men and manners that he afterwards utilised. On Lope's death in 1635, he was summoned by Philip IV. to Madrid, and appointed a sort of master of the revels. In 1640 the rebellion in Catalonia roused him once more to take the field; but in 1651 he entered the priesthood, and in 1653 withdrew to Toledo. Ten years went by, and he was recalled to court and to the resumption of his dramatic labours, receiving, with other preferments, the post of chaplain of honour to Philip; and he continued to write for the court, the church, and the public theatres till his death, 25th May 1681. Castilian and Catholic to the backbone, Calderon wrote for his contemporaries, his fellow-countrymen, his co-religionists. Posterity and the outer world must fail to appreciate his perfect fidelity to the Spanish thought and manners of his age; his passion seems to them bombast, his nice points of honour fantastic, and his plots a very labyrinth for intricacy. This, though Schlegel pronounced him 'the fourth in a mighty quater-nion, with Homer, Dante, and Shakespeare.' His autos sacramentales, outdoor plays for the festival of Corpus Christi, number 72, and have been divided into seven classes—biblical, classical, ethical, 'cloak and sword plays,' dramas of passion, and so forth; the finest of them is El Divino Orfeo. Of his regular dramas 118 are extant. About a score of them are known to English readers through the renderings of one or more of the following translators: Shelley (a fine fragment from The Magician); Denis M'Carthy (10 plays, 1853-73); Edward FitzGerald (8 plays, 1853 et seq.); Archbishop Trench (2 plays, with essay on 'Life and Genius,' 1856; 2d ed. 1880). The best edition of the autos is that of Apontes (1760), and of the plays those by Hartzenbusch (1850), Garcia Ramon (1882), and Maccoll (four plays, 1888). See Ticknor's Spanish Literature (1849), and Miss Hasell's Calderon ('Foreign Classics' series, 1879). [Cal-day-roan'.]

Calderwood, DAVID (1575-1650), ecclesiastical historian, was probably born at Dalkeith, and, after studying at Edinburgh, was in 1604 ordained minister of Crailing, Roxburghshire. In 1617 he joined in a protest against granting the power of framing new church laws to an ecclesiastical council appointed by the king, and was imprisoned and banished. In Holland he published (1625) the Altare Damascenum against Episcopacy. After King James's death (1625), he returned to Scotland, and spent years in collecting materials for a history of the Church of Scotland. In 1640 he became minister of Peucaitland. His History of the Kirk of Scotland was printed for the Wodrow Society (8 vols. 1842-45).

Calderwood, HENRY, born at Peebles in 1830, from 1856 to 1868 was minister of Greyfriars, Glasgow, and then became professor of Moral Philosophy at Edinburgh. He died in Edinburgh, 19th November 1897. He was the author of The Philosophy of the Infinite (1854), Moral Philosophy (1872), Mind and Brain (1879), Evolution and Man (1893), Vocabulary of Philosophy (1894), David Hume (1898), &c. See Life by his son and by the Rev. D. Woodside (1898).

Caldwell, ANNE. See MARSH, Mrs.

Calepino, AMBROGIO (1435-1511), an Augustinian monk, born at Bergaino, compiled a polyglot dictionary.

Calhoun, JOHN CALDWELL, a statesman of Irish Presbyterian descent, was born in Abbeville County, South Carolina, March 18, 1782, studied at Yale, and became a successful lawyer. In congress he supported the measures which led to the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain, and promoted the protective tariff. In 1817 he joined Monroe's cabinet as Secretary of War, and did good work in reorganising the war department. He was vice-president under John Q. Adams (1825-29), and then under Jackson. In 1829 he declared that a state can nullify unconstitutional laws; and his Address to the People of South Carolina (1831) set forth his theory of state rights. On the passing by South Carolina in 1832 of the nullification ordinance he resigned the vice-presidency, and entered the senate, becoming a leader of the states-rights movement, and a champion of the interests of the slave-holding states. In 1844, as Secretary of State, he signed a treaty annexing Texas; but once more in the senate, he strenuously opposed the war of 1846-47 with Mexico. He died at Washington, March 31, 1850. He, Henry Clay, and Daniel Webster were 'the great triumvirate' of American political orators. See the Life by R. S. Jenkins (1851); his collected works (6 vols. 1853-54), with a Life by Crallé; and H. von Holst's John C. Calhoun (1882). [Cal-hoon'.]

Calig'ula, CAIUS CESAR AUGUSTUS GERMANICUS, Roman emperor, the youngest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born at Antium, August 31, 12 A.D. Educated in the camp, he was nicknamed Caligula from his soldier's boots (caligæ). He ingratiated himself with Tiberius, and, on his death or murder in 37 A.D., was found to have been appointed co-heir along with the emperor's grandson; the senate, however, conferred imperial power on Caligula alone. At first he seemed lavishly generous; but when illness, the result of his vicious life, had weakened his faculties, the lower qualities of his nature obtained the complete mastery. Besides squandering in one year the enormous wealth left by Tiberius (£5,625,000), he banished or murdered his relatives, excepting his uncle Claudius and sister Drusilla (with whom he carried on incestuous intercourse); filled Rome with executions and confiscations; amused himself while dining by having victims tortured and slain in his presence; and uttered the hideous wish that all the Roman people had but one neck, that he might strike it off at a blow! His favourite horse he made a member of the college of priests and consul. Finally, he had declared himself a god, when he was assassinated, January 24, 41 A.D.

Calixtus, the name of three popes: CALIXTUS or CALLISTUS I. (from 218 to 222 A.D.), according to Hippolytus, his bitter opponent, was originally a slave, and had twice undergone severe punishment for his crimes before he became a priest under Zephyrinus, whom he succeeded.—CALIXTUS II. (1119-24), formerly Guido, Archbishop of Vienne, in 1121 overcame the antipope Burdinus (Gregory VIII.), who was supported by the emperor Henry V., and in 1122 concluded with the emperor the concordat of Worms, which settled the Investiture Controversy.—CALIXTUS III. (1455-58), formerly Alfonso de Borja (Ital. Borgia), born at Jativa in Spain, was successively counsellor to Alfonso V. of Aragon, Bishop of Valencia, and cardinal. He laboured in vain to organise a crusade against the Turks, and raised to the cardinalate his nephew, Rodrigo Borgia (afterwards Alexander VI.). The name Calixtus III. was also assumed by an antipope whom Frederick Barbarossa set up in 1168 against Alexander III.

Calixtus, GEORG (properly Callisen), Lutheran theologian, was born, 14th December 1586, at Medelbye in Sleswick, and from 1603 to 1609 studied at Helmstedt, where, after travelling for four years in Germany, Belgium, England, and France, he became professor of theology. Although acknowledged by learned Romanists to be one of their ablest opponents, he was, for some statements in his work De Præcipuis Religiosis Christianæ Capitibus (1613) which seemed favourable to Catholic dogmas, and of others in his Epitome Theologiæ Moralis (1634) and De Tolerantia Reformatorum (1658) which approached too near to the Calvinistic standpoint, declared guilty of abominable heresy. Having stated subsequently that the doctrine of the Trinity was less distinctly taught in the Old than in the New Testament, and having finally, at the conference of Thorn in 1645, been on more intimate terms with the Calvinistic than the Lutheran theologians, he was accused of apostasy. His friends in Brunswick, however, stood firmly by him, and he retained his chair till his death on 19th March 1656. See Henke, Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit (1853-60).

Calkin, JAMES (1786-1862), composer, was born and died in London, and for thirty years was organist to the Regent Square Church.

Callcott, JOHN WALL (1766-1821), composer, was born at Kensington, and abandoning medicine for music, in 1785 was made Mus. Bac., in 1800 Mus. Doc. of Oxford. In 1806 he published his Musical Grammar; the year after, his mind gave way. He recovered in 1812, but only for four years. He was especially celebrated for his glees. The best of these were published in 1824, with a memoir by his son-in-law, W. Horsley.—His brother, SIR AUGUSTUS WALL CALLCOTT (1779-1844), was born at Kensington, and for six years was a chorister at Westminster. In 1799 he exhibited a portrait at the Academy, and from 1804 devoted himself to landscape-painting. He became an A.R.A. in 1806, an R.A. in 1810, and was knighted in 1837. In 1827 he married Maria, daughter of Admiral Dundas, and widow of Capt. Graham, R.N. Lady Callcott (1785-1842) wrote Little Arthur's History of England and fourteen less-known works.

Callim'achus, an Alexandrian poet, gramm-rian, and critic of the 3d century B.C., was born at Cyrene in Libya, and became head of the Alexandrian Library. The mere fragments that represent most of his eight hundred works have been edited by O. Schneider (2 vols. 1870-73); his six extant Hymns and sixty-four Epigrams by Meineke (1861) and Wilamowitz (1882).

Callisthenes of OLYNTHUS, a kinsman and pupil of Aristotle, devoted himself to natural and political history, and accompanied Alexander the Great in his expedition to India. His bold outspoken ways led to his being put to death on a pretended charge of treason, 328 B.C. Only a few fragments of his historic works remain, and these are not valuable. The History of Alexander ascribed to him belongs to the 2d or 3d century A.D., and is much more romance than history. See Westermann, De Callisthene (Leip. 1838-42).

Callistratus, an Athenian orator, whose eloquence is said to have fired the imagination of the youthful Demosthenes. For his Spartan sympathies he was condemned to death in 361 B.C., and on his return from exile in Macedonia, was actually executed. Another Callistratus was a grammarian and critic.

Callistus. See HIPPOLYTUS.

Callot, JACQUES, engraver, was born at Nancy in 1594, and early devoted himself to art in opposition to his father's wishes. A boy of twelve, he attached himself to a band of Gypsies, and wandered with them to Florence; thence a gentleman sent him on to Rome, where, however, some Nancy merchants recognised him, and induced him to return home. He twice revisited Italy, and the second time (about 1612) became Thomassin's pupil at Rome in drawing and engraving; afterwards he repaired to Florence, where, by numerous spirited etchings, he gained great fame. In 1621 he returned to Nancy, there to be favourably received by the Duke of Lorraine. For Louis XIII., who invited him to Paris, he executed etchings of the siege of Rochelle, but refused to commemorate the capture of his native town. He died in Paris, 28th March 1635. His activity as an artist was marvellous. His 1600 realistic engravings are invaluable from the vivid light they cast on the manners of the 17th century. His 'Miseries of War,' and his 'Gypsies,' are especially celebrated. See works on him by H. Green (1804), Thausing (Vienna, 1881), Meaume (Nancy, 1860), Dumast (Nancy, 1875), Houssaye (Par. 1875), Vachon (Par. 1886), and Bouchot (Par. 1890). [Cal-loh.]

Calmet, AUGUSTINE, born at Mesnil-la-Horgne, near Commercy, February 26, 1672, entered the Benedictine order in 1689, and was successively appointed teacher of philosophy in the Abbey Moyen-Montier (1698), sub-prior at Münster in Alsace (1704), prior at Lay (1715), abbot of St Leopold (1718), and abbot of Senones in Lorraine (1728). He died at Paris, October 25, 1757. His writings, commended by both Roman Catholics and Protestants, include Commentary on the Bible (23 vols. Paris, 1707-16), Historical and Critical Dictionary of the Bible (4 vols. 1722-28), History of the Bible and of the Jews (2 vols. 1718), Universal History (17 vols. 1735-71), and History of Lorraine (4 vols. 1728). See Lives by Digot (Nancy, 1861), and Guillaume (ib. 1875). [Cal-may.]

Calomar de, DON FRANCISCO TADEO, DUKE (1773-1842), a reactionary Spanish statesman, who died in exile at Toulouse.

Calonne, CHARLES ALEXANDRE DE (1734-1802), born at Douay, studied law, and in 1783 was made Controller-general of Finance. As such he gained favour among the courtiers, who had complained of Turgot and Necker, by showering on them sums obtained by borrowing and increased taxation. In 1786, when the people could bear this no longer, Calonne advised the king to convoke the Assembly of the Notables, and distribute the burden of taxation more equally. In opening the Assembly (1787), he described the general prosperity of France, but confessed that the annual deficit of the treasury had risen to 115 million francs, and that during 1776-86 the government had borrowed 1250 millions! The Notables demanded a statement of accounts; and failing to satisfy them, he was banished to Lorraine. After this, he resided chiefly in England, until in 1802 Bonaparte permitted him to return. He died very poor. [Cal-on.]

Calovius, or KALAU, ABRAHAM (1612-86), Lutheran controversialist, was born at Mohrun-gen in East Prussia, and became successively professor at Königsberg (1637), preacher at Danzig (1643), and professor at Wittenberg (1650). He was six times married.

Calprenède, GAUTIER DES COSTES DE LA (1610-63), officer of the guards and royal chamberlain of France, wrote tragedies, tragi-comedies, and the clever but tedious 'heroic romances,' Cléopâtre, Cassandre, &c. [Calp'r-nèhd.]

Calpurnius Siculus, TITUS, a Latin bucolic poet of the middle of the 1st c. A.D. His Eclogues are in Postgate's Corpus (1904), and were translated by E. J. L. Scott (1891).

Calvaert, DENIS (c. 1540-1619), called also DIONISIO FIAMMINGO, painter, was born at Antwerp, and settled at Bologna. There he opened a school, among whose students were Guido Reni, Domenichino, and Albani, who afterwards, however, were pupils of the Caracci. [Cal-vahrt.]

Calvé, EMMA, a French operatic singer, born in 1866, made her début at Brussels in 1882, and appeared in London in 1892.

Calverley, CHARLES STUART, prince of parodists, was the son of the Rev. Henry Blayds (who in 1852 took the name of Calverley), and was born at Martley, 22d Dec. 1831. From Harrow he passed to Balliol, Oxford, but migrated in 1852 to Christ's, Cambridge. He graduated as second classic in 1856, in 1858 was elected a fellow, and in 1865 was called to the bar, and settled in London. A fall on the ice in the winter of 1866-67 put an end to a brilliant career; and he died at Folkestone, 17th Feb. 1884. One of the most gifted men of his time, and unrivalled as a humorist, Calverley will be remembered by his two little volumes, Verses and Translations (1862) and Fly Leaves (1872), whose gem, 'Butter and Eggs,' appeared first in Chambers's Journal for Nov. 1869. His rendering of Theocritus (1869) shows at once his ripe scholarship and his facile mastery of English verse. See Memoir by Seindall, prefixed to his Literary Remains (1885).

Calvert, EDWARD (1799-1883), an over-fastidious artist, who painted nymphs and shepherds of Arcady, was born at Appledore, N. Devon, served as a naval midshipman (1814-20); entered the Academy's schools in 1824, and never exhibited after 1836. He visited Greece in 1844, and died at Hackney. The friend of Blake, he was influenced still more by Stothard. See the sumptuous Memoir by his son (1893).

Calvert, FREDERICK CRACE (1819-73), chemist, was born in London, resided in France (1836-46), and then settled as a consulting chemist in Mau-chester. He was largely instrumental in introducing carbolic acid as a disinfectant.

Calvert, GEORGE. SEE BALTIMORE, LORD.

Calvert, GEORGE HENRY (1803-89), a many-sided author, great-grandson of Lord Baltimore, was born in Maryland, studied at Harvard and Göttingen, and from 1843 lived at Newport, Rhode Island. His works embrace poems, tragedies, comedies, essays, translations from the German, and studies of Goethe (1872), Wordsworth (1878), Shakespeare (1879), and Coleridge, Shelley, and Goethe (1880).

Calvin, JOHN, was born, 10th July 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy, where his father, Gérard Cailvin or Cauvin, was procureur-fiscal and secretary of the diocese. He studied Latin at Paris (from 1523) under Corterius; subsequently as a law-student in Orléans he received from the Scriptures his first impulse to theological studies. From Orléans he went to Bourges, where he learned Greek, and began to preach the reformed doctrines. After a short stay (1533) at Paris, now a centre of the 'new learning' and of religious excitement, he visited Noyon. We next find him at Saintonge; at Nerac, the residence of the queen of Navarre; at Angoulême, with his friend Louis du Tillet; then at Paris again. Persecution raged so hotly, that Calvin was no longer safe in France; at Basel he issued in 1536 his Christianæ Religionis Institutio, with the famous preface addressed to Francis I. After a short visit to Italy, to René, Duchess of Ferrara, he revisited his native town, sold his paternal estate, and set out for Strasburg, by way of Geneva, where Farel persuaded him to remain and assist in the work of reformation. The citizens had asserted their independence against the Duke of Savoy; and magistrates and people eagerly joined with the reformers. A Protestant Confession of Faith was proclaimed, and moral severity took the place of license. The strain, however, was too sudden and extreme. A spirit of rebellion broke forth under the 'Libertines,' and Calvin and Farel were expelled from the city (1538). Calvin, withdrawing to Strasburg, devoted himself to critical labours on the New Testament; and here in 1539 he married the widow of a converted Anabaptist. But in 1541 the Genevans, wearying of the Libertine license, invited Calvin to return; and after some delay, he acceded to their request. By his College of Pastors and Doctors, and his Consistorial Court of Discipline, he founded a theocracy, which was virtually to direct all the affairs of the city, and to control the social and individual life of the citizens. His struggle with the Libertines lasted fourteen years, when the reformer's authority was confirmed into an absolute supremacy (1555). During that long struggle occurred also Calvin's controversies with Castellio (q.v.), Bolsec (q.v.), and Servetus (q.v.). The last, whose speculations on the Trinity were abhorrent to Calvin, was apprehended at Vienne by the Catholic authorities (to whom Calvin forwarded criminating documents), and was sentenced to be burned, but effected his escape, and at Geneva, on his way to Italy, was subjected to a new trial, condemned, and burnt to death (1553). Calvin's intolerance was approved by the most conspicuous Reformers, including the gentle Melancthon. Through Beza he made his influence felt in the great struggle in France between the Guises and the Protestants. In 1561 his energies began to fail; and he died on 27th May 1564.

None can dispute Calvin's intellectual greatness, or the powerful services which he rendered to the cause of Protestantism. Stern in spirit and unyielding in will, he is never selfish or petty in his motives. He rendered a double service to Protestantism: he systematised its doctrine, and he organised its ecclesiastical discipline. His fame is enduring as a religious writer, as a social legislator, and a powerful and graceful writer of modern French. His commentaries embrace the greater part of the Old Testament and the whole of the New except the Revelation.—The first collected edition of Calvin's works is that of Geneva (12 vols. fol. 1617). A complete critical edition by Baum, Cunitz, Reuss, &c. appeared at Brunswick (59 vols. 1863-1900). By the 'Calvin Translation Society' in Edinburgh, his works were collected and translated into English (52 vols. 1844-56). His letters were published by Bonnet (2 vols. Paris, 1854); in an English translation by Constable and Gilchrist (1855 et seq.). The libraries of Geneva and Zurich contain about 3000 unprinted sermons and other short writings by Calvin. Beza's life of him appeared in French in 1564, and in Latin in 1576. There are also lives by Bolsec (1577), Jaques E. May (1657), Audin (1840), and Kampschulte (unfinished, 1869)—all from the Catholic standpoint; also by Williston Walker (1906), Henry (trans. 1849), Dyer (1850), Bungeener (trans. 1863), Stähelin (1863), Pressel (1864), Viguet and Tissot (1864), Guizot (Paris, 1873), and Goguel (2d ed. 1878).

Cam (Cão), DIOGO, a Portuguese explorer, who followed up the course of Prince Henry of Portugal, and in 1482 discovered the mouth of the Congo, near whose bank an inscribed stone erected by him as a memorial was found in 1887. He afterwards examined the coast as far as 22° S. lat.

Cambacérés, JEAN JACQUES RÉGIS DE (1753-1824), Duke of Parma and High Chancellor under Napoleon, was born at Montpellier, and died in Paris. His Projet de Code Civil formed the basis of the Code Napoléon. [Comp^d-ba-say-ress.]

Cambert, ROBERT (c. 1628-77), an early operatic composer, was born in Paris, and in 1673 came to London, where he died. [Cam-bayr.]

Cambrensis. See GIRALDUS.

Cambridge, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK CHARLES, DUKE OF (1819-1904), was born at Hanover, the only son of George III.'s seventh son, Adolphus Frederick (1774-1850), who was created first duke in 1801. Promoted major-general in 1854, he fought at Alma and Inkermann; in 1862 was made field-marshal; and from 1856 to 1895 was commander-in-chief. He married an actress, Miss Farebrother, their children bearing the name Fitzgeorge. See Lives by Verner (military; 1905) and Sheppard (private; 1906).

Camby'ses (Kambujiya), second king of the Medes and Persians, succeeded his father, Cyrus, in 529 B.C. He put his brother Smerdis to death, and in 527 or 525 invaded and conquered Egypt. He meditated further conquests, but the Tyrian mariners refused to serve against Carthage; an army sent to seize the temple of Ammon perished in the desert; and one which he led in person to Nubia purchased some conquests dearly at the price of myriads of lives. He had given himself up to drunkenness and hideous cruelties, when news came, in 522, that Gaumáta, a Magian, had assumed Smerdis' character, and usurped the Persian throne. Camby'ses marched against him from Egypt, but died in Syria from an accidental wound in the thigh.

Camden, CHARLES PRATT, EARL (1718-94), was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and called to the bar in 1738. Lord Chancellor from 1766 to 1770, he was President of the Council (1782-94), and was created Earl Camden in 1786.

Camden, WILLIAM, scholar, antiquary, and historian, was born in London, where his father was a painter, 2d May 1551. His education, commenced at Christ's Hospital, was completed at St Paul's School and at Oxford. Appointed second master of Westminster School in 1575, and head-master in 1593, he undertook his survey of the British Isles, the famous Britannia (1586; 6th ed. 1607). It was first translated from the Latin by Philemon Holland in 1610; the latest and best translation is that by Gough and Nichols (2d ed. 4 vols. 1806). Of this great work of Camden Bishop Nicolson said it was 'the common sun whereat our modern writers have all lighted their little torches.' In 1597 Camden was made Clarenceux King-at-arms, an appointment which gave him more leisure for his favourite studies. His other most important works, all in Latin, are a list of the epitaphs in Westminster Abbey (1600), a collection of old English historians (1603), a narrative of the trial of the Gunpowder plotters (1607), and Annals of the Reign of Elizabeth to 1558 (1615). He died at Chislehurst (his house was afterwards Napoleon III.'s), 9th November 1623, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Camerarius, JOACHIM (1500-74), changed his original name Liebhart into Camerarius, because his forefathers had been Kämmerer (chamberlains) to the bishops of Bamberg. His works include an excellent biography of his friend Melancthon (1566), a collection of letters by that reformer (1569), and Epistole Familiæres (3 vols. 1583-95).—His son, JOACHIM CAMERARIUS (1534-98), was one of the most learned physicians and botanists of his age.—RUDOLF JAKOB CAMERARIUS (1665-1721) was also a physician and botanist.

Cameron, SIR CHARLES ALEXANDER, chemist and hygienist, was born in Dublin, 16th July 1830, and knighted in 1886.

Cameron, CHARLES H. See CAMERON, JULIA.

Cameron, SIR EWEN (1629-1719), 'of Lochiel,' a Highland chieftain, who was knighted in 1681, fought at Killiecrankie (1689), and is said to have slain the last wolf in Scotland. His grandson, DONALD (c. 1695-1748), the 'Gentle Lochiel,' was 'out' in the '45, and died in exile.

Cameron, JOHN (c. 1579-1625), the 'walking library,' was born in Glasgow, and educated at its university. In 1600 he went to the Continent, where his erudition secured him appointments at Bergerac, Sedan, Saumur, &c.; and returning to Britain in 1620, he was two years later appointed principal of Glasgow University. In less than a year, however, he returned to Saumur, and thence to Montauban, where he received a divinity professorship, and where, as at Glasgow, his doctrine of passive obedience made him many enemies. He was stabbed by one of them in the street, and died from the wound. His eight theological works, in Latin and French (1616-42), are said to be the foundation of Amyraut's doctrine of universal grace (1634).

Cameron, JULIA MARGARET, née PATTLE (1815-79), born at Calcutta, married in 1838 the Indian jurist, Charles Hay Cameron (1795-1880), and died, like him, in Ceylon. She took admirable photographs of Tennyson, Darwin, Carlyle, Newman, &c.

Cameron, RICHARD, Covenanter, was born about 1648 in Falkland, where, having studied at St Andrews 1662-65, he became precentor and schoolmaster under an Episcopal incumbent. 'Converted by the field-preachers,' he next is said to have been tutor in the household of a Sir Walter Scott of Harden (of whom genealogists know absolutely nothing), and then to have been licensed to preach by the 'celebrated John Welsh' (that worthy's grandson, possibly). In 1678 he really did go to Holland, and returned in 1680 in time to publish the Sanquhar Declaration. Retiring then, with some sixty armed comrades, to the hills between Nithsdale and Ayrshire, he succeeded in evading capture for a month, though 5000 merks was set on his head. On 20th July 1680, however, they were surprised by a body of dragoons on Airds Moss, near Auchinleck, and, after a brave fight, Cameron fell. His hands and head were fixed on the Netherbow Port, Edinburgh. See Life by Prof. Heikless (1897).

Cameron, SIMON, American statesman, born in Pennsylvania, 8th March 1799, was a journeyman printer and newspaper editor, in 1845 became a senator, was Lincoln's secretary of war (1861-62), and minister plenipotentiary to Russia (1862-63), and died at New York, 26th June 1889.

Cameron, VERNEY LOVETT, African explorer, was born at Radipole, near Weymouth, 1st July 1844, entered the navy in 1857, and served in the Mediterranean, West Indies, Red Sea, and on the east coast of Africa, taking part in the Abyssinian expedition, and in the suppression of the slave-trade. In 1872 he was appointed to the command of an east-coast expedition to relieve Livingstone, and starting from Bagamoyo in March 1873, in August at Unyamweye met Livingstone's followers bearing his remains to the coast. At Ujiji he found some of Livingstone's papers; and then he made a survey of Lake Tanganyika, which proved to be disconnected with the Nile system. In the belief that the Lualaba was the upper Congo, he resolved to follow its course to the west coast; but native hostility prevented him from forestalling Stanley's discoveries in 1877, and striking south-west he reached Benguela on the 7th November 1875. Made C.B. and commander, in 1878 he travelled overland to India, to satisfy himself of the feasibility of a Constantinople-Bagdad railway; and in 1882, with Sir Richard Burton, he visited the Gold Coast. Among his works are Across Africa (1877), Our Future Highway to India (1880), and several boys' books. He died from a hunting accident at Leighton-Buzzard, 26th March 1894.

Camillus, MARCUS FURIUS, a Roman patrician who first appears as censor in 403 B.C. He took Veii in 396, after a ten years' siege; and in 394 his magnanimity induced Falerii to surrender unconditionally. Condemned on a charge of misappropriating the booty, but really because of his patrician haughtiness, he went into banishment at Ardea (391); but, Brennus (q.v.) having captured and destroyed all Rome except the Capitol, he was recalled and appointed dictator, appeared according to the legend just as the garrison were about to purchase the Gauls' departure, and drove the invader from the town. His strenuous resistance defeated the plebeians' proposal to remove to Veii. He afterwards routed the Æqui, Volsci, and Etrusci; and in 367 B.C., though eighty years old, he became for the fifth time dictator, defeated the Gauls near Alba, and made peace between patricians and plebeians. He died of the plague, 365 B.C.

Camões (Camões), LUIS DE, the greatest poet of Portugal, was born at Lisbon in 1524, and studied for the church as an 'honourable poor student' at Coimbra, but declined to take orders.

His Amphitriões was acted before the university. Returning to Lisbon, probably in 1542, he fell in love with Donna Caterina Ataide, who returned his affection; but her father prohibited their union, and the poet had to content himself with passionate protestations in his Rimas—short poems after the model of the Italians. For reasons not ascertained Camoens was banished from Lisbon for a year, and joining a Portuguese force at Ceuta, served there for two years, losing his right eye by a splinter. In 1550 he again returned to Lisbon, where for the next three years he seems to have led a somewhat discreditable life; and having been thrown into prison for his share in a street affray, was released only on his volunteering to proceed to India. At Goa (1553-56) he engaged in two military expeditions, but his bold denunciations of the Portuguese officials at length led to an honourable exile to a lucrative post at Macao (1556). Returning to Goa (1558), he was shipwrecked and lost everything except his poem, The Lusitads. At Goa he was thrown into prison through the machinations of his former enemies; but at length, after an exile of sixteen years, Camoens returned to Portugal to spend the remainder of his life at Lisbon in poverty and obscurity. In 1572 he published The Lusitads, which had an immediate and brilliant success, but did little for the fortunes of its author, who died in a public hospital, 10th June 1580. In The Lusitads (Os Lusitados, 'the Lusitanians'), Camoens did for the Portuguese language what Chaucer did for English and Dante for Italian—besides making himself the interpreter of the deepest aspirations of the Portuguese nation. It has been called 'The Epos of Commerce,' and the Portuguese regard it as their national epic. The radical faults of the poem are its inartistic construction and its puerile use of the classical mythology. Of Camoens' 352 sonnets, 70 have been well translated by Aubertin (1881); and the whole by Sir R. Burton (1885). We have English renderings of The Lusitads by Sir R. Fanshawe (1655), Mickle (1775; 6th ed. 1877), Musgrave (1826), Quilliam (books i.-v. 1853), Sir L. Mitchell (1854), Aubertin (1878), and Sir R. Burton (1881). See Burton's Camoens (1882), a German life by Storck (1890), and a Portuguese by Braga (1907). [Ca-mo'en'sh.]

Campan, JEANNE LOUISE HENRIETTE (1752-1822), who was born in Paris, and died at Mantes, from 1770 till 1792 was Marie Antoinette's confidant, and during the Reign of Terror withdrew to the valley of Chevreuse, beyond Versailles. After Robespierre's fall, she opened a boarding-school at St Germain-en-Laye; and in 1806 Napoleon appointed her head of the school at Ecône for the daughters of officers of the Legion of Honour. She wrote Vie Privée de Marie Antoinette (1823), Journal Anecdote (1824), and Correspondance avec la Reine Hortense (2 vols. 1835). See works by Bonneville de Marsangy (1879), Flammermont (1886), and Carette (1891).

Campanella, TOMMASO (1568-1639), Italian philosopher, was born at Stilo in Calabria, entered the Dominican order in his fifteenth year, was as a theological or political heretic confined in a Neapolitan dungeon for twenty-seven years, and seven times racked, and died in the Dominican monastery of St Honoré, near Paris. An opponent of the schoolmen, he wrote over fifty works, chiefly in Latin, among them Philosophia Sensibus Demonstrata (1591), De Monarchia Hispanica, Astrologicorum Libri VII. (1617), De Sensu Rerum et Magia (1620), Philosophia Epilogistica Realis (1623), Universalis Philosophia (1638), Philosophia Rationalis et Realis (1638), and Civitas Solis (1623), an imitation of Plato's Republic. His poems and sonnets, published by his German disciple, Tobias Adami, in 1622, were, after a long search, rediscovered by J. G. Orelli, and by him republished in 1834. The Sonnets were translated into rhymed English by J. A. Symonds in 1878; his complete works were published at Turin in 1854; and his life has been written by Baldacchini (1847), Berti (1878), and Amabile (3 vols. 1882).

Campbell, a Scottish family, to which genealogists have chosen to assign an Anglo-Norman origin, deriving its surname from the Latin De Campo Bello. According, however, to the Duke of Argyll, it is purely Celtic, of Scotch-Irish origin; and Cambel, as the name was always formerly written, is just the Celtic cam beul, 'curved mouth.' Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochow, created Lord Campbell in 1445, and his descendants, the ducal house of Argyll (q.v.), have been noticed already. From his younger son, Sir Colin Campbell of Glenorchy (circa 1400-78), are descended the earls and marquises of Breadalbane (creations 1681 and 1831-55); and from the younger son of the second Earl of Argyll, who fell at Flodden in 1513, the earls of Cadwall (cre. 1827). [Cam'bell.]

Campbell, ALEXANDER (1788-1866), founder about 1827 of the 'Disciples of Christ' or 'Campbellites,' was born near Ballymena, Antrim, and emigrated to the States in 1807. In 1826 he published a translation of the New Testament, in which the word 'baptism' gave place to immersion. In 1841 he founded Bethany College in West Virginia, and here he died. He wrote much. See Life by Richardson (1868).

Campbell, SIR COLIN, LORD CLYDE, was born in Glasgow, 20th October 1792. His father was a carpenter, named MacIver, but Colin assumed the name of Campbell from his mother's brother, Colonel John Campbell, who in 1802 put him to school at Gosport. He was gazetted an ensign in 1808, and by 1813 had fought his way up to a captaincy, serving on the Walcheren expedition (1809), when he contracted a life-long ague, and through all the Peninsular war, where he was severely wounded at the siege of San Sebastian and the passage of the Bidassoa. He took part in the expedition to the United States (1814), and then passed nearly thirty years in garrison duty at Gibraltar, Barbadoes, Demerara, and various places in England, in 1837 becoming lieutenant-colonel of the 98th foot. For the brief Chinese campaign of 1842 he was made a C.B., and for his brilliant services in the second Sikh war (1848-49) a K.C.B., thereafter commanding for three years at Peshawar against the frontier tribes. On the outbreak of the Crimean war in 1854 he was appointed to the command of the Highland Brigade; the victory of the Alma was mainly his; and his, too, the splendid repulse of the Russians by the 'thin red line' in the battle of Balaklava. He was rewarded with a K.G.C.B., with a sword of honour from his native city, and with several foreign orders, and in 1856 was appointed Inspector-general of Infantry. When on 11th July 1857 the news reached England of the Mutiny, Lord Palmerston offered him the command of the forces in India: he started next day for Calcutta. He reached it in August; on 17th November, with 4700 men, effected the final relief of Lucknow; and on 20th December 1858, having five months earlier been created Lord Clyde, announced to the viceroy that the rebellion was ended. Returning next year to England, he was made a field-marshal, and received a pension of £2000. He died at Chatham, 14th August 1863, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Lives by Lieutenant-general Shadwell (2 vols. 1881) and Archibald Forbes (1895).

Campbell, DUNCAN (c. 1680-1730), a deaf-and-dumb London soothsayer, born in Lapland, of an Argyllshire father. See his Life by Defoe (1720; new ed. by Aitken, 1895).

Campbell, GEORGE (1719-96), divine, was born at Aberdeen, and educated there at the grammar-school and Marischal College. Abandoning law for divinity, he was in 1748 ordained minister of Banchory Ternan; in 1757 was called to Aberdeen; and in 1759 was appointed Principal of Marischal College, in 1771 professor of Divinity. His works included the famous Dissertation on Miracles (1762) in answer to Hume, Philosophy of Rhetoric (1776), and Lectures on Ecclesiastical History (1800), with a memoir by G. S. Keith.

Campbell, JAMES DYKES (1838-95), Coleridge's biographer, was for many years a successful merchant in Mauritius.

Campbell, JOHN, BARON, Lord Chancellor of England, was born, 15th September 1779, at Cupar-Fife, a son of the parish minister. He studied for the ministry at St Andrews University, became (1798) a tutor in London, joined Lincoln's Inn (1800), read law and acted as reporter and made dramatic critic to the Morning Chronicle, and was called to the bar in 1806. His nisi prius 'Reports' (1808), brought him into notice, and by 1824 he was leader of the Oxford circuit. He became king's counsel in 1827, Whig M.P. for Stafford in 1830, and for Dudley in 1832, in which year he was made solicitor-general and knighted. Attorney-general in 1834, he was defeated at Dudley, but returned for Edinburgh. He became Lord Campbell (1841), and for six weeks Lord Chancellor of Ireland, next, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1846), Chief-justice of the Queen's Bench (1850), and Lord Chancellor of England (1859). He died 22d June 1861. He was a courteous and painstaking judge; he carried statutes on defamation, compensation for death by accident, and against obscene publications. His Lives of the Chief-justices (1849-57) and of the Lord Chancellors (1845-47), though readable, are disfigured by the obtuseness of himself, and in the later volumes by misrepresentation and inaccuracy. Repeating Arbutnot's bon-mot on Curll's biographies, Sir Charles Wetherell declared that 'his noble and biographical friend had added a new terror to death.' His wife, a daughter of Lord Abinger, was created Baroness Stratheden in 1836. See Life by his daughter, the Hon. Mrs Hardcastle (1881).

Campbell, JOHN, LL.D. (1708-75), the diligent compiler of Lives of the Admirals, &c., was born in Edinburgh and died in London.

Campbell, JOHN FRANCIS, of Islay, folklorist, was born 29th December 1822. Educated at Eton and Edinburgh University, he held offices at court, and was afterwards secretary to the lighthouse and coal commissions. He travelled much, and died at Cannes, 17th February 1885. An enthusiastic Highlander and profound Gaelic scholar, he is chiefly remembered by his Popular Tales of the West Highlands (4 vols. Edin. 1800-62), one of the most important contributions ever made to the study of folk-tales.

Campbell, JOHN McLEOD, theologian, was born at Kilninver, Argyllshire, in 1800, entered Glasgow University at eleven, and was ordained minister of Row, near Helensburgh, in 1825. His views on the personal assurance of salvation and on the universality of the atonement led to his deposition for heresy in 1831. For two years he laboured in the Highlands as an evangelist, and then for six and twenty, from 1833, preached quietly without remuneration to a congregation that gathered round him in Glasgow. From 1870 he lived at Rosneath, and here he died, 27th February 1872. He wrote Christ the Bread of Life (1851), The Nature of the Atonement (1856), and Thoughts on Revelation (1862). See the Memorials by his son (2 vols. 1877).

Campbell, LEWIS, born 3d September 1830, was educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, took Anglican orders, and from 1863 to 1892 was professor of Greek at St Andrews. He died 28th November 1908.

Campbell, MRS PATRICK, actress, was born at Kensington of mixed English and Italian parentage, married in 1834, went on the stage in 1891, and gained fame in the Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893). Her husband fell in South Africa in 1900.

Campbell, REGINALD JOHN, born at London in 1867, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and graduated with honours. He entered the Congregationalist ministry in 1895, became pastor of the City Temple in 1903, and in 1907 startled the evangelical world by his exposition of an 'advanced' New Theology.

Campbell, THOMAS, poet, was born in Glasgow, 27th July 1777, the youngest of the eleven children of an unfortunate merchant. From the grammar-school he passed in 1791 to the university, in 1795 went as tutor to Mull, and in 1797 repaired to Edinburgh nominally to study law; but he was more and more drawn to the reading and writing of poetry. The Pleasures of Hope, published in 1799, ran through four editions in a twelvemonth. During a tour on the Continent (1800-1) Campbell visited Hohenlinden, at Hamburg fell in with the prototype of his Exile of Erin, and sailed past the batteries of Copenhagen. In 1803 he married and settled in London, having refused the offer of a chair at Wilna, and resolved to adopt a literary career. He contributed articles to The Edinburgh Encyclopedia, and compiled The Annals of Great Britain from George II. to the Peace of Amiens. In 1806, through Fox's influence, he received a yearly pension of £200. In 1809 appeared Gertrude of Wyoming; in 1818 Campbell was again in Germany, and on his return he published his Specimens of the British Poets. In 1820 he delivered a course of lectures on poetry at the Surrey Institution; and from this date to 1830 he edited The New Monthly Magazine, contributing thereto The Last Man and other poems. In 1827-29 he was thrice elected Lord Rector of the university of Glasgow. He died at Boulogne, 15th June 1844, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Campbell is an established English classic. It is in his lyrics that he has soared highest into the heaven of song: Hohenlinden, Ye Mariners of England, and The Battle of the Baltic are in their own way unsurpassed. See his Life and Letters by Beattie (1849), Cyrus Redding's Reminiscences (1859), a short Life by Hadden (1900), and editions of the poems by Allingham (1890), Lewis Campbell (1904), and Logie Robertson (1908).

Campbell, THOMAS (1790-1858), sculptor, was born in Edinburgh and died in London.

Campbell-Bannerman, SIR HENRY, was born in 1836, the second son of Sir James Campbell, Lord Provost of Glasgow in 1840-43. He assumed the name Baumerman in 1872. Educated at Glasgow and Trinity College, Cambridge, he became Liberal M.P. for the Stirling burghs in 1868, was Chief Secretary for Ireland in 1884, and, having been converted to Home Rule for Ireland, War Secretary in 1886, G.C.B. in 1895, Liberal leader in 1899, and Prime-minister in 1905. He died in April 1908, just after having resigned office.

Campe, JOACHIM HEINRICH (1746-1818), educationist, born near Holzmiinden, after serving with Basedow (q.v.), founded an institution of his own, and in 1787 reorganised the school-system in Brunswick, where he also established a large publishing house. He wrote some works on education, and a German Dictionary (5 vols. 1807-11); but his books for the young were specially popular, especially Robinson der Jüngere (115th ed. 1890; Eng. trans. 1855). See Lives by Hallier (2d ed. 1862), Leyser (1877), and Lötze (1890). [Cam'peh.]

Campeggio, LORENZO (1472-1539), born at Bologna, studied law, married early, and after his wife's death took orders. He was made Bishop of Feltri (1512), a cardinal (1517), papal legate to England to incite Henry VIII. against the Turks (1518), and bishop of Salisbury and archbishop of Bologna (1524). Joint judge with Wolsey in the divorce suit against Catharine of Aragon, he ended by displeasing all parties (1529). [Cam-pej'jo.]

Camper, PETER (1722-89), anatomist, was born at Leyden and died at the Hague. i

Camphausen, WILHELM (1818-85), painter of battle-pieces, was born and died at Düsseldorf. [Cam-phow'zen.]

Campi, a family of artists at Cremona. GIULIO CAMPI (1500-72), the eldest brother, studied under Giulio Romano, and has left a fine altar-piece at Cremona.—ANTONIO CAMPI was a successful imitator of Correggio, and had some merit as an architect and engraver. He died after 1591.—VINCENZO CAMPI (died 1591) excelled in small figures; some of his portraits and paintings of fruits also are highly valued.—BERNARDINO CAMPI (1522-90) was the son of a goldsmith, and possibly a kinsman of the three brothers. He studied first under Giulio, but soon excelled his master. Although he imitated Titian with such success that it has been difficult to distinguish the copies from the originals, he is not purely Venetian in his style, but borrowed much from both Correggio and Raphael. [Cam-pee.]

Campion, EDMUND, the first of the Eng.'sh Jesuit martyrs, was born 25th January 1540, the son of a London tradesman, and from Christ's Hospital passed to St John's College, Oxford. He became the most popular man at the university, but hankered after the old religion, although he took deacon's orders in the Church of England in 1569, in which year he helped to re-establish the Dublin University. Suspected of leanings towards Rome, and fearing arrest, he escaped to Douai, and in 1573 joined the Society of Jesus in Bohemia. In 1580 he was recalled from Prague, where he was professor of Rhetoric, to accompany Parsons on the Jesuit mission into England. The audacity of his controversial manifesto known as Campion's 'Brag and challenge', which was followed by his Decem Rationes, or 'Ten Reasons,' greatly irritated his opponents. In July 1581 he was caught near Wantage, and sent up to London, tied on horseback, with a paper stuck on his hat inscribed 'Campion, the seditious Jesuit.' Thrice racked, he was tried on a charge of conspiracy of which he was innocent, hanged on 1st December 1581, and, with other sufferers in the same cause, beatified by Leo XIII. in 1886. See Life by Richard Simpson (1867; new ed. 1896).

Campion, THOMAS (c. 1575-1620), physician, poet, and composer, was born at Witham in Essex, studied at Cambridge and abroad, and died in London. See Bullen's edition of his Works (1889) and P. Vivian's (1909).

Campomanes, PEDRO RODRIGUEZ, COUNT OF (1723-1802), Spanish statesman and writer on political economy. [Cam-po-mah'nays.]

Camuccini, VINCENZO (1775-1844), painter of biblical and classical subjects, was born and died at Rome. [Ca-moo-chee'nee.]

Camus, ARMAND GASTON (1740-1804), born in Paris, was sent in 1793 to make Dumnouriez prisoner, but was himself with four colleagues seized and delivered over to the Austrians. After an imprisonment of two and a half years, he was exchanged for the daughter of Louis XVI., and on his return to Paris was made member, and afterwards president, of the Council of Five Hundred, but resigned in 1797, and devoted his time to literature. [Ca-meess.]

Canaletto, ANTONIO (1697-1768), Venetian painter, studied at Rome, painted a series of views in Venice, paid two visits to England, but died in his native city.—His nephew, BERNARDO BELLOTTO, surnamed CANALETTO (1720-80), attained high excellence as a painter, and also as an engraver on copper. He practised his art in Venice, Rome, Verona, Brescia, Milan, Dresden, and England, where he painted a masterly interior of King's College Chapel, Cambridge. He died in Warsaw. See R. Meyer, Die beiden Canaletti (Dresden, 1878).

Candace (Gr. Kanda'kē), the name of a queen (or rather dynasty) of Ethiopia in the first Christian century.

Candlish, ROBERT SMITH, ecclesiastic, was born in Edinburgh in 1806, but was brought up at Glasgow. Entering the university at twelve, he graduated five years later, and after studying divinity, and living two years at Eton as private tutor to a Scotch pupil there, was licensed to preach in 1828. Minister from 1834 of St George's, Edinburgh, he became famous as a preacher, and ere long was one of the boldest leaders of the 'non-intrusion' party. After the Disruption he co-operated with Dr Chalmers in organising the Free Church, and from Chalmers' death was its virtual leader, his name being associated with education and the movement for union with other dissenting Presbyterians. He was made Moderator of the Free Assembly in 1861, Principal of the New College in 1862, and a D.D. of Edinburgh. He died there, October 19, 1873, having published over twenty works since 1841. See Life by Dr W. Wilson (1880).

Candolle. See DE CANDOLLE.

Canina, LUIGI (1795-1856), architect and antiquary, was born at Casale, lived in Turin and Rome, and died at Florence. [Ca-nee'na.]

Canning, CHARLES JOHN, EARL, third son of George Canning, was born in London, 14th December 1812, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he obtained high honours. He entered parliament in 1836 as Conservative member for Warwick, but next year was raised to the Upper House as Viscount Canning by his mother's death, both his elder brothers having predeceased her. In 1841 he became Under-secretary in the Foreign Office. Under Lord Aberdeen he was Postmaster-general; and in 1856 he succeeded Lord Dalhousie as Governor-general of India. The war with Persia was brought to a successful close in 1857. In the same year (10th May) the Indian Mutiny began with the outbreak at Meerut. Canning's conduct was decried at the time as weak—he was nicknamed 'Clemency Canning'; but the general opinion now is that he acted with singular courage, moderation, and judiciousness. In 1858 he became the first viceroy, and in 1859 was raised to an earldom. He had married in 1835, Charlotte, elder daughter of Lord Stuart de Rothesay, and sister to Lady Waterford; and she having died at Calcutta on 18th November 1861, he retired from his high office, and died in London, 17th June 1862. See Life by Sir H. S. Cunningham (1892), and A. J. C. Hare's Story of Two Noble Lives (3 vols. 1894).

Canning, ELIZABETH (1784-73), a London domestic servant who in January 1753 disappeared for four weeks, and then alleged she had been seized by two men and carried to a house at Enfield Wash, where she had been ill used by an old woman, and starved in an upper room, to compel her to an immoral life. She identified Susannah Wells and an old Gypsy named Mary Squires as her persecutors; and Squires was sentenced to be hanged, Wells to be burned in the hand. The lord mayor made further investigations, which resulted in Squires' free pardon; and the case now became the excitement of the town. On 29th April 1754 Canning was tried at the Old Bailey for perjury, and after an eight days' trial, in which the jury seem to have been completely puzzled between the thirty-eight witnesses who swore that Squires had been seen in Dorsetshire, and the twenty-seven who swore to her having been in Middlesex, was sentenced to seven years' transportation. She died at Weathersfield, Connecticut. See Paget's Paradoxes and Puzzles (1874).

Canning, GEORGE, statesman, was born in London, April 11, 1770. His father, who claimed descent from William Canynoges of Bristol, displeased his family by marrying beneath his station, and died in poverty when his son was one year old. His mother, who was twice subsequently married, to an actor first, then a linen-draper, for the next thirty years was a not too successful actress; but she lived to participate in the good-fortune of her boy, whose education meanwhile was liberally provided by his uncle, Stratford Canning, a banker. From Eton he passed in 1788 to Christ Church, Oxford, and thence in 1790 to Lincoln's Inn. But in 1794, at Burke's suggestion, he entered parliament for Newport, Isle of Wight, as a supporter of Pitt; in 1796 he was appointed an under-secretary of state; and in 1798 he established his reputation by his speeches against the slave-trade and Tierney's motion for peace with the French Directory. He gave valuable assistance to the ministry, not only by his voice in parliament, but by his pen in the Anti-Jacobin (1797-98); the 'Needy Knife-grinder' is one of his happiest efforts. In 1800 he married Joan Scott, who was sister to the Duchess of Portland, and had £100,000. Pitt resigned office in 1801; when he again became premier, Canning was treasurer of the navy until Pitt's death (1804-6). In the Portland ministry (1807) Canning as Minister for Foreign Affairs planned the seizure of the Danish fleet, which did so much to upset the schemes of Napoleon; and he recommended the energetic prosecution of hostilities in Spain under both Moore and Wellesley. His disapproval of the Walcheren expedition led to a misunderstanding with Castlereagh (q.v.), secretary-at-war, which resulted in a duel. After the Portland ministry fell, Canning held no high office for many years. All his eloquence was enlisted in favour of Catholic emancipation in 1812, when he was elected for Liverpool, a seat exchanged for Harwich in 1822. In 1814 he went as ambassador to Lisbon, in 1816 was made President of the Board of Control, and supported the Liverpool ministry in all their repressive measures until 1820, when he resigned in consequence of the action of the government against Queen Caroline. Nominated Governor-general of India in 1822, he was on the eve of departure when Castlereagh's suicide called him to the head of Foreign Affairs. He infused a more liberal spirit into the cabinet, he asserted British independence against the Holy Alliance, and gave a new impetus to commerce by a gradual laying aside of the prohibitive system. He arranged the relations of Brazil and Portugal; drew the French cabinet into agreement with the British respecting Spanish-American affairs; was the first to recognise the free states of Spanish America; promoted the union of England, France, and Russia in the cause of Greece (1827); protected Portugal from Spanish invasion; contended earnestly for Catholic emancipation; and prepared the way for a repeal of the corn laws. In February 1827 paralysis forced Lord Liverpool to resign, and Canning formed an administration with the aid of the Whigs. His health, however, gave way under the cares of office, and he died 8th August at the Duke of Devonshire's Chiswick villa, in the room where Fox had died twenty-one years earlier. He was buried, near Pitt, in Westminster Abbey. His widow next year was created Viscountess Canning. As a parliamentary orator Canning was remarkable for acuteness, power of expression, and well-pointed wit; still, on the whole, he was inferior to Pitt, Burke, and Fox. See his Speeches edited by Therry (6 vols. 1828); A. Stapleton's Political Life of Canning (1831), and George Canning and his Times (1859); the masterly sketch in Lord Dalling's Historical Characters (1867); books by Hill (1887), Phillips (1908), Temperley (1905), and Bagot (1909); and his Official Correspondence, edited by E. J. Stapleton (2 vols. 1887).

Canning, SIR SAMUEL, engineer-in-chief of the Atlantic cables of 1865-69, was born at Ogbourne St Andrew, near Marlborough, in 1823.

Canning, SIR STRATFORD. See STRATFORD.

Cano, ALONSO (1601-67), a painter of Granada, who in 1639 was appointed court painter and architect. Accused (falsely, it seems) of having murdered his wife, he was racked; but no confession having been elicited, he was acquitted and taken back into the royal favour, and spent his last years in acts of devotion and charity. [Cab'no.]

Cano, JUAN SEBASTIAN DEL, the first circumnavigator, was born at Guetaria on the Bay of Biscay. In 1519 he sailed with Magellan (q.v.), and, after his death, safely navigated the Victoria home to Spain, 6th September 1522. He died in a second expedition, 4th August 1526.

Canova, ANTONIO, sculptor, was born November 1, 1757, at the Venetian village of Possagno, and having displayed remarkable talent in modelling as a boy, studied at Venice and Rome (1779). His 'Theseus' (1782) was greeted as well worthy to vie with classic art, and he was regarded as the founder of a new school. Nevertheless, he did not rigorously adhere to the severe simplicity of the antique, but endeavoured to infuse into his works a peculiar grace such as characterised his 'Cupid and Psyche,' which was produced soon after he had completed in 1787 the monument of Pope Clement XIV. Other works were a 'Winged Cupid,' 'Venus and Adonis,' a 'Psyche holding a Butterfly,' 'Penitent Magdalen,' and 'Perseus with the head of the Medusa,' a second famous papal monument, and one at Vienna to an archduchess. In 1802 he was appointed by Pius VII. curator of works of art, and was called to Paris to model a colossal statue of Napoleon. In 1815 the pope sent him again to Paris to recover the works of art taken there, and he visited England. Created Marquis of Ischia, he died in Venice, 13th Oct. 1822. See Lives by Missirini (1824), Cicognara (1823), Rosini (1825), and D'Este (1864), and his Memorie (1885).

Cánovas del Castillo, ANTONIO, Spanish Conservative statesman and historian, born at Malaga, 8th Feb. 1826, became a member of the Cortes in 1854, and was premier 1875-81, 1884-85, 1890-92, and from 1895 till 8th August 1897, when, at the bath of Santa Agnida, Vittoria, he was shot by an Anarchist in the presence of his wife.

Canrobert, FRANÇOIS CERTAIN, Marshal of France, born at St Ceré in Lot, 27th June 1809, had seen close upon twenty years' brilliant service in Algeria, and had supported the coup d'état of 1851, when he commanded in the Crimea in 1854, and was wounded at the Alma. On St Arnaud's death Canrobert assumed the chief command. He commanded at Magenta and Solferino (1859); in the Franco-German war of 1870 he was shut up in Metz with Bazaine, and became a prisoner in Germany. He died 28th Jan. 1895. See Lives by Grandin (1895), Martin (1895), Felix (1895), and Bapst (1898). [Com-ro-bayr'.]

Cant, ANDREW (c. 1590-1663), Scottish Covenantant, became minister of Pitsligo 1633, of Newbattle 1638, and of Aberdeen 1640. In July 1638 he had been sent there to persuade the inhabitants to subscribe the Covenant; and in Nov. of that same year he was a member of the Glasgow Assembly which abolished Episcopacy. Withal, he was a zealous royalist. He was with the Scots army when it obtained possession of Newcastle; and in 1641 preached before Charles I. at Edinburgh. His son, Andrew, was principal of Edinburgh University 1675-85.

Cantacuzenus, JOHANNES, a Byzantine soldier and statesman in the reigns of Andronicus II. and III., the latter of whom in 1341 left him guardian of his son, Johannes V., then nine years old. Cantacuzenus, however, proclaimed himself the child's colleague, and after a five years' civil war secured his recognition, as well as the marriage of one daughter to the young emperor, and of another to the Sultan Orchan. A second war, during which the Turks occupied Gallipoli, caused his retirement in 1355 to a monastery, where he died in 1383. He wrote a history of his time, and a defence of Christianity.—MATTHIAS, his son, was also made a colleague in the empire in 1353, and on his father's abdication began a war which ended, two years later, in his own deposition. He too died in 1383.

Cantarini, SIMONE (1612-48), an Italian painter, born at Pesaro, and hence called 'Il Pesarese,' studied under Guido Reni at Bologna. His intolerable arrogance made him numerous enemies; and after a quarrel with his chief patron, the Duke of Mantua, he died at Verona, perhaps having poisoned himself. [Can-ta-ree'nee.]

Cantelupe, ST THOMAS DE (c. 1218-82), born at Hambleton, near Henley-on-Thames, studied at Oxford, Paris, and Orleans, and was made chancellor of Oxford University (1262), Chancellor of England by Simon de Montfort (1264-65), and Bishop of Hereford (1275). He died at Orvieto, and was canonised in 1320.—His uncle, WALTER DE CANTELUPE, was Bishop of Worcester from 1237 till his death in 1266.

Canton, JOHN, electrician, born at Stroud, 31st July 1718, settled as a schoolmaster in London, and was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1749. He invented an electroscope and an electrometer; originated experiments in induction; was the first to make powerful artificial magnets; and in 1762 demonstrated the compressibility of water. He died 22d March 1772.

Cantu, CESARE, Italian author, born 8th December 1807, at Brivio in the Milanese territory. Imprisoned as a liberal in 1833, he described the sorrows of a prisoner in a historical romance, Margherita Pusterla (1838), which is only less popular than Manzoni's I Promessi Sposi. To his great Storia Universale (35 vols. 1836-42) succeeded a multitude of works on Italian history and literature, as well as lighter works, and Manzoni: Reminiscenze (2 vols. 1883). He died 11th March 1895. [Kan-too'.]

Canute, or Cnut, king of the English, Danes, and Norwegians, was born about 994, the son of Sweyn, king of Denmark, by Sigrid, widow of Eric, king of Sweden. His father died in England in his career of conquest (1014), and Cnut was at once chosen by his fleet king of England, while his elder brother, Harold, succeeded as king of Denmark. But the Witan sent for Ethelred to be king, and Cnut was soon obliged to flee back to Denmark, first cutting off the hands, ears, and noses of the English hostages, and landing them at Sandwich. In 1015 he put to sea again with a splendid fleet, landed in Dorsetshire, ravaged the country far and wide, and by Christmas had made himself master of Wessex. Early next year he marched to York, and overawed all Northumbria into submission. Already he was master of England, save London, when Ethelred's death and the election by the Londoners of his vigorous son Edmund to be king gave a new turn to the struggle. Twice Cnut failed to capture London; the final struggle took place at Assandun, or Ashington, when, after a desperate battle, the English fled. Edmund and Cnut met at the isle of Olney, in the Severn, and divided the country between them: Cnut taking the northern part, and Edmund the southern. Edmund's death in 1016 gave the whole kingdom to the young Danish conqueror. His first act was to put to death some of the more powerful English chiefs, and to send Edmund's two little sons out of the kingdom. In 1018 he levied a heavy Danegeld, with which he paid off his Danish warriors, keeping only the crews of forty ships. The kingdom he divided into the four earldoms of Mercia, Northumberland, Wessex, and East Anglia. From this time onwards till his death Cnut's character seems to have become completely changed. At once he laid aside his ruthless temper to become a wise, temperate, devout, and law-abiding ruler. He strove also to govern England according to English ideas, restored the equal rights that had prevailed in Edgar's time, and gradually replaced the Danish earls with native Englishmen. Ethelnoth became Archbishop of Canterbury; Godwine, Earl of Wessex. He himself married Emma, the widow of Ethelred. He was liberal to monasteries and churches, and reverent to the memory of the native saints. He made a pilgrimage to Rome in 1026-27, and his letter sent thence to his subjects reveals alike the noble simplicity of his nature and his high conception of the duty of a king. The death of Harold in 1013 had given him the crown of Denmark; that of Olaf in 1030 secured him in the possession of Norway. He died at Shaftesbury, 12th November 1035, and was buried at Winchester.

Canynge, WILLIAM (c. 1399-1474), a great Bristol merchant, mayor, and M.P., who rebuilt St Mary Redcliffe, and, having taken orders, in 1409 became dean of the college of Westbury.

Capefigue, BAPTISTE HONORÉ RAYMOND (1802-72), a French historical writer, born at Marseilles.

Capel, ARTHUR, LORD, born about 1610, was raised to the peerage in 1641, and fought for the king through the Great Rebellion. Captured at Colchester in 1648, he escaped from the Tower, but was retaken, and beheaded 9th March 1649.—His eldest son, ARTHUR (1631-83), was created Earl of Essex in 1661. Viceroy of Ireland (1672-77), and first Lord-commissioner of the Treasury (1679), on the discovery of the Rye House Plot he was sent to the Tower, where he was found with his throat cut—probably by his own hand. From him the present Earl of Essex is descended.

Capel, MONSIGNOR THOMAS JOHN (1836-1911), a Roman Catholic churchman, celebrated till about 1878 as a London pulpit orator, died at Sacramento. He figures as 'Catesby' in Lothair.

Capell, EDWARD (1713-81), was born near Bury St Edmunds, and published an edition of Shakespeare (10 vols. 1768) and Notes and Various Readings to Shakespeare (3 vols. 1783).

Capella, MARTIANUS MINEUS FELIX (fl. 480 A.D.), a native of Africa, whose Satiricon, a kind of encyclopædia, highly esteemed during the middle ages, is a medley of prose and verse, full of curious learning. The best editions are by Kopp (1836) and Eysenhardt (1866).

Capetian Dynasty, the third Frankish dynasty, which was founded by Duke Hugon Capet in 987, and continued to rule France till 1328.

Capgrave, JOHN (1393-1464), chronicler, theologian, and provincial of the Augustine Friars in England, was born and died at Lynn, studied probably at Cambridge, and was ordained priest about 1418, having already entered his order at Lynn. His works include, in Latin, Bible commentaries; sermons; Nova legenda Anglie, printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1516; De illustribus Henricis, giving the lives of twenty-four emperors of Germany, kings of England, &c., all of the name of Henry; and Vita Humfredi Ducis Glocestrie. Among his English works are a life of St Katherine in verse (ed. by Horstmann, Early Eng. Text Soc. 1893), and A Chronicle of England from the Creation to 1417 ('Rolls Series,' 1858). Ye Solace of Pilgrimes, a description of Rome, was traced to him, and edited by Mills (1911).

Capistrano, GIOVANNI DA (1386-1456), born at Capistrano in the Abruzzi, entered the Franciscan order at thirty. From 1426 he was employed as legate by several popes, and acted as inquisitor against the Fraticelli. In 1450 he preached a crusade in Germany against Turks and heretics, and opposed the Hussites in Moravia. His fanaticism led to many cruelties, such as the racking and burning of forty Jews in Breslau. When Belgrade was besieged by Mohammed II. in 1456, he led a rabble of 60,000 to his relief; but he died at Illock, on the Danube. He was canonised in 1690. [Ca-pis-tra'h'no.]

Capito, or KÖPFEL, WOLFGANG FABRICIUS (1478-1541), reformer, born at Hagenau in Alsace, entered the Benedictine order, and in 1515 became professor of Theology at Basel. He approved of Luther's action, but in 1519 entered the service of Archbishop Albert of Mainz; and did not till later declare for the Reformation. See Capito und Bucer, by J. W. Baum (1860).

Capo d'Istrias (or D'ISTRIA), IOANNES ANTONIOS, COUNT, president of the Greek republic, was born, 11th February 1776, in Corfu, and in 1809, after holding a high position in the Ionian Islands, passed to the diplomatic service of Russia. In 1828 he entered on a seven years' presidency of Greece; but imbued as he was with Russian ideas, his autocratic measures aroused discontent; and on 9th October 1831 he was assassinated in a church at Nauplia. See Lives by Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (Berl. 1864), and Dragounis (Par. 1891). His feeble brother, Iony Angostinos (1778-1857), succeeded him, but resigned in the following April.

Cappello, BIANCA (1548-87), the Venetian mistress, and from 1579 wife, of Francesco de' Medici, Duke of Florence (1541-87), with whom she was supposed, but falsely in all likelihood, to have been poisoned by his brother, the Cardinal Ferdinando. See monograph by Saltini (1863).

Cappellus, LUDOVICUS (1585-1658), French Protestant and professor of Theology at Saumur.

Capponi, GINO, MARCHESE (1792-1876), historian and Dante scholar, blind from 1844, was born and died at Florence. See Lives by Montazio (1872) and Von Reumont (1880).

Caprivi, GEORG LEO, GRAF VON, German imperial chancellor, was born in Berlin, 24th Feb. 1831, the descendant of a family originally Friulian, which settled in Silesia in the 17th c., and is sometimes called Caprivi de Caprara de Montecuculi. Entering the army in 1849, he fought in the campaigns of 1864 and 1866, and in the Franco-German war of 1870 was chief of the staff to the 10th Army Corps. In 1883-88 he was at the head of the Admiralty, and then commander of his old army corps, till, on Bismarck's fall in 1890, he became imperial chancellor and Prussian prime-minister. His principal measures were the army bills of 1892-93 and the commercial treaty with Russia in 1894, in the October of which year he was dismissed. He died 6th Feb. 1899. See Life by Schreck (Düss. 1891). [Ca-præ'væ.]

Capua, PENELOPE SMYTH, PRINCESS OF, was an Irish young lady who in 1836 was four times married (at Rome, Madrid, Gretna Green, and St George's, Hanover Square) to 'Bomba's' brother, the Prince of Capua. He died in 1862, leaving a son and a daughter; and she died near Lucca, 15th December 1882.

Caraboo, an impostor who appeared at Almondsbury, Gloucestershire, in April 1817, and for some months ingeniously carried out the rôle of a lady of rank wholly ignorant of English, from an island near China, called Javasu. Ultimately it appeared that she was none other than Mary Wilcocks (1791-1864), a runaway domestic servant. She went to America, but returned to England in 1824. See Chambers's Journal, 1889.

Caracalla, Roman emperor, the son of the Emperor Septimius Severus, was born at Lyons, 188 A.D. He was originally named Bassianus, from his maternal grandfather, but his legal name was M. Aurelius Antoninus. Caracalla was a nickname given him from his long hooded Gaulish tunic. After his father's death at Eboracum (York) in 211 he ascended the throne as co-regent with his brother Publius Septimius Antoninus Geta, whom he murdered. He next directed his cruelty against all Geta's adherents, killing twenty thousand of both sexes—including the great jurist Papinianus. After almost exhausting Italy by his extortions, he turned to the provinces. In 214 he visited Gaul, Germany, Dacia, and Thrace; and after a campaign against the Alemanni, assumed the surname Alemannicus. He was assassinated, 8th April 217, on the way from Edessa to Carrhæ.

CARACCI, or CARRACCI, LUDOVICO (1555-1619), the son of a butcher, was born at Bologna, studied at Venice and Parma, and with his two cousins, established in Bologna an 'eclectic' school of painting. Some of his finest works are preserved at Bologna—among others, the 'Madonna and Child Throned,' 'Madonna and Child Standing,' the 'Transfiguration,' and the 'Nativity of St John the Baptist.'—AGOSTINO CARACCI (1557-1602) was also born in Bologna, and became a disciple of his cousin Ludovico, but he was too versatile to devote himself closely to any subject, though his 'Communion of St Jerome,' still at Bologna, is an admirable work. He dabbled in poetry and literature, and was a really great engraver on copper. His brother's jealousy is said to have driven him from Rome (where they did the frescoes in the Farnese palace) to Parma, where he died.—ANNIBALE CARACCI (1560-1609), born in Bologna, was bred a tailor, but rapidly became a great painter under his cousin, and soon outstripped both him and his brother. The influence of Correggio and of Raphael largely moulded his style. His fame reached Rome, where he was employed to fresco the Farnese palace. He was buried close to Raphael in the Pantheon. His most celebrated easel-picture is the 'Three Maries,' now at Castle Howard.—ANTONIO MARZIALE CARACCI (1583-1618), natural son of Agostino, was a pupil of Annibale. [Ca-rac'h'ee.]

CARACCILO, PRINCE FRANCESCO (1752-99), had risen to the supreme command of King Ferdinand's navy, when in December 1798 he fled with him before the French from Naples to Palermo. Learning, however, of the intended confiscation of the estates of all absentees, he obtained permission to return to Naples, and there entered the service of the 'Parthenopean Republic.' For two months he ably directed the operations of the revolutionists, and not till their cause seemed hopeless did he quit the capital. He was captured in peasant disguise, and on 29th June was brought on board Nelson's flag-ship, tried by a court-martial of Neapolitan officers, and hanged from the yard-arm of a Neapolitan frigate. See NELSON; Paget's Paradoxes and Puzzles (1874); Gutteridge, Nelson and the Neapolitan Jacobins (1903). [Ca-rac'h'o-lo.]

CARACTACUS, CARATĀCOS, or CARADOC, a British king, warred gallantly against the Romans (43-50 A.D.), but at length was completely overthrown by Ostorius near Ludlow. His wife and daughters fell into the hands of the victors; his brothers surrendered; and he himself was delivered up by Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes. He was carried to Rome, 51 A.D., and exhibited in triumph by the emperor Claudius. According to tradition he died at Rome about 54 A.D.; but there is absolutely no ground for supposing that the Claudia of 2 Tim. iv. 21 was his daughter, and introduced Christianity into Britain.

CARÁFA, MICHELE (1785-1872), operatic composer, was born at Naples, and died in Paris.

CARAFFA, an ancient Neapolitan family, to which several cardinals and Pope Paul IV. (q.v.) belonged.—CARLO CARAFFA (1517-61) fought in the Netherlands, joined the Knights of Malta, and was made cardinal by his uncle, Paul IV., who, however, had ultimately to banish the cardinal and his brothers from Rome for extortion. Pius IV. caused him to be put to death.

CARAN D'ACHE was the name assumed by Emmanuel Poiré (1853-1909), French caricaturist, born in Moscow.

CARAUSIUS (c. 245-293), Roman Emperor in Britain from 287 till his murder by Allectus, was originally a Batavian pilot.

CARAVAGGIO, MICHEL ANGELO MERISI OF AMERIGHI DA, painter, was born in 1569 at Caravaggio. His father, a mason, employed him in preparing plaster for the fresco-painters of Milan, and, after studying the works of the great masters there for five years, and afterwards in Venice, he went to Rome, where at length Cardinal del Monte noticed one of his pictures. But his quarrelsomeness soon involved him in difficulties. Having killed a man he fled to Malta, and there obtained the favour of the Grand-master; in making his way back to Rome, he was wounded, lost all his baggage, caught a violent fever, and on reaching Porto Ercole, lay down on a bank and died (1609). Caravaggio gave in his paintings expression to his own wild and gloomy character; his 'Christ and the Disciples at Emmaus' is in the National Gallery.—POLIDORO CALDARA DA CARAVAGGIO (c. 1492-1543) was murdered by his servant at Messina. He aided Raphael in his Vatican frescoes. His 'Christ bearing the Cross' is in the Naples Museum. [Ca-ra-va-j'jo.]

CARCANO, GIULIO (1812-84), a Milanese poet.

CARDAN (Ital. Cardano; Latinised Cardanus), JEROME, mathematician, naturalist, physician, and philosopher, was born at Pavia, September 24, 1501, the natural son of a jurist of Milan. His education was as irregular as his birth, but he finally graduated in medicine at Padua. As professor of Mathematics at Milan he practised medicine and gradually gained a high reputation. In 1552 he visited Scotland, on an invitation from Archbishop Hamilton, and cured him of asthma. In 1559 he became professor of Medicine at Pavia, later at Bologna; and there in 1570 we find him in prison for heresy or debt, or both. Having regained his liberty in 1571, he went to Rome, where Gregory XII. pensioned him. He died in Rome, September 2, 1576, a few weeks after finishing his candid autobiography, De Propria Vita. Some have asserted that he starved himself to death, to fulfil a prediction he had made as to the time when he should die. He was a devoted astrologer. Cardan reveals throughout his works (10 vols. Lyons, 1663) an intellect of rare subtlety and force, with a sound conception of scientific method in spite of his empiricism and imperfect knowledge. He wrote over a hundred treatises on physics, mathematics, astronomy, astrology, rhetoric, history, ethics, dialectics, natural history, music, and medicine. See Lives by Henry Morley (2 vols. 1854) and W. G. Waters (1899).

Cardi. See CIGOLI.

Cardigan, JAMES THOMAS BRUDENELL, EARL OF (1797-1868), sat in the House of Commons from 1818 to 1837, when he succeeded his father as seventh earl. He entered the army in 1824, and rapidly bought himself into the command of the 15th Hussars, which he resigned in 1833, on the acquittal of an officer whom he had illegally put under arrest. From 1836 to 1847 he commanded the 11th Hussars, on which he spent £10,000 a year, and which he made the crack regiment in the service. He never was popular with his officers, and his treatment of them brought about a duel with Captain Harvey Tuckett, for which in 1841 Cardigan was tried before the House of Lords, but escaped through a legal quibble. He commanded a cavalry brigade under Lord Lucan in the Crimea, and led the Six Hundred at Balaclava. He was inspector-general of cavalry 1855-60.

Carducci, GIOSUÈ, Italian poet, was born, a physician's son, at Valdicastello, in the province of Pisa, in 1836, and died in 1907. In 1860 he became professor of Italian Literature at Bologna, in 1876 was returned to the Italian parliament as a republican, and in 1890 was nominated a senator. A complete edition of his poems in 20 vols. appeared at Bologna in 1889 et seq. See introductions to the translations of F. Sewall (New York, 1892). [Car-doo't'chee.]

Cardwell, EDWARD, VISCOUNT, born in Liverpool, 24th July 1813, from Winchester passed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he obtained a double first and a fellowship. He entered parliament in 1842, from a Peelite gradually became a Liberal, and was President of the Board of Trade (1852-55), Chief-secretary for Ireland (1859-61), Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1861-64), Colonial Secretary (1864-66), and Secretary for War (1868-74), as such the reorganiser of the British army. Raised to the peerage in 1874, he died at Torquay, 15th February 1886.

Carême, MARIA ANTONIN (1784-1833), chef de cuisine and author, was born and died in Paris. He wrote Les Déjeuners de l'Empereur Napoléon, La Cuisine Française, &c., and, as Talleyrand's cook, played an important part at the Congress of Vienna. [Ca-rehm.]

Carew, BAMFYLDE MOORE (1698-c. 1770), son of the rector of Bickleigh, near Tiverton, and 'king of the gipsies.'

Carew, JOHN EDWARD (c. 1785-1868), sculptor, was born at Waterford, and died in London.

Carew, RICHARD (1555-1620), Cornish topographer and poet, was born and died at Antony House, near St Germans.

Carew, THOMAS (c. 1589-1639), poet, after quitting Corpus Christi College, Oxford, without a degree, studied in the Middle Temple. Between 1613 and 1619 he visited Italy, Holland, France; afterwards he rose into high favour with Charles I. His Poems (1640, ed. by J. W. Ebsworth, 1893; and A. Vincent, 1899), mostly lyrical and amatory, exhibit much fancy and tenderness.

Carey, HENRY, poet and musician, is believed to have been an illegitimate son of George Savile, Marquis of Halifax (1633-95), and was very young when he published his first volume of poems (1713). He wrote innumerable songs, witty poems, burlesques, farces, and dramatic pieces, sometimes composing the accompanying music. His best-known poem is 'Sally in our Alley;' there is no sufficient ground for attributing 'God save the King' to him. He died suddenly, by his own hand apparently, 4th October 1748.

Carey, HENRY CHARLES, political economist, was born, 15th December 1793, at Philadelphia. With his father, Matthew Carey (1760-1839), a journalist who had been thrown into prison for Nationalist opinions, had emigrated from Ireland in 1784, to become a successful publisher and author, known especially for his Vindicie Hibernice, written to confute Godwin and other English misrepresenters of Ireland. Henry Charles early became a partner in his father's bookselling business; and when in 1835 he retired from business to devote himself to his favourite study, he was at the head of the largest publishing concern in the United States. He died 13th October 1879. Among his works were Principles of Political Economy (3 vols. 1837-40) and Principles of Social Science (3 vols. 1858-59). Originally a zealous free-trader, he came to regard free trade as impossible in the existing state of American industry; it might be the ideal towards which the country should tend, but a period of protection was indispensable. See Memoir by Elder (Phil. 1880).

Carey, JAMES (1845-88), a Dublin builder and town-councillor, who joined the Fenians about 1861, and helped to found the 'Invincibles' in 1881. He betrayed his associates in the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish (q.v.) and Mr Burke, and on the voyage between Capetown and Natal was shot dead by a bricklayer, Patrick O'Donnell, who was hanged in London.

Carey, JOHN, LL.D. (1756-1826), an Irish classical master in London, remembered by his Grædus ad Parnassum (1824).

Carey, SIR ROBERT (c. 1560-1639), youngest son of Lord Hunsdon, for the last ten years of Elizabeth's reign was English warden on the Border marches. He was present at her death-bed (1603), and in sixty hours galloped with the news to Edinburgh. Charles I. created him Earl of Monmouth. He died 12th April 1639.

Carey, ROSA NOUCHETTE (died 1909), wrote a long series of stories for girls.

Carey, WILLIAM, D.D., missionary and orientalist, was born at Paulerspury, near Towcester, 17th August 1761. Apprenticed to a shoemaker, he joined the Baptists in 1783, and three years later became a minister, first at Moulton in Northamptonshire, and then at Leicester. In 1793 he and a Mr Thomas were chosen the first Baptist missionaries to India, where he founded the Serampur mission in 1799, and from 1801 to 1830 was Oriental professor at Fort-William College, Calcutta. He died 9th June 1834. Besides his labours on the Bible or portions thereof in about forty oriental languages, he published grammars and dictionaries of Bengali, Marathi, Sanskrit, &c. See Lives by Culross (1881) and Dr G. Smith (1884).

Cargill, DONALD, COVENANTER, was born about 1619 at Rattray, near Blairgowrie, studied at Aberdeen and St Andrews, and in 1655 was ordained minister of the Barony parish in Glasgow. Ejected for denouncing the Restoration, he became an indefatigable field preacher, fought at Bothwell Bridge, and took part with Richard Cameron in the famous Sanguhar declaration (1680). Having excommunicated the king, the Duke of York, and others at Torwood, Stirlingshire, he was seized, and suffered at the cross of Edinburgh, 17th July 1681. [g hard.]

Carissimi, GIACOMO (1604-74), composer, was organist from 1628 in Rome. He did much to develop the sacred cantata. [Ca-ris'si-mee.]

Carlén, EMILIE (1807-92), Swedish novelist, was born at Strömstad, and died at Stockholm. The first of her novels (31 vols. 1869-75) appeared in 1838, and many of these have been translated into English. See her Reminiscences (1878).

Carleton, WILL, author of Farm Ballads (1873), City Ballads (1885), &c., born in Hudson, Michigan, 21st October 1845, graduated at Hillsdale College in that state, and has lectured in the United States and Canada. He has visited Europe.

Carleton, WILLIAM, Irish novelist, was born 20th Feb. 1794 at Prillisk, near Clogher, in County Tyrone. Of peasant birth, the youngest of fourteen children, he fell in with Gil Blas about the same time as he gave up all thoughts of the priesthood, and came to Dublin with only three shillings in his pocket. He took to tuition, schoolmastering, and finally literature, contributing to the Protestant Christian Examiner a series of sketches, which in 1830 he republished as Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. A second series (1833) was no less well received; and in 1839 appeared the powerful story, Fardougha the Miser. His next tales (3 vols. 1841), mostly pathetic, included the humorous Misfortunes of Barney Branagan. Valentine M'Clutchy (1845), Rody the Rover (1846), The Black Prophet (1847), and The Tithe Proctor (1849) are also worthy of mention. He received in 1848 a pension of £200, and, always hard up, died in Dublin 30th January 1869. See his Autobiography, edited and completed by D. J. O'Donoghue (2 vols 1896).

Carli, GIOVANNI RINALDO (1720-95), Italian economist and archaeologist, best known by his Della Moneta (1754-60). [Car'lee.]

Carlile, RICHARD (1790-1843), born at Ashburton, Devon, 8th December 1790, had been a chemist's boy and a tinman's apprentice, when in 1817 he began to vend the Radical Black Dwarf through London, next sold thousands of Soutaey's Wat Tyler, reprinted Hone's Parodies, and wrote a series of imitations of them, for which he got eighteen weeks in the King's Bench. This was the first of a series of imprisonments whose total amounted to nine years and four months. See Holyoake's Life and Character of R. Carlile (1848).

Carlisle, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK HOWARD, seventh EARL OF, K.G., was born in London, 18th April 1802. Educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, he took in 1821 the Chancellor's and Newdigate prizes, and graduated with a first-class in classics. M.P. for Morpeth in 1826, he at once attached himself to the cause of parliamentary reform. In 1830 he was elected for Yorkshire, and after the Reform Bill, for the West Riding, a seat which he lost in 1841, but recovered in 1846. Under Melbourne he was Chief-secretary for Ireland (1835-41), and under Russell (1846-52) Chief-commissioner of Woods and Forests, and afterwards Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1848 he succeeded to the peerage, and was Lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1855 and 1859. He wrote a Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters (1854), Poems (1866), &c. He died at Castle Howard, 5th December 1864.

Carlisle, LUCY, COUNTESS OF (1599-1660), second daughter of the ninth Earl of Northumberland, in 1617 married James Hay, afterwards Earl of Carlisle (d. 1636). Witty and beautiful, she was the friend of Strafford, and, after his fall, played an intricate game of intrigue, which in 1649 brought her for some months to the Tower.

Carlo Dolci. See DOLCI.

Carlos, DON, son of Philip II. by his first wife, Maria of Portugal, was born at Valladolid, July 1545. He was sent to study at Alcalá de Henares, where he profited so little that the king invited a nephew, the Archduke Rudolf, to Spain, intending to make him his heir. Weak, vicious, and cruel, he early conceived a strong aversion towards the king's confidants, and in confession to a priest, on Christmas Eve 1567, betrayed his purpose to assassinate a certain person. As the king was believed to be the intended victim, this confession was divulged; and Don Carlos was tried and found guilty of conspiring against the life of his father. The sentence was left for the king to pronounce. Philip declared that he could make no exception in favour of such an unworthy son; but sentence of death was not formally recorded. Shortly afterwards Don Carlos died, July 24, 1568. The suspicion that he was poisoned or strangled has no valid evidence to support it; and the story which obtained currency through Schiller's Don Carlos was due to the romancing pen of Saint-Real in 1672. Its credibility was shattered first in 1817 by Lorente, and in 1829 by Ranke. See works by Gaillard (2d ed. Paris, 1867) and Maurenbrecher (2d ed. Berlin, 1876), and Stirling-Maxwell's Don John of Austria (1883).

Carlos, DON (1788-1855), second son of Charles IV. of Spain, on the accession of his niece Isabella in 1833, asserted his claim to the throne—a claim reasserted by his son, DON CARLOS (1818-61), Count de Montemolin, and by his nephew, DON CARLOS (1848-1909). Carlist risings, whose strength lay in the Basque provinces, occurred in 1834-39 and 1872-76.

Carlos, or CARELESS, WILLIAM, a royalist officer who hid with Charles II. (q.v.) in the oak at Boscobel, and died in 1689.

Carlstadt (properly, ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN), reformer, born prior to 1483 at Carlstadt in Bavaria, in 1517 joined Luther, who in 1521 rebuked his iconoclastic zeal, and whom he afterwards opposed on the question of the Eucharist. Accused of participation in the Peasants' War, he fled to Switzerland, and became professor of Theology at Basel. He died 25th December 1541.

Carlyle, ALEXANDER, of Inveresk, was born, 26th January 1722, at Chinnertrees manse, Dumfriesshire, but brought up at Prestonpans. Educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Leyden, he was minister of Inveresk from 1748 till his death, 25th August 1805. The friend of Hume, Adam Smith, Smollett, John Home, &c., with Robertson the historian he led the moderate party in the Church of Scotland; he was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1770, and was made Dean of the Chapel-royal in 1789. His imposing presence earned him the name of 'Jupiter Carlyle'; 'he was,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'the grandest demigod I ever saw.' See his interesting Autobiography, first edited in 1860 by John Hill Burton (new ed. 1910).

Carlyle, THOMAS, was born, 4th December 1795, at Ecclefechan in Dumfriesshire. He was the second son of James Carlyle (1758-1832), a stonemason of fearless independence and strong natural faculty; but his first son by his second wife, Margret Aitken (1771-1853). From the Ecclefechan school he proceeded in 1805 to Annan Academy; and in 1809 he entered Edinburgh University, where he excelled in geometry. In 1813 he began preparation for the ministry of the Church of Scotland; but in 1814 he competed successfully at Dumfries for the mathematical mastership of Annan Academy, and in 1816 accepted the post of assistant at the parish (or grammar) school of Kirkcaldy. Ere long the work of teaching became intolerable, and when in the end of 1818 he removed to Edinburgh, he had abandoned all thoughts of the ministry. Here he obtained private teaching; for Brewster, editor of the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, he wrote many articles, chiefly biographical and geographical; and he translated Legendre's Elements of Geometry. In 1819 he began the study of Scots Law, but found law as uncongenial as divinity. Till 1822 he lived in Edinburgh, absorbed in German literature, especially Goethe, who had an abiding influence on him. In 1821 he was introduced through his friend Edward Irving, to Irving's pupil Miss Jane Baillie Welsh (1801-66), only daughter of Dr John Welsh, medical practitioner in Haddington, who had left his daughter sole heiress of the small estate of Craigenputtock, 16 miles from Dumfries. In 1822 Irving, entering on the pastorate of the Caledonian Chapel in London, recommended Carlyle as tutor to Charles Buller (q.v.). Carlyle found his duties pleasant, and was now able to give substantial pecuniary aid to his family, particularly as regarded the education of his younger brother John Aitken Carlyle, M.D. (1801-79), the translator in 1840 of Dante's Inferno. Now also he arranged to write a Life of Schiller and a translation of the Wilhelm Meister of Goethe. He paid his first visit to London in 1824, and remained there till the publication in book-form of his Schiller (1825). At this time he received the first of a series of letters from Goethe, and made the acquaintance of Coleridge, Thomas Campbell, Allan Cunningham, Procter, and other notabilities. In 1825 he removed to the farm of Hoddam Hill, near his father's farm of Mainhill, which he had leased, his brother Alexander doing the farming, while he translated German romances. In 1826 his father and he had removed to Scotsbrig farm, when in October he married Miss Welsh, and settled in Edinburgh. Here he completed four volumes of translations from Tieck, Musæus, and Richter (German Romance, 1826), and sent his first article on Jean Paul Richter to the Edinburgh Review in 1827. In 1828 they removed to Craigenputtock, and there they lived for six years, Carlyle writing meanwhile magazine articles on Burns, Samuel Johnson, Goethe, Voltaire, Diderot, Schiller, &c. He also wrote a History of German Literature, the best parts of which were subsequently published in the form of essays; and in 1833-34 there appeared in Fraser's Magazine his most characteristic work, Sartor Resartus, the fantastic hero of which, Teufelsdröckh, illustrates in his life and opinions the mystical 'Philosophy of Clothes.' In Sartor he abandoned the simple diction of his earlier essays for the thoroughly individual style of his later works—eruptive, ejaculatory, but always powerful. In 1834 Carlyle, resolved to try his fortune in London, established himself in the house, 5 Cheyne Row, Chelsea, in which he lived till the day of his death. His French Revolution, which established his reputation as a literary genius of the highest order, appeared in 1837. In 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1840 he lectured on 'German Literature,' 'The History of Literature,' 'The Revolutions of Modern Europe,' and 'Heroes and Hero-worship.' In 1838 appeared Sartor in book-form, and the first edition of his Miscellanies; in 1839 Chartism, the first of a series of attacks on the shams and corruptions of modern society; in 1843 Past and Present, and in 1850 Later-day Pamphlets. Cromwell's Letters and Speeches (1845) completely revolutionised the public estimate of its subject. In 1851 he published a biography of his friend John Sterling. From this time Carlyle gave himself up entirely to his largest work, The History of Frederick II. commonly called Frederick the Great (1858-65). As Lord Rector of Edinburgh University he delivered an address in which he embodied his moral experiences in the form of advice to the younger members of his audience (1866); three weeks later his wife died very suddenly. Carlyle's grief developed into remorse when he discovered from her letters and journal that during a period of their married life his irritability of temper and unconscious want of consideration for her wishes had caused her much misery and even ill-health. The Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle prove Mrs Carlyle to have been one of the keenest critics, most brilliant letter-writers, and most accomplished women of her time. In 1867 there appeared in Macmillan's Magazine Carlyle's view of British democracy, under the title of 'Shooting Niagara.' He prepared a special edition of his collected works, and added to them in 1875 a fresh volume containing 'The Early Kings of Norway' and an 'Essay on the Portraits of John Knox.' In 1874 he accepted the Prussian Order of Merit, bestowed in recognition of his life of Frederick the Great, who founded the Order. When Mr Disraeli offered him a G.C.B. and a pension, he declined both. He died on 5th February 1881 at his house in Chelsea, and was laid in the churchyard of Ecclefechan beside his kindred. As a prophet in the guise of a man of letters, Carlyle exerted a greater influence on British literature during the middle of the nineteenth century, and on the ethical, religious, and political beliefs of his time, than any of his contemporaries. As a humorist using humour as a weapon for the enforcement of his opinions, he has no superior. As a master of the graphic in style he has no rival and no second. Irritable and intolerant though he was, he was incapable of conscious injustice, vindictiveness, or insincerity. See his own Reminiscences (two editions: Froude's and Norton's); Froude's Life of him (4 vols. 1882-84); his wife's Letters and Memorials (1883); his Correspondence with Emerson (1883) and his Early Letters (1886-88), edited by Norton; his Bibliography, by R. H. Shepherd (1881); and books on him by Wylie (1881), Moncreu Conway (1881), Masson (1885), Garnett (1887), Nichol (1892), Duffy (1892), and Macpherson (1896). The unedifying controversy about his relations to his wife was reopened by New Letters of Mrs Carlyle's, prefaced by Sir James Crichton-Browne in 1903, and continued by the publication of a privately printed memoir by Froude.

Carmagnola, FRANCESCO (1390-1432), condottiere and commander-in-chief of the Venetian forces, beheaded for failure. [Car-man-ya'la.]

Carman, BLISS, a Canadian nature-poet, born at Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1861, contributed poems to the Atlantic Monthly, Century, &c. His Collected Poems appeared in 1905. He collaborated with Richard Hovey.

Carmen Sylva, the pen-name of Elizabeth, queen of Roumania, who was born 29th December 1843, the daughter of Prince Hermann of Wied Neuwied, and married King (then Prince) Charles of Roumania in 1869. Her only child, a daughter, died in 1874, and out of this great sorrow of her life arose her literary activity. Two poems, printed privately at Leipzig in 1880 under the name 'Carmen Sylva,' were followed by Stürme (1881), Leidens Erdengang (1882; translated into English as Pilgrim Sorrow by Helen Zimmern, 1884), Pensées d'une Reine (1882), Metster Manole (1892), &c. In the war of 1877-78 she endeared herself to her people by her devotion to the wounded, and she has diligently fostered the national women's industries. See Life by Baroness Deichmann (trans. 1890) and A Study by Mrs Roosevelt (1891).

Carnarvon, HENRY HOWARD MOLYNEUX HERBERT, EARL OF, born 24th June 1831, from Eton passed to Christ Church, Oxford, where in 1852 he took a first-class in classics. He had succeeded his father as fourth earl in 1849, and entered the Upper House as a Conservative. As Lord Derby's Colonial Secretary (1866) he had moved the second reading of a bill for the confederation of the British North American colonies, when, with the future Marquis of Salisbury, he resigned office upon the Reform Bill of 1867. On Disraeli's return to power in 1874, Carnarvon resumed office as Colonial Secretary, once more to resign in January 1878 on the despatch of the British fleet to the Dardanelles. In 1885-86 he was Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and his negotiations with Mr Parnell gave rise, two years later, to controversy. Carnarvon, who died 28th June 1890, was author of The Druses of Mount Lebanon (1860) and Reminiscences of Athens and the Morca (1869); translated the Agamemnon, the Odyssey, and the Prometheus Vincetus; and edited new letters of Chesterfield's.

Carneades (c. 213-129 B.C.), Greek philosopher, founder of the Third or New Academy, was born at Cyrene, and died at Athens. [Car-né-a-deez.]

Carnegie, ANDREW, iron-master, was born 25th November 1835, in Dumfermline, whence his father, a weaver, emigrated in 1847 to Pittsburgh. Factory hand, telegraphist, and railway clerk, he invested his savings in oil lands, and after the war in the business from which grew up the largest iron and steel works in America. He retired in 1901 with a fortune of £50,000,000 to Skibo Castle in Sutherland. He has bestowed over £40,000,000 on public libraries in the United States and Britain, the Scottish universities (£2,000,000), the Carnegie Institution at Pittsburgh (£2,000,000), trustees for the promotion of peace (£2,000,000), a hero fund (£250,000), &c. Besides records of coaching tours, he has published (1886-1905) Triumphant Democracy, The Gospel of Wealth, The Empire of Business, and a Life of James Watt. [Car-nee-gie; g hard.]

Carnot, LAZARE NICOLAS MARGUERITE (1758-1823), the 'organiser of victory' during the French Revolution, was born at Nolay, Côte d'Or, entered the army as engineer, in 1791 became a member of the Legislative Assembly, and in the Convention voted for the death of Louis XVI. During a mission to the army of the north, he took temporary command and gained the victory of Wattignies. Elected into the Committee of Public Safety and entrusted with the organisation of the armies of the Revolution, he raised fourteen armies, and drew up a plan of operations by which the forces of the European reaction were repelled from the frontier. Though he endeavoured to restrict the power of Robespierre, he was accused after the Reign of Terror; but the charge was dismissed.

Having as a member of the Directory opposed, in 1797, the extreme measures of Barras, his colleague, he was sentenced to deportation as a suspected royalist. Escaping to Germany, he wrote a defence which conducted to the overthrow of his colleagues in 1799. The 18th Brumaire brought him back to Paris, where in 1800, as Minister of War, he helped to achieve the brilliant results of the Italian and Rhenish campaigns. He retired when he understood the ambitious plans of the emperor, but on his reverses, hastened to offer his services, and received the command of Antwerp in 1814, which he heroically defended. During the Hundred Days he was Minister of the Interior; and after the second restoration retired first to Warsaw, and next to Magdeburg, where he died. He wrote much on mathematics, military tactics, &c. See his Mémoires (2 vols. 1861-64; new ed. 1893); his Correspondance, edited by Charavay (1892 et seqq.); and Lives by Arago (1850), Picaut (1885), and Bonnat (1888).—His son, NICOLAS LEONARD SADI (1796-1832), founder of the science of thermo-dynamics, was born at Paris, became a captain of engineers, but died of cholera. He wrote Réflexions sur la Puissance du Feu (1824).—Another son, LAZARE HIPPOLYTE CARNOT, born at St Omer, 6th April 1801, was in early life a disciple of St Simon, but left that school protesting against Enfantin's 'organisation of adultery,' and devoted himself to the inculcation of a more orthodox and virtuous socialism. After the February Revolution (1848) he was appointed Minister of Public Instruction, but soon resigned. In 1863 he entered the Corps Législatif, and the National Assembly in 1871. Elected a life-senator in 1875, he died 16th March 1888. He wrote an Exposé of St Simonianism and Mémoires of Henri Grégoire and of Barrère.—MARIE FRANÇOIS SADI CARNOT, President of the French Republic, was born at Limoges, 11th August 1837, the eldest son of the last named. He studied at the École Polytechnique, and became a civil engineer. In 1871 he was chosen to the National Assembly, and was finance minister in 1879 and 1887. Distinguished for integrity and moderation, he was in Dec. 1887, on Grévy's resignation, chosen President of the Republic, but was stabbed at Lyons by an anarchist, 24th June 1894. See Dreyfous' Les trois Carnot (1895). [Car-noh.]

Caro, ANNIBALE (1507-66), Italian poet and prose-writer, lived as secretary with a succession of cardinals, and died at Rome. [Cah-ro.]

Caro, ELMÉ MARIE, 'le philosophe des dames,' was born at Poitiers, March 4, 1826, became in 1857 a lecturer at the École Normale, and ten years later professor at the Sorbonne, in 1876 he was elected to the French Academy, and died 13th July 1887. His works include Le Mysticisme au XVIII. Siècle (1852-54), L'idée de Dieu (1864), La Philosophie de Goethe (1866), Le Matérialisme et la Science (1868), Le Pessimisme au XIX. Siècle (1878), Mélanges et Portraits (1888), and Variétés Littéraires (1889).

Caroline of ANSBACH (1683-1737), the queen of George II. (q.v.). For her granddaughter Caroline Matilda, see STRUENSEE.

Caroline, AMELIA ELIZABETH, wife of George IV., was the second daughter of Charles William, Duke of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, and of George III.'s sister, the Princess Augusta. She was born on 17th May 1768. In 1795 she was married to the Prince of Wales. The marriage was disagreeable to him, and although she bore him a daughter, the Princess Charlotte (q.v.), he let her live by herself at Shooters Hill and Blackheath, the object of much sympathy. Reports to her discredit led the king in 1806 to cause investigation to be made into her conduct, which was found to be imprudent, but not criminal. In 1814 she obtained leave to visit Brunswick, and afterwards to make a farther tour. She visited the Mediterranean coasts, and lived for some time on the Lake of Como, an Italian, Bergami, being in her company. When George came to the throne in 1820, she was offered an annuity of £50,000 to renounce the title of queen and live abroad; when she refused, and made a triumphal entry into London, the government instituted proceedings against her for adultery. Much that was very reprehensible was proved; but her husband's usage, and the splendid defence of Brougham, caused such a general feeling in her favour, that the ministry gave up the Divorce Bill after it had passed the House of Lords. She now assumed the rank of royalty, but was turned away with needless brutality from the door of Westminster Abbey on the day of her husband's coronation, 19th July 1821. On 7th August she died.

Carové, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1789-1852), philosopher and liberal Catholic, was born at Coblenz and died at Heidelberg.

Caracciolo, VITTORIO (c. 1450-1522), an early Venetian painter, was born in Venice, and was influenced by the Vivarini and Gentile Bellini. His rich colouring and accurate perspective, his boundless invention, his powerful delineation of character, and his love of varied incident, are visible in the nine subjects from the life of St Ursula, which he painted, 1490-95, for the school of St Ursula, Venice, and which are now preserved in the Accademia there. The nine subjects from the lives of the Saviour, and Saints Jerome, George, Tryphonius, 1502-3, painted for the school of San Giorgio de Schiavoni, are still preserved there. In 1510 he executed for San Giobbe his masterpiece, the 'Presentation in the Temple,' now in the Accademia. His later works show a marked decline in power. The 'Virgin and Child adored by the Doge Mocenigo,' in the National Gallery, London, is very doubtfully assigned to him. See the great work by Ludwig and Mollenhuth (1907). [Car-patch'o.]

Carpeaux, JEAN BAPTISTE, sculptor, was born at Valenciennes, 14th May 1827, in 1854 obtained the Prix de Rome, and died near Paris, 11th October 1875. His chef d'œuvre, the marble group, 'The Dance,' in the façade of the New Opera in Paris, showed his dramatic power. See a monograph by Chesneau (1880). [Car-po.]

Carpenter, MARY, philanthropist, was born at Exeter, 3d April 1807, the eldest child of Lant Carpenter, LL.D. (1780-1840), Unitarian minister at Exeter from 1805 till 1817, and afterwards at Bristol. Trained as a teacher, she took an active part in the movement for the reformation of neglected children, and founded a ragged school and several reformatories for girls. With philanthropic aims she visited India four times between 1866 and 1876, and America once (1873). She died 14th June 1877. Besides her reformatory writings she published Our Convicts (1864), The Last Days of Rammohun Roy (1866), and Six Months in India (1868). See Mary Carpenter, by J. E. Carpenter (1879).—Her brother, WILLIAM BENJAMIN CARPENTER, biologist, was born at Exeter, 29th October 1813. He studied medicine at Bristol, London (1833), and Edinburgh (1835-39). His graduation thesis (1839) on the nervous system of the invertebrates led up to his Principles of General and Comparative Physiology (1839). Removing to London in 1844, he was appointed Fullerian professor of Physiology at the Royal Institution, lecturer at the London Hospital and University College (1849), examiner at the university of London, and its registrar (1856-79), and, on his retirement, C.B. His death, 19th November 1885, resulted from burns caused by the upsetting of a spirit-lamp. He made valuable researches on the Foraminifera, Eozoon Canadense, feather-stars and crinoids, mind and brain, and unconscious cerebration. Other works are Principles of Human Physiology (1846), Principles of Mental Physiology (1874), and Nature and Man (1888), with a memoir by J. E. Carpenter. The Microscope and its Revelations is still popular.

Carpenter, WILLIAM BÖYD, Bishop of Ripon, 1884-1911, was born 26th March 1841.

Carpini, or JOHANNES DE PIAN DEL CARPINE, a Franciscan monk, was born in Umbria about 1182, and died Archbishop of Antivari some time before 1253. He was head of the mission sent by Pope Innocent IV. to the emperor of the Mongols, whose warlike advances had thrown Christendom into consternation. A big, fat man, more than sixty years old, he started from Lyons in April 1245, and, crossing the Dnieper, Don, Volga, Ural, and Jaxartes, in the summer of 1246 reached Karakorum, beyond Lake Baikal, thence returning to Kieff in June 1247, and so back to Lyons. The hardships of the journey were great, and one ride of 3000 miles in 106 days surpasses the best records of most modern travellers. Hakluyt copied much of the Latin narrative of his travels into his Navigations and Discoveries (1598); but the first complete edition of the text was D'Arvezac's (1839). [Car-pe'nee.]

Carpo'crates of ALEXANDRIA flourished in the first decades of the 2d century A.D., and founded the Gnostic sect of Carporations.

Carpozov, BENEDICT (1595-1666), writer on law, held high offices at Dresden and Leipzig. His brother JOHANN BENEDICT (1607-57), professor of Theology at Leipzig, published his Systema Theologicum in 1633.

Carr, JOSEPH WILLIAMS COMYNS, critic, playwright, and director of the New Gallery, born in 1849, was called to the bar in 1872.

Carr, ROBERT. See OVERBURY.

Carracci. See CARACCI.

Carranza, BARTHOLOMÆUS DE (1503-76), born at Miranda in Navarre, entered the Dominican order, became professor of Theology at Valladolid, and in 1554 accompanied Philip II. to England, where he was confessor to Queen Mary, and where his zealous efforts to re-establish Catholicism gained him the confidence of Philip and the archbishopric of Toledo. Here, however, he was accused of heresy, and imprisoned by the Inquisition in 1559. In 1567 he was removed to Rome, and confined in the castle of St Angelo. He died a few days after his release.

Carrel', ARMAND, publicist and republican, was born at Rouen, 8th May 1800, in 1830 became editor of the National, and, wounded in a duel with Émile de Girardin, died two days after, 24th July 1836. Littré and Paulin edited his Œuvres Politiques et Littéraires (5 vols. 1857-58).

Carrér, LUIGI (1801-50), poet, was born and died in Venice. See Life by Venanzio (1854).

Carrick, THOMAS (1802-75), miniaturist, was born near Carlisle, and died at Newcastle.

Carrier, JEAN BAPTISTE, an infamous revolutionist, was born at Yolai, near Aurillac, in 1756. In the National Convention he helped to form the Revolutionary Tribunal, voted for the death of the king, demanded the arrest of the Duke of Orleans, and assisted in the overthrow of the Girondists. At Nantes in 1793 he massacred in four months 16,000 Vendean and other prisoners, chiefly by drowning them in the Loire (the noyades), but also by shooting them, as in a battue. Even Robespierre was offended by these enormities, and recalled Carrier; and after the fall of Robespierre, Carrier was tried, and perished by the guillotine, 16th December 1794. [Car-gay.]

Carrier-Belleuse, ALBERT ERNEST (1824-87), a French sculptor.

Carrière, EUGÈNE, born 21st January 1849 at Gournay-sur-Marne, and resided at Paris, was called by Edmond de Goncourt 'the modern Madonna painter.' His portraits, as of Daudet, are also remarkable. [Car-ee-ehr.']

Carrière, MORIZ (1817-95), philosopher, born at Griedel, in Hesse, in 1853 became professor of Philosophy at Munich. Among his works (13 vols. 1886-91) are Asthetik (1859) and Kunst und Kulturentwicklung (1863-74). [Car-ee-ehr.']

Carrington, RICHARD CHRISTOPHER (1826-75), astronomer, was born in Chelsea.

Carroll, LEWIS. See DODGSON, CHARLES.

Carruthers, ROBERT, LL.D. (1799-1878), biographer of Pope, born at Dumfries, in 1828 became editor, and in 1831 proprietor, of the Inverness Courier.

Carson, CHRISTOPHER or 'KIT' (1809-68), emigrated from Kentucky to Missouri as a trapper and hunter. His knowledge of Indian habits and languages brought him to be guide in Frémont's explorations, and Indian agent in New Mexico (1853). For services here in the civil war, he was breveted brigadier-general. He died at Fort Lynn, Colorado. See Life by Charles Burdett (Phila. 1869).

Carstares, WILLIAM, born in Cathcart manse, near Glasgow, February 11, 1649, after four years (1663-67) at the university of Edinburgh, went in 1669 to study theology at Utrecht, where his scholarship, polite address, knowledge of men, and great political information, recommended him to the Prince of Orange, who chose him as confidential adviser in all matters relating to Britain. Coming to London in 1672, he was arrested in 1675 and examined before Lauderdale, and kept prisoner in Edinburgh Castle till 1679. In 1683 he was again arrested at Tenterden in Kent, conveyed to Edinburgh, and put to the torture of the boot and thumb-screw; his deposition as to Argyll's plot was used against Baillie of Jerviswood. After an imprisonment of a year and a half, at London, Edinburgh, and Stirling, he returned to Holland to be second minister of the English church at Leyden (1686) and chaplain to the Prince of Orange. He accompanied him in the invasion of 1688, and afterwards secured good relations between the new king and the Scottish Church. From 1693 to the death of the king in 1702 he could not have had more influence in Scottish affairs if he had been prime-minister; he was popularly called 'Cardinal Carstares' by the Jacobites. He was elected principal of Edinburgh University in 1703, in 1704 was presented to the church of Greyfriars, and in 1705-14 was four times Moderator of the General Assembly. His influence helped to pass the Treaty of Union. He died December 28, 1715. See Life of Carstares, by Principal Story (1874).

Carstens, ASMUS JAKOB (1754-98), reviver of art in Germany, was born near Sleswick, and studied art at Copenhagen; in 1783-88 barely supported himself by portrait-painting in Lübeck and Berlin before his 'Fall of the Angels' gained him a professorship in the Academy. He was a precursor of Overbeck and Cornelius. Many of his subjects are classical—from Dante and Shakespeare. See Lives by Fernow (1806; new ed. 1807), Schöne (1806), and Sach (1881).

Carte, RICHARD D'OYLY (1844-1901), built the Savoy Theatre, where he produced Gilbert and Sullivan's operas.

Carte, THOMAS, historian, was born in 1686 at Clifton-upon-Dunsmore vicarage, near Rugby. Educated at University College, Oxford (1698-1702), he took his M.A. both there and at Cambridge, and receiving holy orders in 1707, was appointed reader at the Abbey Church, Bath. In 1714, however, he resigned rather than take the oaths to the Hanoverian government. In 1722 he was suspected of complicity in the conspiracy of Atterbury, whose secretary he was, and £1000 was offered for his apprehension; but he escaped to France, where he remained till 1728. After his return, he published a Life of James, Duke of Ormonde (2 vols. 1736), and a History of England to 1654 (4 vols. 1747-55), whose prospects were blighted by an unlucky note, ascribing to the Pretender the gift of touching for the king's evil. Carte died at Caldecott House, near Abingdon, 2d April 1754.

Carter, ELIZABETH (1717-1806), Greek scholar, poet, &c., best known by her translation of Epictetus, was born at Deal, and died in London. Among her friends were Dr Johnson, Bishop Butler, Archbishop Secker, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Burke, and Horace Walpole. See Lives by Pennington (2d ed. 1808) and Miss Gausson (1906).

Carter, GEORGE (1737-94), painter, was born at Colchester, and died at Hendon.

Carter, HENRY. See LESLIE, FRANK.

Carteret, JOHN, EARL GRANVILLE, orator, diplomatist, and statesman, was born April 22, 1690, the son of Baron Carteret, and studied at Westminster School and Christ Church College, Oxford. On the accession of George I., Carteret became, as a Whig, a Lord of the Bedchamber. In 1719 he was ambassador extraordinary to Sweden, and arranged treaties of peace between Sweden, Denmark, Hanover, and Prussia. In 1721 he was appointed one of the two foreign secretaries, and as such, attended in 1723 the congress of Cambrai. As Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland (1724-30) he ordered the prosecution of the author, printer, and publisher of Draper's Letters; on his recommendation Wood's coinage was abandoned (1725). In spite of the Drapier prosecution, Swift and he became warm friends. In 1730-42 he led in the House of Lords the party opposed to Walpole, and became the real head of the next administration, although nominally only Secretary of State—his foreign policy being to support Maria Theresa. He was with George II. at the battle of Dettingen (1743). Now become Earl Granville, he was driven from power by the Pelhams in 1744, though from 1751 till his death he was President of the Council under Henry Pelham, and twice refused the premiership. He died January 2, 1763. See the Life by Ballantyne (1887), and the Carteret Papers in the British Museum.

Carteret, PHILIP, navigator, sailed as lieutenant in Byron's voyage (1764-66), and commanded the second vessel in Wallis's expedition (22d August 1766). Separated from Wallis next April while clearing the Strait of Magellan, he discovered Pitcairn and other small islands (one of the Solomons bears his name), and returned round the Cape of Good Hope to England, 20th March 1769. He retired in 1794, a rear-admiral, and died at Southampton, 21st July 1796.

Cartesius. See DESCARTES.

Cartier, SIR GEORGE ÉTIENNE (1814-73), became Attorney-general for Lower Canada in 1856, and was Prime-minister from 1858 to 1862.

Cartier, JACQUES, a French navigator, the discoverer of the St Lawrence, was born at St Malo, 31st December 1494; between 1534 and 1541 made three voyages of discovery to North America; returned to St Malo; and died 1st September 1557. See Life by Jotion des Longrais (Par. 1888). [Kar-te-ay.]

Cartouche, LOUIS DOMINIQUE (c. 1693-1721), the head of a Paris band of robbers, was broken on the wheel. See work by Maurice (Par. 1859).

Cartwright, EDMUND, inventor of the power-loom, was born at Marnham, Notts, 24th April 1743. Educated at Wakefield and University College, Oxford, he became rector of Goadby-Marwood, Leicestershire (1779), where on his glebe he made improvements in agriculture. A visit in 1784 to Arkwright's cotton-spinning mills resulted (1785-90) in his power-loom. Attempts to employ it at Doncaster and Manchester met with fierce opposition; it was not till the 19th century that it came into practical use. Cartwright also took out patents for combing wool (1790) and various other inventions; he even joined Robert Fulton in his efforts after steam-navigation. All these labours brought him no direct gain, but in 1809 government made him a grant of £10,000. He died at Hastings, 30th October 1823. See his Life (1843).

Cartwright, JOHN, the 'Father of Reform,' and elder brother of the preceding, was born 17th September 1740. He served in the navy (1758-70) under Howe; in 1775 he became major to the Notts militia. He now began to write on politics, advocating annual parliaments, the ballot, and manhood suffrage, and afterwards taking up reform in farming, abolition of slavery, the national defences, and the liberties of Spain and Greece. Fined £100 for seditious in 1820, he died in London, 23d September 1824. Of his eighty books and tracts a list is given in the Life by his niece (1826).

Cartwright, PETER (1785-1872), Methodist preacher, born in Virginia, was ordained in Kentucky in 1806, and in 1823 removed to Illinois. See his Autobiography (1856), and The Backwoods Preacher (Lond. 1869).

Cartwright, THOMAS, Puritan divine, was born in Hertfordshire in 1535. Forced to quit Cambridge as a Protestant, he returned on Mary's death, and, after a sojourn in Ireland (1565-67), became in 1569 Lady Margaret Divinity professor. But his lectures offended the authorities, who deprived him. He travelled on the Continent, and after his return to England in 1572 was several times imprisoned for nonconformity. He was pastor awhile of the English church in Antwerp, and venturing back in 1585 was once more committed to prison. He died master of a hospital at Warwick, 27th December 1603.

Cartwright, WILLIAM (1611-43), playwright, poet, and preacher, was born at Northway, near Tewkesbury, and died at Oxford.

Carus, JULIUS VICTOR (1823-1903), zoologist, born at Leipzig, from 1849 to 1851 was keeper of the museum of comparative anatomy at Oxford. In 1853 he became professor of Comparative Anatomy at Leipzig. He died in April 1903. [Kah'roos.]

Carus, KARL GUSTAV (1789-1869), scholar, physiologist, physician, and artist, was born at Leipzig, and died at Dresden. See his Lebens-erinnerungen (4 vols. Leip. 1865-66).

Carver, JOHN, born about 1575, was the leader of the Pilgrim Fathers, and died at New Plymouth, Massachusetts, in April 1621, within five months of their landing.

Cary, ALICE (1820-71), poet, story-teller, &c., was born near Cincinnati, and removed in 1852 to New York.—Her sister, PHOEBE (1824-71), also wrote verse. See Mrs Ames's Memorial of the sisters (1873).

Cary, HENRY FRANCIS, translator of Dante, was born at Gibraltar, 6th December 1772. He was educated at Rugby, Sutton Coldfield, and Birmingham, in 1790 entered Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1796 took holy orders. In 1805 he published a translation of the Inferno, in 1814 of the whole Divina Commedia, a translation remarkable for fidelity, force, and expressiveness. He afterwards translated Pindar's Odes and Aristophanes' Birds, and wrote memoirs in continuation of Johnson's Lives of the Poets. Assistant-librarian in the British Museum (1826-37), he died 14th August 1844, and was buried in Westminster Abbey beside Samuel Johnson. See Memoir by his son (2 vols. 1847).

Cary, LUCIUS. See FALKLAND.

Cary, SIR ROBERT. See CAREY.

Casa, GIOVANNI DELLA (1503-56), author, was born near Florence, and died in Rome.

Casabianca, LOUIS, a French naval officer, born at Bastia about 1755, sat in the National Convention of 1792, and was captain of the flagship L'Orient at the battle of the Nile, August 1, 1798. He was mortally wounded; the ship caught fire; his ten-year-old son would not leave him; and both perished in the final explosion.

Casanova de Seingalt, GIOVANNI JACOPO, adventurer, was born at Venice, 2d April 1725, and by 1750 had been abbé, secretary to Cardinal Aquaviva, ensign, and violinist at Rome, Constantinople, Corfu, and his own birthplace, where he cured a senator of apoplexy. His irregularities drove him from Venice, but after roaming through Northern Italy and France he was back there in 1755, and was then condemned to five years' imprisonment in the 'Piombi.' In fifteen months' time he effected a daring escape, and for nearly twenty years wandered through Europe, visiting most of its capitals, and making the acquaintance of the greatest men and women of the day, from the pope to Madame de Pompadour, and from Cagliostro to Frederick the Great. Alchemist, cabalist, knight of the papal order of the Golden Spur, and spy, he was everywhere introduced to the best society, and had always to 'vanish' after a brief period of felicity. In 1785 he established himself with the Count of Waldstein, at his castle of Dux in Bohemia, and there he died 4th June 1798. His clever, cynical Mémoires écrits par Lui-même (12 vols. Leip. 1828-38; new ed. 3 vols. Par. 1880) are unmatched as a self-revelation of scoundrelism. See Armand-Baschet in Le Livre (1881), and a Life by Maynard (trans. 1911).—Two of his brothers were painters—GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1728-95), from 1764 director of the Dresden Academy; and FRANCESCO (1727-1805), famous for his battle-pieces.

Casas, LAS. See LAS CASAS.

Casati, GAETANO, born in 1858 near Monza, travelled much in Central Africa, especially Unyoro, till 1889. He died in 1902. [Kas-ah'tee.]

Casaubon, ISAAC, classical scholar, was born at Geneva, February 18, 1559, and was often hampered in his incessant labours by broken health and narrow means. In 1583 he became professor of Greek at Geneva; in 1586 he married the daughter of the famous Henri Stephens. He was made Greek professor at Montpellier in 1596, and royal librarian at Paris in 1598. After the death of Henry IV. his Protestantism exposed him to risk; and removing in 1610 to London, he was made a prebendary of Canterbury, and died in London, July 12, 1614. His works include De Satyrica Græcorum Poëst et Romanorum Satira (1605), De Libertate Ecclesiastica (1607), the Exercitationes contra Baronium (1614), and editions of Aristotle, Diogenes Laertius, Theophrastus, Polybius, Strabo, Theocritus, Athenæus (1600), Persius, Suetonius, &c. See Isaac Casaubon, by Mark Pattison (1875; 2d ed. 1892).—His son, MÉRIC CASAU BON (1599-1671), was born at Geneva, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, and died rector of Ickham, near Canterbury. He edited Terence, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, &c., and vindicated his father in two Latin works.

Casimir, the name of many Polish princes and kings. Under Casimir I. in 1041, Christianity was established in Poland. Casimir III., the Great, became king in 1333, founded Cracow university (1364), and died 5th November 1370.

Casimir-Périer, JEAN PIERRE PAUL (1847-1907), French President, was born at Paris, the son of Casimir Périer (q.v.). In 1871 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, for military services during the siege of Paris. A moderate republican, he was elected a deputy in 1874, and was successively under-secretary for instruction and for war, vice-president of the Chamber (1885-93), and president of the Chamber (1893). Premier of France for six months in 1893-94, he was again president of the Chamber, when, on the assassination of M. Carnot (June 1894), he was called to become President of the Republic—an office he resigned in January 1895.

Caspari, KARL PAUL (1814-92), born at Dessau, professor of Theology at Christiania, wrote an Arabic grammar, works on Isaiah, Micah, Daniel, and a church history. [Kas-pah'ree.]

Cass, LEWIS, born at Exeter, New Hampshire, 9th October 1782, was called to the Ohio bar in 1803, but rose to be general in the war of 1812. He was then for eighteen years civil governor of Michigan, which under his skillful administration became a settled state. In 1831-36 he was Secretary of War, and in 1836-42 Minister at Paris. He twice failed in a try for the presidency, sat in the senate 1845-57, and was Secretary of State in 1857-60. He died at Detroit 17th June 1866. His position was generally one of compromise, but was bitterly hostile to Britain. He published works on the Indians (1823) and France (1840). See Lives by W. L. Smith (1856) and M'Laughlin (1891).

Cassagnac, ADOLPHE GRANIER DE (1806-80), journalist, came from Gers to Paris in 1832, where his vehement writing in the journals brought him many duels and law-suits. In 1840

he went to the West Indies and married a Creole. Until 1848 a zealous Orleanist, he became a strenuous imperialist, and as such represented his native department from 1852 to 1870. He became editor of the semi-official Le Pays, and published two romances and a number of compilations.—His son, PAUL ADOLPHE MARIE (born 2d December 1843), joined him on Le Pays (1866), fought at Sedan in 1870. After 1872 he violently advocated the imperialist cause, as deputy was troublesome to friends and foes, and edited the 'Victorist' organ Autorité till his death, 4th November 1904. [Kas-san'yak.]

Cassander (c. 354-297), from 318 king of Macedonia, the father of Philip.

Cassell, JOHN (23d January 1817—2d April 1865), the son of a Manchester innkeeper, came to London in 1836 as temperance advocate, in 1847 started as a tea and coffee merchant, and, turning author and publisher, in 1859 entered into partnership with Messrs Petter & Galpin.

Cassianus, JOANNES (360?-448?), monk, spent some years as an ascetic in the Egyptian deserts, was ordained by Chrysostom at Constantinople in 403, and afterwards instituted several monasteries in the south of France, including the Abbey of St Victor at Massilia (Marseilles), which served as a model for many in Gaul and Spain. Cassianus was one of the first of the 'semi-Pelagians.' There is an edition of his works by Gazeus (1616). See Wiggers' De Johanne Cassiano (1822), and Life by Principal Gibson in vol. xi. of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers (1895).

Cassie, JAMES (1819-79), Scottish painter of landscapes and sea-pieces.

Cassi'ni, GIOVANNI DOMENICO (1625-1712), astronomer, was born near Nice, in 1650 became professor of Astronomy at Bologna, and in 1669 took charge of the observatory at Paris, where he died. He greatly extended our knowledge of the sun's parallax, the periods of Jupiter, Mars, and Venus, the zodiacal light, &c.—His son and successor, JACQUES (1677-1756), wrote on astronomy and electricity.—His son, CÉSAR (1714-84), also a distinguished scientist, left a son, JEAN DOMINIQUE (1748-1845), who, keeper of the Paris observatory, and ennobled, completed the great map of France begun by his father.

Cassiodorus, MAGNUS AURELIUS (468-568), was born of noble family at Scylaceum (Squillace) in Calabria, and became secretary to the great Ostrogothic king, Theodoric. He was quæstor and prætorian prefect, sole consul in 514, and after Theodoric's death (526) chief minister to Queen Amalasontha. His history of the Goths (De Rebus Geticis) we possess only in Jordanes' epitome. Of his official letters Hodgkin published a condensed translation in 1866.

Cassius, or in full, Caius Cassius Longinus, conspirator, was quæstor to Crassus in the Parthian war (54 B.C.), saved the credit of Roman arms after the commander's disastrous defeat and death, and as tribune of the people (49) attached himself to Pompey. After Pharsalia he was taken prisoner and pardoned by Cæsar. In 44 B.C. as prætor he attached to himself the aristocrats who resented Cæsar's supremacy, and won over M. Brutus; and the same year Cæsar was murdered. But popular feeling blazed out, and Mark Antony seized his opportunity. Cassius fled to the east, united his forces with those of Brutus, and at Philippi being routed, compelled his freedman to kill him.

Cassius. See DION CASSIUS.

Cassivellaunus, a British chief who fought against Cæsar on his second invasion, 54 B.C.

Castaños, FRANCISCO XAVER DE, DUKE OF BAILEN (1756-1852), a Spanish general, who in July 1808 compelled 18,000 French to surrender at Bailen, but was defeated by Lannes at Tudela. Under Wellington he took part in the battles of Albuera, Salamanca, and Vittoria.

Castelar, EMILIO (1832-99), Spanish orator, statesman, and writer, was born at Cadiz. He studied at Madrid, in 1856 became professor there of History and Philosophy, began early to write on letters and politics, and in 1864 started La Democracia. After the abortive rising of 1866 he was condemned to death, but contrived to escape to Paris, returning at the revolution of 1868. All his eloquence could not hinder the crowning of King Amadeus, though it helped to bring about his downfall in 1873. Then the Cortes made Castelar dictator, but he found himself unable to crush either Socialism or Carlism. In the beginning of 1874 a hostile vote in the Cortes obliged him to resign, and soon after the pronunciamento in favour of Alfonso XII. drove him across the frontier. He returned to Spain in 1876, and till his withdrawal from public life in 1893, he often spoke in the Cortes with all his old fire and eloquence. His writings include La Civilizacion en los cinco primeros siglos (2d ed. 1865), Questiones politicas (1870), Discursos parlamentarios (1871), Vida de Byron (1873), El Movimiento republicano en Europa (2 vols. 1874), La Question de Oriente (1876). See Lives by Sanchez de Real (Madr. 1874), Sandoval (Par. 1886), D. Hannay (1896), and Araco (1900); also Grant Duff's Miscellanies (1879).

Castelli, IONAZ FRANZ (1781-1862), a German poet, was born and died in Vienna.

Castello, SEBASTIANUS (1515-63), a theologian, born in Savoy, studied at Lyons, and about 1540, on Calvin's recommendation, was appointed rector of a school at Geneva. His toleration, however, and views as to the Song of Solomon (a mere erotic poem to him) and Christ's descent into hell embroiled him with the reformer; and in 1544 he was forced to migrate to Basel, where in 1553 he became Greek professor. He translated the Bible into Latin and French. See Lives by Mahly (Basel, 1862), Broussoux (Strasb. 1867), and Buison (Par. 1892).

Castelnau, FRANCIS, COMTE DE (1812-80), a French traveller in N. and S. America, Africa, Arabia, &c., was born in London, and died at Melbourne, where he was consul from 1862.

Casti, GIAMBATTISTA, poet, born (c. 1721) at Prato, in Tuscany, took orders, but in 1764 was made poet-laureate to the court of Vienna. On Joseph II.'s death (1790) he returned to Florence, and in 1798 removed to Paris, where he died, 6th February 1803. He wrote the 48 Novelle Galanti (Paris, 1793), and Gli Animati Parlanti (1802), a political satire of charming spirit and grace, freely rendered by W. S. Rose in 1819.

Castiglione, BALDASARRE, COUNT (1478-1529), author, was born near Mantua, and in 1505 was sent by the Duke of Urbino as envoy to Henry VII. of England, who made him a knight. He lived much in Rome, and died at Toledo on an embassy for Clement VII. His chief work, Il Cortegiano (Eng. trans. 1561), a manual for courtiers, and his Italian and Latin Poems are models of elegance; and his Letters (1769-71) illustrate political and literary history. See his Life and Letters by Mrs Ady (1908). [Cast-teel-yo'-nay.]

Castiglione, CARLO OTTAVIO, COUNT (1784-1849), numismatist, editor of Ultilas, &c., was born at Milan and died at Genoa.

Castilho, ANTONIO FELICIANO (1800-75), Portuguese poet, was born and died at Lisbon. See Life by his son (Libs. 1881). [Cast-teel-yo.]

Castillejo, CRISTÓVAL DE (c. 1490-1556), last of the Spanish court poets, was born at Ciudad Rodrigo, and died in Vienna. [Cast-teel-yay-ho.]

Castlereagh, ROBERT STEWART, VISCOUNT, was born 18th June 1769, the son of an Ulster proprietor, who in 1789 was created Baron Londonderry, in 1795 Viscount Castlereagh, in 1796 Earl, and in 1816 Marquis, of Londonderry. Robert was educated at Armagh, and, after a twelvemonth at St John's College, Cambridge, was making the grand tour of Europe when in 1790 he was returned to the Irish parliament as Whig member for County Down—the election cost his father £60,000. He turned Tory in 1795, and next year became Keeper of the Privy Seal; but he continued a steadfast supporter of Catholic emancipation. As Irish Chief-secretary from 1797, he bent his whole energies to forwarding Pitt's measure of Union—a measure carried in 1800, largely through Castlereagh's skill in buying up the borough-mongers; but Pitt's pledges to the Catholics were defeated by George III.'s bigotry, and Castlereagh with Pitt retired from office. In the weak Addington ministry (1802) he was President of the Board of Control; but the second era in his career was as War Minister from July 1805 to January 1806, and again from April 1807 to September 1809. The bombardment of Copenhagen and seizure of the Danish fleet, the extension of the war to the Peninsula, and selection of Wellesley for general, may be set off against the Walcheren expedition, whose failure was due to the king's obstinacy in giving Lord Chatham the command. But Castlereagh was made the scapegoat, and the shilly-shally behaviour of his colleagues caused him to challenge his great rival, Canning. On 21st September 1809 they met upon Putney Heath, and, at the second fire, Canning received a slight wound in the thigh. Castlereagh's real greatness begins with March 1812, when, as Foreign Secretary under Lord Liverpool, he became the soul of the coalition against Napoleon in 1813-14. He represented England at the congresses of Chatillon and Vienna in 1814-15, at the treaty of Paris in 1815, at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818; and he was preparing to start for a congress at Verona, when, on 12th August 1822, in a fit of insanity, he committed suicide with a penknife at Fooks Cray, his Kentish seat. England and Europe owe much to Castlereagh for the forty years' peace that succeeded Napoleon's downfall. Yet no statesman, save Strafford, was ever pursued with more rancorous hatred—a hatred that raised a shout of exultation as he was borne to his grave in Westminster Abbey. To many even at the present day he is still the cold-blooded repressor of the Irish rebellion, the 'executioner in enamel,' the sympathiser with the Holy Alliance, the tool of Metternich, Queen Caroline's persecutor, and the author of the Peterloo massacre and the coercive 'Six Acts.' His failings have been exaggerated, his splendid services in diplomacy lost sight of or tardily recognised; but, in truth, as a minister, Lord Castlereagh was not lovable. He had succeeded his father as second marquis in 1821, and leaving no issue by his accomplished wife, a daughter of the Earl of Buckinghamshire, whom he married in 1794, was himself succeeded by his half-brother, Sir Charles Stewart (1778-1854), a gallant soldier, diplomatist, and statesman, who edited Castlereagh's Correspondence and Despatches (12 vols. 1847-53). See Sir A. Alison's Lives of the two brothers (3 vols. 1851); Lady Londonderry's Life of Castlereagh (1904), and A. Hassall's (1909); and Lord Salisbury's essay. [Formerly Kas'l-rayf.]

Castren, MATHIAS ALEXANDER (1813-52), philologist, was born at Tervola, in the north of Finland, studied at Helsingfors (1830-36), and in 1838 walked through Finnish Lapland, in 1839 through Karelia, to collect ballads, legends, &c. On his return, he published in Swedish a translation of the great Finnish epic, the Kalevala. During 1841-45, conjointly with Lonnot, he prosecuted researches among the Laplanders; whilst, as ethnographer to the St Petersburg Academy, he in 1845-49 extended his investigations to China and the Arctic Ocean. On his return he was appointed professor of the Finnish language and literature at Helsingfors. His eighteen works, published mostly in Swedish (twelve after his death), include his travels, lectures on Finnish mythology and the Altai races, grammars, vocabularies, &c. See his Life by Snellman (1870). A son, Robert Castren (1851-83), wrote on Finnish history. [Kas-trayn.]

Castro, GUILLEN DE (1569-1631), dramatist, was born in Valencia, commanded a Neapolitan fortress, but later lived in Madrid, and died in poverty. To his Lus Mucedades del Cid Corneille was deeply indebted. See Lord Holland's Lives of Lope de Vega and Castro (1817).

Castro, INEZ DE, the daughter of a Spanish nobleman, in 1340 came to Portugal in the train of her cousin Costanza, the bride of the Infante, Dom Pedro. Her beauty captivated him, and, after Costanza's death in 1345, he made her his mistress, in 1354 his wife. But by authority of his father, Alfonso IV., she was stabbed to death in January 1355.

Castro, JOÃO DE, born at Lisbon in 1500, volunteered against the Moors at Tangiers, accompanied Charles V. to Tunis, and had already fought and travelled in the East, when in 1545 he sailed to India at the head of a small expedition. Here, after his heroic relief and defence of Diu, he was appointed Portuguese viceroy, but died in the arms of Francis Xavier, June 6, 1548. See Life by Andrada (1651; trans. 1664).

Castruccio-Castracani (1281-1328), a Ghibelline soldier of fortune, who in 1327 was made Duke of Lucca. [Kas-trootsh'yo-Kas-tra-kah'nee.]

Catalani, ANGELICA, born in 1779 at Sinigaglia, was educated in a convent near Rome, where at six she displayed wonderful vocal powers. She made her début at Venice in 1797, and had a succession of triumphs in every country in Europe for over thirty years, making vast sums of money—e.g. nearly £10,000 during a four months' engagement in London (1806). She retired from the stage in 1827, settling near Florence; in 1849 she repaired with her daughters to Paris, where she died of cholera on 13th June. [Ka-ta-lah'nee.]

Catchpole, MARGARET (1773-1841), a Suffolk girl who for horse-stealing and jail-breaking was twice sentenced to death (1797, 1800), but was transported to Australia, where she married and died respected. See the semi-fictional Life by the Rev. R. Cobbold (1845).

Catesby, MARK (c. 1679-1749), naturalist, was probably born and died in London, and travelled in North America in 1710-19 and 1722-26.

Catesby, ROBERT (1573-1605), was a Northamptonshire Catholic of good fortune and lineage, being sixth in descent from Richard III.'s Catesby, hanged three days after Bosworth. Robert had suffered much as a recusant both by fines and imprisonment, when in 1604 he engaged in the Gunpowder Plot. He was shot dead in the defence of Holbeach House.

Catharine, Sr, a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the gospel at a sacrificial feast appointed by the Emperor Maximinus, and was beheaded, after they had vainly attempted to torture her on a toothed wheel, 307 A.D.—ST CATHARINE OF SIENNA (1347-80) was the daughter of a dyer in Sienna. She became a Dominican, and so is a patron saint of the Dominicans. Her enthusiasm converted hardened sinners, and she prevailed on Pope Gregory XI. to return from Avignon to Rome. Christ's Stigmata were said to be imprinted on her body. She was canonised in 1461. She wrote devotional pieces, letters, and poems (ed. by Tomasseo, 4 vols. Florence, 1860); her ecstatic Dialogue was Englished in 1896. See Miss Drane's History of St Catharine (3d ed. 1899). Three other saints are CATHARINE OF BOLOGNA (1413-63), CATHARINE OF SWEDEN (died 1381), and CATHARINE RICCI (1522-89), a Tuscan prioress.

Catharine de' Medici (French spelling Médicis), wife of one king of France, and mother of three, was the daughter of Lorenzo de' Medici, Duke of Urbino, and was born at Florence in 1519. In her fourteenth year she was married to Henry, second son of Francis I., but was slighted at the French court, even after the accession of her husband. On the accession of her eldest son, Francis II., in 1559, she found some scope for her ambition; and on the accession of her second son, Charles IX., in 1560, the government fell entirely into her hands. She sought to rally the Huguenot leaders around the throne to serve as a counterpoise to the Guises. But after the peace of Amboise, she became alarmed at the increase of the Protestant power, and entered into a secret treaty with Spain, and into a plot with the Guises, which resulted in the fearful massacre of St Bartholomew's Day. She got her third son elected to the Polish throne. But her tyrannical administration at home roused a Catholic party, headed by her fourth son, the Duke of Alençon; and it was believed that she was privy to the machinations that led to his death. When, after Charles IX.'s death, Henry III. returned from Poland to be king of France, his mother still ruled the court; but having betrayed all who trusted them, she and her son were abhorred by Catholic and Protestant alike. She died at Blois, 5th January 1589. See works by Renmont (1854), T. A. Trollope (1856), Capetigue (1856), and Miss Sichel (1905 and 1908), and her letters (1880-99). [Meh'di-see.]

Catharine I. (c. 1684-1727), Empress of Russia, was the daughter of a Lithuanian peasant, her original name being Martha Skavrouska. Left an orphan, she was brought up by a Lutheran pastor at Marienburg in Livonia. In 1702 she married a Swedish dragoon, but Marienburg being taken by the Russians, she became the mistress of Prince Menschikoff, and then of Peter the Great, being in 1703 baptised into the Greek Church as Catharina Alexievna. She was married to the emperor in 1712, and on Peter's death in 1725 was acknowledged Empress of Russia, when she surrendered herself to Menschikoff's direction.

Catharine II., Empress of Russia, was born at Stettin, 2d May 1729, daughter of the Prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, and was married to Peter, heir to the Russian throne, in 1745. She soon quarrelled with her husband, and her intimacy first with Soltikoff and then with Poniatowski was scandalous. After Peter III.'s accession in 1761, the conjugal differences became continually wider. Catharine was banished to a separate abode, till Peter was dethroned by a conspiracy, and Catharine made empress. A few days afterwards Peter was murdered (July 1762). Catharine now made a show of regard for the Greek Church, although her principles were those of the French philosophers. The government was carried on with great energy; and the dominions and power of Russia rapidly increased. When discontent was manifested, the young prince Ivan, the hope of the disaffected, was murdered in the castle of Schlüsselburg. From that time internal politics consisted in court intrigues for and against one favourite or another, Potemkin (q.v.) being the best known. The first partition of Poland in 1772 and the Turkish war (1774) vastly increased the empire; so did a war with Sweden (1790) and another Turkish war (1792). The second and third partitions of Poland, and the incorporation of Courland with Russia, completed the triumphs of Catharine's reign. A stroke of apoplexy cut her off on the 17th November 1796. She was a woman of great ability, and though she had in full the vices of her time and station, distinguished French authors flattered her and lived at her court. See two French works by Waliszewski (Eng. trans. 4 vols. 1893-94).

Catharine of Valois (1401-37), the youngest daughter of Charles VI. of France, in 1420 was married at Troyes to Henry V. (q.v.) of England; in 1421 gave birth to Henry VI.; and, after Henry V.'s death (1422), married Owen Tudor, a poor Welsh squire, her son by whom, Edmund, was Henry VII.'s father. Catharine died at Bermondsey Abbey. See vol. iii. of Miss Strickland's Queens of England.

Catharine of Aragon, queen of England, the first wife of Henry VIII., and fourth daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, was born December 1485. Married on 14th November 1501, when scarcely sixteen, to Arthur (1486-1502), Prince of Wales, son of Henry VII., she was left a widow on 2d April, and on 25th June was betrothed to her brother-in-law Henry, as yet a boy only eleven years old. The pope's dispensation enabling such near relatives to marry was obtained in 1504, and the marriage took place in June 1509, seven weeks after Henry's accession to the crown. Between 1510 and 1518 she bore him five children, one only of whom, the Princess Mary, survived; but, though Henry was very far from being a model husband, and though he had conceived a passion for Anne Boleyn (q.v.) as early as 1522, he appears to have treated Queen Catharine with all due respect until 1527. He now expressed doubts as to the legality of his marriage, and set about obtaining nullification, which, all other means failing, was at length pronounced by Cranmer in May 1533. Queen Catharine, who had offered a dignified passive resistance, lived at Amptill, in Bedfordshire, and afterwards at Kimbolton Castle, Hunts, where she led an austere religious life until, on 7th January 1536, she died—apparently of cancer of the heart. See Froude's Divorce of Catharine of Aragon (1891) and Martin Hume's Wives of Henry VIII. (1905).

Catharine Howard, a granddaughter of the second Duke of Norfolk, in the same month as Anne of Cleves was divorced (July 1540) became Henry VIII.'s fifth queen. In the November of the following year she was charged by Cranmer with intercourse before her marriage with a musician and a kinsman, and on 13th February 1542 she was beheaded. See Martin Hume's Wives of Henry VIII. (1905).

Catharine Parr. See PARR.

Catharine of Braganza (1638-1705) was the daughter of the Duke of Braganza, who in 1640 became John IV. of Portugal. In May 1662 she was married at Portsmouth to Charles II. (q.v.), seven years after whose death—she mourned it deeply—she returned to Portugal. See Miss Strickland's Queens of England, vol. v.

Cathcart, WILLIAM SCHAW (1755-1843), first Earl Cathcart, son of the ninth Baron Cathcart, was educated for the bar at Eton and Glasgow, but entering the army, served in the wars in America, Flanders, and Germany. In 1803-5 he was commander-in-chief in Ireland; in 1807 commanded the land-forces at Copenhagen, and was made Viscount Cathcart. Sent in 1813 as ambassador to St Petersburg, he accompanied the Czar Alexander in his campaigns; in 1814 he was made an earl.—His eldest son and successor, CHARLES MURRAY (1783-1859), long known as Lord Greenock, served with high distinction in Spain and at Waterloo, and in 1846-49 was commander-in-chief in British North America.—A younger son, SIR GEORGE CATHCART (1794-1854), served with the Russians in the campaigns of 1812 and 1813, and as aide-de-camp to Wellington was present at Quatre Bras and Waterloo. After helping to suppress the Canadian rebellion of 1835, and being deputy-lieutenant of the Tower, in 1852 as governor at the Cape he brought to a successful end the Kaffir war. In the Crimea in 1854, as general of division, his bravery was conspicuous especially at Inkermann (November 5), where he fell. He wrote valuable Commentaries on the War in Russia and Germany in 1812-13 (Lond. 1850).

Cathelineau, JACQUES (1759-93), Vendean leader, was born at Pin-en-Mauge, Lower Anjou. A poor linen-merchant at the Revolution, in 1793, at the head of a handful of recruits, he became famous for his exploits, the greatest of them the storming of Cholet; and supreme command was forced upon him after the victory of Saumur. Attacking Nantes, he penetrated into the town, but received a musket-ball, and died twelve days later. [Kaht-lee-no'.]

Catherine. See CATHARINE.

Catiline, LUCIUS SERGIUS, Roman conspirator, was born about 108 B.C. of an impoverished family, and fell into profligacy and crime. An adherent of Sulla, despite his infamies he was elected prætor in 68, and next year governor of Africa, but was disqualified for the consulship in 66 by charges of maladministration. Disappointed and burdened with debts, he entered into a conspiracy with other Roman nobles like himself; but the plot was revealed to Cicero by Fulvia, mistress of one of them. In November 63 Catiline explained to his confederates a plan for assassinating Cicero and the hostile senators, and other details of a complete revolution—details soon made known to Cicero. When the chosen assassins came to the house of the consul, they were repulsed; and when two days later Catiline appeared in the senate, Cicero made his famous speech against him. Catiline's reply was drowned in cries of execration. He escaped from Rome, but Lentulus, Cethegus, and others of the conspirators were arrested and executed. Insurrections in several parts of Italy were suppressed; and in January 62 Catiline encountered the forces of the republic at Pistoria (now Pistoia), and after a desperate battle was defeated and slain. Sallust's Bellum Catilinarium is a historical masterpiece.

Catinat, NICOLAS (1637-1712), marshal, was born in Paris, and died near St Denis.

Catlin, GEORGE, ethnologist, was born at Wilkesbarre, Pa., July 26, 1796, and bred to the law, but soon turned to drawing and painting. During 1832-40 he was studying the Indians of the Far West, everywhere painting portraits (470 full length) and pictures illustrative of life and manners, now in the National Museum at Washington. Catlin spent eight years in Europe with a Far West show; travelled (1852-57) in South and Central America; and again lived in Europe until 1871. He died at Jersey City, December 23, 1872. His works include Manners of the North American Indians (2 vols. 1841), The North American Portfolio (1844), and Last Rambles in the Rocky Mountains (1868).

Catnach, JAMES (1792-1841), born at Alnwick, from 1814 printed ballads in broadsides in the Seven Dials. See books by Hindley (1878-87).

Cato, DIONYSIUS, the name prefixed to a 4th-century volume of 104 moral precepts in Latin dactylic hexameters, which was a great favourite during the middle ages. The author is unknown. An English version by Benedict Burgh was printed by Caxton before 1479; a good edition is Nemethy's (Budapest, 1892).

Cato, MARCUS PORCIUS, 'the Elder,' was born at Tusculum in 234 B.C. He distinguished himself at the capture of Tarentum (209), and in the second Punic war; and became successively quaestor, aedile, praetor, and consul (195). In Spain he crushed a formidable insurrection; and in 191 he gained glory in the campaign against Antiochus. Meanwhile, he strove to stem the tide of Greek refinement and luxury, and advocated a return to a simpler and stricter social life after the ancient Roman pattern. In 184 elected censor, he discharged so rigorously the duties of his office that Censor became his permanent surname. He repaired watercourses, paved reservoirs, cleansed drains, raised the rents paid by the tax-farmers, and reduced the contract prices paid by the state. More questionable reforms were those in regard to the price of slaves, dress, furniture, equipages, and the like. Good and bad innovations he opposed with equal intolerance. Sent on a mission to Carthage in 175, he was so impressed by the dangerous power of the Carthaginians that afterwards he ended every speech in the senate with the words: 'Moreover, I vote that Carthage must be destroyed.' Cato (who treated his slaves with old-fashioned cruelty, and in old age became avaricious) died in 149. He wrote several works, of which only the De Re Rustica (ed. by Keil, Leip. 1882-94), and a few fragments of his Origines, a summary of the Roman annals, have been preserved. We possess his life by Cornelius Nepos, Plutarch, and Aurelius Victor.

His great-grandson, MARCUS PORCIUS CATO, 'the Younger,' called 'Uticensis' from the place of his death, was born 95 B.C., and served in the campaign against Spartacus. Military tribune in 67, he brought back with him from Greece the Stoic philosopher Athenodorus. As quaestor he carried through a rigorous reform into the treasury offices. As tribune (63) he delivered a famous speech denouncing Caesar as an accomplice of Catiline, and began a course of strenuous opposition to Crassus, Pompey, and Caesar, which hastened the formation of the first triumvirate. He was afterwards forced to side with Pompey, and after the battle of Pharsalia (48) escaped into Africa, and undertook the defence of Utica. When he had tidings of Caesar's decisive victory at Thapsus (46), he resolved to die rather than surrender; and, after spending the night reading Plato's Phaedo, committed suicide by stabbing himself in the breast.

Cats, JACOB (1577-1660), statesman and poet, was born at Brouwershaven in Zeeland, and after studying law at Leyden and Orleans, settled at Middelburg. He rose to high office in the state, and was twice ambassador in England (1627 and 1652). From this time till his death, 'Father Cats' lived at his villa near the Hague, writing the autobiography printed in the 1700 edition of his Poems (new ed. 1878-82).

Cattermole, GEORGE, water-colour painter and book-illustrator, was born at Dickleborough, Norfolk, 8th August 1800. At sixteen he was engaged upon Britton's English Cathedrals, and in 1830 he visited Scotland to obtain materials for his fine illustrations to the Waverley Novels. He was largely employed by the publishers, contributing to the annuals, and illustrating Master Humphreys's Clock. In 1822 he was elected an associate exhibitor, and in 1833 a member, of the Water-colour Society; in 1850 he turned his attention to oil-painting. He died at Clapham Common, 24th July 1868.

Catullus, GAIUS VALERIUS, the greatest lyric poet of ancient Italy, was born at Verona, probably in 84 B.C. He lived mainly at Rome, where he settled about 62 B.C., and at his villas at Tibur and Sirmio. He began to write verses when a boy of sixteen. In Rome he became intimate with Cicero, the Metelli, Hortensius, and probably Lucretius; and in Rome he met the 'Lesbia' whom he sang in verses unequalled in the lyric poetry of passion. A final rupture seems to have happened in 57 B.C., and in that year Catullus accompanied Memmius to his province of Bithynia. He returned to Rome disappointed in his hopes of enriching himself, and entered impetuously as an aristocrat into the contest of parties. A fiery, unscrupulous partisan, he assailed his enemies, including Julius Caesar, with equal scurrility and wit. In all probability he did not survive the year 54 B.C. His extant works comprise 116 pieces, many of them extremely brief, while the longest contains only some 400 lines. But in this slender body of poetry, there are besides the magnificent love-poems, graceful, playful verses of society, fierce, satiric poems, elaborate descriptive and mythological pieces (some of them adapted from the Greek), and the strange, wild, imaginative Attis. For fire and music and unlaboured felicity of phrase their author has no superior among the lyric poets of all time. The text of the works, lost for more than three hundred years, was discovered in the 14th century at Verona, and two copies of this MS. survive. There are editions by Robinson Ellis (1866-67), Bahrens (1876-85), Schmidt (1884), Riese (1887), Owen (1892), and Prof. Palmer (1896); and English verse translations by Martin (1861), Cranston (1867), Ellis (1867-71), Grant Allen (the Attis, 1892), Sir R. Burton and Smithers (1894), and Trenenheere (Lesbia, 1898). See also Monro's Criticisms of Catullus (1878);

Sellar's Roman Poets of the Republic (new ed. 1881); and Lafaye's Catulle et ses Modèles (1894).

Cauchy, AUGUSTIN LOUIS (1789-1857), the founder with Bolzano of the Theory of Functions, was born in Paris. His Mémoire sur la Théorie des Ondes (1815) helped to establish the undulatory theory of light; at Prague, where he resided as tutor to the Comte de Chambord, he published his Mémoire sur la Dispersion de la Lumière (1837). He was professor of Astronomy at Paris (1848-52), but refused the oath of allegiance to Napoleon III. A reissue of his works, in 26 vols., was commenced by the Academy in 1882. See his Life by Valson (1868). [Ko-shee.]

Caulaincourt, ARMAND DE (1772-1827), was made a general of division in 1805, and shortly after created Duke of Vicenza. Faithful to the last to Napoleon, he was Minister for Foreign Affairs in 1813, and during the Hundred Days resumed the office, receiving a peerage of France, of which he was deprived after the restoration. See his Souvenirs (1837-40). [Ko-lan'-koor.]

Caulfield, JAMES (1764-1826), a London printer, who also compiled or edited a score of works, chiefly historical.

Caus, or CAULX, SALOMON DE (1576-1626), a Huguenot engineer, who was born at Dieppe, and died in Paris, but spent much of his time in England and Germany. The invention of the steam-engine has been claimed for him.

Cavagnari, SIR LOUIS, born in France in 1841, was educated at Christ's Hospital, London, and in 1857 was naturalised as a British subject. He had seen twenty-one years' military and political service in India, and had just been made a K.C.B., when on 3d September 1879 he was murdered at Kabul by the rebel troops of the Afghan Ameer. [Ka-van-yak'ree.]

Cavaignac, LOUIS EUGÈNE, born in Paris, 15th October 1802, was a son of General Jean Baptiste Cavaignac (1762-1829), a member of the National Convention. Bred a soldier, he served in the Morea, and afterwards in Algeria, whither he was sent (1832) into honourable exile for free speech in favour of republican institutions. Here he won great distinction by his energy and intrepidity, and was made governor-general in 1848, when in view of revolutionary dangers he was called to Paris and became Minister of War. As military dictator he quelled the formidable insurrection of June, after a most obstinate four days' contest. As candidate for the presidency of the republic, he received 1,469,166 votes against Louis Napoleon's 5,562,834. On the coup d'état of December 1851, he was arrested but soon released; and though he refused to give his adhesion to the Empire, he was permitted to reside in France. He died, 28th October 1857, at his château near Tours. See Life by Deschamps (2 vols. 1870). [Ca-van'-yak.]

Cavalcanti, GUIDO (c. 1230-1300), Italian poet, married a Ghibelline, so was banished by the Guelphs, and returned to Florence only to die there. See works by Capasso (Pisa, 1879) and Ercole (Milan, 1885). —BARTOLOMMEO CAVALCANTI (1503-62), a noble and eloquent Florentine, led a revolt against the Medici, and was afterwards employed by Pope Paul III.

Cavalcaselle, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, art writer, was born at Legnago in January 1820, and in 1846 proceeded to Germany, where he met J. A. Crowe (q.v.), with whom he returned to Italy. Banished for his share in the revolution of 1848, he accompanied Crowe to London, and there their first joint work, Early Flemish Painters (1857; 8d

ed. 1879), was published. Cavalcaselle returned to Italy in 1858, and in 1861 commenced with Crowe the History of Painting in Italy (5 vols. 1864-71). Other joint works are Titian (1876) and Raphael (1883). Thereafter he became a head of the art department in the ministry of Public Instruction. He died 31st Oct. 1897. [Ca-val-ca-zel'leh.]

Cavalier, JEAN (1681-1740), a journeyman baker of Anduze, who in 1702 became a famous leader of the Huguenot Camisards, with a prophet and preacher. He surrendered to Villars in 1704, and entered the service of Savoy; but in 1711 we find him settled with a British pension in England, and he died at Chelsea, governor of Jersey. [Ca-val-yay.]

Cavaliere, EMILIO DEL (c. 1550-99), composer, was born in Rome. [Ka-val-yay'ray.]

Cavalli, FRANCESCO (c. 1600-76), composer, was born and died at Venice.

Cavallini, PIETRO (1259-1344), Roman painter and artist in mosaic, a pupil of Giotto. [Ka-val-lee'nee.]

Cavazzola, PAOLO (1486-1522), painter, was born and died at Verona. [Ka-val'so-la.]

Cave, EDWARD (1691-1754), 'Sylvanus Urban,' was born at Newton, near Rugby; at Rugby received some schooling; and after many vicissitudes, became apprentice to a printer. Obtaining money enough to set up a small printing-office, in 1731 he started the Gentleman's Magazine. Samuel Johnson became its parliamentary reporter in 1740; and with his hand in Johnson's, Cave died at St John's Gate, Clerkenwell.

Cave, WILLIAM (1637-1713), who was born at Pickwell, Leicestershire, and died a canon of Windsor, wrote twelve works on church history.

Cavedone, GIACOMO (1577-1660), painter, was born at Sassuolo, assisted Guido Reni at Rome, and settled in Bologna, where many of his religious pictures still are. [Ka-vay-do'neh.]

Cavendish, the surname of the ducal House of Devonshire, a family directly descended from the chief-justice Sir John Cavendish, who in 1381 was beheaded at Bury St Edmunds by Jack Straw's followers; and from Sir William Cavendish of Cavendish, Suffolk (c. 1505-57), a brother of Wolsey's biographer. His third wife, the celebrated 'Bess of Hardwick,' afterwards Countess of Shrewsbury, brought Chatsworth into the family; and William, their second son, was in 1618 made Earl of Devonshire. His great grandson, William (1640-1707), was, under the last two Stuarts, a steadfast member of the Whig opposition. He succeeded as fourth earl in 1684, and, for his services at the Revolution, was in 1694 raised to be Duke of Devonshire and Marquis of Hartington. His great-grandson, William (1720-64), succeeded as fourth duke in 1755, and was prime-minister from November 1756 to the following May. William, fifth duke (1748-1811), was a bit of a poet; but is less remembered than his beautiful duchess, Lady Georgiana Spencer (1757-1806), whom Gainsborough and Reynolds painted. William, sixth duke (1790-1858), was chiefly distinguished by his sumptuous embassy to St Petersburg (1826). William, seventh duke (1808-21st December 1891), had for twenty-four years been Earl Burlington when he succeeded his cousin in the ducal title. His eldest son, SPENCER COMPTON CAVENDISH, eighth Duke of Devonshire (23d July 1833-22d March 1908), but for thirty-three years known as Marquis of Hartington, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and entered parliament in 1857, being first returned for North Lancashire, then in 1869 for the Radnor boroughs, in 1880 for North-east Lancashire, and in 1885 for the Rossendale division of that county. The representative of a great Whig house, he was chosen as early as 1859 to move the vote of want of confidence that overthrew the Derby government, and between 1863 and 1874 held office as a Lord of the Admiralty, Under-secretary for War, War Secretary, Postmaster-general, and, from 1871, Chief-secretary for Ireland. Neither a born statesman nor great orator, he had yet shown an 'infinite capacity for taking pains,' when, in February 1875, on Mr Gladstone's temporary abdication, he was chosen leader of the Liberal opposition. He led it admirably, and in the spring of 1880, on the downfall of the Beaconsfield administration, was invited by the Queen to form a ministry. He rejected the offer, and served under Mr Gladstone, first as Secretary of State for India, and then as War Secretary from 1883 to 1885. But disapproving Irish Home Rule, he became head of the Liberal Unionists from 1886, and served in the Unionist government as Lord President of the Council from 1895 till 1903, when as a free trader he withdrew. See Life by Holland (1911).

His younger brother, Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH, was born 30th November 1836, and was also educated at Trinity, taking his B.A. in 1858. He sat in parliament as Liberal member for the northern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire from 1865 till the spring of 1882, when he succeeded Mr Forster as Chief-secretary for Ireland. Between 7 and 8 P.M., on 6th May, having only that morning reached Dublin, he and Mr Burke, an unpopular subordinate, were stabbed to death in the Phoenix Park. Eight months later, twenty 'Irish Invincibles' were tried for the murder, and Carey (q.v.) turning Queen's evidence, five were hanged, three sentenced to penal servitude for life, and nine to various terms of imprisonment.

'Cavendish.' See JONES, HENRY.

Cavendish, ADA, actress, came out in London in 1863, and became the second wife of Frank Marshall, dramatist. She died 5th October 1895.

Cavendish, GEORGE, the biographer of Wolsey, was born about 1500, and became Wolsey's gentleman-usher at least as early as 1527. In attendance upon his great master till the end (November 28, 1530), he afterwards retired to his house at Glensford, in Suffolk, where he lived quietly with his wife, a niece of Sir Thomas More, till the close of his own life in 1561 or 1562. The best edition of his Life of Cardinal Wolsey is Singer's (1815), reprinted with a good introduction in Morley's 'Universal Library' (1886).

Cavendish, HENRY, natural philosopher, eldest son of Lord Charles Cavendish, and a grandson of the second Duke of Devonshire, was born at Nice, October 10, 1731. From a school at Hackney he passed in 1749 to Peterhouse, Cambridge, but quitted it three years later without a degree; thereafter he devoted the whole of his long life to scientific investigations, having had a large fortune bequeathed him by an uncle. A silent, solitary man, he had his magnificent library in London, four miles from his residence on Clapham Common, so that he might not encounter persons coming to consult it. His female domestics had orders to keep out of his sight, on pain of dismissal. His dinner he ordered daily by a note placed on the hall-table. He died, unmarried, at Clapham, March 10, 1810, leaving more than a million sterling to his relatives. Cavendish may almost be called the founder of pneumatic chemistry. In 1760 he discovered the extreme levity of inflammable air, now known as hydrogen gas—a discovery which led to balloon experiments; and later, he ascertained that water resulted from the union of two gases—a discovery which has erroneously been claimed for Watt. The famous Cavendish Experiment was an ingenious device for estimating the density of the earth. Cavendish also wrote on astronomical instruments; and his Electrical Researches (1771-81) were edited by Professor Clerk Maxwell (1879). See his Life by G. Wilson, forming vol. i. of the Cavendish Society's Works (1846).

Cavendish, THOMAS (c. 1555-92), circumnavigator, was born at Trimley St Martin, near Ipswich, and, after squandering his patrimony at court, shared in Grenville's expedition to Virginia (1585). On 21st July 1586 he sailed from Plymouth with 123 men and three ships of 40, 60, and 140 tons, and, by Sierra Leone and Brazil, reached the Strait of Magellan. During the nine months on the Pacific he burned three Spanish towns and thirteen ships; then, with a rich booty, but only his largest vessel, he returned by the Cape of Good Hope to England, 10th September 1588. Elizabeth knighted him. A second expedition (1591) ended in utter disaster, and Cavendish died broken-hearted off Ascension.

Cavendish, WILLIAM, Duke of Newcastle, son of Sir Charles Cavendish, and nephew of the first Earl of Devonshire, was born in 1592, and educated at St John's College, Cambridge. James I. in 1610 created him Knight of the Bath, and in 1620 Viscount Mansfield. Charles I., who was splendidly entertained by him at Welbeck and Bolsover, in 1628 created him Earl of Newcastle, and in 1638 appointed him governor to his son, afterwards Charles II. His support of the king in the Civil War was munificent. As general of all the forces north of the Trent, he had power to issue declarations, confer knighthood, coin money, and raise men; the last function he executed with great zeal. After Marston Moor (1644) he lived on the Continent, at times in great poverty, till the Restoration. In 1665 he was created Duke of Newcastle; and he died 25th December 1676. He was author of two works on horsemanship, and of several poor plays. See his Life by his second wife (1667; new ed. by C. H. Firth, 1886).—She, MARGARET LUCAS (1624-74), the daughter of an Essex house, where 'all the brothers were valiant, and all the sisters virtuous,' had married him in 1645, and herself wrote a dozen folio volumes of poems, plays, letters, &c. See E. Jenkins, The Cavalier and his Lady (new ed. 1893).

Cavour, COUNT CAMILLO BENSO DI, restorer of Italian nationality, was born at Turin, August 10, 1810, of an ancient Piedmontese house. His liberal opinions led him in 1831 to retire from the army; and devoting himself to agriculture, he vastly improved the family estates. He widened his economic and political knowledge by travel in France and England. In conjunction with Count Cesare Balbo, he in 1847 established a newspaper, Il Risorgimento, in which he advocated a representative system; and on his suggestion, the king was petitioned for a constitution, which was granted in February 1848. Cavour strenuously opposed the ultra-democrats, and counselled alliance with England. In D'Azeglio's ministry he had an important place; and from 1852, when he succeeded D'Azeglio as premier, till his resignation in 1859, he was the originator and director of the Sardinian policy. Superintending also finance, commerce, agriculture, home office, and foreign affairs, he greatly improved the financial condition, introduced free trade measures, consolidated constitutionalism, weakened clerical influence, and made Sardinia a power in Europe. Through his advice Sardinia took part in the Crimean war, and so he managed to bring the Italian question before the Congress of Paris in 1856. In 1858 he planned with Napoleon to drive Austria out of Italy, and in 1859 he conducted with masterly tact and astuteness a diplomatic contest with Austria. The peace of Villafranca, leaving Venetia Austrian, was a bitter disappointment, and Cavour resigned; returning, however, to his great task in 1860. Popular feeling in central Italy declared for union with the north, and thus Parma, Modena, and Tuscany came under the sway of Victor Emmanuel; but Cavour had to purchase the acquiescence of France by the surrender of Nice and Savoy. He secretly encouraged the expedition of Garibaldi, which in 1860 achieved the deliverance of Sicily and southern Italy. In 1861 an Italian parliament was summoned, and Victor Emmanuel was declared king of Italy, though Rome and Venetia still were wanting. Thus had Cavour achieved his task, but not without a fearful strain on his health, and he died June 6, 1861. Caxton, WILLIAM, the first English printer, was born in Kent, probably at Tenterden, about 1422. He was apprenticed in 1438 to Robert Large, a London mercer who was Lord Mayor in 1439-40. On his master's death in 1441, he went to Bruges, and became in 1462 governor of a chartered association of English merchants in the Low Countries. In 1471 he attached himself to the household of Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, the sister of Edward IV.; and apparently towards the end of 1476 he set up his wooden printing-press at Westminster. The art of printing he had acquired in Bruges, doubtless from the famous Colard Mansion; and in 1474 he put through the press at Bruges the first book printed in the English tongue, the Recuyell of the Histories of Troye. The Game and Playe of the Chesse was another of Caxton's earliest publications; but the Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers (1477) is the first book proved to have been printed in England. Of the ninety-nine known distinct productions of his press, no less than thirty-eight survive in unique copies or in fragments only. Caxton enjoyed the patronage and friendship of some of the chief men of his time. He was diligent in the exercise of his craft or in translation till within a few hours of his death, about the close of 1491. See The Old Printer and the New Press, by Charles Knight (1854); Life and Typography of Caxton (1861-63), by W. Blades; and his Biography and Typography of Caxton (1877; 2d ed. 1882).

Cayley, ARTHUR, mathematician, was born at Richmond, Surrey, 16th August 1821. He was educated at King's College, London, and Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated as senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman in 1842. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1849, and established a practice as a conveyancer. In 1863 he was elected first Sadlerian Professor of pure Mathematics at Cambridge, and in 1875 a fellow of Trinity. He was president of the Royal Astronomical Society (1872-73), and of the British Association at its Southport meeting in 1883, where his address on the ultimate possibilities of mathematics attracted much attention. His chief book is an Elementary Treatise on Elliptic Functions (1876); a ten volume edition of his Mathematical Papers was begun in 1889. He died at Cambridge, 26th January 1895.

Caylus, ANNE CLAUDE PHILIPPE DE TUBIÈRES, COMTE DE (1692-1765), an archaeologist who was born and died in Paris, and after serving in the Spanish War of Succession, travelled in Italy and the Levant, returning to Paris in 1717 to devote himself to the study of antiquities, and the promotion of the fine arts. Céleste, MADAME, dancer, born in Paris, 6th August 1814, or probably four years before, made her début in 1827 at New York, and in America married one Elliott, who died early. At Liverpool in 1830 she played Fenella in Masaniello; in 1831-33 she became the rage in London. Her second visit to America (1834-37) brought her £40,000. She took part in the management of the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, and the Adelphi and Lyceum in London. She retired in 1874, and died at Paris, 12th Feb. 1882. [Say-lest.]

Celestine was the name of five popes: Celestine I. (422-32); II. (1143-44); III. (1191-98); IV. (1241), and V. The last was the Neapolitan Peter di Morrone, who, born in 1215, after a long life of ascetic severities was much against his will elected pope in 1294. He resigned his office after five months—the great refusal, for which Dante places him at the entrance of hell. He was imprisoned by his successor, Boniface VIII., and died in 1296. He founded the Celestines, and was canonised in 1313.

Cellini, BENVENUTO, goldsmith, sculptor, and engraver, and the author of one of the most interesting autobiographies ever written, was born 5d November 1500 in Florence, a city which he was forced to quit in early life through having taken part in 'an affray.' He then travelled to Rome, where his skill as an artist in metal-work gained him the favour of the highest nobles and prelates. By his own account he was as expert with sword and dagger as with his goldsmith's tools, and he had apparently no scruple in murdering or maiming any who endeavoured to thwart him. He states that at the siege of Rome in 1527 it was he who killed the Constable Bourbon, and that he afterwards shot down the Prince of Orange before the castle of St Angelo. He stood high in favour with Pope Clement VII., but was eventually flung into prison for the murder of a rival goldsmith. In 1534 he was pardoned and set free by Paul III., who wished him to engrave dies in the mint; soon afterwards, having spoken contemptuously of the pope's artistic tastes, he was cast into an oubliette of St Angelo. He escaped through his knowledge of the castle's vaults, but was immediately recaptured, and was only saved from the pope's vengeance by the intercession of Cardinal d'Este. For some years he lived alternately in Rome and Florence, Mantua and Naples. In 1537 he was honourably received at the court of Francis I. of France, but soon returned to Florence, where he worked under the patronage of Cosmo de' Medici, and where he executed his famous bronze 'Perseus with the head of Medusa.' He began to write his autobiography in 1558, and died at Florence 13th February 1571. The autobiography was translated into German by Goethe (1803), into English by T. Roscoe (1822) and J. A. Symonds (1887). See also the magnificent monograph by Eugène Plon (1882). [Tchel-lee'nee.]

Celsius, ANDERS (1701-44), the constructor in 1742 of the centigrade thermometer, was born at Uppsala. He was the grandson of Magnus Celsius (1621-79), astronomer and decipherer of the Helsing runes, and nephew of Olof Celsius (1670-1756), professor of Theology and author of the Hierobotanicon. Anders became in 1730 professor of Astronomy at Uppsala, where in 1740 a splendid observatory was erected for him.

Celsius, a philosopher and friend of Lucian, who wrote, about 176-180, during the persecution of Marcus Anrelius, under the title Logos Aléthēs ('true word'), the first notable polemic against Christianity. The book itself has perished; but fragments of high interest occur as quotations in Origen's Contra Celsum. See Keim, Celsius' Wahres Wort (1873); Pélagand, Etude sur Celse (1878); Fronde's Short Studies, vol. iv.; and J. Patrick's Origen in Reply to Celsius (1892).

Celsius, AULUS CORNELIUS (fl. 50 A.D.), a Latin physician, wrote on medicine, rhetoric, history, philosophy, war, and agriculture. His only extant work is the De Medicinā (ed. by Daremberg, Leip. 1859; Eng. trans. 1756).

Cenci, BEATRICE, according to Muratori, was the youngest of the twelve children by his first marriage of Francesco Cenci, a Roman nobleman of colossal wealth. After his second marriage, he treated the children of his first wife in a revolting manner; and the beauty of Beatrice inspired him with an incestuous passion, so, with her step-mother and her brother Giacomo, she planned his murder, and two hired assassins drove a nail into his brain (9th September 1598). The crime was discovered, and both she and Giacomo were racked; Giacomo confessed, but Beatrice maintained her innocence. All, however, were beheaded (10th September 1599). Thus Muratori, whilst others allege that Beatrice was the victim of an infernal plot. The results, however, of Bertolotti's investigations (1879) go far to deprive the story of the romantic elements on which Shelley's tragedy mainly turns. Francesco, it seems, was profligate, but no monster; Beatrice was not sixteen, but twenty-one years of age, was far from beautiful, and was probably the mother of an illegitimate son. And the sweet and mournful picture in the Barberini Palace in Rome cannot possibly be a portrait of Beatrice by Guido, who never painted in Rome till some nine years after her death. See the Edinburgh Review for January 1879, and Swinburne's Studies (1894). [Tchen-tchee.]

Centlivre, SUSANNAH (c. 1667-1723), dramatist, is said to have been born in Ireland, her surname either Freeman or Rawkins, and to have been the wife or mistress of two or three gentlemen, when in 1700 she produced a tragedy, The Perjured Husband, and subsequently appeared on the stage at Bath. In 1706 she married Joseph Centlivre, head-cook to Queen Anne, with whom she lived happily till her death, December 1, 1723. Her nineteen plays (with Life, 3 vols. 1761; new ed. 1872) include The Busybody ('Marplot' its leading character, 1709) and A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717). [Sent-leevr.]

Cervantes Saavedra, MIGUEL DE, the author of Don Quixote, was born at Alcalá de Henares in 1547, and baptised on the 9th of October, being the descendant of an old and once renowned family that took its surname from the castle of San Servando or Cervantes, near Toledo. The story of his having studied at Salamanca is improbable; the first known productions of his pen appeared in 1569 in a collection of pieces on the death of the queen. Early in the same year he passed over into Italy in the service of Cardinal Giulio Acquaviva, but shortly afterwards enlisted as a soldier; and at the battle of Lepanto he received three severe gunshot wounds, by one of which his left hand and arm were permanently disabled. After having seen further service against the Turks in Tunis, he was returning to Spain in 1575 when the galley he sailed in was captured by Algerine corsairs, and with his brother Rodrigo and others he was carried into Algiers, where he remained in captivity five years, during which he made four daring attempts to escape. In 1580 he was ransomed by the charity of the Redemptorist Fathers and the devotion of his family; and rejoining his old regiment, served in the expedition to the Azores under the Marquis of Santa Cruz. At the close of the war he retired from military life and turned his attention to literature. His first work was the Galatea, a pastoral romance, printed at Alcalá in 1585. While it was passing through the press he married, and for two or three years strove to gain a livelihood by writing for the stage. He produced between twenty and thirty plays, of which two only, the Numancia and the Trato de Argel, have kept the stage. In 1587 he became deputy-purveyor to the fleet at Seville. In 1594 he was appointed a collector of revenues for the kingdom of Granada; but in 1597, failing to make up the sum due to the treasury, he was sent to prison at Seville, released on giving security, but not reinstated. Local tradition maintains that he wrote Don Quixote in prison at Argamasilla in La Mancha. In 1603 he was living at Valladolid; in September 1604 leave was granted to print the first part of Don Quixote, and early in January 1605 the book came out at Madrid. It leapt into popularity at once, though Lope de Vega wrote sneeringly of it; but instead of giving his readers the sequel they asked for, Cervantes busied himself with writing for the stage and composing short tales, or 'exemplary novels' as he called them. His Viage del Parnaso, a poem of over 3000 lines in terza rima, reviews the poetry and poets of the day. In 1613 he published his twelve Novelas. In 1614 a pseudonymous writer brought out a spurious second part of Don Quixote, with an insulting preface, which served to spur Cervantes to the completion of the genuine second part (1615). While it was in the press he revised his various plays and interludes, and a little before his death finished the romance of Persiles and Sigismunda. He died at Madrid, 23d April 1616.

In right of Don Quixote Cervantes ranks as one of the great writers of the world; but his short novels also are the best of their kind; and if a good deal of his poetry is weak, there is much that only a poet could have written. Numancia is, with all its defects, the most powerful and original drama in the language. His minor works all show signs of the author's care; Don Quixote, on the other hand, is the most carelessly written of all great books. Cervantes, it is plain, did not regard it as such. He was very proud of its popularity; but all he ever claims for it is that it will amuse, and that it did the state some service in laughing chivalry romances out of fashion. He wrote it by fits and starts, and he neglected it for his other works. But it may be that we owe more to this carelessness than we think. In his other works Cervantes studied recognised models; in Don Quixote he followed the bent of his own genius alone, and wrote only as instinct prompted him. Written in a desultory fashion, it had time to grow and ripen under his hand; Don Quixote and Sancho, outlines at first, became by degrees flesh and blood realities to his fancy, beings that he loved; and the story—the second part especially—served him as a kind of commonplace-book.

The only complete edition of Cervantes' works is Rivadeneyra's (12 vols. Mad. 1863-64). Of Don Quixote in the original 150 editions are known, among them those of Clemencin (1839), Hartzenschusch (1863), Lopez Fabra (1874), Maunez (1875), Ortego (1884), Fitzmaurice Kelly (1898), Cortejón (1905 et seq.). There are translations in fourteen languages. The oldest is the English by Shelton (1612-20; new ed. by Kelly, 1896). Other English translations are by Phillips (1689), Motteux (1702), Jervas (1742), Smollett (1755), Duffield (1881), Ormsby (1885), and H. E. Watts (1888-89). In French there are nine; in German thirteen. See Lives by Navarrete (1819), Moran (1863), Chasles (1866), Duffield (1881), Watts (1891), and Kelly (1892). [Ser-van'tees; Span. Ther-vahn'tehz.]

Cesarotti, MELCHIORE (1730-1808), Italian poet, was born at Padua, where in 1768 he became professor of Greek and Hebrew. His translations of Macpherson's Ossian (1763) and the Iliad unquestionably threw fresh life into Italian literature. His Filosofia delle Lingue and Filosofia del Gusto are the best of his Works (42 vols. Pisa, 1800-13). [Tchey-a-rot'tee.]

Cesnola, COUNT LUIGI PALMA DI (1832-1904), archaeologist, was born near Turin. He served with the Sardinian contingent in the Crimean war, went to New York in 1860, and fought in the civil war. Appointed American consul at Cyprus in 1865, he commenced a series of excavations; his splendid collection of statues, lamps, vases, inscriptions, &c. is in New York Metropolitan Museum. Chabas, FRANÇOIS (1817-82), Egyptologist, was born at Briangon, and died at Versailles. Though at first engaged in commerce, he found time to become a learned linguist, but it was not till 1851 that he gave himself up to the study of hieroglyphics. [Sha-bah'.]

Chad, St (Ceadda), born in Northumbria, was a pupil of St Aidan, spent part of his youth in Ireland, and in 664 became abbot of Lastingham, in 666 Bishop of York. Doubt having been cast on the validity of his consecration, he withdrew in 669, but was immediately made Bishop of Mercia, fixing the see at Lichfield. He died in 672.

Chadwick, SIR EDWIN, a social reformer, born near Manchester, 24th January 1801, was called to the bar in 1830. He early studied social, sanitary, and political science, and was by Lord Grey's government appointed an assistant poor-law commissioner. His report (1833) laid the foundation of the later systems of government inspection. On the organisation of the new Poor-law Board, Chadwick was appointed secretary; in 1854 he retired with a pension. He afterwards promoted competitive examinations for government offices. He was made a K.C.B. in 1889, and died 5th July 1890. See books by Richardson (1885) and Miss Hutchins (1909).

Chalkondylas, NIKOLAOS, an Athenian, wrote about 1450 a history of the Turks and the fall of the Greek Empire. — His brother DEMETRIOS (1424-1511) came after the Turkish conquest from Athens to Italy, and at Florence and Milan taught Greek, published grammars, and edited Homer, Isocrates, and Suidas.

Challemel-Lacour, PAUL ARMAND, politician, was born at Avranches, 19th May 1827, and lectured at Paris and elsewhere on philosophy, being banished in 1851-54 for his independent views. Subsequently an active journalist, he was made prefect of Lyons by Gambetta in 1871, and, elected a member of the National Assembly, was one of the most gifted representatives of republicanism and anti-clericalism. Successively foreign minister, senator, ambassador at Berne and in London, vice-president (1890), and president (1893) of the Senate, he wrote on philosophy and W. von Humboldt, translated Ritter's History of Philosophy, edited Madame d'Épinay's works, and was an Academician. He died 26th October 1896. [Shal-mel-La-koor.]

Challis, JAMES, astronomer, born at Braintree in Essex, 12th December 1803, graduated senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman at Cambridge in 1825, was ordained in 1830, and in 1836 became professor of Astronomy at Cambridge, where he died 3d December 1882. In August 1846, whilst preparing to test Adams' results, he twice unconsciously noted the planet Neptune before its discovery at Berlin on 23d September.

Challoner, RICHARD, was born at Lewes, September 29, 1691, and turning Catholic, was sent in 1704 to the English College at Douay, where he became a professor, and remained until 1730. He then served as a missionary priest in London, until in 1741 he was consecrated Bishop of Debra and coadjutor of Bishop Petre, whom he succeeded as Vicar Apostolic of the London district in 1758. During the 'No Popery' riots of 1780 he was secreted near Highgate, and he died in London, January 12, 1781. Among his thirty-four works are the Catholic Christian Instructed (1737), an answer to Conyers Middleton's Letters from Rome; the Garden of the Soul (1740), still the most popular prayer-book with English Catholics; his revision of the Douay version of the Bible (5 vols. 1750), substantially the Bible used by them; Memoirs of Missionary Priests, 1577-1684 (2 vols. 1741), and Britannia Sancta (2 vols. 1745), a collection of the lives of British and Irish saints.

Chalmers, ALEXANDER (1759-1834), was born at Aberdeen, studied medicine there, but about 1777 became an active writer for the press in London, and the busiest of booksellers' hacks. His editions of Burns, Beattie, Fielding, Gibbon, Bolingbroke, Shakespeare, Johnson, and Boswell's Johnson are now of no importance; that of The British Essayists, in 45 vols., is still esteemed; but his reputation depends mainly on the General Biographical Dictionary (32 vols. 1812-14). [Tchahmerz.]

Chalmers, GEORGE (1742-1825), Scottish antiquary, was born at Fochabers, and was educated there and at King's College, Aberdeen. Having afterwards studied law at Edinburgh, in 1763 he went to North America, where he practised as a lawyer at Baltimore till the breaking out of the war of independence. He then settled in London (1775), and was appointed clerk to the Board of Trade in 1786. Of his thirty-three works the chief is Caledonia; an Account, Historical and Topographical, of North Britain (vols. i-iii. 1807-24). In 1888-95 it was reprinted at Paisley in 7 vols., comprising the matter prepared for the unpublished 4th vol., and furnished with a much-needed index. Among his other works are A Collection of Treaties between Great Britain and other Powers (2 vols. 1790); Lives of Defoe, Paine, Ruddiman, and Mary Queen of Scots; and editions of Allan Ramsay and Lyndsay.

Chalmers, GEORGE PAUL, R.S.A., was born at Montrose in 1833, served as errand-boy to a surgeon, and apprentice to a ship-chandler; but in 1853 came to Edinburgh, and studied art under Scott Lauder. Elected R.S.A. in 1871, he died from accidental injuries, 20th February 1878. He executed some important portraits. He is represented in the National Gallery of Scotland by 'The Legend.' See his Lives by J. M. Gray (1879) and Pinnington (1896).

Chalmers, JAMES (1782-1853), a Dundee bookseller, born in Arbroath, for whom has been claimed the invention of adhesive stamps.

Chalmers, THOMAS, D.D., D.C.L., was born at Anstruther, Fife, 17th March 1780, educated at St Andrews, and in 1803 ordained minister of Kilmarnock. He carried on mathematical and chemistry classes at St Andrews in 1803-4, and in 1808 published an Inquiry into National Resources. Shortly after this he came under profound religious impressions; in 1815 he was translated to the Tron parish in Glasgow, where his magnificent oratory, partly published as Astronomical Discourses (1817) and Commercial Discourses (1820), took the city by storm. He laboured hard to abate the appalling ignorance and immorality of his parish by 're-modelling and extending the old parochial economy of Scotland.' To the English compulsory assessment for the poor, he preferred the old Scotch method of voluntary church-door contributions, administered by elders; and as minister of St John's parish (after 1819), by reviving this method, he in four years reduced the pauper expenditure in the parish from £1400 to £280 per annum. Edward Irving was for two years his assistant. In 1823 he accepted the Moral Philosophy chair in St Andrews, where he wrote his Use and Abuse of Literary and Ecclesiastical Endowments (1827). In 1827 he was transferred to the chair of Theology in Edinburgh, and in 1832 published a work on political economy. In 1833 appeared his Bridgewater treatise, On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man. As convener of the Church-extension Committee (1834), after seven years of enthusiastic labour, he collected £300,000 for building 220 new churches. Meanwhile, the struggles in regard to patronage became keener, until in 1843 Chalmers, followed by 470 ministers, left the church of his fathers, and founded the Free Church, whose swift and successful organisation was greatly owing to his indefatigable exertions. He spent the close of his life as principal of the Free Church College, and in completing his Institutes of Theology. He died suddenly, May 30, 1847. His works, in 34 vols., deal especially with natural theology, apologetics, and social economy. As a religious orator Chalmers was unrivalled, and never did Scotland produce a greater or more lovable soul, or one more fervid from the strength of a resolute will. See Memoirs, by his son-in-law, Dr Hanna (4 vols. 1849-52); Correspondence (1853); and smaller books by Dean Ramsay (1850), D. Fraser (1881), Mrs Oliphant (1893), and W. G. Blaikie (1897).

Chalon, ALFRED EDWARD, R.A. (1780-1860), water-colour portrait painter, was born at Geneva, of Huguenot ancestry, and came with his family to Kensington in 1789.—His elder brother, JOHN JAMES CHALON, A.R.A. (1778-1854), was chiefly a landscape-painter.

Chalybæus, HENRICH MORITZ (1796-1862), was appointed in 1839 professor of Philosophy at Kiel, but was dismissed in 1852, owing to his Germanic sympathies, and died at Dresden. His chief work is his System der speculativen Ethik (1850). [Ka-lee-bay-ooos.]

nection with the Charivari. See Life by Ribeyre (Par. 1885). {Show.]

Chamberlain, JOSEPH, born in London in July 1836, was educated at University College School, and entered his father's screw factory at Birmingham (the name of the firm being Nettlefold), from which, however, he retired in 1874. He had by this time acquired considerable celebrity as a Radical politician, having in 1868 been appointed a Birmingham town-councillor, and from 1873 to 1876 been Mayor of Birmingham. After unsuccessfully contesting Sheffield against Mr Roebuck in 1874, he was returned unopposed for Birmingham in 1876. He soon made his mark in parliament, and in 1880 was appointed President of the Board of Trade, with a seat in the cabinet. To his exertions was due the passing of the Bankruptcy Bill, but his efforts to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts were unsuccessful. Meanwhile his influence was increasing rapidly outside the House; he came to be regarded as the leader of the extreme Radical party, and enunciated schemes for the regeneration of the masses which were based on the doctrines of the 'restitution' of land and the 'ransom' of property. During the general election of 1886 he was most severe in his strictures on the moderate Liberals, and produced an 'unauthorised' programme, which included the readjustment of taxation, free schools, and the creation of allotments by compulsory purchase. In February 1886 he became President of the Local Government Board, but resigned in March because of his strong objections to Mr Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, of which he became the most strenuous opponent. By the Marquis of Salisbury he was sent to America as one of the British commissioners to settle the disputes about fisheries between the United States and Canada. After the Marquis of Hartington went to the Upper House (1891) Mr Chamberlain became leader of the Liberal Unionists in the House of Commons, and in the Coalition Government of 1895 he took office as Secretary for the Colonies. Even before the Transvaal troubles and the South African war (1899-1902) he had acquired the reputation of a great colonial administrator—a reputation increased by his management of colonial interests generally and his visit to South Africa. When in the autumn of 1903 he saw himself shut up, by his views on the needs of the empire, to advocate, in addition to retaliatory tariffs as a means of self-defence, a preferential treatment of the colonies and the imposition of a tax on imported grain (a policy Mr Balfour, the premier, sympathised with but did not see his way to accept as a practical measure), Mr Chamberlain resigned office and began a vigorous advocacy of his imperial scheme. In 1906 he practically withdrew from public life in consequence of ill health. He is Chancellor of Birmingham University. See Lives by S. H. Jeyes (1896, re-edited 1903), Miss Marris (1900), Mackintosh (1906).—In the changes that took place in connection with his resignation, his son, Mr AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (b. 1863), M.P. for Worcestershire, and successively Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and Postmaster-general, became Chancellor of the Exchequer (1903-6).

Chambers, EPHRAIM, a free-thinking encyclopædist, was born about 1680 at Kendal, and while apprentice to a globe-maker in London, conceived the idea of a cyclopædia that should surpass Harris's Lexicon Technicum (1704). It appeared in 2 folio vols. in 1728, and reached a 5th edition in 1746, Chambers having died meanwhile on 16th May 1740. A French translation gave rise to the great French Encyclopédie.

Chambers, GEORGE (1803-40), marine painter, was born at Whitby.

Chambers, SIR WILLIAM (1726-96), architect, was born of Scotch ancestry at Stockholm, but brought up in England. Somerset House (1776) was his design, and he wrote a Treatise of Civil Architecture (1759).

Chambers, WILLIAM, publisher, was born, 16th April 1800, at Peebles, where his father was a cotton manufacturer. In 1814 he was apprenticed to a bookseller in Edinburgh, and in 1819 started business for himself, to book-selling afterwards adding printing. Between 1825 and 1830 he wrote the Book of Scotland and, in conjunction with his brother Robert, a Gazetteer of Scotland. In 1832 he started Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, six weeks in advance of the Penny Magazine; and soon thereafter he united with Robert in founding the business of W. & R. Chambers, the best known of whose many publications are, besides the Journal and a numerous series of educational works, a Miscellany (20 vols.), Papers for the People (12 vols.), the Cyclopædia of English Literature (2 vols. 1844; new ed. 1901-3); and the Encyclopædia (10 vols. 1859-68; new ed. 1888-92). In 1859 William founded and endowed an institute in his native town. Lord Provost of Edinburgh (1865-69), he promoted a successful scheme for improving the older part of the city; and he carried out at his own cost a restoration of St Giles' Cathedral. He died 20th May 1883, having shortly before received the offer of a baronetcy. He was made LL.D. of Edinburgh in 1872. Besides many contributions to the Journal, he wrote a Youth's Companion, a History of Peeblesshire (1864), Ailie Gilroy, Stories of Remarkable Persons, Stories of Old Families, and a Historical Sketch of St Giles' Cathedral (1879).—ROBERT CHAMBERS, born in Peebles, 10th July 1802, began business as a bookseller in Edinburgh in 1818, and gave his leisure to literary composition. In 1824 he produced the Traditions of Edinburgh; and between 1822 and 1834 he wrote twenty-five volumes. The success of the Journal was materially promoted by his essays and his literary insight. In 1844 he published anonymously the Vestiges of Creation, which prepared the way for Darwin's Origin of Species. The authorship, ascribed to him in the Athenæum of 2d December 1854, was first announced in Mr Ireland's introduction to the 12th ed. (1884). He received the degree of LL.D. from St Andrews in 1863. The labour of preparing the Book of Days (2 vols. 1863) broke his health, and he died at St Andrews, 17th March 1871. Other works by Robert are Popular Rhymes of Scotland (1847), a History of the Rebellions in Scotland, Life of James I., Scottish Ballads and Songs (1829), Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen, Ancient Sea Margins (1838), The Life and Works of Robert Burns (4 vols. 1851; new ed. by W. Wallace, 1896), Domestic Annals of Scotland (3 vols. 1859-61), and Songs of Scotland prior to Burns (1862).—His son ROBERT CHAMBERS, born in 1832, became head of the firm in 1883, and conducted the Journal till his death, March 23, 1888.—See W. Chambers's Memoir of William and Robert Chambers (1872; 13th ed., with supplementary chapter, 1884).

Chambord, HENRI CHARLES DIEUDONNÉ,

COMTE DE, was born in Paris, 29th September 1820, seven months after the assassination of his father, the Duc de Berri (q.v.). On the day of his baptism, the 'Child of Miracle' was presented by the Legitimists with the château of Chambord; hence in 1844 he dropped the title of Duc de Bordeaux for that of Comte de Chambord. When Charles X. abdicated in 1830, he did so in favour of his little grandson; but the people insisted on the 'citizen king,' and the elder Bourbons were driven into exile. They fixed their court successively at Holyrood, Prague, and Görz, where the young count was trained in clerical and absolutist ideas by his aunt, the Duchesse d'Angoulême. A good, dull, timid soul, whom D'Orsay likened to 'a palace with no room furnished but the chapel,' 'Henry V.' had three times a chance of regaining the crown of his ancestors—in 1848, 1870, and 1873, on which last occasion, three months after Thiers' overthrow, he paid an incognito visit to Versailles. Each time he fooled away his opportunities, always vanishing just when his presence was indispensable, and ever protesting that he would 'never abandon the white flag of Joan of Arc.' A fall from his horse (1841) had lamed him for life; his marriage (1846) with the Princess of Modena (1817-86) brought him no successor; and he passed forty years of blameless inertia. He died, after long suffering, at his castle of Frohsdorf, in Lower Austria, 24th August 1883. See BOURBON; the Comte de Falloux' Mémoires d'un Royaliste (1888); and Lives by Nouvion (1884) and Dubosc de Pesquidon (1887). [Show-borr'.]

Chamfort, NICOLAS (1741-94), gaining an entrance into the highest literary circles of Paris, lived for years 'by his wit, if not by his wits,' and at the Revolution was hailed in the clubs as 'La Rochefoucauld-Chamfort.' After a time, however, certain incisive witticisms—such as, 'Be my brother or I will kill you'—drew down on him the anger of the Jacobin leaders. Threatened with arrest, he tried to commit suicide, and died after several days' suffering. His works (ed. by Auguis, 5 vols. 1824-25) include tales, dramas, éloges, brilliant maxims, and even more admirable anecdotes. [Show-forr'.]

Chamier, FREDERIC (1796-1870), novelist, born in London, entered the navy in 1809, and retiring in 1833, was promoted captain in 1856. His eighteen works, now almost forgotten, include sea-stories, a continuation of James's Naval History (1837), and a Review of the French Revolution of 1848 (1849). [Shah-me-af'.]

Chaminade, CÉCILE LOUISE STÉPHANIE, composer, was born in Paris in 1861.

Chamisso, ADELBERT VON, German lyric poet, was born at the château of Boncourt, in Champagne, 30th January 1781. The French Revolution driving his parents to settle in Prussia in 1790, he became a page of the queen, and entered the army. But in 1806 he returned to France, for though no admirer of Napoleon, he would not fight against his native land. In the circle of Madame de Staël at Coppet he began that study of natural science which he afterwards pursued at Berlin. In 1815-18 he accompanied a Russian exploring expedition round the world as naturalist; and on his return was appointed keeper of the Botanical Garden of Berlin. In 1835 he was elected to the Academy of Science; and, after a happy domestic life, he died at Berlin, 21st August 1838. He wrote several works on natural history, but his fame rests partly on his poems, still more on his quaint and humorous Peter Schlenihl (1813), the story of the man who lost his shadow. His collected works have been edited by Hitzig (6th ed. 4 vols. 1874). See his Life by Fuida (Leip. 1881), and in English by Lentzner (1893). [Sha-meess'o.]

Champfleury, the assumed name of JULES FLEURY-HUSSON (1821-89), French author, who was born at Laon, and died at Sèvres, head of the Porcelain Museum there. In early pieces for the theatre, and later romances, he achieved some distinction as a realistic writer. Works of greater value, however, are those on the history of caricature, literature, art, pottery, &c. [Show-flay-ree'.]

Champlain, SAMUEL DE (1567-1635), French governor of Canada, was born at Brouage in Saintonge, and in 1603 made his first voyage to Canada. In 1604-7 he explored the coasts, and on his third voyage in 1608 he founded Quebec. In 1612 he was appointed lieutenant of Canada, and had a busy time with attacks on the Iroquois, explorations of the interior, and journeys to France, until 1629, when he had to surrender to an English fleet, and was carried captive to England. Liberated in 1632, he returned to Canada in 1633. See Life by Narcisse de Dionne (1905). [Show-plan'.]

Champneys, BASIL, architect, was born in 1842, the son of William Welldon Champneys (1807-75), dean of Lincoln from 1868.

Champollion, JEAN FRANÇOIS, the founder of modern Egyptology, was born December 23, 1791, at Figeac, dep. Lot. He was educated at Grenoble, and devoted himself from his boyhood to the study of oriental languages, especially Coptic. In 1807 he went to Paris, and in 1816 became professor of History at Grenoble. He had already published (1811-14) the first two volumes of L'Égypte sous les Pharaons (3 vols.), when he was expelled from his chair for his Bonapartist sympathies. His decipherment of the hieroglyphics was set forth in three works (1821-28). He was sent by the king on a scientific mission to Italy in 1824-26, and in 1826 was appointed conservator of the Egyptian collections. In 1828-30 he accompanied a scientific expedition to Egypt; on his return to Paris he was made a member of the Académie des Inscriptions (1830), and a new chair of Egyptology was founded for him in the Collège de France. He died March 4, 1832.—His elder brother, JEAN JACQUES CHAMPOLLION-FIGEAC (1778-1867), archaeologist, was born at Figeac. After holding at Grenoble the offices of librarian and professor of Greek, he was appointed in 1823 conservator of MSS. in the Royal Library in Paris, but after the February revolution was deposed from office by Carnot. In 1848 he was appointed librarian of the palace of Fontainebleau. His works include Annales des Lagides (2 vols. 1819), Les Tournois du Roi René (1827-28), and numerous publications of French historical documents. After his brother's death, he prepared, with the help of his MSS., L'Égypte ancienne et moderne (1840) and L'écriture démotique égyptienne (1843). See Les deux Champollion (Gren. 1887) by his son, AIMÉ (1812-94), himself an archaeologist. [Show-pol-yow-Fee-zhak'.]

Chancellor, RICHARD, English seaman, was brought up in the household of the father of Sir Philip Sidney, and was chosen in 1553 as 'pilot-general' of Sir Hugh Willoughby's expedition in search of a North-east Passage to India. The ships were parted in a storm off the Lofoden Islands, and Chancellor, after waiting seven days at Vardohus, proceeded alone into the White Sea, and travelled thence overland to the court at Moscow, where he concluded a treaty giving freedom of trade to English ships. His interesting account of Russia is in Hakluyt's Navigations. Next spring he returned to England, where his hopeful reports led to the establishment of the Muscovy Company. In 1555 he made a second voyage to the White Sea and to Moscow. In July 1556 he set sail homewards, but on 10th November was lost in Aberdour Bay, Aberdeenshire.

Chandler, CHARLES FREDERICK, chemist, was born at Lancaster, Mass., 6th December 1836, and studied at Harvard, Göttingen, and Berlin.

Chandler, RICHARD (1738-1810), archæologist, was born at Elson, Hants, and educated at Winchester and at Queen's and Magdalen Colleges, Oxford. His Marmora Oxoniensia (1768) is an elaborate description of the Oxford marbles. He afterwards travelled through Greece and Asia Minor for the Dilettanti Society. The materials collected were given to the world in Ionian Antiquities (1769), Inscriptiones Antiquæ (1774), Travels in Asia Minor (1775), and Travels in Greece (1776). Chandler, made D.D. in 1773, held preferments in Hants and at Tilehurst, near Reading.

Chandler, SAMUEL (1693-1766), an industrious writer, was born at Hungerford, became Presbyterian minister at Peckham, and preached at the Old Jewry from 1726.

Chandos, a great English family, descended from a follower of William the Conqueror. Its greatest member was Sir John Chandos, the Black Prince's follower, who fell in battle, 1st January 1370; and its last representative in the direct male line was another Sir John (died 1428), whose sister married one Giles Brydges. Their descendant, Sir John Brydges, was lieutenant of the Tower under Queen Mary, and was created Baron Chandos in 1554. James Brydges (1673-1744), eighth Lord Chandos, sat in parliament for Hereford from 1698 to 1714, and was created Duke of Chandos in 1719. In 1796 the title passed by marriage to the family of Grenville, till 1889 dukes of Buckingham and Chandos. See J. R. Robinson, The Princely Chandos (1893).

Changarnier, NICOLAS ANNE THÉODORE (1793-1877), French general, born at Autun, went in 1830 to Algeria, where he saw all the active service there was to be seen. In 1848 he acted as provisional governor-general of Algeria, but returned to Paris to take command of the Paris garrisons and of the National Guard. In the Legislative Assembly he held a neutral position between Orleanists and Legitimists, whilst opposing the Bonapartists. After the coup d'état in 1851 he went into exile; in the Franco-Prussian war he was shut up in Metz with Bazaine. He died at Versailles. See Life by Comte d'Antioche (1891). [Shon^g-garn-yay.]

Chanler, AMÉLIE (née RIVES), born in 1863 at Richmond, Va., divorced from J. A. Chanler, married Prince Troubetzkoi. The Quick and the Dead (1888) was first of half-a-dozen novels.

Channing, WILLIAM ELLERY, born 7th April 1790 at Newport, R.I., graduated at Harvard in 1798, and in 1803 was ordained to a Congregational church in Boston, where his sermons were famous for their 'fervour, solemnity, and beauty.' He was somewhat of a mystic, held Christ to be more than man, but was ultimately the leader of the Unitarians. In 1821 he received the title of D.D. from Harvard University, and next year he visited Europe, and made the acquaintance of Wordsworth and Coleridge.

Among his Works (6 vols. 1841-46) were his Essay on National Literature, Remarks on Milton, Character and Writings of Fénelon, Negro Slavery, and Self-culture. He died October 2, 1842, at Bennington, Vermont. See Lives by his nephew, W. H. Channing (3 vols. 1848; new ed. 1880), Frothingham (1887), and Chadwick (1903).

Chantrey, SIR FRANCIS LEGATT, sculptor, was born at Norton, in Derbyshire, 7th April 1781. His father, who was a carpenter, and rented a small farm, died when Chantrey was only twelve years of age, and the boy was in 1797 apprenticed for seven years to a carver and gilder in Sheffield. His efforts at modelling in clay and drawing pencil portraits and landscapes were encouraged by J. R. Smith, the mezzotint engraver, and in 1802 he was enabled to cancel his indentures. He studied for a short time at the Royal Academy, employing himself also in wood-carving; and in 1805 received his first commission, a marble bust for Sheffield parish church. This was followed by commissions for colossal busts of admirals for Greenwich Hospital; and on his marriage in 1807 to a well-to-do cousin his struggles were over. In 1808 he was successful in the competition for the statue of George III. for Guildhall, and during the rest of his life he was largely employed on works of portraiture. His best-known statue-group is the 'Sleeping Children' in Lichfield Cathedral. His busts include those of Watt, Wordsworth, and Scott; his statues Sir Joseph Banks (1827), Sir John Malcolm (1837), Francis Horner, Pitt, George IV., and the Duke of Wellington; while his head of Satan, and his 'Plenty' designs for Sheaf House, Sheffield, and his 'Penelope' at Woburn, are examples of his rare treatment of ideal and imaginative subjects. In 1816 Chantrey was elected an A.R.A., in 1818 an R.A.; and in 1835 he was knighted. He made a fortune of £150,000; and at his death, 25th November 1841, bequeathed to the Royal Academy, with liferent to his widow, who died in 1875, a sum yielding about £3000 annually, of which the president was to receive £300 and the secretary £50, and the rest was to go to the purchase of native works of art. See Life by John Holland (1851).

Chanzy, ANTOINE EUGÈNE ALFRED (1823-83), French general, born at Nouart (Ardennes), entered the artillery as a private, received a commission in the Zouaves in 1841, and served almost uninterruptedly in Africa till 1870. After the revolution of the 4th September he was appointed a general of division; and placed in December at the head of the second Army of the Loire, he resisted the invaders inch by inch. In 1873-79 he was governor-general of Algeria. Chosen a life-senator in 1875, he was put forward for the presidency in 1879. He was ambassador at St Petersburg in 1879-81, and afterwards commanded the 6th army corps at Châlons. See Chuquet, Le Général Chanzy (1884). [Shon^g-zee.] Chapelain, JEAN (1595-1674), a learned, industrious writer, who passed for a poet and critic. His unreadable epic, the Pucelle, in twenty-four books, was gibbeted in Boileau's satires. He wrote some fair odes. See works by Fabre (Par. 1890) and Mühlau (Leip. 1893). [Shahp-law.]

Chaplin, HENRY, born in 1841, and educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, became Conservative M.P. for Sleaford (1868), Wimbledon (1907), Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1885), president of the Board of Agriculture (1889) and Local Government Board (1895-1900), and tariff commissioner (1904).

Chapman, GEORGE, was born near Hitchin, Hertfordshire, about 1559, and is supposed to have studied at Oxford and Cambridge. To Lawrence Keymis's Second Voyage to Guiana (1596) he prefixed a spirited poem. His earliest extant play, The Blind Beggar of Alexandria, was produced in February 1595-96. The excellent comedy, All Fools, printed in 1605, was probably produced in 1599. In 1598 he completed Marlowe's Hero and Leander. After partial translations from the Iliad in 1598 and 1610, the complete translation of The Iliads of Homer, Prince of Poets, in rhymed verses of fourteen syllables, appeared in 1611. Having finished the Iliad, he set to work on the Odyssey (1616), followed (about 1624) by the minor works. In spite of all harshnesses, obscurities, conceits, and mistakes in Greek, Chapman's translation of Homer is a noble achievement. He joined Jonson and Marston in the composition of Eastward Ho (1605), and in 1606 published a graceful comedy, The Gentleman Usher. In 1607 appeared Bussy d'Ambois, and in 1613 The Revenge of Bussy d'Ambois—tragedies containing much inarticulate bombast intermingled with exalted poetry. The Conspiracie and Tragedie of Charles, Duke of Byron (1608), are also undramatic, but abound in fine poetry. Chapman's other plays are The May Day (1611), The Widow's Tears (1612), and Cæsar and Pompey (1631). Two posthumous tragedies (1654), Alphonso and Revenge for Honour, bear his name with doubtful right, but their authorship is uncertain. The Ball, a comedy, and The Tragedie of Chabot (1639) were the joint work of Chapman and Shirley. Among Chapman's non-dramatic works are Ethymicæ Luptus (1609), Petrarch's Seven Penitentiall Psalmes (1612), The Divine Poem of Musæus (1616), and The Georgicks of Hesiod (1618). He died 12th May 1634. A complete edition of his works in 3 vols., edited by Dr Parrott (1910 et seq.), supersedes that of 1873-75.

Chapman, WALTER. See CHEPMAN.

Chapone, HESTER (1727-1801), authoress, daughter of Thomas Mulso, and born at Twywell, Northants, wrote for the Rambler (No. 10), Advertiser, and Gentleman's Magazine; but is now chiefly remembered by her Letters on the Improvement of the Mind (1772). She married an attorney in 1760, but next year was left a widow. See her Works with Life (4 vols. 1807). [Sha-poan'.]

Chappell, WILLIAM, F.S.A., born November 20, 1809, lived mostly in London, where he was a member of a great music publishing house, and where he died, August 20, 1888. His Collection of National English Airs (2 vols. [1838-40]) ultimately grew into Popular Music of the Olden Time (2 vols. [1855-59]; new ed. by Ellis and Woodridge, 1893). Mr Chappell took a principal part in the foundation in 1840 of the Musical Antiquarian Society, the Percy Society, and in 1868 of the Ballad Society. He published in 1874 vol. i. of a History of Music.

Chaptal, JEAN ANTOINE (1756-1832), French statesman and chemist, was born at Nogaret, and died in Paris, having in 1811 been made Comte de Chanteloup by Napoleon. [Shap-tal.]

Charcot, JEAN MARTIN (1825-93), pathologist, was born at Paris, studied medicine at Paris, where he became a professor, doctor at the Salpêtrière hospital, and a member of the Institute. He contributed much to our knowledge of chronic and nervous diseases, and made hypnotism a scientific study. He published numerous works on these subjects.

Chard, JOHN ROUSE MERRIOTT, born Dec. 21, 1847, entered the engineers in 1868, and as lieutenant gained an imperishable name by holding Rorke's Drift a whole night (Jan. 22, 1879) against 3000 Zulus with eighty men of the 24th Regiment. He was made major and V.C., and in 1893 lieutenant-colonel. He died near Taunton, Nov. 1, 1897.

Chardin, JEAN (1643-1713), traveller, was born in Paris, and went to India in 1663 to buy diamonds for his father, a jeweller; resided for some years in Persia; and after a short visit to France in 1670, returned to India and Persia. Settling as a Protestant in England in 1681, he was knighted the same year by Charles II., and afterwards he was the representative to Holland of the English East India Company. His Journal du Voyage, and an English translation of it, were published in 1686-1711.

Charlemagne, Karl or Charles the Great, king of the Franks and Roman emperor, was born on 2d April 742, perhaps at Aix-la-Chapelle, and was the eldest son of Pepin the Short and grandson of Charles Martel. On Pepin's death (768) Charles and his brother Carloman jointly succeeded to the throne; and on Carloman's death (771) Charles became sole king, and in 772 fought against the Saxons. At the request of Pope Adrian I., he crossed the Alps in 773, and overthrew the Lombard kingdom, confirming Ravenna to the papal see. In 775 he was again reducing the Saxons; in 776 he suppressed an insurrection in Italy; and in 777 secured the submission of the Saxon chiefs. From Spain, whither he had gone to fight the Moors and Arabs (778), he was summoned to crush the Saxons; in 781 he was in Rome. The Saxons rising in arms once more, destroyed a Frankish army in 782, which Charlemagne fearfully avenged. A more general rising followed, but in 783-785 the Frankish monarch persuaded the chiefs to submit to baptism and become his faithful vassals. In 788 Bavaria was absorbed in his dominions, and next the country of the Avars to the Raab; the eastern 'mark,' the nucleus of the Austrian empire, being established to defend the frontier there (798). In 800 he marched into Italy to support Pope Leo III. against the rebellious Romans, and on Christmas Day 800, in St Peter's Church, was crowned by the pope, and saluted as Carolus Augustus, emperor of the Romans. The remaining years of his reign were spent in further consolidating his vast empire, which extended from the Ebro to the Elbe. Bishoprics were founded in the Saxon country; many of the Slavs beyond the Elbe were subjugated. The emperor zealously promoted education, agriculture, arts, manufactures, and commerce. He built sumptuous palaces, particularly at Aix-la-Chapelle and Ingelheim near Bingen, and many churches. Learned men were encouraged to come to his court, and he himself could speak Latin and read Greek. His fame spread to all parts of the world; in 798 Haroun Al-Raschid sent ambassadors. The emperor, who was of most commanding presence, died 28th January 814, and was buried at Aix-la-Chapelle. His reign was a noble attempt to consolidate order and Christian culture among the nations of the West; but as his successors were weaklings, his empire fell to pieces. Besides his Capitularies or collection of laws, there are letters and Latin poems ascribed to him. His Life was written in Latin by his secretary, Eginhard (q. v.), the best editions being by Jaffé (1876) and Holder (1882). See Lives by Cutts (1882), Mombert (1889), Hodgkin (1897), Davis (1900); Wells,

The Age of Charlemagne (1898); and ROLAND. [Sharl'main; Fr. nearly Sharl-mahn'ye.]

Charles, surnamed Martel ('the Hammer'), was the natural son of Pepin of Heristal, mayor of the palace under the later Merovingian kings, and was born about 688. Chosen duke in 714 by the Austrasian Franks, he became in 720 mayor of the palace and real ruler of all the Franks. He had much hard fighting with the Saxons, Alemanni, and Bavarians, and he it was who rolled back the tide of Moslem conquest, in a desperate battle between Tours and Poitiers (732). Charles finished his work by driving the Saracens out of Burgundy and Languedoc (737). He died in 741, leaving the kingdom to be divided between his sons—Carloman and Pepin.

Charles I., born at Dunfermline on 19th November 1600, was a sickly child, unable to speak till his fifth year, and so weak in the ankles that till his seventh he had to crawl upon his hands and knees. Except for a stammer, he outgrew both defects, and became a skilled tilter and marksman, as well as an accomplished scholar and a diligent student of theology. He was created Duke of Albany at his baptism, Duke of York in 1605, and Prince of Wales in 1616, four years after the death of Prince Henry had left him heir to the crown. The Spanish match had been mooted as early as 1614; but it was not till 17th February 1623 that, with Buckingham, Charles started on the romantic incognito journey to Madrid. Nothing short of his conversion would have satisfied the Spanish and papal courts; and on 5th October he landed again in England, eager for rupture with Spain. The nation's joy was speedily dashed by his betrothal to the French princess, Henrietta Maria (1609-69); for the marriage articles pledged him to permit her the free exercise of the Catholic religion, and to give her the upbringing of their children till the age of thirteen.

On 27th March 1625 Charles succeeded his father, James I.; on 13th June he welcomed his little bright-eyed queen at Dover, having married her by proxy six weeks earlier. Barely a twelvemonth was over when he packed off her troublesome retinue to France—a bishop and 29 priests, with 410 more male and female attendants. Thenceforth their domestic life was a happy one; and during the twelve years following the murder of Buckingham (1592-1628), in whose hands he had been a mere tool, Charles gradually came to yield himself up to her unwise influence, not wholly indeed, but more than to that of Strafford even, or Laud. Three parliaments were summoned and dissolved in the first four years of the reign; then for eleven years Charles ruled without one, in its stead with subservient judges and the courts of Star Chamber and High Commission. In 1627 he had blundered into an inglorious French war; but with France he concluded peace in 1629, with Spain in 1630. Peace, economy, and arbitrary taxation were to solve the great problem of his policy—how to get money, yet not account for it. The extension of the ship-tax to the inland counties was met by Hampden's passive resistance (1637); Laud's attempt to Anglicise the Scottish Church, by the active resistance of the whole northern nation (1639). Once more Charles had to call a parliament: two met in 1640—the Short Parliament, which lasted but three weeks, and the Long, which outlasted Charles.

It met to pronounce Strafford's doom; and, his plot with the army detected, Charles basely sacrificed his loyal servitor to fears for the queen's safety, at the same time assenting to a second bill by which the existing parliament might not be dissolved without its own consent. That pledge, as extorted by force, Charles purposed to disregard; and during his visit to Edinburgh, in the autumn of 1641, he trusted by lavish concessions to bring over the Scots to his side. Instead, he got entangled in dark suspicions of plotting the murder of the Covenanted lords, of connivance even in the Ulster massacre. Still, his return to London was welcomed with some enthusiasm, and a party was forming in the Commons itself of men who revolted from the sweeping changes that menaced both church and state. Pym's 'Grand Remonstrance' justified their fears, and Charles seemed to justify the 'Grand Remonstrance' by his attempt to arrest the five members (4th January 1642); but that ill-stricken blow was dictated by the knowledge of an impending impeachment of the queen herself. On 22d August he raised the royal standard at Nottingham; and the four years' Civil War commenced, in which, as at Naseby, he showed no lack of physical courage, and which resulted at Naseby in the utter annihilation of his cause (14th June 1645). Quitting his last refuge, Oxford, he surrendered himself on 5th May 1646 to the Scots at Newark, and by them in the following January was handed over to the parliament. His four months' captivity at Holby House, near Northampton; his seizure, on 3d June, by Cornet Joyce; the three months at Hampton Court; the flight on 11th November; the fresh captivity at Carisbrooke Castle, in the Isle of Wight—these lead up to the 'trial' at Westminster of the 'tyrant, traitor, and murderer, Charles Stuart.' He had drawn the sword, and by the sword he perished, for it was the army, not parliament, that stood at the back of his judges. Charles faced them bravely, and with dignity. Thrice he refused to plead, denying the competence of such a court; and his refusal being treated as a confession, on 30th January 1649 he died on the scaffold in front of Whitehall, with a courage worthy of a very martyr. On the snowy 7th of February they bore the 'white king' to his grave at Windsor in Henry VIII.'s vault; in 1813 the Prince Regent had his leaden coffin opened. Six children survived him—Charles and James, his successors; Mary, Princess of Orange (1631-60); Elizabeth (1635-50); Henry, Duke of Gloucester (1639-60); and Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans (1644-70), the last born ten weeks after Charles's final parting from his queen. Charles II., born at St James's on 29th May 1630, was present at Edgehill (1642), and in 1646, after a twelvemonth in the western counties, escaped to France by way of Scilly and Jersey. He got little good from two years spent in Paris; then he passed on to Holland, whence, in 1648, with nineteen English royalist war-ships, he made an expedition to the Thames. His father beheaded—Charles did his utmost to save him—and his hopes disappointed from Ireland and Montrose, in 1650 he accepted the terms of the Scottish commissioners, and landed on 23d June at the mouth of the Spey. That was a dreary time of prayers, fastings, and sermons for the gay young prince. Less a king than state-prisoner, he must sign and re-sign the two Covenants, must put away his old friends, must acknowledge his father's blood-guiltiness and mother's idolatry. But the defeat at Dunbar and his 'start' for the Highlands gained Charles somewhat more liberty; and, having on 1st January 1651 been crowned at Scone, in the following August he suddenly marched, with 10,000 men, into England. Few joined the Scots, and, catching them up at Worcester, Cromwell utterly routed them on 3d September. For six weeks Charles wandered a fugitive, a thousand pounds set on his head, now hiding in the oak at Boscobel, now riding disguised as a serving-man, anon lurking at Stonehenge. More than forty persons were privy to his secret, yet on 15th October he embarked at Shoreham for Normandy. Nearly three years followed of exile in France, nearly two at Cologne, then three in the Low Countries, needy everywhere, everywhere profligate; but at last, on 26th May 1660, Charles landed at Dover, recalled to the throne by the fall of the Protectorate and the nation's dread of military despotism.

Of the four parliaments that succeeded the Convention, the first or 'Cavalier' parliament lasted from 1661 to 1679; from March 1681 Charles ruled without one. The first seven years (1660-67) were the period of Clarendon's ascendancy, of constitutional loyalty to church and state, as anti-Catholic as it was anti-Puritan. Next came the Catholic-Presbyterian Cabal, broken up by the Test Act of 1673; and then the fierce struggle between the Court and Country factions, in which Shaftesbury played the chief part, and from which, in the end, Charles issued victorious. As early as 1661 he accepted a secret subsidy from France, and no act of his reign was more unpopular than the sale next year of Dunkirk. In 1665 a naval Dutch war, due to commercial jealousy, was forced on by Clarendon's enemies. In spite of two English victories, with an indecisive engagement between (Lowestoft, Downs, and North Foreland), in June 1667 De Ruyter sailed up the Thames, and burned several war-ships lying at Chatham—that night Charles was very merry in his harem. The peace of Breda (21st July), which in August was followed by Clarendon's downfall, left both nations exhausted, and France the sole gainer. Temple's Triple Alliance (1668), between England, Holland, and Sweden, was on Charles's part a mere bid for popularity, a means too of raising his price with Louis XIV.; and by the secret treaty of Dover (1670) he entered on an alliance with France, became its pensioner, and undertook the conversion of England. A sea-fight with the Dutch in South-west Bay (1672) was bloody but indecisive; and the strong anti-French feeling forced Charles to conclude a peace (1674), and to consent to the marriage of his niece Mary with his nephew William of Orange (1677). Still, by two other secret treaties (1676-78), and by also intriguing with the opposition, Louis secured his end, to cut England off from continental politics.

At home, the abortive Savoy Conference was followed by the ejection of nearly 2000 Nonconformist ministers (1662); the Great Plague (1665) carried off nearly 70,000 Londoners; and the Great Fire (September 1666) consumed 13,200 houses. Sir John Coventry, for plain speaking, got his nose slit by Charles's bullies (1670); the 'stop of the Exchequer' (1672) plunged the chief city bankers in bankruptcy; and Charles's two Declarations of Indulgence (1662-72) were met by the Conventicle and Test Acts. Clarendon's foes had cause to dread Clarendon's son-in-law, the king's brother, James, Duke of York; and his open profession of Catholicism (1672) gave a pretext for Shaftesbury's Exclusion Bill, and colour to Oates's trumped-up Popish Plot (1678-80). Men's shame at that shameful panic, and disgust at the thought of the bastard Monmouth on the throne, caused a Tory reaction; and the Tory reaction drove the Whigs on to open resistance—the Rye-house Plot (1683). Shaftesbury died beyond the seas, Lord Essex by his own hand in the Tower, and Russell and Sidney by the headsmen's axe. Struck with apoplexy, and reconciled on his deathbed to the Catholic Church, Charles passed away on Friday the 6th of February 1685. On the night of the 14th he was buried in Westminster Abbey. With him ended the worst reign in English history, whose sole great measure was the Habeas Corpus Act (1679). On 22d May 1662 he had married poor plain Catharine of Braganza (1638-1705). The marriage was childless, and her influence on English politics was slight as compared with that of his numberless mistresses. Of these, before the Restoration, two only call for notice—'brown, beautiful, bold, but insipid' Lucy Walter (1630-58), the mother of James, Duke of Monmouth and Buccleuch (1649-85); and Catherine Peg, the mother of Charles Fitzcharles, Earl of Plymouth (1657-80). Then came the splendid tynmagent, Barbara Villiers or Palmer (1640-1709), whom Charles made Countess of Castlenain in 1661, Duchess of Cleveland in 1670, and who was mother of the three Fitzroy Dukes of Southampton and Cleveland (1662-1730), Grafton (1663-90), and Northumberland (1665-1716). By 'pretty, witty' Nell Gwynn (1650-87) Charles was father of Charles Beaulerck, Duke of St Albans (1670-1726); almost his last words were 'Let not poor Nelly starve.' There were, besides, 'la belle Stewart' (Duchess of Richmond), the Duchess of Mazarin, and many more, with, last but not least, the hated 'Madam Carwell,' i.e. Louise de Keroualle (1649-1734), the subtle, 'baby-faced' Breton. She was made Duchess of Portsmouth in 1672, French Duchesse d'Aubigny in 1684; and she was the mother of Charles Lennox, Duke of Richmond (1672-1723). CHARLES I., 'the Bald' (823-77), was king of France from 843 and emperor of the West from 875.—CHARLES II. of France, 'the Fat' (839-88), king from 884, had become emperor in Germany (as Charles III.) in 881, but was deposed for making a disgraceful treaty with the Northmen in 887.—CHARLES III., 'the Simple' (879-929), king from 893, made peace with the Northmen, and was deposed in 922.—CHARLES IV. (1294-1328) was king from 1322.—CHARLES V., 'the Wise' (1337-80), succeeded his father, John II., in 1364, and regained most of the territory lost to the English.—His son, CHARLES VI., 'the Foolish' (1368-1422), lost the battle of Agincourt, and died insane.

Charles VII., king of France, was born in 1403, and, on succeeding his father, Charles VI., in 1422, held with his army the southern provinces; Paris and the north being in the hands of the English, who proclaimed Henry VI. of England king of France, and appointed the Duke of Bedford regent. Charles was compelled to evacuate Champagne and Maine; but in 1426 at Montargis Dunois gained the first victory over the English, who in 1427 laid siege to Orleans. Joan of Arc roused the fervour of both nobles and people; the siege of Orleans was raised in May 1429; the English gradually lost all they had gained in France; and their cause became hopeless after the treaty concluded at Arras (1435) between the French king and the Duke of Burgundy. Bayonne fell in 1451, and with the death of Talbot under the walls of Castillon in 1453, the whole south finally passed to France, and the Hundred Years' War came to an end. In 1436 Charles entered Paris. He devoted himself to the reorganisation of the government, and under his rule France recovered in some measure from her terrible calamities. His last years were embittered by the conduct of his son, the Dauphin, afterwards Louis XI. He died at Melun, 22d July 1461. See the great work by Du Fresne de Beaucourt (6 vols. 1881-92).—CHARLES VIII., 'the Affable' (1470-98), succeeded his father, Louis XI., in 1483; in 1495-96 he failed in an attempt to secure the kingdom of Naples.

Charles IX., king of France, the second son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, was born at St Germain-en-Laye in 1550, and succeeded his brother, Francis II., in 1560. He was a proficient in manly exercises, and possessed much physical energy, with some literary accomplishments. But, weak and wavering with all his cruelty and cunning, he was completely subject to his mother, whose counsels drove him to authorise the atrocious massacre of St Bartholomew, 24th August 1572. Its consequences were far from favourable to the Catholic cause, while scarce two years later (May 30, 1574) the wretched king died miserably. See works by Desjardins (1874) and De la Barre-Duparcq (1875).

Charles X., king of France, third son of the Dauphin Louis, and grandson of Louis XV., was born at Versailles, 9th October 1757. He received the title of Comte d'Artois, and in 1773 married Maria Theresa of Savoy. The first emigration was headed by him and Condé. After taking a small part in the war of 1792, Charles went to St Petersburg; thence in 1793 to England. In spite of the failure of the expedition to Quiberon Bay in June 1795, another was attempted under Artois in October, but he had not courage to land and head the insurgents, whom he basely left to the vengeance of Hoche. After this he lived partly at Holyrood and partly at Hartwell, until the allies entered Paris in 1814, when he appeared in France as lieutenant-general of the kingdom. After the second restoration, in alliance with the priests, he headed the Ultras in their struggle with the Constitutionals. The death of Louis (1824) brought him to the throne as Charles X. He took the oath of adherence to the Charte, and was at first popular, but soon showed signs of restoring the absolutism of the old French monarchy. Popular discontent rapidly increased; but in 1829 Charles called Prince Polignac to the head of affairs. A threatening royal speech, on 2d March 1830, was followed by a remonstrance, signed by 221 deputies, upon which the king dissolved the chambers. The deputies who signed the address were all re-elected, but the celebrated five ordinances of 25th July were signed by the king, putting an end to the freedom of the press, and dissolving the recently elected chamber. Paris took up arms, and the king, as a last resource, with his elder son, the Duc d'Angoulême (q.v.), abdicated on 2d August 1830 in favour of his grandson, the little Comte de Chambord. But it was too late; the Revolution was completed, and Louis-Philippe was chosen king of the French. Charles resided for some time at Holyrood again, and afterwards at Prague. He died of cholera at Görz, 6th November 1836. See works by Védrenne (1879), Petit (1886), Villeneuve (1889), and Imbert de Saint-Amand (1891).

Charles I. of Germany was Charlemagne (q.v.); CHARLES II. was Charles I. of France; and CHARLES III. was Charles II.—CHARLES IV. (1316-78) was the son of John of Bohemia, and held his court mainly at Prague.

Charles V., emperor of Germany, was born at Ghent, 24th February 1500. From his father Philip, son of the Emperor Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy, he inherited the Low Countries, the county of Burgundy, and a claim to the imperial crown; from his mother, Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, he inherited Spain, Naples, and Spanish America. In 1517 he went to Spain, and was made joint ruler with his mother, now insane; and in 1519 he was elected to the Holy Roman Empire. Next year he was crowned emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle, and a few months later (1521) presided at the Diet of Worms, which condemned Luther's opinions.

The history of Western Europe was now largely the rivalry of Charles and Francis I. of France. Henry VIII. of England and the popes favoured now the one and now the other; and the result was almost continuous war, broken by the Treaty of Madrid (1526), the Ladies' Peace of Cambrai (1529), and the Peace of Crespy (1544). Charles claimed the duchy of Burgundy and the duchy of Milan. Francis asserted his right to these, and demanded homage of Charles for Flanders and Artois. At first the war—mainly in Italy—was altogether in Charles's favour. Henry VIII. aided the emperor, and Francis's greatest subject, the Constable Bourbon, leagued with Charles and Henry. In 1524 Charles's troops drove the French out of Italy and invaded Provence; and next year Francis was defeated and taken prisoner at Pavia, being released in 1526 only on yielding to Charles on all the points in dispute. Straightway the Holy League was formed against Charles by Pope Clement VII., Henry VIII., Francis, and the Venetians; but in 1527 a motley army of Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, led by Bourbon, who fell in the assault, sacked Rome, and imprisoned the pope. Charles, denounced as the author of the sacrilege, disclaimed all part in it. The Peace of Cambrai (1529) left Charles master of Italy.

During these years Charles had been resident in Spain, where it required all his tact to suppress discontent and extort the funds needed for his foreign schemes. In 1529 he proceeded to Italy, and at Bologna was crowned by the pope king of Lombardy and emperor of the Romans. In vain he urged the pope to call a general council for settling the Lutheran problem. At the Diet of Augsburg (1530) Charles confirmed the Edict of Worms, and the Protestants formed the League of Schmalkald. The threat of an invasion by the Sultan forced Charles to make concessions. In 1535 Charles in person crushed the corsair Barbarossa, and captured Tunis. In 1536 he invaded Provence from Italy, but accomplished nothing; Francis, in desperation, called in the aid of the Turk. In 1538 the pope (Paul III.), Francis, and Charles agreed at Nice to a ten years' truce.

In 1539 Charles travelled through France to the Low Countries, quelled an insurrection at Ghent, and stripped the town of all its privileges; and held another diet in Germany. In 1541 he conducted against the pirates of Algiers a fleet which was utterly wrecked by storms. The war with Francis about Milan went on again for three years; and the Turkish fleet wintered at Toulon, whereat Henry VIII. was so indignant that he concerted with Charles an invasion of France; it forced Francis to make the unfavourable peace of Crespy (1544). Charles's league with the pope drove the Protestants to arms, but two campaigns saw their power broken, and the Augsburg Interim (1548) followed. Charles's severe enforcement of the Interim, his cruel treatment of his prisoners, the Landgrave of Hesse and the Elector of Saxony, and his evident design to make himself absolute master of Germany, led to the overthrow of all his plans. Maurice of Saxony, who, although a Protestant, had hitherto supported Charles, worsted the emperor and soon was in a position to command the most favourable conditions for the Protestants, and by the Treaty of Passau (1552), and by the Peace of Augsburg (1555), Protestantism received legal recognition. He had tried in vain to persuade his brother Ferdinand to waive his claims to the empire in favour of his son Philip, and the princes of Germany, Catholic as well as Protestant, refused to entertain Charles's suggestion. Disappointed in his dearest hopes, and broken in health by gout, Charles laid down his imperial dignity and resigned the kingdom of Spain to his son (1555), who had married Mary of England. Retiring to the monastery of Yuste, in Estremadura, he spent the rest of his life in complete seclusion, dying on 21st September 1558. Don John (q.v.) of Austria was an illegitimate son of Charles V. See Robertson's Life of Charles V., and Prescott's continuation; Ranke's History of the Reformation in Germany; Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell's Cloister Life of Charles V.; and E. Armstrong's Charles V. (1902).

Charles I. of Spain was Charles V. of Germany (q.v.).—CHARLES II. (1661-1700), who succeeded his father, Philip IV., in 1665, was a feeble king.—CHARLES III. (1716-88) was a younger son of Philip V., and succeeded his half-brother, Ferdinand VI., in 1759.—His son CHARLES IV. (1784-1819) was the king whose fleet Nelson destroyed at Trafalgar, and who had to abdicate in Napoleon's favour in 1808.

Charles X. (1622-60), king of Sweden, the son of the Count Palatine by Gustavus-Adolphus's sister, took part in the Thirty Years' War, and on the abdication of his cousin, Queen Christina (1654), succeeded to the throne of a kingdom impoverished by her extravagance. He overran Poland in 1655; forced the Great Elector to acknowledge his lordship over Prussia; and crushed the forces of the Polish king anew in a terrible three-days' battle at Warsaw (July 28-30, 1656). His next war was with the Danes, when he crossed the Great and Little Belt on the ice, and extorted the Treaty of Boeskind (1658), which gave to Sweden the southern parts of the Scandinavian peninsula, heretofore Danish. In 1659 he was driven from a new attack on Copenhagen by help of the Brandenburgers and Dutch; and he died suddenly at Gothenburg, 23d February, 1660, being succeeded by his infant son, Charles XI. (1660-97).

Charles XII. of Sweden, the son of Charles XI., was born 27th June 1682, and on the death of his father in 1697 was declared of age. Denmark, Poland, and Russia thought this a favourable time for combining to humble Sweden. The young king at once flung an army into Zealand, and in concert with Sir George Rooke's Anglo-Dutch squadron speedily compelled the Danes to sue for peace. Charles now hastened to meet the Russians, 50,000 strong, at Narva, stormed their camp with but 8000 Swedes, and routed them with great slaughter, 30th November 1700. He next dethroned Augustus II., and procured the election of Stanislaus Leszczynski as king of Poland. Augustus was pursued to Saxony, his hereditary dominion, and forced to sign a humiliating peace (1706). In 1707 Charles had collected an army of 45,000 men in Saxony, and in the January of the following year suddenly burst into Russia, and almost captured Peter the Great at Grodno. He drove the Russians before him, and had won a battle at Smolensk, when he suddenly turned southwards to the Ukraine, trusting to the promises of the Cossack hetman Mazeppa. But Mazeppa failed to bring forward his 30,000 Cossacks, and, after a winter of fearful hardship, Charles, with 23,000 men, laid siege to Pultowa, where the Czar defeated him (8th July 1709). Charles fled across the Turkish frontier to Bender. The Czar and the king of Denmark assailed the Swedish territories, but Charles stirred up the Porte to war with Russia. Ere long, however, the Turks became suspicious of Charles and imprisoned him; but escaping, he made his way through Hungary and Germany in sixteen days, till he reached Stralsund in November 1714. A month later the town was forced to capitulate to an allied army of Danes, Saxons, Prussians, and Russians, Charles having escaped four days before. Nothing daunted, he attacked Norway in 1716; and soon after he formed a highly ambitious scheme. He was to make terms with the Czar by surrendering the Baltic provinces of Sweden, then conquer Norway, next land in Scotland and replace the House of Stuart on the throne, with the help of the Jacobite party within and that of Cardinal Alberoni without. No sooner had he purchased his peace with the Czar than he burst into Norway; and during the siege of Frederikshald was killed (11th December 1718) by a musket-shot from the fortress—not, as was long alleged, by a treacherous shot from his own ranks. Charles was brave to the pitch of reckless folly, determined to the point of foolish obstinacy. His hardy frame defied alike fatigue, heat, and cold: he shared the coarsest food and severest labour of the common soldier with a winning cheerfulness. He was able and sagacious in counsel. But his ambition was fatal to his country; and after his death, Sweden, exhausted by his wars, ceased to be numbered among the great powers. Voltaire's Histoire de Charles XII. remains, spite of errors, the best life; there are also good sketches by King Oscar II. (Eng. trans. 1879), Nisbet Bain (1896), and Oscar Browning (1899).

Charles XIV., king of Sweden and Norway, originally JEAN BAPTISTE JULES BERNADOTTE, was born, a lawyer's son, at Pau, January 26, 1764. He entered the French army in 1780 as a common soldier, became an ardent partisan of the Revolution, and fought his way up to the command of a division in 1794, and a marshal's baton in 1804. He distinguished himself greatly in the German campaigns in 1796 and the year after under the eye of his great chief himself in Italy. In 1799 he was minister of war, and for his conduct at Austerlitz was named in 1805 Prince of Pontecorvo. In the campaigns of 1806 he commanded the first army corps. After Jena he pursued the Prussians to Halle, and Blücher to Lübeck, compelling him to surrender (November 7). He received the command of the French troops in North Germany and Denmark, and led the Saxon troops at Wagram. But he had never been liked or trusted by Napoleon, whose jealousy now became so apparent that Bernadotte returned to Paris. In 1810 he was elected heir to the throne of Sweden. He turned Protestant, and changed his name to Charles John; and the health of the Swedish king, Charles XIII., failing next year, the reins of government came almost entirely into his hands. He refused to comply with Napoleon's demands, which were opposed to Swedish interests, and was soon involved in war with him. He took part in the final struggle at Leipzig, but showed much reluctance to join in the invasion of France. He became king of Sweden on Charles's death in 1818, and won for himself the character of a wise and good king. He died March 8, 1844, and was succeeded by his son Oscar. See French Life by Sarrans (1845).

Charles d'Orléans (1391-1465), son of Louis d'Orléans, duke, who was murdered by the Burgundians, was the grandson of Charles V. of France, and the father of Louis XII. He was taken prisoner at Agincourt, and kept in captivity in England from 1415 to 1440. He wrote graceful lyrics while in prison and after his return to France. At Blois he gathered together the chief French writers, and took part with them in poetical tournaments; François Villon competed in one successfully. His works were edited by Guichard (1842) and Héricault (1875). See R. L. Stevenson's Familiar Studies (1882).

Charles of Anjou (1225-1285), youngest son of Louis VIII. of France, received the crown of Naples and Sicily from Pope Urban IV., slew Manfred, and provoked the rising against the French known as 'the Sicilian Vespers.'

Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, was born at Dijon 10th November 1433. From his youth he was a declared enemy of Louis XI. of France, nominally feudal superior of Burgundy, and he early formed an alliance with the Duke of Brittany and some of the great nobles of France. Their united forces ravaged Picardy, threatened Paris, defeated the king at Monthéry, and extorted from him favourable terms. In 1467 Charles succeeded his father, Philip the Good, as Duke of Burgundy. Richer and more powerful than any prince of his time, he conceived the design of restoring the old kingdom of Burgundy, and conquering Lorraine, Provence, Dauphiné, and Switzerland. Louis invited him to a conference, and while he hesitated, stirred up the citizens of Liège to revolt. At the news Charles seized the king, and but for Comines (q.v.), would have put him to death. He compelled Louis to accompany him to Liège, and sanction by his presence the cruelties which he inflicted on the citizens. War raged between them till 1475, when Charles turned anew to his favourite scheme of conquest, and soon made himself master of Lorraine. Invading Switzerland, he stormed Granson, and hanged and drowned the garrison; but was terribly defeated by the Swiss near that place (1st March 1476). Presently he besieged Morat, but sustained a more terrible defeat (June 22). The news that Duke René of Lorraine was attempting to recover his territories roused him from despair. He laid siege to Nancy; but his army was small, and his Italian mercenaries went over to the enemy. Charles fought with all his wonted recklessness, and perished in the battle, January 5, 1477. His daughter Mary married the Emperor Maximilian I. See Lives by Kirk (3 vols. 1863) and Putnam (1908).

Charles Edward. See STEWART.

Charles (Karl Ludwigo Johans), Archduke of Austria, third son of the Emperor Leopold II., was born at Florence, 5th September 1771. Entrusted in 1796 with the chief command of the Austrian army on the Rhine, he defeated Moreau and Jourdan in several battles, drove the French over the Rhine, and took Kehl. In 1799 he was again victorious over Jourdan. Next year ill-health compelled him to accept the governor-generalship of Bohemia. Recalled after Hohenlinden to the chief command, he checked the progress of Moreau. In 1805 he commanded against Massena in Italy; then, upon bad tidings from Germany, made a masterly retreat to Croatia. In 1809 he won the great battle of Aspern; but Napoleon soon retrieved his fortunes at Wagram. He died 30th April 1847. See his Ausgewählte Schriften (6 vols. Vienna, 1899-94).

Charles Albert (1798-1849), king of Sardinia, in 1800 succeeded his father, Prince Charles Emmanuel of Savoy-Carignan. In 1817 he married Maria Theresa, daughter of the Archduke of Tuscany. When the revolution took place in Piedmont in 1821, he was temporarily regent, in 1829 was appointed viceroy of Sardinia, and on the death of Charles Felix in 1831 ascended the throne. His moderation earned Mazzini's denunciations but the applause of all far-sighted men. In 1848 he declared war against Austria; but after the fatal battle of Novara, 24th March 1849, he had to abdicate in favour of his son, Victor Emmanuel. He died broken-hearted in Portugal. See Life by Cibrario (Turin, 1861).

Charles, ELIZABETH (1828-96), born at Tavistock, the daughter of John Rundle, M.P., in 1851 married Andrew Paton Charles, who died in 1868. Since 1850 she published upwards of a score of works, the best known her Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family (1863). See her autobiographical Our Seven Homes (1897).

Charlesworth, MARIA LOUISA (1819-80), author of Ministering Children (1854), &c., was born at Little Blakenham rectory, near Ipswich, and died at Nutfield, near Reigate.

Charlet, NICOLAS TOUSSAINT (1792-1845), painter and engraver, born at Paris, held a clerkship under the Empire, but lost it at the Restoration (1815), and betook himself to art. After studying under Gros, he gradually formed a style for himself. The Béranger of caricature, he was especially successful in his sketches of children and military incident. See Lives by Lacombe (1856) and Dayot (1892). [Shar-lay.]

Charleton, WALTER (1619-1707), physician, philosopher, antiquary, and author, was born at Shepton-Mallet, and died at Nantwich.

Charlevoix, PIERRE FRANÇOIS XAVIER DE (1682-1761), a French Jesuit traveller, born in St Quentin, twice visited Canada, and voyaged down the Mississippi to New Orleans. He published his journal, histories of San Domingo, Japan, and Paraguay, and a Histoire de la Nouvelle France (1744; Eng. trans. New York, 6 vols. 1865-72). [Sharl-voah.]

Charlotte, PRINCESS, born at Carlton House, London, 7th January 1796, was the only child of the future George IV. and Caroline of Brunswick, who parted immediately after her birth. A bright, lively, warm-tempered girl, she was brought up in strict seclusion, seeing her father rarely, and her mother only for two hours a week. Her six months' engagement to Prince William of Orange she herself broke off in June 1814, greatly to George's fury. On 2d May 1816 she married Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg; but the marriage, a happy one, was cut short on 5th November 1817 by her death, after giving birth to a still-born boy. See Memoirs by Lady Rose Weigall (1874) and Mrs Herbert Jones (1885).

Charlotte Elizabeth (1652-1721), only daughter of the Count Palatine, and grand-daughter of Elizabeth of Bohemia, in 1671 became the second wife of Philip Duke of Orleans (1640-1701). See her interesting Life and Letters (Lond. 1889).

Charlotte Sophia (1744-1818), niece of the Duke of Mecklenburg, in September 1761 was married to George III. (q.v.), and bore him fifteen children. Her eldest daughter, Charlotte Augusta Matilda (1766-1828), in 1797 married the future Elector and King of Württemberg.

Charnock, JOB, the founder in 1686-90 of Calcutta by the removal hither from Hugli of the factories of the East India Company. He had come out to India about 1655, about 1664 became chief of the Patna factory, was transferred to Hugli in 1686, and died in January 1693, having married about 1679 a beautiful young Hindu widow whom he had rescued from suttee.

Charnock, ROBERT (c. 1663-96), the Romanist ex-fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, who was hanged at Tyburn for his share in Barclay's plot to assassinate William III.

Charnock, STEPHEN (1628-80), puritan, studied at Cambridge, but in 1649 settled at Oxford, becoming a fellow of New College. He was chaplain to Henry Cromwell, was eminent as a preacher, and left several works.

Charpentier. See DE CHARPENTIER.

Charron, PIERRE (1541-1603), born at Paris, after being called to the bar, took orders, and became a leader of the moderate Catholics. He assailed the League in his Discours Chrétiens (1589), vindicated Catholicism in Les Trois Vérités (1594), and in his chief work, De la Sagesse (1601), took a sceptical attitude towards all forms of religion. He was a friend of Montaigne, from whose essays he borrowed freely. [Shar-ron.]

Charteris, FRANCIS (1675-1732), colonel, card-sharpener, thief, and scoundrel generally, was a native of Dumfriesshire, and purchased an estate in East Lothian. His only daughter married the fourth Earl of Weimys. [Char-ters.]

Chartier, ALAIN (c. 1394-c. 1441), born at Bayeux, was secretary to Charles VI. and Charles VII. According to an impossible legend, Margaret the dauphiness, herself a poetess, once stooped to kiss him as he lay asleep, in token of her admiration of his verses. In his Livre des Quatre Dames four ladies bewail the deaths of their lovers who fell at Agincourt. Chartier showed skill in handling the ballade and other lyrical forms, but he is more interesting as a prose-writer than as a poet. See monographs by Delannay (1876) and Joret-Desclosières (1877). [Shart-yay.]

Chartres, ROBERT, DUC DE (1840-1910), grandson of Louis-Philippe, born at Paris, served in the American Civil War and under Chanzy in the Franco-German War. His son, Prince Henry of Orleans (1867-1901), born at Ham, travelled in Tibet and S.E. Asia.

Chase, SALMON PORTLAND, American statesman, born at Cornish, New Hampshire, 13th January 1808, in 1830 settled as a lawyer in Cincinnati, where he acted as counsel for the defence of fugitive slaves. In 1841 he helped to found the Liberty party, which in 1844 brought about Clay's defeat. Chase was returned to the senate in 1849 by the Ohio Democrats, but separated from the party in 1852 when it committed itself to slavery. He was twice governor of Ohio (1855-59), and in 1861-64 was secretary of the treasury. In 1864 Lincoln appointed him chief-justice of the U.S.; as such he presided at the trial of President Johnson (1868). He died at New York, 7th May 1873. See Lives by Schuckers (1874) and Prof. A. B. Hart (1896).

Chase, WILLIAM, painter, born in Franklin, Ind., 1st November 1849, during 1872-78 was in Europe studying at Munich under Piloty.

Chasles, MICHEL, geometer, was born at Épernon, near Chartres on 15th November 1793. He entered the École Polytechnique in 1812, and in 1829 addressed to the Brussels Academy a memoir on duality and homography in geometry. Its introduction expanded into the Origine et Développement des Méthodes en Géométrie (1837). In 1841 he was appointed to the chair of Mechanics and Geodesy at the École Polytechnique, and in 1846 to that of Higher Geometry at the Sorbonne. In 1852 appeared his Traité de Géométrie supérieure; in 1860, Porismes d'Euclide; in 1865, Sections Coniques; in 1870, Progress de la Géométrie. He died at Paris on 18th December 1880. In 1867 he reported to the Academy that he had come into possession of autographs of Pascal's which proved that he had anticipated Newton's greatest discoveries. Ultimately, however, he had to admit that these and about 27,000 other autographs (of Julius Cæsar, Dante, Shakespeare, &c.) were forgeries. The forger, Vrain-Lucas, was convicted. [Shah.]

Chasles, PHILARÈTE, a voluminous writer, was born at Mainvilliers, near Chartres, 8th October 1798. Early imbued with Rousseau's ideas, he was apprenticed at fifteen to an ardent Jacobin bookseller, along with whom he was sent to jail after the Restoration. Released by Chateaubriand's influence, he went to England, where he worked in a printer's; and during his seven years' residence laid the foundation of his large knowledge of English literature. After his return to France he reviewed English books for the Revue encyclopédique. In 1837 he became librarian of the Bibliothèque Mazarin, in 1841 professor of Northern Languages at the Collège de France. He died at Venice, July 18, 1873. See his Mémoires (2 vols. 1876-78).

Chassé, DAVID HENDRIK, BARON (1765-1849), Dutch soldier, born at Thiel, in Guelders, took French service in 1787; was lieutenant-colonel in 1793; and two years later was marching towards the Netherlands under Pichegru. 'Général Baionette,' as Napoleon nicknamed him, afterwards fought with great distinction in Germany and Spain; he was made a baron by Louis Bonaparte in 1809. As lieutenant-general of the Dutch forces in 1815 he did good service at Waterloo against his old comrades, the French; as governor of Antwerp he for three weeks held the citadel with 5000 men against 60,000 Belgians and French (1832). [Shas-say.]

Chassepot, ANTOINE ALPHONSE (1833-1905), was an employee in the Paris arsenal, and in 1863 produced the model of his rifle, adopted in 1866. He subsequently became a hotel-keeper in Nice. [Shas-po'.]

Chastelard, PIERRE DE BOSCOSEL DE (c. 1540-63), a hapless French poet, who, as page in the household of Marshal Damville, came to Scotland with Queen Mary (1561). Here he fell madly in love with the queen, ventured to conceal himself under her bed, was discovered and forgiven, but on a repetition of his offence was hanged at St Andrews. He is the subject of a tragedy by Mr Swinburne. [Shakt-lahr.]

Chateaubriand, FRANÇOIS RENÉ, VICOMTE DE, writer and politician, was born of a noble Breton family at St Malo, 4th September 1768. He served for a short time as an ensign, and in 1791 sailed to North America, spending eight months in the travels recounted in his Voyage en Amérique. Returning to France, he married, but forthwith joined the army of the émigrés, and was left for dead near Namur. From 1793 to 1800 he maintained himself in England, chiefly in London, by teaching and translation; in 1797 he published an Essai sur les Révolutions. Atala, a love-story of savage life (1801), established his literary reputation; and the Génie du Christianisme (1802), a vindication of the Church of Rome, raised him to the foremost position among the French men of letters of the day. Its author was in 1803 appointed secretary to the embassy at Rome, where he wrote his Lettres sur l'Italie, and in 1804 was sent as envoy to the little republic of Valais. But on the murder of the Duc d'Enghien, Chateaubriand refused to hold office under Napoleon. He set out to the East in 1806, visited Greece, Palestine, and Egypt, and returned to France in 1807. Two years later he issued Les Martyrs, a prose epic of Diocletian's persecutions. From 1814 to 1824 he gave a thorough-going support to the Restoration monarchy. He was made a peer and minister, and in 1822-24 was ambassador extraordinary at the British court. Disappointed in his hope of becoming prime-minister, from 1824 to 1830 he figured as a Liberal; but on the downfall of Charles X. went back to the Royalists. His politics were thus a tissue of inconsistencies, but to regard him as a mere time-server is to misunderstand his character; he was really sentimental, imperious, and rebellious. During the reign of Louis-Philippe he occupied himself in writing his celebrated Mémoires d'outre Tombe. Parts of this eloquent autobiography appeared before his death, July 4, 1848; the whole, in 6 vols., not till 1902 (translated in 1902). His writings also include the Itinéraire de Paris à Jérusalem; Les Natchez, a prose epic dealing with savage life in North America; and two works of fiction, René and Le Dernier des Abencerrages. Chateaubriand was not a thinker; he dealt in false sentiment and extravagant imagery. But when he is at his best his brilliant and glowing diction acts on the reader like an enchantment. He has been justly called the father of the romantic school. See works by Sainte-Beuve (1877), Villemain (1858), Bénéoit (1863), Lescure (1892), Bertrin (1900), Biré (1902-3), and Gribble (1910); his Correspondance (1912 et seq.).

Châtelet-Lomont, GABRIELLE ÉMILIE, MARQUISE DU (1706-49), distinguished alike for her beauty and talent, studied Latin and Italian with her father the Baron de Breteuil, and subsequently mathematics and the physical sciences. She soon found a host of suitors. Her marriage with the Marquis du Châtelet-Lomont did not hinder her from forming, in 1733, a tendresse for Voltaire, who came to reside with her at her château of Cirey, on the borders of Champagne and Lorraine. Here they studied, loved, quarrelled, and loved again; but in 1747 the philosopher had to make room for M. Saint-Lambert, a captain of the Lorraine Guards. The Marquise wrote Institutions de Physique (1740), and translated Newton's Principia. See Lives by Capefigue (1868) and Hamel (1910). [Shakt-lay-Lomon'].

Chatham, WILLIAM PITT, EARL OF, often spoken of as 'the elder Pitt,' orator and statesman, was the younger son of Robert Pitt of Bocconnoc, in Cornwall, and was born in Westminster, November 15, 1708. Educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford, he obtained a cornetcy in the Blues (1731), and in 1735 entered parliament for the family borough Old Sarum. He espoused the side of Frederick, Prince of Wales, then at deadly feud with the king, and offered, as leader of the young 'Patriot' Whigs, a determined opposition to Walpole. Walpole being driven from power, the king found it necessary, in 1746, to allow Pitt's admission to the Broad Bottom administration; subsequently he was paymaster-general, but resigned in 1755. The Duchess of Marlborough had left him £10,000 in 1744; and Sir William Pynsent left him £3000 a year and the Somerset estate of Burton-Pynsent, the family seat thenceforward of the Pitts. In 1756 Pitt became nominally secretary of state, but virtually premier. He immediately put into execution his own plan of carrying on the war with France, raised the militia, and strengthened the naval power; but the king's old enmity and German predilections led him to resign in April 1757, to be recalled in June, in obedience to the loud demands of the people. Now his war policy was characterised by unusual vigour, sagacity, and success. French armies were beaten everywhere by Britain and her allies—in India, in Africa, in Canada, on the Rhine—and British fleets drove the few French ships they did not capture or destroy from almost every sea. But the prime mover of all these brilliant victories found himself compelled to resign (1761) when, through Lord Bute, the majority of the cabinet refused to declare war with Spain. Pitt received a pension of £3000 a year; and his wife, sister of George Grenville, was created Baroness Chatham. In 1766 he formed a new ministry, choosing for himself the almost sinecure office of Privy Seal, with a seat in the House of Lords as Viscount Pitt and Earl of Chatham. Ill-health prevented Chatham from taking any active part in guiding his weak and embarrassed ministry, and he resigned in 1768, to hold office no more. He spoke strongly against the arbitrary and harsh policy towards the American colonies, and warmly urged an amicable settlement of the differences. But when it was proposed to make peace on any terms, ill though he was, Chatham came down to the House of Lords (2d April 1778), and by a few broken words secured a majority against the motion. But exhausted by speaking, on rising again to reply to a query, he fell back into the arms of his friends, and died May 11, 1778. He was honoured with a public funeral and a statue in Westminster Abbey; government voted £20,000 to pay his debts, and conferred a pension of £4000 a year on his descendants. His imposing appearance and his magnificent voice added greatly to the attractions of his oratory. His character was irreproachable, though his haughtiness irritated even his friends. See Lives by F. Thackeray (1827), W. D. Green (1901), M'Dowall (1903), Albert von Ruville (trans. 1907), and Rosebery (1910).—His eldest son, JOHN, second EARL OF CHATHAM (1756-1835), entered the army in 1778, and is remembered as the incompetent commander of the luckless Walcheren Expedition (1809). For his second son, see PITT.

Chatterton, HENRIETTA, LADY (1806-76), author of twenty-nine works of fiction, travel, &c., was the daughter of Prebendary Iremongr, and married first an Irish baronet and then Mr. E. H. Dering, whom she followed in 1875 into the Roman Catholic communion. See her Life (1878).

Chatterton, THOMAS, was born at Bristol, 20th November 1752. His father, a sub-chantor in the cathedral, and master of a charity school, was a roystering fellow, yet a lover of books and coins, a dabbler in magic; he had died in the August before the poet was born. The mother, a poor schoolmistress and needlewoman, brought up her boy and his sister beneath the shadow of St Mary Redcliffe, that glorious church where their forefathers had been sextons since the days of Elizabeth. He seemed a dull, dreamy child till his seventh year; then he 'fell in love' with an old illuminated music folio, and, quickly learning to read from a black-letter Bible, began to devour every book that fell in his way. He was a scholar of Colston's bluecoat hospital 1760-67, and then was bound apprentice to Lambert, an attorney. In December 1762 he wrote his first poem, On the Last Epiphany; in the summer of 1764, the first of his pseudo-antiques, Elinour and Juga, which he professed to have got from Canynge's Coffin in the muniment room of St Mary's. Next, early in 1767, for one Burgum, a pewterer, he concocted a pedigree of the De Bergham family (this brought him five shillings); and in 1768 he hoaxed the whole city with a description, 'from an old manuscript,' of the opening of Bristol Bridge in 1248. His life at Lambert's was a sordid one; he slept with the footboy, and took his meals in the kitchen. Yet, his duties over—and he discharged them well—he had ample leisure for his darling studies, poetry, history, heraldry, music, antiquities. An attempt to draw Dodsley had failed, when, in 1769, he sent Horace Walpole a 'transcript' of The Keyse of Peyncteynge, written by T. Rowle, 1469, for Mastre Canynge. Walpole, quite taken in, wrote at once to his unknown correspondent, expressing a thousand thanks for the manuscript. Back came a fresh batch of manuscript, and with it a sketch of Chatterton's own history. The poems, however, being shown to Mason and Gray, were pronounced by them to be forgeries; and Walpole's next letter was a letter of advice to stick to his calling. A 'Last Will and Testament of Thomas Chatterton . . . executed in the presence of Omniscience this 14th of April 1770,' falling into his master's hands, procured the hasty cancelling of his indentures; and ten days later the boy quitted Bristol for London. There he arrived with his poems, and perhaps five guineas in his pocket, and lodged first in Shoreditch; next, from the middle of June, at Brooke Street, Holborn. Abstemious, sleepless, he fell to work as with a hundred hands, pouring forth satires, squibs, stories, political essays, burlettas, epistles in Junius' style (for 'Wilkes and liberty'), and the matchless Balade of Charitie. For a while his prospects seemed golden. The publishers spoke him fair; he obtained an interview with the Lord Mayor Beckford; in the first two months he earned eleven guineas (at the rate of from a farthing to two-pence a line); and he sent home glowing letters, with a box of presents for his mother and sister. Then Beckford died; the 'patriotic' publishers took fright; the dead season set in; he had overstocked the market with unpaid wares; a last desperate application failed for the post of surgeon to a Bristol slaver. He was penniless, starving, yet too proud to accept the meal his landlady offered him, when, on 24th August 1770, he locked himself into his garret, tore up his papers, and was found the next morning dead—poisoned with arsenic. They buried him in the paupers' pit of the Shoe Lane Workhouse, a site usurped fifty-six years later by Farringdon Market. For eighty years the Rowley controversy was waged with no less bitterness than ignorance, the Rowleyans including Jacob Bryant (1781), Dean Milles (1782), and Dr S. R. Maitland (1857); the anti-Rowleyans, Tyrwhitt (1777-82) and Warton (1778-82). The subject was once and for ever laid to rest by Professor Skeat in his edition of Chatterton's Poetical Works (1871), the bogus 'early English' is the boy poet's own invention. The Rowley Poems were edited by Steele (1899) and Hare (1911), the complete poetical works by H. D. Roberts (1906). See Watts-Dunton's essay in Ward's English Poets (1880); Sir Herbert Croft's Love and Madness (1780); and Lives by Dix (1837), Sir Daniel Wilson (1869), and Prof. Masson (1856; new ed. 1900).

Chatto, WILLIAM ANDREW (1799-1864), a writer on wood-engraving, angling, playing-cards, &c., was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and died in the Charterhouse.

Chaucer, GEOFFREY, was born in or about 1340 (not 1328), and was the son of John Chaucer, a vintner and tavern-keeper in London, perhaps the John Chaucer who was deputy to the king's butler. It is possible he may have gone to Oxford or to Cambridge; certainly in 1357 and 1358 he was a page in the service of the wife of Lionel, Duke of Clarence; whence he would seem to have been presently transferred to the king's household. In 1359 he served in the campaign in France, and was taken prisoner at Retiers in Brittany, but was soon ransomed, the king contributing £16 towards the required amount. From this time no mention has yet been found of him till 1367, when the king grants him a pension. He is described as 'our beloved yeoman,' and as 'one of the yeomen of the king's chamber.' In 1366 one Philippa Chaucer appears amongst the ladies of the queen's bedchamber, and there is no good reason for doubting that this is the poet's wife. She seems to have had two sons and a daughter; but apparently Chaucer's married life was disturbed and unhappy. In the year 1369 Chaucer comes certainly before us as a poet, with his Death of Blanche the Duchess (wife of John of Gaunt), in many ways a crude composition. In 1370 he went abroad on the king's service; in 1372-73 on a royal mission to Genoa, Pisa, Florence; in 1376, abroad, it is not known where; in 1377, to Flanders and to France; in 1378, to Italy again. Meanwhile in 1374 he was appointed Comptroller of the Customs and Subsidy of Wools, Skins, and Tanned Hides in the port of London; in 1382, Comptroller of the Petty Customs; and in 1385 he was allowed to nominate a permanent deputy. In 1374 the king granted him a pitcher of wine daily; and John of Gaunt conferred on him a pension of £10 for life. In 1375 he received from the crown the custody of lands that brought him in £104 (over £1000 of our money). In 1386 he was elected a knight of the shire for Kent. The following writings certainly belong to the period 1369-87: The Assembly of Fowls, The House of Fame, Troilus and Cressida, and The Legend of Good Women; also what ultimately appeared as the Clerk's, Man of Law's, Prioress's, Second Nun's, and Knight's Tales in the Canterbury Tales. By far the most important influence acting upon him during this middle period of his literary life was the influence of Italy. Dante profoundly impressed him, and he appreciated worthily the works of Petrarch and Boccaccio. Much of his subject-matter he derived from his great Italian contemporaries, especially from Boccaccio; and the influence of the Italian poets recreated him as an artist, giving him a new and loftier conception of artistic form and beauty. What he did was to imitate not the letter but the spirit of his Italian masters. And in the heroic heptastich, and presently in the heroic couplet, he found metrical forms that satisfied the highest ideal. The crowning work of the middle period of his life is certainly Troilus and Cressida—a work in which the abundant wealth of his genius is lavishly displayed. The Prologue to the Legend of Good Women is an admirable piece of writing; but the theme was soon felt to be wearisomely monotonous, and was abandoned. His next great subject was the Canterbury Pilgrimage. But about the close of 1386 he was deprived of both his places in the civil service; and from this time to very nearly the end of his life things went ill with him. Possibly he was involved in court intrigues; possibly also there was dissatisfaction with his official work. In 1389 he was appointed Clerk of the King's Works, but two years afterwards we find him superseded. What glimpses we have of him in the succeeding years show him in perpetual impecuniosity and distress. Thrift was not one of his virtues. No sort of provision seems to have been made against a 'rainy day'; and now came many rainy days. In 1394 King Richard granted him a pension of £20 for life; but the advances of payment he applies for, and the issue of letters of protection from arrest for debt, indicate his condition. An improvement came with the accession to the throne of the son of his old patron John of Gaunt. In 1399 King Henry IV. granted him a pension of 40 marks (£26, 13s. 4d.). This would raise his income to at least £500 a year of our money. And we may believe his few remaining months were spent in comfort. He seems to have died on the 25th October 1400, and was laid in that part of Westminster Abbey which through his burial there came afterwards to be called the Poet's Corner. In spite of all his reverses and troubles, it was during this last period of his life that Chaucer's genius shone brightest. The design of the Canterbury Tales was indeed too huge for completion; and no doubt for all his vigour and buoyancy his troubles interfered with his progress. His work remains but a fragment; but it is a fragment of large and splendid dimensions, consisting of parts that are admirably finished wholes. His greatest achievement is the Prologue (1387) to the Tales, which for its variety, humour, grace, reality, and comprehensiveness is, as a piece of descriptive writing, unique in all literature. Chaucer is in order of time the first great poet of the English race; and in order of merit he is amongst the first of all our poets. In the middle ages in England he stands supreme, with neither equal nor second. Many works have been ascribed to Chaucer, and are still printed in popular editions, that are certainly not his—e.g. The Court of Love, Chaucer's Dream, The Complaint of the Black Knight, The Cuckoo and Nightingale, The Flower and the Leaf, and in all probability the extant Romaunt of the Rose. See the six-volume and one-volume (1894-95) editions by Skeat, the Canterbury Tales by Pollard (2 vols. 1894), his 'Literature Primer' on Chaucer, works by Ward, Ten Brink, Skeat, Lounsbury (1892), and Lowell's My Study Windows.

Chaumette, PIERRE GASPARD (1763-94), a French Revolutionist, was born a shoemaker's son at Nevers. Successively a seaman and a clerk, he at the Revolution attached himself to Camille Desmoulins, and soon gained such popularity by his extreme sansculottism that he was appointed procurator of the Paris commune. His extravagances disgusted Robespierre, and he perished on the scaffold. [Sho-mett.]

Cheever, GEORGE BARELL (1807-90), born in Maine, was educated at Bowdoin College and Andover Theological Seminary, and from 1832 to 1870 was pastor of Congregational and Presbyterian churches in Salem and New York. His Lectures on the Pilgrim's Progress (1844) and Wanderings in the Shadow of Mont Blanc (1845-46) have had a wide circulation.

Cheke, SIR JOHN, was born in 1514 at Cambridge, and in 1529 obtained a fellowship of St John's College, where he embraced the Reformed doctrines. He laboured earnestly to advance Greek studies, and in 1540 was appointed first regius professor of Greek. His new mode of pronouncing Greek, assailed by Bishop Gardiner in vain, resembled that still in vogue in England. In 1544 he became tutor to the Prince, afterwards Edward VI., whose accession secured Cheke a seat in parliament (1547), the provostship of King's College (1548), and knighthood (1552). He was stripped of everything at Mary's accession, and went abroad, but in 1556 was treacherously seized in Belgium, and brought to the Tower. Fear of the stake induced him to abjure Protestantism, but his recantation preyed on his mind, and he died 13th September 1557. See Life by Strype (best ed. 1821).

Chelmsford, FREDERIC THESIGER, BARON (1794-1878), was a midshipman in the navy, but exchanged the sea for law, and was called to the bar in 1818. He was knighted and made solicitor-general in 1844, attorney-general in 1845 and 1852, and lord chancellor in 1858 and 1866.—His son, FREDERIC AUGUSTUS THESIGER, second BARON, G.C.B., was born 31st May 1827, and educated at Eton. He entered the Rifle Brigade in 1844, became major in the Grenadier Guards in 1855, and served through the Crimea, the Mutiny, and the Abyssinian campaign of 1868. He was adjutant-general in Bengal (1869-74), and commanded in the Kaffir war of 1878 and in the unfortunate

Zulu war of 1879, having resigned the governorship of Cape Colony. Lieutenant-general (1882) and lieutenant of the Tower of London (1884-89), he died in April 1905. [Chemsford.]

Chemnitz, MARTIN (1522-86), Lutheran theologian, was born at Treuenbrietzen, in Brandenburg. His skill in astrology led to his being appointed ducal librarian at Königsberg in 1549, and thenceforth he devoted himself to theology. His opposition to Oslander led him to Wittenberg (1553); and he was appointed a preacher at Brunswick in 1554, and 'superintendent' in 1567. His works include Examen Concilii Tridentini (1565-73) and De duabus Naturis in Christo (1571). See Lives by Prussel (1862), Lentz (1866), and Hachfeld (1867). [Kem-neets.]

Chenery, THOMAS, journalist and orientalist, was born in Barbadoes in 1826, educated at Eton and Cains College, Cambridge, and called to the bar. Sent out as Times correspondent to Constantinople during the Crimean war, he was on the Times staff till 1877, when he became its editor. As Hebraist and Arabist he had few equals, and his translation of the Assemblies of Al Hariri (1867) procured him a chair of Arabic at Oxford in 1868. He died 11th February 1884.

Chenevix, RICHARD (1774-1830), chemist and mineralogist, was born in Dublin of Huguenot ancestry, and lived much in France.

Chénier, MARIE-ANDRÉ, French poet, was born at Constantinople, 30th October 1762, the third son of the French consul-general and a Greek lady. At three he was sent to France, and at twelve was placed at the Collège de Navarre, Paris, where Greek literature was his special subject. At twenty he entered the army, and served for six months in Strasburg; but disgusted with the frivolity of military life, returned to Paris, and gave himself up to strenuous study. To this period belong his famous idyls, Le Mendiante and L'Aveugle. His health giving way, he travelled in Switzerland, Italy, and the Archipelago. In 1786 he returned to Paris, and began several ambitious poems, most of which remained fragments. The most noteworthy are Suzanne, L'Invention, and Hermès, the last being in plan and spirit an imitation of Lucretius. In 1787 he went to England as secretary to the French ambassador, but his residence there proved uncongenial; in 1790 he returned to Paris to find himself in the ferment of the Revolution, which at first he supported; but alarmed by its excesses he mortally offended Robespierre by pamphlets. He was thrown into prison, and after six months was executed on 25th July 1794, just three days before the close of the Reign of Terror. See Sainte-Beuve, Critiques et Portraits, tome ii.; and other French works by Becq de Fouquières (1881), Todeschini (1891), Rouquet (1891), and Haraszi (1891).—His younger brother, MARIE JOSEPH DE CHÉNIER (1764-1811), was an ardent republican, sat in the Legislative Assembly, and wrote satires and heavy plays. [Shayn-yay.]

Cheops (Grecised form of Khufu) was king of Memphis in Egypt, of the fourth dynasty, famous as the builder of the largest pyramid. The date usually assigned to him is about 3000 B.C. His successor and brother Chephren (Khafa) built the next largest pyramid.

Chepman, WALTER (c. 1473-1538), was an Edinburgh notary, who, with a bookseller, Andrew Myllar, in 1507 received a patent from James IV. to set up the first Scottish printing-press.

Cherbuliez, a family at Geneva whose founder, Abraham Cherbuliez, a prosperous bookseller, left three sons—(1) ANDRÉ (1795-1874), professor of Ancient Literature at the Geneva Academy; (2) ANTOINE ÉLISÉE (1797-1869), an eminent publicist, professor of Law and Political Economy at Geneva, at Paris the redoubtable antagonist of Proudhon and the socialists, and finally professor at Zurich; (3) JOËL (1806-70), who succeeded to his father's business, and edited the Revue Critique (1833 et seq.). His Lendemain du dernier Jour d'un Condamné (1829) was a clever burlesque and more upon Victor Hugo's well-known tour-de-force, while his Genève (1867) was a solid contribution to the history of the city. Of the sisters, the eldest, Madame TOURTE-CHERBULIEZ (1793-1863), wrote tales and novels; and the youngest, ADRIENNE (1804-80), translated into French the tales of Zschokke and Kleist.—VICTOR CHERBULIEZ, son of André, was born at Geneva, 19th July 1829, and studied there, at Paris, Bonn, and Berlin, first mathematics, then philology and philosophy; after which he lived in Geneva as a teacher, until his call to Paris in 1864 to join the staff of the Revue des Deux Mondes. Since 1882 he had been a member of the French Academy. Cherbuliez began his literary career with compounds between fiction and criticism, from these he turned to work which really proved his powers. The strong and striking Comte Kostia (1863) was followed by a series of novels which, always clever and original, if sometimes mannered and over-inventive, lifted Cherbuliez into the front rank of French writers of fiction. The best are: Le Roman d'une honnête Femme (1866), La Revanche de Joseph Noirel (1872), Méta Holdenis (1873), Miss Rovel (1875), Samuel Brohl et Cie (1877), L'Idée de Jean Téterol (1878), La Ferme du Choquard (1883), La Vocation du Comte Ghislain (1888), and Le Secret du Précepteur (1893). He published also political studies on Germany and Spain, and died 1st July 1899. See Saintsbury's French Novelists (1891) and Faguet's éloge (1899). [Sher-beel-yay.]

Cherubini, MARIA LUIGI CARLO ZENOBIO SALVATORE, composer, was born at Florence, 14th September 1760, and in his boyhood produced seventeen works which were performed in Florentine churches. In 1778-82 he studied at Bologna and Milan under Sarti. In 1780 his first opera, Quinto Fabio, was produced, and a succession of dramatic works followed. In 1784 he was in London, in 1785 in Paris, and from 1788 he made Paris his home. Hitherto his operas (all forgotten) had been in the light Neapolitan style of Paisiello or Cimarosa; a change is distinguishable in his first Parisian opera, Demophon (1788), and more distinctly developed in Lodoïska (1791). Subsequent works were Elise (1794), Médée (1797), Les deux Journées (or 'The Water-carrier,' 1800), his operatic masterpiece, and Anacreon (1803). His lofty manner irritated Napoleon. In 1805 he visited Vienna (where two of his operas were produced); but the war cut short his stay. In 1808 he entered on a third period with his Mass in F. Louis XVIII. made him a knight of the Legion of Honour and maître-de-chapelle. Later works were a Mass in C (1816), and Requiems in C and D (1817 and 1836), all of the highest rank, besides numerous other church pieces, and six string quartets. In 1822 he became director of the Paris Conservatoire, and raised it to greatness. His work on counterpoint and fugue (1835) remains a standard book. He died 15th March 1842. His music, which shows affinities with Mozart, holds the stage in Germany rather than in France. See the Lives by Bellasi

(Lond. 1874), Pougín (1883), and Crowst (Lond. 1890). [Kay-roo-bee-nee.]

Cheselden, WILLIAM, born in 1688 at Somerby near Melton-Mowbray, in 1711 established himself in London as a lecturer on anatomy, and next year was elected an F.R.S. As surgeon to three London hospitals, he acquired great reputation, especially by his 'lateral operation for the stone' in 1727. He died at Bath, 10th April 1752. See the Asclepiad (1886).

Chesney, FRANCIS RAWDON, the explorer of the Euphrates, was born at Annalong, County Down, 16th March 1789, and was gazetted to the Royal Artillery in 1805. In 1829 he inspected the route for a Suez canal; after 1831 he four times explored a route to India by Syria and the Euphrates. He commanded the artillery at Hong-kong in 1843-47. In 1850 he published his Survey of the Euphrates and Tigris, and in 1868 a Narrative of the Euphrates Expedition. He died 30th January 1872. See Life by his wife and daughter, edited by Stanley Lane-Poole (2d ed. 1893).—A nephew, COL. CHARLES CORNWALLIS CHESNEY (1826-76), was author of the well-known Waterloo Lectures (1861) delivered at Sandhurst.—His younger brother, GEN. GEORGE TOMKYNES CHESNEY (1830-95), became a member of the Council of the Viceroy of India in 1886, and in 1892 Conservative M.P. for Oxford. He was the author of The Battle of Dorking (1871), The Private Secretary (1881), The Lesters (1893), &c.

Chester, JOSEPH LEMUEL, genealogist, born in Norwich, Connecticut, 20th April 1821, was a newspaper editor in Philadelphia, and in 1858 came to England, where he edited the Registers of Westminster (1876), &c. He was an LL.D. of Columbia College, and D.C.L. of Oxford, but always retained the title of Colonel, a reminiscence of the honorary post of aide-de-camp to a Pennsylvania governor. He died in London, 26th May 1882. See Dean's Memoir (1884).

Chesterfield, PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, EARL OF, statesman, orator, wit, and man of letters, was born in London, September 22, 1694. He studied at Cambridge, made the grand tour, and sat in the House of Commons as member for St Germain in Cornwall from 1716 to 1726, when he succeeded his father as fourth Earl of Chesterfield. In 1730 he was made Lord Steward of the Household. Until then, as a Whig, he had supported Walpole; but being ousted from office for voting against an excise bill, he went over to the opposition, and was one of Walpole's bitterest antagonists. He joined the Pelham ministry in 1744, made an excellent Irish Lord-lieutenant in 1745, and was in 1746 one of the principal secretaries of state. Intimate with Swift, Pope, and Bolingbroke, he drew from Johnson the famous indignant letter. Besides the well-known Letters to his [natural] Son (ed. Lord Malton, 1845-53; Bradshaw, 1892), he also wrote Letters to his Godson and Successor (ed. by Lord Carnarvon, 1889). He died March 24, 1773. See books on him by W. E. Browning (1874, 1893), Hill (N.Y. 1891), and W. H. Craigt (1907), and essays by Sainte-Beuve and Chaurton Collins (1895).

Chesterton, GILBERT KEITH, born in Kensington in 1874, and educated at St Paul's and the Slade School, wrote (at first as art-critic) for the reviews and papers, and has published vivacious and paradoxical books (The Napoleon of Notting Hill, What's Wrong with the World, &c.), and works on Browning, Watts, Dickens, and G. B. Shaw.

Cetham, HUMPHREY (1580-1655), a Manchester merchant and cloth manufacturer, the founder of a bluecoat hospital and of a public library at Manchester.

Chettle, HENRY, dramatist and pamphleteer, edited Greene's Groat's-worth of Wit (1592), wrote thirteen plays of considerable merit, and was part author of thirty-five others, including Robin Hood, Patient Grisiel, The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, and Jane Shore. He died about 1607.

Chevalier, ALBERT, composer and singer of costermonger ballads, was born the son of a French teacher at the Kensington Grammar School, 21st March 1862. He appeared as an actor at the old Prince of Wales's in 1877, and continued to play with various companies till in 1891 he came before the public as a music-hall singer. Writing, composing, and singing his songs of the humour and pathos of coster life (of fifty well-known ones, forty are his own creations) he from the first took up the line in which he came to be known as the 'costers' laureate.' See the Record by Himself (1895). [Shval-yay.]

Chevalier, MICHEL, French economist, was born at Limoges, January 13, 1806, and trained as an engineer. An ardent St Simonian, he attached himself to Enfantin, and helped to compile the propagandist Livre Nouveau. After six months' imprisonment in 1832, he retracted all he had written in the Globe against Christianity and marriage. He was sent by Thiers to inquire into water and railway communication in the United States; was made a councillor of state in 1838; and in 1840 professor of Political Economy in the Collège de France. In 1845 he was returned by Aveyron to the Chamber of Deputies. After the revolution of 1848 he made onslaughts that were never met upon Louis Blanc's socialism in articles collected as L'Organisation du Travail (1848) and Questions politiques et sociales (1852). As a free-trader he aided Cobden in carrying into effect in 1860 the commercial treaty between France and England, becoming a senator and Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour. He died at Montpellier, 28th November 1879. [Shval-yay.]

Chevallier, TEMPLE (1794-1873), astronomer, was born in Suffolk, and from 1835 to 1871 was professor of mathematics at Durham, from 1841 also of astronomy. [Shev'a-leer.]

Chevreul, MICHEL EUGÈNE, chemist, born at Angers, August 31, 1786, studied chemistry at the Collège de France in Paris. He lectured at the Collège Charlemagne, and held a technical post at the Gobelins. In 1826 he entered the Academy of Sciences, and in 1830 became director of the Museum of Natural History. Early discoveries were those of margarine, oleine, and stearine; and these studies and his theory of saponification opened up vast industries. Between 1828 and 1864 he studied colours. This patriarch of the scientific world, 'le doyen des étudiants de France,' died April 9, 1889, his hundredth birthday having been celebrated three years before with great enthusiasm. [Sheh-vrul.]

Cheyne, GEORGE, physician, was born in 1671 at Methlick, Aberdeenshire, and, after studying at Edinburgh under Pitcairn, started a London practice in 1702. Full living made him enormously fat (thirty-two stone weight), as well as asthmatic, but from a milk and vegetable diet he derived so much benefit that he recommended it in all the later of his twelve medical treatises. He died at Bath, 13th April 1743. [Chain.]

Cheyne, JOHN (1777-1836), medical author, was born at Leith, and died at Sherrington, near Newport Pagnell, having practised in Dublin from 1809 to 1831.

Cheyne, THOMAS KELLY, chief editor of the Encyclopædia Biblica (4 vols. 1900-3) and author of Critica Biblica, was born in London, September 18, 1841. Educated at Merchant Taylors' School and Worcester College, Oxford, he became fellow of Balliol College in 1869. He was rector of Tendring in Essex from 1881 to 1885, when he became Oriel professor of the Interpretation of Scripture at Oxford and Canon of Rochester. A member of the Old Testament Revision Company, he has contributed much to magazines and reviews. His chief books are The Prophecies of Isaiah (1880), Exposition of Jeremiah and Lamentations (1883), The Book of Psalms (1888), The Origin of the Psalter (1891), Founders of Old Testament Criticism (1893), and Introduction to Isaiah (1895). [Chain'ie.]

Chiabrera, GABRIELLO (1562-1637), an Italian poet, was born and died at Savona. Educated at Rome, he entered the service of Cardinal Cornaro, but was obliged to leave it for revenging himself upon a Roman nobleman. An enthusiastic student of Greek, he strove to imitate Pindar, and was not less happy in catching the naïf spirit of Anacreon, while his Lettere Famigliari introduced the poetical epistle into Italian literature. His lyrics were published at Rome in 1718, at Venice in 1737, and at Milan in 1807. Prefixed is a fragment of autobiography. [Ke-a-bray-ra.]

Chichele, HENRY (c. 1362-1443), educated at Winchester and Oxford, in 1408 became Bishop of St Davids, and in 1414 Archbishop of Canterbury. See vol. v. of Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury. [Chitch'lay.]

Chigi, a princely Italian family, whose founder, Agostino Chigi (died 1512) of Siena, in Rome became banker to the popes, and was noted for his pomp and encouragement of art. See Cugnioni's Agostino Chigi il Magnifico (Rome, 1881).—A descendant, FABIO CHIGI, became pope as Alexander VII. (1655-67).—FLAVIO CHIGI (1810-85) was a nuncio and cardinal. [Ke'-jee.]

Child, FRANCIS JAMES, the most learned of ballad editors, was born in Boston, Mass., February 1, 1825. He graduated at Harvard in 1846, and, after a year or two spent in Europe, was in 1851 appointed to the chair of Rhetoric, which he exchanged in 1876 for that of Anglo-Saxon and Early English Literature. His first work was Four Old Plays (1848); but more important were his annotated Spenser (5 vols. 1855) and English and Scottish Ballads (8 vols. 1857-59; new ed. 10 vols. 1882-97). He died 11th Sept. 1896.

Child, SIR JOSIAH (1630-99), writer on commerce, was the second son of a London merchant. He himself made a fortune of £200,000 as a navy victualler at Portsmouth and a director of the East India Company. In 1678 he was made a baronet. In his Brief Observations concerning Trade and Interest (1668; 3d ed. 1690) he explains his plans for the relief and employment of the poor, substituting districts or unions for parishes, and transporting paupers to the colonies.—His brother, SIR JOHN CHILD, was governor of Bombay, where he died, 4th February 1690.

Child (mê FRANCIS), LYDIA MARIA, American author, born in Medford, Mass., in 1802, published her first novel in 1821, and in 1828 married David Lee Child (1794-1874), a journalist, with whom she edited the Anti-slavery Standard in New York in 1848-44. Her works, nearly thirty in number, include novels, the best of them relating to early New England history, and an ambitious but inaccurate work on the history of religion (1855). She died 20th October 1880.

Child, WILLIAM (c. 1606-97), composer of anthems, was born in Bristol, and died at Windsor, organist there off and on from 1632.

Childe, HENRY LANGDON (1781-1874), improved the magic lantern and invented dissolving views.

Childers, HUGH CULLING EARDLEY, born in London, 25th June 1827, the son of a Yorkshire clergyman, was educated at Cheam and Trinity College, Cambridge, taking his B.A. in 1850. After seven years in Australia, he returned to England in 1857, and sat as a Liberal for Pontefract 1860-85, and for South Edinburgh 1886-92, holding office as First Lord of the Admiralty 1868-71, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster 1872-73, War Secretary 1880-82, Chancellor of the Exchequer 1882-85, and Home Secretary 1886. He died in London, 29th January 1896.

Childers, ROBERT CÆSAR (1838-76), orientalist, was born at Nice, held a Civil Service post in Ceylon (1860-64), and in 1873 became Pali professor at University College, London.

Childs, GEORGE WILLIAM, born in Baltimore, 12th May 1829, became clerk in a book-store in Philadelphia, and by 1850 was already head of a publishing firm. Proprietor from 1864 of the Public Ledger newspaper, he devoted his wealth to beneficence, erecting a memorial window in Westminster Abbey to Cowper and George Herbert, a monument to Leigh Hunt at Kensal Green, and a fountain to Shakespeare at Stratford-on-Avon. He died 2d February 1894. See his Recollections of Noted Persons (1890).

Chillingworth, WILLIAM, theologian, was born at Oxford in 1602, the son of a prosperous citizen, and in 1618 became a scholar, in 1628 a fellow of Trinity. Through the arguments of an able Jesuit, 'John Fisher,' he embraced Catholicism, and in 1630 went to Douay, where, urged to write an account of his conversion, he was led to renounce that faith by examination of the questions at issue. He became thereafter involved in controversies with several Catholic divines, and his answers are contained in his Additional Discourses. In the quiet of Lord Falkland's house at Great Tew in Oxfordshire he wrote his famous book, The Religion of Protestants a safe Way to Salvation (1637)—a demonstration of the sole authority of the Bible in the matter of salvation, and of the free right of the individual conscience to interpret it. His conclusion is, in his own oft-quoted words: 'The Bible, I say, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants.' He left also nine sermons, and a fragment on the apostolical institution of episcopacy. In 1638 he took orders, and was made Chancellor of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth in Notts annexed. In the Civil War he accompanied the king's forces, and before Gloucester devised a siege-engine like the old Roman testudo. At Arundel Castle he fell ill, and after the surrender was lodged in the bishop's palace at Chichester, where he died, 30th January 1643. See Lives by Des Maizeaux (1725) and Birch (1742), the 1838 edition of the Works (3 vols.), and Tulloch's Rational Theology (1872).

Chłopicki, JOSEPH (1771-1854), a Polish soldier and patriot, who served under Napoleon, was made a general by the Emperor Alexander, but became dictator in the Polish insurrection of 1830, and died in exile at Cracow. [Klo-pitz'-kee.]

Choate, JOSEPH HODGES (b. 1832), an eminent lawyer and accomplished orator, was U.S. ambassador to Britain in 1899-1905. [Chôt.]

Choate, RUFUS (1799-1859), lawyer, was born in Essex, Mass., and admitted to the bar in 1823. He sat in congress from 1830 to 1834, and then settled in Boston, where he rose to be leader of the bar. He sat in the U.S. senate 1841-45. Sailing for Europe in ill-health, he died at Halifax, Nova Scotia. See Memoir by Brown, prefixed to his writings (1862), and Neilson's Memoirs of Choate (1884).

Chodowiecki, DANIEL NIKOLAUS (1726-1801), painter and copperplate engraver, was born at Danzig. See Life by F. Meyer (Berl. 1887) and Austin Dobson's Eighteenth Century Vignettes (2d series, 1894). [Ko-do-vee-etz'-kee.]

Choiseul-Amboise, ÉTIENNE FRANÇOIS, DUC DE (1719-85), minister of Louis XV., served with credit in the Austrian Wars of Succession, and, through Madame de Pompadour, became lieutenant-general in 1748, and Duc de Choiseul in 1758. He arranged in 1756 the alliance between France and Austria against Frederick the Great, and made himself popular by the terms he obtained in 1763 at the close of a disastrous war, as also by his opposition to the Jesuits. He improved the army and navy, developed trade and industry, and reopened intercourse with India, whose princes were assisted by French officers in their endeavours to expel the British from the peninsula. He had spies in every court, and Catharine of Russia nicknamed him Le Cocher de l'Europe. His power survived the death of his patroness in 1764, but Madame Dubarry alienated Louis from his able minister, who retired in 1770 to his estate of Chanteloup. See works by Grasset (1874), Mangras (1889), and Daubigny (1892). [Shwah-zul-On'-bvahz'.]

Chopin, FRÉDÉRIC, composer and pianist, was born March 1, 1809, at Zelazova Vola, a village near Warsaw, his father being a Frenchman settled there. The boy, trained at the Conservatoire, played in public at the age of nine; in 1825 he published his first work; and after visiting Vienna, Dresden, &c., he started for Paris in 1831. Here he found fame, and lost his health; here he became the idol of the salons, giving lessons to a select clientèle of pupils, and employing his leisure in composition. He rarely performed in public, though, in Mendelssohn's judgment, he was 'a truly perfect virtuoso' as well as a thorough musician, with a faculty for improvisation such as perhaps no other pianist ever possessed. In 1836 he was introduced to George Sand (Madame Dudevant) by Liszt; the intimacy lasted for seven years, when George Sand 'gave her butterfly the congé.' Chopin visited England in 1837 and 1848, playing in London, Manchester, Edinburgh, and Glasgow. Long enfeebled by consumption, he died at Paris, 17th October 1849. On a groundwork of Slavonic airs and rhythms, notably that of the mazurka, Chopin raised superstructures of the most fantastic and original beauty; his style is so strongly marked as to amount to a mannerism. He seldom composed for the orchestra; but for the piano he wrote a great deal of music superlatively artistic in form, impregnated with subtle romance, and full of exuberant fancy. His compositions comprise upwards of 50 mazurkas, 27 études, 25 préludes, 19 nocturnes, 13 waltzes, 12 polonaises, 4 ballades, 4 impromptus, 3 sonatas, 2 concertos for piano and orchestra, and a funeral march. See Lives by Karasowski (trans. 1879), Niecks (Lond. 2 vols. 1889), and Willeby (1892); and books by Kleczynski (1896), Huneker (1901), Hadden (1904), and Ashton (1905). [Sho-pan'.]

Chorley, HENRY FOTHERGILL, musical critic, was born at Blackley Hurst, Wigan, 15th December 1808, and educated in Liverpool. He joined the Athenaeum staff in 1833, and soon had charge of the musical department, from which he retired in 1868; he wrote also many literary reviews. He published some half-dozen artificial romances, three acted dramas, and some graceful verse; but is remembered by his Music and Manners in France and Germany (1841) and his charming Thirty Years' Musical Recollections (1862). He held and expressed very decided opinions in music (hostile to Berlioz and Wagner). He died 16th February 1872. See Autobiography (2 vols. 1873).

Chosroes, or KHOSRU, reigned over Persia 531-579 A.D., waged war with Rome for twenty years, and at home promoted agriculture, commerce, and science. His grandson, Chosroes II. (591-628), inflicted on the Byzantine empire great disaster, conquering Syria and Egypt.

Chrétien de Troyes, an old French poet of whose life nothing more is known than that he lived about 1175 and was a favourite of Mary, Louis VII.'s daughter, and wife in succession to the Counts of Champagne and of Flanders. He worked up the Round Table legends into numerous spirited and yet refined poems, which had a wide literary influence and were translated by the German minnesingers. A collection of his works was begun by W. Förster at Halle in 1884. [Kroyt-yon' day Trwah.]

Christian II. (1481-1559), king of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, mounted the throne of Norway and Denmark in 1513. His marriage in 1515 to a sister of the Emperor Charles V. did not extinguish his love for his mistress Dyveke (q.v.). In 1520 he overthrew Sten Sture, the regent of Sweden, and thereafter was crowned king. But his treacherous massacre in the Stockholm 'blood bath' of the foremost men in Sweden (November 8-10, 1520) roused such a spirit that he was speedily driven out by Gustavus Vasa. In Denmark a popular revolt drove him for refuge to the Netherlands, and placed his uncle, Frederick I., on the throne. Assisted, however, by Charles V., Christian landed in Norway in 1531, but at Aggerhus next year was totally defeated, and spent his remaining years in imprisonment.

Christian IV., king of Denmark and Norway, and Duke of Sleswick-Holstein, was born in 1577, and elected successor to his father, Frederick II., in 1588. He assumed the government of the duchy in 1593, of the kingdom in 1596. His first war with Sweden (1611-13) ended in an advantageous peace; his second (1643-45) cost him much of the territory across the Sound. In the Thirty Years' War he became chief of the Protestant league (1625), but his disasters so damped his ardour that in 1629 he was glad to make room for Gustavus Adolphus. He strengthened his country's maritime power, extended its commerce to the East Indies, and by restrictions upon the Hanse towns greatly increased the inland trade. The well-known ballad, King Christian stood by the lofty Mast, commemorates his heroism in the sea-fight with the Swedes before Kiel in 1644. He died at Copenhagen, February 28, 1648.—CHRISTIAN VIII. (1786–1848), from 1839 was king of Denmark.—CHRISTIAN IX., king of Denmark (1818–1906), ascended the throne in 1863, and next year was deprived of Sleswick-Holstein.

Christian, FLETCHER, the ringleader in the mutiny of the Bounty (see ADAMS, JOHN; and BIGH). His brother, Edward, was a Law professor at Cambridge from 1788 till his death in 1823.

Christian, WILLIAM (1608–63), from 1648 receiver-general of the Isle of Man, was shot for treason, in 1651, to the Countess of Derby.

Christie, JAMES (1730–1803), the founder in 1766 of a great London line of auctioneers. Two of his sons were JAMES (1773–1831), antiquary and auctioneer, and SAMUEL HENRY (1784–1864), student of magnetism, who was teacher and professor of mathematics at Woolwich 1806–50. There in 1845 was born his son, SIR WILLIAM HENRY MAHONEY CHRISTIE, Astronomer-royal (1881–1910). See Roberts's Memoirs of Christie's (1897).

Christie, THOMAS (1761–96), essayist and revolutionist, born at Montrose, died in Surinam.

Christina, of Spain. See MARIA CHRISTINA.

Christina, queen of Sweden, was born 17th December 1626, and succeeded her father, Gustavus Adolphus, in 1632. Clever and beautiful, she received a man's rather than a woman's education. During her minority the kingdom was governed mainly by Chancellor Oxenstiern. In 1644 she assumed the reins of power, and in 1650 was crowned with the title of king. For four years thereafter she ruled with vigour, and patronised learned men, such as Grotius, Salmastius, and Descartes. In 1654, however, weary of the personal restraint which royalty imposed on her, she abdicated in favour of her cousin, Charles Gustavus, reserving to herself sufficient revenues, entire independence, and supreme authority over her suite and household. Leaving Sweden, she embraced Catholicism at Brussels, and entered Rome on horseback in the costume of an Amazon. At Fontainebleau in 1657 she caused her grand equerry, Monaldeschi, to be executed in her own household for treason. The death of the king in 1660 made her hasten from Rome to Sweden; but, failing in her attempt to be reinstated on the throne, she again left the country. In 1666 she aspired to the crown of Poland, but was unnoticed by the Poles. The remainder of her life was spent at Rome in artistic and scientific pursuits. Here she died April 19, 1689. See Lives by Woodhead (2 vols. 1863), Bain (1889), and Claretta (Turin, 1892).

Christine de Pisan (c. 1363–1431), a French poetess, born in Venice, in 1365 was brought by her father, an astronomer, to the court of Charles V., married a Frenchman, and losing him in 1389, took first to letters and then entered a convent. Roy has edited her poems (1886–91).

Christison, SIR ROBERT, toxicologist, was born at Edinburgh, the son of the professor of Humanity, July 18, 1797. After graduating in 1819, he proceeded to London and Paris, and in the French capital studied toxicology under Orfila. He was in 1822 appointed professor of Medical Jurisprudence at Edinburgh, and from 1832 to 1877 held the chair of Materia Medica. He became physician to the Queen (1848), president of the Edinburgh Royal Society (1868–73), and a baronet (1871). During a vigorous old age he could walk, run, or climb better than any of his coevals. He died 23d January 1882. Besides contributing to medical journals, Christison wrote the standard Treatise on Poisons (1829), &c. See Life, edited by his sons (1885–86).

Christophe, HENRI, king of Hayti, was born a slave on the island of Grenada, October 6, 1767. Coming to Hayti, he joined the black insurgents against the French in 1790, and, from his gigantic stature and courage, soon became a leader among them, and by Toussaint l'Ouverture was appointed brigadier-general. In 1802 he gallantly defended Cape Hayti against the French. He and Pétion overthrew Dessalines in 1806; and in 1807 he was appointed president. Civil war commenced between him and Pétion; but Christophe was proclaimed king of Hayti as Henri I. in 1811, and ruled with vigour. But his avarice and cruelty led to an insurrection; and he shot himself, October 8, 1820.

Christopher (from Gr. Christophoros, 'Christ-bearer'), a Syrian saint, said to have been 12 feet high, and to have suffered martyrdom under the Emperor Decius (249–251). For the legends about him see monographs by Sinemus (Hanover, 1868) and Mainguet (Tours, 1891).

Christy, EDWIN P. (1815–62), minstrel, was singing with two assistants at a public house in Buffalo in 1842, but steadily increased the reputation of his troupe, and the success of his enterprise in New York and London, till, becoming insane during the civil war, he threw himself out of a window. Originally the songs were real negro songs, and the humour genuine darkie fun.

Christy, HENRY (1810–65), a wealthy ethnologist, born at Kingston-upon-Thames, who explored French prehistoric caves.

Chrysippus, Stoic philosopher, was born about 280 B.C. at Soli in Cilicia. He came as a youth to Athens, and devoted himself to philosophy under Cleanthes. Of his works, which exceeded 700, only a few fragments remain. See monographs by Petersen (Altona, 1827) and Gercke (Leip. 1884). [Krisip'pus.]

Chrysoloras, MANUEL, the first to transplant Greek literature into Italy, was born at Constantinople. About 1391 he was sent by the Byzantine emperor, John Palæologus, to England and Italy to entreat assistance against the Turks, and in 1397 he settled at Florence and taught Greek literature. He was afterwards employed by Pope Gregory XII. in an attempt to promote a union of the Greek with the Roman Church, and in 1413 went with John XXIII. to the Council of Constance, where he died, 15th April 1415. His chief work was a Greek grammar, Erotemata (Venice, 1484).—His nephew, JOHN CHRYSOLORAS, also taught Greek in Italy.

Chrysostom, ST JOHN (Gr. Chrysostomos, 'golden-mouthed;') so named from his eloquence, was born at Antioch about 347 A.D., and trained by his pious mother Anthusa. He studied oratory for the career of advocate; but, in his twenty-third year was baptised and ordained an anagnōstēs or 'Reader.' After six years spent as a monk in the mountains, illness forced him to return in 380 to Antioch, where he was ordained deacon in 381, and priest in 386. The eloquence and earnestness of his preaching secured for him the reputation of the greatest orator of the church; and in 398 the Emperor Arcadius made him archbishop of Constantinople. Chrysostom bestowed much of his revenues on hospitals, sought to reform the lives of the clergy, and sent monks as missionaries into Scythia, Persia, and other lands. His faithful reproof of vices moved the Empress Eudoxia to have him deposed and banished in 403—to first to Nicæa, and then to the Taurus mountains, and finally to Pitynus on the Euxine. Compelled to travel hither on foot, with his bare head exposed to a burning sun, the old man died on the way at Comana, in Pontus, September 14, 407 A.D. His body was brought to Constantinople and reburied with honour in 438. His works are very numerous, and consist of admirable Homilies, Commentaries on the whole Bible, part of which have perished, Epistles, Treatises on Providence, the Priesthood, &c., and Liturgies. The best edition is Montfaucon's (13 vols. fol. 1718-38; reprinted by Migne, 1863). See works by Neander (tr. 1838), Stephens (1872), Thierry (1874), Busk (1885), Chase (1887), and Schaff (1891).

Chubb, CHARLES, patentee of improvements in 'detector' locks, originally (1818) patented by his brother, Jeremiah, of Portsea, was in the hardware business at Winchester and Portsea previous to his settlement in London, where he died, 16th May 1845. Under his son, John Chubb (1816-72), further patents were taken out.

Chubb, THOMAS, deist, was born at East-Harnham near Salisbury in 1679. His father, a maltster, died early; consequently the children were poorly educated and early sent to work. Thomas was first apprenticed to a glover in Salisbury, but his eyesight failing, in 1705 he became a tallow-chandler; as such he died, 8th February 1747. He had already contrived to pick up considerable learning, when a perusal of the 'historical preface' to Whiston's Primitive Christianity Revived impelled him to write his own tract, The Supremacy of the Father asserted, which Whiston helped him to publish in 1715. Encouraged by Jekyll and others, he continued to write; and a quarto volume of his tracts, published in 1730, made his name widely known. His opinions drifted nearer and nearer to deism, yet he went regularly to church, and regarded the mission of Christ as divine. See his Posthumous Works (2 vols. 1848).

Chudleigh, ELIZABETH (1720-88), Countess of Bristol, and mistress and bigamous wife of the Duke of Kingston—prototype of 'Beatrix' in Esmond. See Pearce's Amazing Duchess (1911).

Chunder Sen, KESHUB (1838-84), a Hindu, the chief developer after 1858 of the Theistic society called the 'Brahmo Samaj of India,' which originated with Rammohun Roy (q.v.). He visited Europe in 1870. See Max Müller's Biographical Essays (1884), and a Life by Mozoomdar (1888).

Church, FREDERICK EDWIN, landscape-painter, born at Hartford, Conn., 14th March 1826, painted in South America, the Arctic Regions, and the East. He died in April 1900.

Church, SIR RICHARD (1785-1873), born at Cork of Quaker parentage, had served with distinction in the British and Neapolitan services, and been made a C.B. (1815) and K.C.H. (1822), when in 1827 he was appointed generalissimo of the insurgent Greeks—their success was due largely to his strategy. He lived afterwards in Athens, and died there. See Lives by Stanley Lane-Poole (1890) and E. M. Church (1895).

Church, RICHARD WILLIAM, Dean of St Paul's, was born at Lisbon, 25th April 1815. He took a first-class from Wadham College, Oxford, in 1836, in 1838 was elected a fellow of Oriel, and in 1853 became rector of Whatley, near Frome, in 1871 Dean of St Paul's. He died 9th December 1890. Among his works, besides several volumes of sermons, were Essays and Reviews (1854), Life of St Anselm (1871), The Beginning of the Middle Ages (1877), Dante: an Essay (1879), with a translation of the De Monarchia by his only son, F. J. Church, a young man of rare promise, who died in 1888; Spenser (1879) and Bacon (1879); The Oxford Movement (1891), and Occasional Papers (1897). See Life by his daughter (1894), and a shorter one by D. C. Lathbury (1905).

Church, WILLIAM, the inventor in 1822 of the first type-setting machine.

Churchill, CHARLES, satirist, was born in Westminster in February 1731. After leaving Westminster School, he did not enter Oxford or Cambridge, being apparently disqualified by an imprudent Fleet marriage at seventeen. In 1756 he was ordained priest, 'through need, not choice,' and at his father's death in 1758 he succeeded him as curate of St John's, Westminster. But after a bankruptcy, a formal separation from his wife, and a course of unclerical dissipation, he gave up the church and cast himself upon the town (1763). His Rosciad (1761) had already made him famous and a terror to actors. The Apology (also 1761) was a savage onslaught on his critics, particularly Smollett. Night (1762), a long poetical epistle, contained some nervous lines, but was on the whole a poor production, marred by impudent bravado. The Ghost (1762) is an incoherent and tiresome poem of over four thousand lines. Churchill next helped Wilkes in the North Briton, and heaped timeous ridicule upon the Scotch in The Prophecy of Famine (1763), an admirable satire—undoubtedly his best work. For The Epistle to Hogarth (1763) the great caricaturist paid the poet by gibbeting him as a bear in torn clerical bands, with a pot of porter and a club. Other works are The Duellist, The Author, The Conference, Gotham, The Candidate, The Farewell, The Times, and Independence. In October 1764 he crossed to Boulogne to see Wilkes, and died of fever on 4th November. He was buried at Dover. Churchill left two unfinished satires—The Journey and the masterly Dedication. He lacked the chief essentials of true satire, a real insight into the heart of man and that rarest power of preserving likeness in unlikeness, but possessed fatal volubility in rhyming, a boisterous energy, and an instinctive hatred of wrong. See Lowe's edition of The Rosciad (1891).

Churchill, LORD RANDOLPH HENRY SPENCER, third son of the seventh Duke of Marlborough, was born at Blenheim Palace, February 13, 1849, and educated at Eton and Merton College, Oxford. Returned for Woodstock in 1874, in which year he married an American lady, he became conspicuous in 1880 as the leader of a guerrilla band of Conservatives known as the 'Fourth Party;' and ere long had a considerable following among the younger Conservatives, who regarded him as the future leader of the Tory Democracy. After a plucky attempt to defeat Mr Bright at Birmingham in 1885, Lord Randolph was returned for South Paddington. He was Secretary for India in Lord Salisbury's first ministry (1885-86), and then, in his second, Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House of Commons from July to December 1886, when he resigned. He visited South Africa in 1891, and died 24th January 1895. See books by Escott (1895), Lord Rosebery (1906), and his son (1906).—That son, WINSTON LEONARD SPENCER CHURCHILL, born 1874, and educated at Harrow and Sandhurst, served as an officer of hussars in Africa and India, and during the Transvaal war was present at a dozen engagements. Captured by the Boers, he escaped a month later. War correspondent to the Morning Post, he wrote four books on his experiences, besides a novel, Savrola, and a Life of his father (1906). Conservative M.P. for Oldham in 1901–6, he sat as Liberal M.P. for N.W. Manchester (1906–8) and Dundee, and was Under-secretary for the Colonies, President of the Board of Trade (1908), Home Secretary (1910), and First Lord of the Admiralty (1911).—Another WINSTON CHURCHILL, born at St. Louis, Missouri, U.S., in 1871, has written historical novels, including Richard Carvel (1899), The Crossing, and The Crisis.

Churchyard, THOMAS (c. 1520–1604), soldier, poetaster, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Shrewsbury, and died in London.

Chute, ANTHONY, a minor Elizabethan poet, assailed by Nashe, died about 1595.

Cialdini, ENRICO (1811–92), Duke of Gaeta, was born at Castelvetro, Modena, studied medicine at Parma, fled after the insurrection of 1830, but fought again for the national cause in 1848, 1849, and 1859–61, gaining two victories in the latter war, besides capturing Gaeta and Messina. In 1864 he became a senator, and in the war of 1866 occupied Venice. [Tchal-dee'nee.]

Ciaran, the name of two Irish sixth-century saints, the one the founder of Clonmacnoise, and the other Bishop of Ossory.

Cibber, COLLEY, actor, manager, and dramatist, was born in London, 6th November 1671. He was the son of the Holstein sculptor, Caius Gabriel Cibber (1630–1700), whose best known work is the bas-relief on the London Monument. He was educated at Grantham, and in 1690 joined the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, where he remained, with short intervals, during his whole theatrical career of forty-three years. In 1696 his first comedy, Love's Last Shift, was produced, the author playing Sir Novelty Fashion; it established his fame both as dramatist and actor. Poet-laureate from 1730, he died suddenly, 11th December 1757. Cibber contributed largely to the improvement in decency which followed Jeremy Collier's famous philippic in 1698; his comedies do not rely for ludicrous effects on the outraged husband. His Apology for the Life of Mr Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740; new ed. by Lowe, 1888), is one of the most interesting autobiographies in the language.—His son, the actor and dramatist, THEOPHILUS (1703–58), married the actress Susannah Maria Arne (q.v.). [Sib'ber.]

Cibrario, LUIGI (1802–70), historian and politician, was born at Turin, became Education minister and foreign minister of Sardinia, and wrote on political economy, the history of Savoy and of Turin, and numismatics. See the Life by Odorici (1873). [Tchee-brah'ree-o.]

Cicero, MARCUS TULLIUS, orator, statesman, and man of letters, was born in 106 B.C. at Arpinum in Latium, of good family. At Rome he learned law and oratory, Greek philosophy, and Greek literature. His first important speech, in his twenty-sixth year, was the successful defence of a client against a favourite of the dictator Sulla. After a visit to Athens, and a tour in Asia Minor, he was (76) elected quaestor, and obtained an appointment in Sicily; at the request of the Sicilians he undertook his successful impeachment of the infamous Verres in 70 B.C. In 66 he was praetor, and supported in a great speech (Pro Lege Manilia) the appointment of Pompey to conduct the war with Mithridates. In 63 he was consul, and foiled the plot of Catiline. The 'father of his country' was now for a brief space the great man of the day. But the tide soon turned. Cicero might have saved the country, but had violated the constitution—a Roman citizen could not be capitally punished save by the sentence of the people in regular assembly. Clodius, now tribune, pressed the charge, and after Cicero in 58 had taken refuge at Thessalonica, he was condemned to exile, and his house at Rome and his country houses at Formiae and Tusculum were plundered. But in 57 the people almost unanimously voted his recall. Now, however, he was no longer a power in politics; and, nervously sensitive to the fluctuations of public opinion, he could not decide between Pompey and the aristocracy and Caesar and the new democracy. Thus, though he ultimately inclined to Caesar, he lost the esteem of both parties, being regarded as a trimmer and time-server. In 52 he composed his speech in defence of Milo, who had killed Clodius in a riot. Next year he was in Asia, as governor of Cilicia. In 49–48 he was with Pompey's army in Greece, but after Pharsalia threw himself on the mercy of the conqueror. In 46–44 he wrote most of his chief works on rhetoric and philosophy, living in retirement and brooding over his disappointments. In 43, after Caesar's death, his famous speeches against Antony were delivered, and cost him his life. As soon as Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus had leagued themselves in the triumvirate, they proscribed their enemies, and Cicero's name was in the fatal list. Old and feeble, he fled to his villa at Formiae, pursued by the soldiers of Antony, and was overtaken as he was being carried in a litter. With a calm courage which 'has half redeemed his fame,' he put his head out of the litter and bade the murderers strike. He died in 43 B.C., in his 63d year. As orator and pleader Cicero stands in the first rank; of his speeches the most famous are those against Verres and Catiline. As a politician he failed. As an essayist and letter-writer he is most attractive. His essays on 'old age,' 'friendship,' and 'duty' (De Officiis) are still good reading; and his Tusculan disputations, his treatises on the 'nature of the gods' and 'true ends of human life' (De Finibus), illustrate the various ancient philosophies. The best edition of Cicero's works is by Baiter and Kayser (11 vols. 1861–69); of his Epistles, by Prof. R. Y. Tyrrell (6 vols. Dublin, 1879–99). See Lives by Middleton (1741), Forsyth (2d ed. 1869), Jeans (1880), Trollope (1880), Lucas Collins (new ed. 1885), Strachan-Davidson (1894), and Gaston Boissier's Cicero and his Friends (trans. 1897). [Sis'se-ro; originally Kee'ke-ro.]

Cid, THE (c. 1040–99), Spain's national hero, was born at Burgos. His name was Rodrigo or Ruy Diaz, and Cid is the Moorish Sidi ('my lord'); Campeador ('champion') is often added. A compound of condottiere and patriot, he was constantly fighting from 1065; his great achievement the capture of Valencia (1094). See work by H. Butler Clarke (1897). [Sid; Span. pron. Theed.]

Cigoli, properly Ludovico Cardi (1559–1613), painter and architect, was born at Cigoli, near Florence, and by Clement VII. was invited to Rome. [Tchee-go-lee.]

Cilian, Sr, the Irish apostle of Franconia, slain at Würzburg in 697.

Cimabué, GIOVANNI, painter, was born at Florence about 1240, when the fine arts were practised in Italy chiefly by Byzantines, and painting had degenerated into a mechanical conventionalism. He at first adopted traditional forms, but soon turned to nature, and led the way to the naturalism of his great pupil Giotto (q.v.). In his stiff draperies he made little progress, but he softened his outlines, improved his flesh-tints, and gave projection and rotundity to his forms. He executed several important frescoes in the church of St Francis at Assisi; and in his later years he was capo maestro of mosaics of the Duomo of Pisa. His mosaic of Christ in glory in the apse was probably his last work. He died about 1302. [Chee-ma-bo'o'ay.]

Cima da Conegliano, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (c. 1460-1508), a religious painter of the Venetian school, born at Conegliano. [Chee'mah.]

Cimarosa, DOMENICO (1749-1801), composer of operas, was born at Aversa, studied music at Naples, and produced his first opera there in 1772. In 1789 he was summoned to St Petersburg by Catharine II., in 1792 to Vienna; and in 1793 he returned to Naples, where his comic opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto, was repeated seventy times. He died at Venice. [Chee-ma-ro'za.]

Cimon, Athenian commander, was the son of Miltiades, the conqueror at Marathon. Unable to pay the fine of 50 talents from which his father escaped by dying, he was kept in prison until it was discharged by his wealthy brother-in-law Callias. With his patron Aristides, he was placed over the Athenian contingent to the allied fleet, which, under Pausanias, continued the war against Persia (477 B.C.). His greatest exploit was his encounter with a Persian fleet at the river Eurymedon (466), when he destroyed or captured 300 out of 350 ships, and defeated the land-forces on the same day. He likewise drove the Persians from Thrace, Caria, and Lycia; and expended much of the money which he had obtained by the recovery of his patrimony in Thrace upon the improvement of Athens. He advocated a close alliance with Sparta; and when the Helots revolted, he twice led an army to support the Spartans; but the second time, having lost the confidence of his allies, he was ignominiously dismissed. At Athens he was opposed by the democracy, headed by Pericles, who procured his ostracism. He was recalled in 454, and was instrumental in obtaining a five years' armistice with Sparta. He died in 449 at the siege of a Cyprian town.

Cincinnatus, LUCIUS QUINCTIUS, a favourite hero of the old Roman republic, in 460 B.C. was chosen consul, and two years later dictator. When the messengers came to tell Cincinnatus of his new dignity they found him ploughing on his small farm. He rescued the consul Minucius, who had been defeated and surrounded by the Æqui. Sixteen days after, he laid down his dictatorship and returned to his farm. In 439, at the age of eighty, he was once more made dictator to deal with a plebeian conspiracy.

Cineas, a Thessalian, the friend and minister of Pyrrhus, was the most eloquent man of his time. He died about 270 B.C.

Cinna, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, a patrician who supported Marius. Sulla, after driving Marius from Rome, and before setting out against Mithridates, allowed Cinna to be elected consul on his swearing not to disturb the existing constitution.

No sooner, however, had he entered on office (87 B.C.) than he impeached Sulla, and agitated for Marius' recall. Cinna and Marius next declared themselves consuls after a cruel massacre. Marius died a few days later; and Cinna in 84 B.C. prepared to meet Sulla, but was slain by his own disaffected troops at Brundisium. During his fourth consulate his daughter Cornelia had been married to Julius Cæsar.

Cinq-Mars, HENRI COIFFIER DE RUZÉ, MARQUIS DE, was born in 1620, the second son of the Marshal Marquis d'Effiat. At nineteen he was chief-equerry to Louis XIII., but already in his dreams he was a duke and peer of France, and husband of the Princess Maria of Gonzaga. Finding his projects derided by Richelieu, his former patron, he conspired with the king's brother, Duke Gaston of Orleans, to murder the cardinal. With this was combined a wider plot with Spain; but the conspiracy was discovered, and Cinq-Mars, with De Thou, was executed at Lyons, 12th September 1642. See De Vigny's well-known romance Cinq-Mars (1826). [Sank-Marss.]

Cipriani, GIAMBATTISTA, historical painter, born at Florence in 1727, received some instruction there from an English painter, Hugford, and then studied in Rome. In 1755 he accompanied Sir William Chambers to London, where his graceful drawings, engraved by Bartolozzi, gained great popularity. He was a member of the St Martin's Lane Academy, and in 1768 was elected a foundation member of the Royal Academy, to whose exhibitions he contributed till 1779, and whose diploma he designed in 1768. He married in 1761 an English lady of fortune, and died at Hammersmith, 14th December 1785. [Chee'pree-ah-nee.]

Cirencester, RICHARD OF. See RICHARD.

Civitali, MATTEO (1435-1501), an Italian sculptor, who was born and died at Lucca. See Life by Yriarte (Par. 1886). [Chee-vee-tah'lee.]

Cladet, LÉON (1835-92), a French novelist, born at Montauban. [Kla-day'.]

Clairaut, ALEXIS CLAUDE (1713-65), mathematician, was born and died in Paris. Admitted at eighteen to the Academy of Sciences, he is remembered by his Figure de la Terre (1743), his theory of the lunar apogee, and his computation of the return of Halley's comet. [Klay-ro'.]

Clairmont, 'CLAIRE' (1798-1879), Godwin's step-daughter, the mother by Byron of Allegra.

Clairon (1723-1808), properly Claire Josephe Hippolyte Leyris de la Tudi, a French actress, born near Condé in Flanders. See Life by E. de Goncourt (Par. 1890) and George Moore's Impressions and Opinions (1891).

Claparède, ÉDOUARD (1832-71), a Swiss naturalist, professor of Comparative Anatomy at Geneva. [Kla-pa-rehd'.]

Clapperton, HUGH, African explorer, was born at Annan, Dumfriesshire, 13th May 1788. At thirteen he went to sea; and, transferred to a man-of-war, he rose to lieutenant. Returning to Scotland on half-pay in 1817, he was sent in 1821 with Oudney and Denham to discover the source of the Niger. By way of Tripoli and Murzuk, they reached Kuka on Lake Chad in 1823; and Clapperton proceeded westward with Oudney, who died by the way. He still pushed on alone to Sokoto, but had here to retrace his steps, and, with Denham, returned to England in 1825. The journey had thrown light on Bornu and the Houssa country, but the great problem of the source of the Niger was untouched. To solve it, Clapperton, now a commander, started again from the Bight of Benin in December 1825, in company with Captain Pearce, R.N., Lauder (q.v.), &c. The others died early on the journey, but Clapperton and Lauder reached Sokoto. Here the vexations of detention by the Sultan, joined to the hardships of the journey, so affected his health that he died April 13, 1827. See the Narrative of the first journey (1826), the Journal of the second (1829), and the Records of Clapperton's Last Expedition, by Lauder (1830).

Clare, JOHN, peasant poet, the son of a poor labourer, was born at Helpstone, near Peterborough, July 13, 1793. After some scanty schooling, he began to do outdoor work in his seventh year, and for eleven months was an under-gardener at Burghley Park; meanwhile he studied Thomson's Seasons, and began to cultivate verse writing. He enlisted in the militia (1812), associated with Gypsies, in 1817 worked at a lime-kiln, but was discharged for wasting his time in scribbling, and had to apply for parish relief. His Poems, descriptive of Rural Life (1821), had a good reception; but though the Marquis of Exeter and other patrons secured him £45 a year, he continued unfortunate. He died in the lunatic asylum, Northampton, 20th May 1864. See Lives by Martin (1865) and Cherry (1873).

Clare, Sr (1193-1253), born of a noble family of Assisi, in 1212 founded the order of Franciscan nuns, the 'Poor Clares.'

Clarence, an English ducal title, conferred for the first time in 1362 on Lionel, third son of Edward III. and Philippa. The most notable Dukes of Clarence, all royal, are Thomas, the second son of Henry IV., who fell at the battle of Beaugé (1421); George (1449-78), the third surviving son of Richard of York, and brother of King Edward IV. (Shakespeare's Clarence), who perished in the Tower—in a butt of malinsey, according to three contemporary writers; William IV. who was Duke of Clarence before his accession; and Prince Albert Victor of Wales, who was born at Frogmore Lodge, Windsor, 8th January 1864, and died at Sandringham, 14th January 1892, having in 1890 been created Duke of Clarence. See Memoir by Vincent (1893).

Clarendon, EDWARD HYDE, EARL OF, was born 18th February 1608 at Dinton, near Salisbury, the third son of a Wiltshire squire. Destined for the church, he went up to Magdalen Hall in 1622; but the death of his elder brothers left him heir to the property, so in 1625 he quitted Oxford for the Middle Temple, of which his uncle, Sir Nicholas Hyde, the chief-justice, then was treasurer. Though he rose in his profession, he loved letters better than law; for his friends he chose such brilliant spirits as Falkland, Ben Jonson, and Chillingworth. He married twice—in 1629, Ann, daughter of Sir George Ayliffe; next, in 1632, Frances, daughter of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Master of Requests and of the Mint, who bore him four sons and two daughters. In 1640 he was returned for Wootton-Basset to the Short Parliament, for Saltash to the Long; and up to the summer of 1641 he acted heartily with the popular party. Then he drew back. Enough, he deemed, had been done; a victorious oligarchy might prove more formidable than a humbled king; nor could he conceive 'a religion without bishops.' Charles's answer to the Grand Remonstrance was of Hyde's composing, so were most of the subsequent able manifestoes; and though in a midnight interview with the king he declined to take St John's post of solicitor-general, thenceforward, with Falkland and Colepeper, he formed a veritable privy-council. He headed the royalist opposition in the Commons till, in May 1642, he slipped away, and followed Charles into Yorkshire. He witnessed Edgehill; in 1643 was knighted, and made Chancellor of the Exchequer; in March 1645 attended the Prince of Wales to the west of England; and with him a twelve-month later passed on to Scilly and Jersey. In Scilly, on 15th May 1646, he commenced his History; in Jersey he tarried two whole years. From November 1649 till March 1651 he was engaged in a fruitless embassy to Spain; next for nine years he filled the office of a 'Caleb Balderstone' in the needy, greedy, factious little court of Charles II. Charles had made him High Chancellor in 1658, and at the Restoration he was confirmed in that dignity, in November 1660 being created Baron Hyde, and in the following April Earl of Clarendon. In November 1659 his daughter Anne (1638-71), then lady-in-waiting to the Princess of Orange, had entered into a secret marriage-contract with the king's brother, James, Duke of York; and nine months later they were privately married at her father's house. He, on learning the news, if news indeed it was, burst into a passion of the coarsest invective against her; yet people fancied that in Catharine of Braganza he purposely selected a barren bride for the king, that so his own daughter might some day come to the throne. Nor as chief minister was he otherwise popular. A bigoted churchman, a thorough Conservative, and always a lawyer, he would fain have restored things to the status quo of twenty years earlier. He could not satisfy the Cavaliers, who contrasted his opulence with their own broken fortunes; he did more than enough to irritate the Puritans. The sale of Dunkirk, the Dutch war, the very Plague and Great Fire, all heightened his unpopularity; and in 1667 he fell an easy victim to a court cabal. The great seal was taken from him; impeachment of high treason followed; and on 29th November, at Charles's bidding, he quitted the kingdom for France. All but murdered at Evreux by some English seamen, at last the old man settled at Montpellier, where and at Moulins he spent nearly six tranquil years. Then moving to Rouen, he sent a last piteous entreaty that Charles would permit him to 'die in his own country;' nay, at Rouen must he die, on 9th December 1674. No monument marks his grave in Westminster Abbey.

The failings and merits of the statesman are mirrored in his great History of the Rebellion in England (3 vols. 1704-7), with its supplement and continuation, more faulty and less valuable—the History of the Civil War in Ireland (1721), and the Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon (3 vols. 1759). The best edition is that by W. Dunn Macray (6 vols. Clarendon Press, 1888). We have, besides, twenty-five essays by Clarendon, his Contemplations on the Psalms (begun in 1647, and finished, like the Life, during his second exile), several controversial writings, and 3 vols. of his state papers (1767-86; calendared, 1872-76). See Ranke's able analysis of the History, works cited under CHARLES I. and CHARLES II., the Hon. Agar-Ellis's Historical Inquiry respecting the character of Clarendon (1827), Lady Theresa Lewis's Friends of Clarendon (3 vols. 1852), two articles by Bayne in the Contemporary Review (1876), and the Lives by T. H. Lister (1838) and Sir H. Craik (1911).

Clarendon, GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK VILLIERS, EARL OF, was born in London, 12th

January 1800. His grandfather, Thomas Villiers, second son of the Earl of Jersey, having married in 1752 the heiress of the last Lord Clarendon of the Hyde family, was made Baron Hyde (1756) and Earl of Clarendon (1776). Having studied at Cambridge, he early entered the diplomatic service, and in 1833 was appointed ambassador at Madrid, where he employed his great influence in helping Espartero to establish a constitutional government. In 1838 he succeeded his uncle as fourth earl, and in 1840 was made Lord Privy Seal under Melbourne. When the Whigs fell (1841) he became an active member of the opposition; but warmly supported Peel and his own brother, Charles Pelham Villiers, in the abolition of the corn laws. Under Russell he became President of the Board of Trade in 1846, and from 1847 to 1852 was Irish viceroy. The insurrectionary follies of Smith O'Brien might have set the whole country in a blaze but for the viceroy's prompt measures; and his impartiality helped to reconcile party exasperations, though it did not avert the bitter hatred of the Orangemen. He was thanked in the speech from the throne in 1848, and in 1849 received the garter. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1853), he incurred the responsibility of the Crimean war, and Roebuck's resolution in 1855 cost him his office, which he resumed at Palmerston's desire. He returned to his old office in 1865 and 1868, retaining it till his death, 27th June 1870.

Claretie, JULES (properly Arsène Arnaud), novelist, was born at Linoges, 3d December 1840. While still a schoolboy in Paris, he published a novel, and ere long became a leading critic and political writer. His short story Pierrille (1863) was praised by George Sand; and his novels, Mademoiselle Cachemire (1865) and Un Assassin, renamed later Robert Burat (1866), gained general applause. During the Franco-German war he sent a series of remarkable letters to the Rappel and Opinion Nationale, and acquired the materials for a later series of bright and vigorous anti-German books of an historical character. Later novels were Madeleine Bertin (1868); Le Train 17 (1877); Monsieur le Ministre, an enormous success (1881); Le Million (1882); Michel Berthier (1883); and Le Prince Zilah (1885). He first made a hit on the stage with his Revolution plays, Les Muscadins (1874), Le Régiment de Champagne (1877), and Les Mirabeaux (1878); in 1885 he became director of the Théâtre Français, and in 1888 an Academician. [Klahr-tee.]

Clark, ALVAN (1804-87), a telescope manufacturer at Cambridgeport, Boston, was born at Ashfield, Mass. From 1862 he was assisted by his son, ALVAN GRAHAM CLARK (1832-97).

Clark, SIR ANDREW, physician, was born at Wolfhill, near Coupar-Angus, 28th October 1826, and educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh. In 1854 he settled in London, where he acquired a high reputation for his skill in the treatment of diseases affecting the respiratory, renal, and digestive organs. Among his patients were 'George Eliot' and Mr Gladstone. Created a baronet in 1883, he died 7th November 1893. He published several medical works. See Life by Canon MacColl and Dr Allchin (1899).

Clark, CHARLES HEBER. See ADELER, MAX.

Clark, SIR JAMES, physician, born at Cullen, Banffshire, 14th December 1788, took his M.A. at Aberdeen, studied medicine at Edinburgh and London, was a naval surgeon 1809-15, practised eight years at Rome, and in 1826 settled in London. In 1837 Clark, who had been physician to the Duchess of Kent, was appointed physician in ordinary to Queen Victoria, and in 1838 was created a baronet. He wrote on climate, consumption, &c. He died June 29, 1870.

Clark, THOMAS (1801-67), chemist, was born at Ayr, became a manufacturing chemist in Glasgow, lectured on chemistry there, and in 1833 obtained the chair of Chemistry at Marischal College, Aberdeen. He fell into ill-health in 1843, and died 27th November 1867. He discovered the soap-test for hardness in waters.

Clark, WILLIAM GEORGE, man of letters, was born in March 1821, and educated at Sedburgh and Shrewsbury. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1840, and, graduating second classic in 1844, was a resident fellow till 1873. He had taken orders in 1853, but resigned them in 1869, and published a remarkable pamphlet, The Present Dangers of the Church of England. He was public orator from 1857 to 1869. He died at York, 6th November 1878. Clark travelled in Spain, Greece, Italy, and Poland, and published his experiences. He edited the Cambridge Essays (1855), and was long an editor of the Journal of Philology. Other works were his Lectures on the Middle Ages and the Revival of Learning (1872), and the famous Cambridge Shakespeare (9 vols. 1863-66), in collaboration with Mr Glover and afterwards Mr Aldis Wright. Its text was reprinted in the 'Globe Edition' (1864).

Clark, WILLIAM TIERNEY (1783-1852), constructor in 1839-49 of the suspension-bridge at Budapest, was born at Bristol.

Clarke, ADAM, LL.D. (c. 1762-1832), Wesleyan divine, was born near Portrush. From 1782 he preached in places as widely different as the Channel Islands and Shetland, but after 1805 lived mostly in London. His first work was a Bibliographical Dictionary (8 vols. 1802-6); his greatest his edition of the Holy Scriptures (8 vols. 1810-26) with a commentary. Clarke denied the eternal sonship of Christ, though maintaining his divinity; held that Judas repented unto salvation, and that the tempter of Eve was a baboon. See his Life (3 vols. 1833).

Clarke, CHARLES COWDEN, was born 15th December 1787, at Enfield, Middlesex, where his father kept a school. Keats was a pupil, and in a poetical epistle (1816) addresses Clarke as 'you who first taught me all the sweets of song.' He early imbibed a passion for the theatre, and after his parents' retirement to Ramsgate (1810), continued to pay frequent visits to London, where he formed the friendship of Leigh Hunt, Shelley, Hazlitt, Charles and Mary Lamb. On his father's death in 1820, he became a bookseller in London, and ere long partner as music publisher with Alfred Novello, whose sister, Mary Victoria (born 1809), he married in 1828. A year later Mrs Cowden Clarke began her famous Concordance to Shakespeare's Plays (1845). In 1834 Clarke entered on that twenty years' course of public lectures on Shakespeare and other dramatists and poets which brought him so much celebrity and profit. Some of them were published, as his Shakespeare Characters, chiefly those Subordinate (1863), and Molière Characters (1865). The joint productions of the pair were the valuable Shakespeare Key (1879); an annotated edition of Shakespeare (1869), now reissued as Cassell's Illustrated Shakespeare; and Recollections of Writers (1878), full of reminiscences of Keats, Lamb, Dickens, &c. In 1856 they went to live at Nice, but removed in 1861 to Genoa, where Charles died, 13th March 1877, and his widow on 12th Jan. 1897. She alone wrote novels, volumes of verse, &c. See her Charles Cowden-Clarke (1887) and Autobiographic Sketch (1896).

Clarke, SIR EDWARD, K.C., P.C., born in London, 15th February 1841, after having been in the India Office, a parliamentary reporter, and a journalist, was called to the bar in 1864, and in 1880 was returned by Plymouth as a Conservative M.P. In 1886-92 he was Solicitor-general.

Clarke, EDWARD DANIEL, traveller and author, born at Willingdon Vicarage, Sussex, 5th June 1769, passed from Tunbridge school to Jesus College, Cambridge, and from 1790 to 1799 was tutor and travelling-companion in noblemen's families, making the tour of Britain, France, Italy, Switzerland, and Germany. In 1799-1802 he thus traversed Finland, Russia, Scandinavia, Tartary, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Greece. In 1808 he was appointed first professor of mineralogy at Cambridge. Ordained in 1805, he held two livings from 1809 until his death, 9th March 1822. His Travels (6 vols. 1810-23) were received with extraordinary favour; his other works were chiefly on antiquarian subjects and mineralogy. See Life by Bishop Otter (1825).

Clarke, HENRI JACQUES GUILLAUME (1765-1818), a Napoleonic marshal of Irish ancestry, in 1809 created Duc de Feltre.

Clarke, HYDE (1815-95), a somewhat fanciful ethnologist, was born in London, and employed as a civil engineer in the improvement of Morecambe Bay and Barrow, and next in the extension of telegraphs and railways in Upper India. He became cotton councillor in Turkey, and in 1868 founded the Council of Foreign Bondholders.

Clarke, JACOB AUGUSTUS LOCKHART (1817-80), a London physician, who studied the brain.

Clarke, JAMES FREEMAN (1810-88), theologian, studied at Harvard, became a Unitarian pastor, in 1841 founded the Church of the Disciples at Boston, and held a chair of Natural Theology at Harvard (1867-71). He wrote many books, including an Autobiography (1891).

Clarke, JOHN SLEPER (1833-99), comedian, was born at Baltimore, U.S., and died in London.

Clarke, MARCUS (1846-81), son of a London barrister, went at eighteen to Australia, where he became the principal prose author; his chief work, For the Term of his Natural Life, a story of the convict settlements.

Clarke, MARY ANNE, née THOMPSON (1776-1852), was mistress during 1803-7 to Frederick, Duke of York (1763-1827), and trafficked in commissions. Imprisoned for libel in 1813, she settled in Paris.

Clarke, SAMUEL, D.D., born at Norwich, October 11, 1673, studied at Caius College, Cambridge. Descartes' system then held almost universal sway; but he adopted the views of Newton, and expounded them in his edition of Rohault's Physics. Along with philosophy he studied theology and philology. Chaplain from 1698 to Bishop Moore of Norwich, in 1706 he became chaplain to Queen Anne, and in 1709 rector of St James's, Westminster. By his work on the Trinity (1712), in which he denied that doctrine was held by the early church, he raised the controversy, in which Waterland was his chief opponent. Clarke was a vigorous antagonist of the Deists; he wrote against materialism, empiricism, and necessitarianism, and maintained the essential immortality of the soul. He taught that the fundamental truths of morals were as absolutely certain as the truths of mathematics; space and time he held to be attributes of an infinite and immaterial being. His famous Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, originally the Boyle Lectures of 1704-5, was in answer to Hobbes, Spinoza, Blount, and the free-thinkers, and contained the famous demonstration of the existence of God, often, but inaccurately, called an a priori argument. Clarke's keen correspondence with Leibnitz (published in 1717) dealt with space and time and their relations to God, and moral freedom. He died 17th May 1729. See Life by Hoadly, prefixed to his collected works (4 vols. 1738-42), that by Whiston (1741), and a German one by R. Zimmermann (Vienna, 1870).

Clarke, WILLIAM BRANWHITE (1798-1878), born at East Bergholt, Suffolk, was educated at Dedham and Cambridge, took orders, in 1839 went out to New South Wales, and in 1841 discovered gold in the alluvium of the Macquarie.

Clarkson, THOMAS, philanthropist, was born at Wisbeach, the son of a clerical schoolmaster, March 28, 1760. From St Paul's School he passed to St John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1783. He gained a prize for a Latin essay in 1785, on the question, 'Is it right to make slaves of others against their will?' which in an English translation (1786) was widely read. He now devoted himself to an indefatigable crusade against African slavery. Wilberforce brought the subject before parliament in 1787, and in 1807 the law for the suppression of the slave-trade passed the legislature. Clarkson next wrote a History of the Abolition of the African Slave-trade (2 vols. 1806). He became a leading member of the Anti-slavery Society, formed in 1823 for the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, and saw the object of its efforts attained in 1833. He took active part in benevolent schemes, such as establishing institutions for seamen in seaports. He was in deacon's orders in the Church of England, but all his life kept close to the Society of Friends although he never joined its ranks. He died at Playford Hall, near Ipswich, September 26, 1846. See Lives by Taylor (1839 and 1876) and Elmes (1854).

Classen, JOHANNES (1805-91), classical scholar, was born and died at Hamburg.

Claude Lorraine (properly named Claude Gélée, and called 'Le Lorrain' from his native province), a celebrated landscape-painter, was born at Chamagne, near Mirecourt, in Lorraine, about 1600, went with a relative when still a boy to Italy, and in Rome ground colours for Agostino Tassi, a landscape-painter. He seems also to have studied under Godfrey Waals at Naples, and after some travels finally settled at Rome in 1627. From 1629, when he drew four landscapes for Pope Urban VIII., his works were much sought after. He died 21st November 1682. Claude's landscapes, which number about four hundred, are found in Italy, France, Spain, and Germany, and in particular England, which contains fifty-four. Four of his best works—'Morning,' 'Noon,' 'Evening,' and 'Twilight'—are at St Petersburg. The sketches of his pictures in the six Libri Veritatis, now in the library of the Duke of Devonshire, were engraved in mezzotint by Earlom. Claude was somewhat restricted in his range of subjects and effects, and had little sympathy with nature in her wilder and sterner moods. His composition, if rather formal, is always graceful and well considered, and his colour is singularly mellow and harmonious. Claude produced about thirty etchings; Hamerton pronounced 'Le Bouvier' 'the finest landscape etching in the world.' See Ruskin's Modern Painters; Mrs Mark Pattison (Lady Dilke), Claud Lorrain (Paris, 1884); Dullea, Claude le Lorrain (Lond. 1887); and Grahame, The Portfolio (March 1895).

Claudianus, CLAUDIUS, the last of the great Latin poets, came from Alexandria to Rome in 395 A.D., and obtained patrician dignity by favour of Stilicho, whose fall (408) he seems not to have long survived. A pagan, he wrote first in Greek, though he was of Roman extraction; but in Gibbon's words, he 'assumed in his mature age the familiar use and absolute command of Latin.' We have two epic poems by him, Raptus Proserpine and the fragmentary Gigantomachia, besides panegyrics on Honorius and Stilicho, Eidyllia, Epigrammata, &c. There are editions by Gessner (1759), Jeep (Leip. 1876-79), and Birt (Berl. 1892).

Claudianus Mamertinus, a Latin father, presbyter at Vienne, whose works have been edited by Engelbrecht (Vienna, 1885).

Claudius I., fourth Roman emperor, whose full name was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus, was the younger son of Drusus, brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and was born at Lyons in 10 A.C. His supposed imbecility saved him from the cruelty of Caligula; but in his privacy he had studied history, and wrote in Latin and Greek several works now lost. After Caligula's assassination (41 A.D.), Claudius was found by the soldiers hiding in the palace, and proclaimed emperor. By giving largess to the troops who had raised him to the throne, he commenced the practice which subjected Rome to a military despotism. His first acts gave promise of just government, but in 42, when a conspiracy against him was detected, his timidity led him to yield himself entirely to the guidance of his third wife, Messalina, who practised cruelty, extortion, and profligacy without restraint. The emperor lived in scholarly retirement, and expended enormous sums in building, especially the Claudian Aqueduct. Abroad his arms were victorious. Mauritania was made a Roman province, the conquest of Britain was commenced, and the frontier provinces in the east were settled. Messalina at last married herself publicly to a young lover, on which the emperor put her to death. He next married his niece, Agrippina, who poisoned him (54), to secure the succession of Nero, her son by an earlier husband.

Claudius, APPIUS, a Roman decemvir (451 and 450 B.C.), who gained the favour of the citizens by his ability, but began to show his real aims towards absolute power. The indignation of the populace reached a height on his gaining possession of Virginia, daughter of a plebeian, Lucius Virginus, who was with the army, by pretending that she was the born slave of one of his clients. Her lover Icilius summoned Virginus from the army, but another mock-trial again adjudged the girl to the decemvir. To save her from dishonour, the father seized a knife and slew her. Public indignation and the father's appeal to the army overthrew the decemviri, and Appius died in prison by his own hand. The story is familiar to English readers from Macaulay's Lays.

Claudius, MATTHIAS (1740-1815), a German poet and prose writer, who died at Hamburg. See Life by Herbot (4th ed. Gotha, 1878).

Cloughton, THOMAS LEIGH (1808-92), was professor of Poetry at Oxford (1842-47), Bishop of Rochester (1867-77), and then till 1890 of St Albans.—His brother, PIERS CALVERLEY CLAUGH-TON (1814-84), was Bishop of St Helena (1859-62), and then till 1870 of Colombo.

Claus, KARL, zoologist, born 2d January 1835, at Cassel, became professor at Würzburg (1860), Marburg, Göttingen, and Vienna (1873).

Clausel, BERTRAND (1772-1842), a French marshal, born at Mirepoix, Ariège, obtained distinction in the Italian and Austrian campaigns, but more especially as commander in Spain in 1812. Condemned to death as a traitor on the return of the Bourbons, he was in 1819 permitted to come back from America to France; and from 1835 to 1837 was governor of Algeria. [Klo-zel.]

Clausewitz, KARL VON (1780-1831), a Prussian general, whose writings revolutionised the theory of war, was born at Burg. He served with distinction in the Prussian and in the Russian service, in 1815 became chief of a Prussian army corps, and was ultimately director of the army school, and Gneisenau's chief of staff. He died of cholera at Breslau. His best-known work is Vom Krieg (3 vols. 4th ed. 1880). See Life by Schwartz (Berlin, 1877). [Klow-zay-veetz.]

Clausius, RUDOLF, physicist, born January 2, 1822, at Köslin, studied at Berlin, and in 1869 became professor of Natural Philosophy at Bonn, where he died, August 24, 1888. He was elected a foreign member of the Royal Society in 1868, and in 1879 was given its highest honour, the Copley Medal. He studied optics and electricity, but his speciality was thermo-dynamics, the honour of establishing which on a scientific basis he divides with Rankine and Thomson. See a monograph by Riecke (Göt. 1889). [Klow'zi-ooos.]

Claverhouse. See GRAHAM, JOHN.

Clavijero, FRANCISCO XAVIER (1721-87), Jesuit, was born at Vera Cruz, and died at Bologna. His valuable Italian History of Mexico was translated by C. Cullen in 1787. [Klah-vee-hay'ro.]

Clay, CASSIUS MARCELLUS, abolitionist, a nephew of Henry Clay, was born in Kentucky, 19th October 1810, graduated at Yale in 1832, was elected in 1835 to the Kentucky legislature, in 1845 started at Lexington a vigorous anti-slavery paper, volunteered in the Mexican war (1846), and in 1861-69 was U.S. Minister to Russia. He died in July 1903. See his Life (1886).

Clay, HENRY, statesman and orator, was born in 'the Slashes,' Hanover county, Virginia, April 12, 1777. He was the son of a Baptist preacher who died in 1781, and from his employment in a grist-mill was nicknamed 'the mill-boy of the Slashes.' At fifteen he became an assistant-clerk in the chancery court of Virginia; and in 1797 he was licensed to practise law, and went to Lexington, Kentucky, where he soon acquired a high reputation. He was sent in 1806, and again in 1809, to the U.S. senate for short terms. He entered the lower house of congress in 1811, and was chosen its speaker, a post he filled for many years. He was active in bringing on the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain, and was one of the commissioners who arranged the treaty of Ghent which ended it. By his course in regard to the 'Missouri Compromise' of 1821, he won the title of 'the great pacificator.' In 1824, 1831, and 1844 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the presidency. The compromise of 1850 between the opposing free-soil and pro-slavery interests was largely Clay's work. He died at Washington, July 29, 1852. Of several Lives, the best is that by Carl Schurz (2 vols. Boston, 1887).

Clayton, JOHN MIDDLETON (1796-1856), statesman, was born in Sussex county, Delaware, studied at Yale, and practised as a lawyer. In 1829 he became a United States senator, and, while secretary of state in 1849-50, he negotiated the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty with Britain.

Cleantes (c. 300-220 B.C.), a Stoic philosopher, born at Assos in Troas, studied under Zeno for nineteen years, and, on his death, succeeded him. He died of voluntary starvation. His only extant writing, a Hymn to Zeus, is one of the purest and noblest of Greek poems. See his Fragments and Zeno's, edited by Pearson (1891).

Cleasby, RICHARD (1797-1847), an ex-Russia broker who in 1840 undertook the great Icelandic dictionary, completed in 1873 by Vigfusson. See prefixed Memoir by Dasent.

Cleland, JOHN (1709-89), best forgotten as the author of Fanny Hill (1750), spent much of his early years in the East and on the Continent.

Cleland, WILLIAM (c. 1661-89), Covenanting poet, studied at St Andrews and Utrecht, and had fought at Drumclog, Bothwell Brig, and in Argyll's expedition, when, as colonel of the Cameronians, he fell in the gallant defence of Dunkeld against the Jacobite clansmen.

Clemenceau, EUGÈNE, born in La Vendée, 28th September 1841, practised in Paris as a physician, in 1871 was in the National Assembly, and, sent in 1876 to the Chamber, was a leader of the extreme left. In 1906-9 he was president of the council and minister of the interior. He is an active and brilliant journalist. [Klie-mon'z-so.]

Clemens, SAMUEL LANGHORNE ('Mark Twain'), was born at Florida, Missouri, November 30, 1835. A printer first, and afterwards a Mississippi pilot, he adopted his pseudonym from a well-known call of the man sounding the river in shallow places ('Mark twain,' meaning 'by the mark two fathoms'). After the outbreak of the war of 1861-65 he went to Nevada, where he tried silver-mining; next edited for two years the Virginia City Enterprise, to which he had previously contributed; in 1864 moved to San Francisco, and lectured with success there and in New York. In 1867, with a pleasure party, he visited France, Italy, and Palestine, gathering material for his Innocents Abroad (1869), which established his reputation as a humorist. He was afterwards an editor at Buffalo, New York, where he married Miss Langdon, a lady of wealth. Later he removed to Hartford, Conn., and joined a publishing firm which failed, but largely recouped his losses by lecturing and writing. He died 21st April 1910. Among his books are Roughing It (1872); The Gilded Age (1873), in collaboration with Dudley Warner; Tom Sawyer (1876); A Tramp Abroad (1880); The Prince and the Pauper (1882); Life on the Mississippi (1874, reissued 1883); New Pilgrim's Progress (1884); Huckleberry Finn (1885); The American Claimant (1892); Pudd'nhead Wilson (1894); Recollections of Joan of Arc (1896); More Tramps Abroad (1897).

Clement, or CLEMENS, is the name of seventeen popes, of whom three, as schismatics, are not usually reckoned. The first, CLEMENS ROMANUS, was one of the Apostolic Fathers, and is reckoned variously as the second or third successor of St Peter in the see of Rome. According to Lightfoot, he was a freedman of Jewish parentage belonging to 'Cæsar's household.' The second of the two epistles attributed to him is certainly not by Clement; but the first is generally accepted as his, and was probably written about 95 A.D. It is addressed to the Corinthian Church, and treats of social dissensions and of the resurrection.

The first edition was edited by Patrick Young in 1633, from the incomplete Alexandrian MS., then in the king's library. This was the only copy known until in 1875 Bryennios (q.v.) published a complete MS. (dated 1056) found at Constantinople; and in 1876 a complete Syriac MS. came into the possession of Cambridge University. See Lightfoot's exhaustive edition (1869-77; new ed. 1890), where the second epistle will also be found. The other works attributed to Clement—the Apostolic Constitutions and Canons, two Syriac epistles on Virginity, the Clementine (the Recognitions and Homilies), and two epistles to James are all undoubtedly spurious.—CLEMENS II., a Saxon, was pope in 1046-47.—CLEMENS III. (1187-91) allayed an old feud between the Romans and the popes.—CLEMENS IV. (Gui Foulques), pope in 1165-68, supported Charles of Anjou and encouraged Roger Bacon.—CLEMENS V. (1305-14), formerly archbishop of Bordeaux, suppressed the Templars, and removed the seat of the papacy to Avignon (1308), a movement disastrous to Italy.—CLEMENS VI. (1342-52), also French, was the fourth of the Avignon popes, a patron of art and learning, but no saint.—CLEMENS VII. (1523-34), Giulio de' Medici, was a cunning diplomatist but a most unlucky pope, allied himself with Francis I. against Charles V., was besieged by the Constable Bourbon and became his prisoner, and refused to sanction Henry VIII.'s divorce.—CLEMENS VIII. (1592-1605), an Italian, secured peace between France and Spain, and extended the States of the Church.—CLEMENS IX. (1667-69) and CLEMENS X. (1670-76), both Italians, were unimportant popes.—CLEMENS XI. (1700-21) issued the bull Unigenitus against the 'Gallican liberties' of the French church.—CLEMENS XII. (1730-41) and CLEMENS XIII. (1758-69), Italians, did little of consequence.—CLEMENS XIV. (1769-74), Ganganelli, an excellent and accomplished but much calumniated pope, suppressed in 1773 the Jesuit order.

CLEMENS 'ALEXANDRINUS,' TITUS FLAVIUS, a Church father, was born probably at Athens, of heathen parents, about the middle of the 2d century, and lived chiefly in Alexandria. In his earlier years he devoted himself to philosophy. After coming to Alexandria he was made a presbyter, and about 190 became head of the celebrated Catechetical school. In 203 the persecution under Severus compelled him to flee to Palestine. He seems to have died between 213 and 220. His most distinguished pupil was Origen. The chief writings of Clement that have survived, besides a practical treatise, Who is the Rich Man that is Saved, are the Missionary, the Tutor, and the Miscellanies, which form a connected series, probably continued in his lost Outlines, which was an investigation of the canonical writings. The first is an exhortation to abandon idolatry; the second, Christian ethics; and the third, treatises and observations on Greek and Christian literature, designed as an introduction to Christian philosophy. They exhibit a man of pure and gentle spirit, sincere piety, wide reading, and wider sympathies; but his learning is undigested, his style verbose, and his method desultory. See editions by Potter (1715) and Dindorf (4 vols. Oxf. 1868); the translation in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library (1877-79); and Bigg's Christian Platonists (Bampton Lectures, 1886).

Clement, JACQUES (1564-89), the Dominican who stabbed Henry III. (q.v.) of France.

Clementi, MUZIO (1752-1832), pianist and composer for the pianoforte, was born at Rome, and died at Evesham, having been brought to England in 1766 by Peter Beckford, M.P., and conducted the Italian opera in London from 1777 to 1780.

Clenell, LUKE (1781-1840), engraver, was born at Ulgham, near Morpeth, studied under Bewick at Newcastle 1797-1804, came to London then, and from 1817 was more or less insane. See Austin Dobson's Bewick and his Pupils (1884).

Cleome'des, author in the 2d century A.D. of a Greek treatise On the Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies (ed. by Ziegler, Leip. 1891), which sets forth the Stoic theory of the universe and affirms the spherical shape of the earth.

Cleon, a loud-voiced Athenian demagogue and leader of the war-party at the time of the Peloponnesian war, was originally a tanner. He advocated (427 B.C.) the slaughter of the Mytilenean prisoners, but his first great success was the reduction of Sphacteria, in which a Lacedæmonian force had long held out. Perhaps this exploit was really due to his colleague Demosthenes, but many of his countrymen must have credited Cleon with military genius, for in 422 he was sent to oppose the Spartan Brasidas in Macedonia. But he fell under the walls of Amphipolis.

Cleopatra, born in 69 B.C., should by the will of her father, Ptolemy Auletes (died 51 B.C.), one of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, have shared the throne with her younger brother, Ptolemy. But she was ousted by Ptolemy's guardians, and was about to assert her rights, by help of Syrian troops, when Cæsar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey. Cæsar, captivated by her charms, warily espoused her cause, and, after the Alexandrine war, in which Ptolemy fell, replaced her upon the throne. Cleopatra bore him a son, who was called Cæsarion (afterwards cut off by Augustus), and soon followed her lover to Rome. After Cæsar's murder and the battle of Philippi, Antony summoned her to appear before him at Tarsus in Cilicia. She was then in her twenty-eighth year, the perfection of Greek beauty (she was pure Greek by descent); and the splendour of her loveliness and her wit fascinated Antony. They spent the next winter in Alexandria. Antony then went to Rome to marry Octavia, the sister of Octavian, but soon returned to the arms of Cleopatra, who met him in Syria (36 B.C.), and accompanied him on his march to the Euphrates. From this time his usual residence was with her at Alexandria, where he heaped upon her and her children extravagant gifts and honours; his infatuation cost him all his popularity at Rome. It was at Cleopatra's instigation that he risked the great sea-fight of Actium; and when she fled with sixty ships, he flung away half the world to follow her. When Octavian (Augustus) appeared victorious before Alexandria, Cleopatra entered into private negotiations with him. Antony, told that she had killed herself, fell upon his sword; but on learning that the report was false, he had himself carried into her presence, and died in her arms. Finding that she could not touch Octavian, and scorning to grace her conqueror's triumph at Rome, she took poison, or, as it is said, killed herself by causing an asp to bite her bosom (30 B.C.). See book by P. W. Sergeant (1909).

Clerk, JOHN (1728-1812), of Eldin, writer on naval tactics, was the seventh son of the antiquary, Sir John Clerk of Penicuik (1676-1755), whose Memoirs were edited by J. M. Gray for the Scottish Historical Society in 1893. He prospered as an Edinburgh merchant, and by 1773 purchased the small estate of Eldin at Lasswade, where he devoted himself to etching, geology, and the study of naval tactics. In 1779 he communicated to his friends a new manoeuvre for 'breaking the enemy's line'; and in 1782 printed 50 copies of his Essay on Naval Tactics, which was published in 1790 (new ed. 1804).—His son, JOHN CLERK (1757-1832), was raised as Lord Eldin to the Scottish bench in 1823.

Clerke, CHARLES (1741-79), a captain R.N., who succeeded to the command of Cook's expedition, but himself died soon after off Kamchatka.

Clerk-Maxwell. See MAXWELL.

Clésinger, JEAN BAPTISTE AUGUSTE (1814-83), sculptor, born at Besançon, died in Paris.

Cleveland, DUKE OF. See CHARLES II.

Cleveland, GROVER, the twenty-second president of the United States, was born at Caldwell, New Jersey, March 18, 1837, the son of a Presbyterian minister. In 1859 he was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Buffalo. From 1863 to 1866 he was assistant district attorney for Erie County, and in 1870 was chosen sheriff. After filling the office of Mayor of Buffalo, he was in 1882 elected governor of New York by a majority of 190,000 votes. In 1884 he was nominated by the Democrats for the presidency, and, defeating Blaine, the Republican, took his seat as president in 1885. In a message to congress in 1887 he strongly advised a readjustment of the tariff on certain manufactured articles of import, and the admission duty-free of some raw materials. Protectionists classed the president's message as a free-trade document, but this was denied by the Democrats, and its doctrines were adopted at the convention of that party in 1888, when Mr Cleveland was unanimously nominated for re-election. In the following August, on the rejection of the proposed Fisheries Treaty with Canada by the Republican majority in the senate, the president sent a message to congress, declaring a policy of 'retaliation' against Canada now necessary. At the election in November he was defeated by the Republican candidate, General Harrison, over whom, however, he secured a large majority in November 1892. In 1895 he evoked intense excitement throughout the whole civilised world by his application of the 'Monroe Doctrine' to Britain's dispute with Venezuela over the frontier question. He died 25th June 1908. See Lives by King (New York, 1885) and J. Lowry Whittle (1896), and his Writings and Speeches, edited by Parker (1892).

Cleveland, JOHN, the cavalier poet, was born at Loughborough, Leicestershire, in June 1613, the son of a poor clergyman, ousted by the parliament from the living of Hinckley in 1645. In 1627 he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, graduated B.A. four years later, and then migrated to St John's, where he was elected to a fellowship in 1634, and lived nine years 'the delight and ornament of the society.' He vigorously opposed Cromwell's election to the Long Parliament for Cambridge, and was for his loyalty himself ejected from his fellowship in 1645. He betook himself to the king's army, and was appointed judge-advocate at Newark, but was obliged to surrender with the garrison. In 1655 he was arrested at Norwich, but was released by Cromwell, who could admire the courageous manliness of the poor poet's letter addressed to him. In 1656 he published a volume containing thirty-six poems—elegies on Charles I., Strafford, Laud, and Edward King, also some stinging satires. Cleveland now went to live at Gray's Inn, where he died April 29, 1658. In 1677 was published, with a short Life, Clevelandia Vindicia. See Berdan's edition (1910).

Cleveley, JOHN (1747-86), and ROBERT (1747-1809), twin brothers, born at Deptford, from 1764 were both marine painters.

Clifford, a family descended from Walter, Richard FitzPonce's son, who by marriage, prior to 1138, acquired Clifford Castle on the Wye, 17 miles W. of Hereford, and who thence assumed the surname Clifford. He was the father of Fair Rosamond, Henry II.'s mistress, who seems to have died about 1176, and to have been buried at Godstow Nunnery, near Oxford. The legend of her murder by Queen Eleanor appears first in the 14th century; the Woodstock maze, the clue, the dagger, and the poisoned bowl belong to a yet later age. Among Walter's descendants were the soldier-judge Roger de Clifford, who by marriage with Isabella de Vipont got Brougham Castle in Westmorland (circa 1270); John (1435-61), the savage Lancastrian; Henry (1455-1523), the 'shepherd lord'; Henry (1493-1542), fifteenth Lord Clifford and first Earl of Cumberland; George, third earl (1558-1605), naval commander, whose daughter, Anne (1590-1676), married first the Earl of Dorset, and then the Earl of Pembroke; and Henry, fifth and last earl (1591-1643). To a cadet branch belonged Thomas Clifford (1630-73), a Catholic member of the Cabal, who in 1672 was created Lord Clifford of Chudleigh.

Clifford, GEORGE (d. 1750), a wealthy Dutch banker and burgomaster, Linnaeus' patron.

Clifford, JOHN, Baptist divine, was born in 1836 at Sawley, near Derby, studied at the Baptist College in Nottingham and at University College, London, and in 1858 became pastor of a charge in Paddington. He is M.A., B.Sc., LL.B., and D.D., has been conspicuous in the councils of the Baptist Churches, is a strong Nonconformist Liberal, and has written theological works.

Clifford, WILLIAM KINGDON, F.R.S., mathematician, was born at Exeter, May 4, 1845. In 1860 he passed to King's College, London, and thence in 1863 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he excelled in gymnastics, and came out second wrangler in 1867, next year being elected a fellow. A High-Churchman at first, Clifford soon threw off all dogmatic restraints, and discussed the fundamental questions of religion with complete independence. In 1871 he was elected to the chair of Mathematics and Mechanics at University College, London, which post he retained until his untimely death at Madeira, March 3, 1879. In 1878 he published part i. of Elements of Dynamics; a further instalment appeared in 1887. His Common Sense of the Exact Sciences was completed by Professor Karl Pearson in 1885; his Mathematical Papers were issued in 1881; his lectures on Seeing and Thinking in 1879; and his Lectures and Essays were edited, with a memoir, by L. Stephen and F. Pollock (1879; 2d ed. 1886).—Mrs Clifford (née Lucy Lane, a Barbadian, whom he married in 1875) is the author of Mrs Keith's Crime (1885), Aunt Anne (1892), A Flash of Summer (1895), &c., besides Anyhow Stories and Very Short Stories and Verses, A Woman Alone, and Woodside Farm (1902).

Clinton, an American family, descended from Charles Clinton (1690-1773), who emigrated from Ireland in 1729 to New York state.—His third son, JAMES (1736-1812), served with distinction against the French, and as brigadier-general during the War of Independence.—His brother, GEORGE (1739-1812), sat in the New York assembly, in 1775 was sent to the second Continental Congress, and in 1776 as general of militia served against Sir Henry Clinton. In 1777 he was chosen first governor of New York, to which post he was re-elected in 1780 and 1801; and to him was due the conception of the Erie Canal. In 1804 he was chosen vice-president of the United States, and in that office he died at Washington.—James's son, DE WYR (1769-1828), admitted to the New York bar in 1788, was private secretary to his uncle from 1790 to 1795. He sat in the state legislature (1797) and in the state senate (1798-1802); and in 1802 he was elected to the U.S. senate, but resigned in the same year on being appointed mayor of New York by his uncle. In this office he continued, save for two short intervals, until 1815; he was defeated by Madison in the presidential contest of 1812. He pressed the Erie Canal scheme, was elected governor of the state in 1817, and in 1825 he opened the canal. He died in office at Albany, 11th February 1828. See Life by Campbell (1849).

Clinton, SIR HENRY, British general, born about 1738, was the son of the Hon. George Clinton, governor of Newfoundland, and afterwards of New York. He first entered the New York militia, then in 1751 the Guards, served with conspicuous gallantry in the Seven Years' War, and was promoted major-general in 1772. Sent to America in 1775, he fought at Bunker Hill, and in 1776 was repulsed in an attack on Charleston, but was shortly afterwards knighted for his services under Howe. After Burgoyne's surrender in 1778, Clinton succeeded Howe as commander-in-chief. In 1780 he captured Charleston and the entire southern army; but after Cornwallis' capitulation at Yorktown in 1781, Clinton resigned his command and returned to England, where in 1783 he published a Narrative of the campaign. In 1794 he was appointed governor of Gibraltar, and died there 23d December 1795. His two sons, SIR WILLIAM HENRY (1769-1846) and SIR HENRY (1771-1829), both rose to be generals and G.C.B.'s, the younger being one of Wellington's favourite officers.

Clinton, HENRY FYNES (1781-1852), scholar, was born at Gamston, Notts; was educated at Southwell, Westminister, and Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1803; represented Aldborough in parliament from 1806 till 1826; and died at Welwyn. His great works on Greek and Roman chronology are the Fasti Hellenici (1824-34) and Fasti Romani (1845-50).

Clisson, OLIVIER DE (1336-1407), a famous French knight, a comrade of Du Guesclin.

Clitherow, MARGARET (née Middleton), a Catholic martyr, the wife of a York butcher, was pressed to death, 25th March 1586. See her Life by Lætitia S. Oliver (1886).

Clive, CAROLINE, novelist, was born in London, 24th June 1801, the daughter of Mr Meysiey-Wigley, M.P. for Worcester. In 1840 she married the Rev. Archer Clive; and, for several years a great invalid, she died, through her dress catching fire, at Whitfield, Hereford, 13th July 1873. Between 1840 and 1872 she published eight volumes of Poems by 'V.' (new ed. 1890), but she is best known by Paul Ferroll (1855), a really strong sensation novel, much superior to Why Paul Ferroll killed his Wife (1860).

Clive, KITTY, comic actress, was born in London in 1711, the daughter of William Raftor, a Jacobite lawyer from Kilkenny. She came out at Drury Lane about 1728, and chiefly at Drury Lane she continued to play till 1769, when she quitted the stage, and retired to Twickenham. About 1731 she had married George Clive, a barrister, but they soon parted. She died at Little Strawberry Hill, 6th December 1785. Garrick, Handel, Horace Walpole, and Dr Johnson all liked her, the last remarking to Boswell that 'in the sprightliness of humour he never had seen her equalled.' See her Life by Percy Fitzgerald (1888).

Clive, ROBERT, the creator of our Indian empire, was born at the manor-house of Styche, near Market-Drayton, 29th September 1725. He was the eldest of thirteen children; his father, a lawyer and small landowner, of a very old Shropshire family. The boy was brought up by an uncle near Eccles. There, and at all his four schools—Lostock, Market-Drayton, Merchant Taylors, and Henel-Hempstead—he proved a much better fighter than scholar; in 1748 he was packed off to India as a writer in the service of 'John Company.' He reached Madras penniless, and the drudgery of his life there moved him to suicide. But the pistol snapped twice, and he flung it from him, exclaiming: 'It appears I am destined for something; I will live.' The capture of Madras by the French (1746), Clive's escape thence to Fort St David, his share in its defence, in the fruitless siege of Pondicherry (1748), and in the storming of Devikota (1749)—these events bring us up to Clive's daring dash upon Arcot (1751). He seized it, and held its enormous citadel for eleven whole weeks against 7000 natives and 120 French soldiers. His own little force was reduced to 80 Englishmen and 120 sepoy; but, after a last desperate assault, the siege was raised (14th November), and Clive followed up his success by the victories of Arni and Kaveripak, and the capture of Kovilam and Chingalpat. In 1753 he married Margaret Maskeleyne, sister to the astronomer, and sailed with her for England, where he was presented with a diamond-hilted sword, cleared his father's estate, stood for St Michaels, but was unseated, and otherwise got through a very fair fortune. So in 1755 he was back in India, and a twelvemonth later was summoned from Madras to avenge the atrocity of the Black Hole. Calcutta was soon retaken; Chandernagore, the French settlement, captured; and at Plassey, on 23d June 1757, Clive's 3200 men (two-thirds of them sepoy) encountered Surajud Dowlah's 50,000 plus 50 French gunners. The lustre of his great victory was sullied by the only two blots on Clive's memory. In his dealings with Mir Jaffier, the would-be next nabab of Bengal, he had imposed on a go-between, the merchant Omichand, with a fictitious treaty; and now from Mir Jaffier he accepted upwards of £200,000. For three years sole ruler in all but name of Bengal, Clive, in 1760, with a fortune of more than £40,000 a year, returned to England, to be hailed by Pitt as 'a heaven-born general.' In 1761 he entered parliament as member for Shrewsbury; in 1762 was raised to the Irish peerage as Baron Clive of Plassey; in 1764 was created a Knight of the Bath. But meanwhile in India the Company's affairs had fallen into the utmost disorder; and Clive was the only man who could set them right. He arrived at Calcutta in 1765, and at once applied himself wisely and firmly to reform the civil service and re-establish the military discipline. This second governorship, lasting but twenty-two months, marks the beginning of our Indian administration, as Plassey of our military supremacy. Early in 1767 Clive quitted India, never to return; in all he had spent there less than a dozen years. This time he came back to England poorer than when he last left it; but this time he came back to encounter a storm of obloquy. The energy with which he had cleansed that Augean stable had raised up a host of influential enemies, who employed their influence to stir up ill-feeling against him. His early proceedings in India were in 1772 made the subject of animadversion in parliament and next year matter for the inquiry of a select committee. He was examined and cross-examined like a sheep-stealer. The censure implied in the ultimate resolution was hardly wiped out by its rider, that he 'did at the same time render great and meritorious services' (21st May 1773). Sickness, opium, mental depression—on 22d Nov. 1774 Clive died by his own hand. He is buried in the church of Moreton Say, the parish that gave him birth.—Clive's eldest son, EDWARD (1754–1839), was governor of Madras 1798–1803, and in 1804 was made Earl of Powis, having twenty years earlier married the daughter of the last Earl of Powis of the Herbert line. See Lives by Sir John Malcolm (3 vols. 1836, with Macaulay's essay thereon), Malleson (1882 and 1893), Sir C. Wilson (1890), and Sir A. J. Arbuthnot (1899); also Browning's Dramatic Idylls (2d series, 1880).

Clodd, EDWARD, born at Margate, 1st July 1840, and educated at Aldeburgh, in 1872 became secretary of the London Joint-Stock Bank. His works include Childhood of the World (1873), Myths and Dreams (1885), Story of Creation (1888), Primitive Man (1895), Pioneers of Evolution (1897), and Tom Tit Tot: Savage Philosophy in Folk-tale (1898).

Clodius, PUBLIUS C. PULCHER, a Roman tribune (58 B.C.), who brought about Cicero's banishment, and tyrannised with his gladiators till, on 19th Jan. 52 B.C., he was slain by Milo.

Cloutz, JEAN BAPTISTE DU VAL DE GRACE, BARON, 'Anacharsis Cloutz,' was born at Schloss Gnadenthal, near Cleves, 24th June 1755, but from his eleventh year was educated in Paris. While still young he traversed Europe under the name of Anacharsis, lavishing his money to promote the union of all nations in one family. In the French Revolution he saw the fulfilment of his dreams. He constituted himself the 'orator of the human race,' and wearied the National Assembly with his ravings against Christianity. With all its folly his enthusiasm was honest, and he was both hated and feared by Robespierre, who involved him in Hébert's downfall. He was guillotined, March 23, 1794. Of his absurd books, may be named: Certitude des Preuves du Mohamédisme (Lond. 1780), and Base Constitutionnelle de la République du Genre Humain (1793). See Life by Avenel (2 vols. Par. 1865). [Kloatz.]

Clopton, SIR HUGH, a benefactor of his birthplace, Stratford-on-Avon, in 1492 was Lord Mayor of London, and died 15th September 1497.

Close, FRANCIS, D.D. (1797–1882), from 1824 to 1856 was a clergyman at Cheltenham, and then till 1881 Dean of Carlisle. A strong Evangelical, he published seventy works against horse-racing, tobacco, theatres, &c.

Closterman, JOHN (1656–1713), was born at Osnaburg, and in 1681 settled in England as a portrait-painter.

Clotaire I. (Hlothar, Chlotar), son and successor of Clovis (q.v.), first king of the Franks in Gaul, reigned as sole king from 558 to 561.—CLOTAIRE II. reigned from 584 to 628.

Clotilda, ST (475–545), daughter of Chilperic, king of Burgundy, in 493 married Clovis (q.v.).

After his death she lived a life of austerity and good works at Tours, where she died.

Clouet, or JANET, FRANÇOIS (c. 1510-72), a portrait-painter, born at Tours. See Lord R. Gower's Three Hundred French Portraits (1875).

Clough, ARTHUR HUGH, poet, was born at Liverpool, January 1, 1819. His father, a cotton-merchant, of an old Denbighshire family, in the winter of 1822-23 emigrated to Charleston, South Carolina, and there the boy lived in the midst of a home-life of singular happiness, until in 1828 he was taken back to school at Chester, and next year at Rugby, then under Dr Arnold. In 1837 he entered Balliol College, Oxford, but astonished all who knew his powers by taking only a second-class in 1841; in 1842 he was elected a fellow of Oriel. For a time he fell under the spell of Newman's influence, but this was soon followed by a period of severe inward struggle, its result that he felt it his duty to withdraw in 1848 from Oriel. The same year he published the Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich, a 'Long Vacation pastoral' in hexameter verse. He travelled in France and Italy, part of the time with Emerson, and was appointed on his return (October 1849) Warden of University Hall, London. His life here was far from congenial, but he found much help in the warm friendship of Carlyle. At Rome, in 1849, he had written his Amours de Voyage, and at Venice, during a holiday in 1850, he wrote Dipsychus. In 1852 he resigned his office, and sailed to America, where he commenced his revision of Dryden's Plutarch; but an examinership in the Education Office soon recalled him to England. In 1854 he married, and the remaining seven years of his life were spent in the calm peace of domestic happiness. In 1856 he was nominated secretary to the commission for examining scientific military schools on the Continent, and the duties of this office carried him to France and to Vienna. But his health now gave way, and, after visits to Greece, Constantinople, the Pyrenees, and Italy, he died at Florence, of paralysis, Nov. 13, 1861.—His sister, ANNE JEMIMA (1820-92), was the first principal of Newnham College, Cambridge. See Matthew Arnold's Thyrsis; the Memoir by F. T. Palgrave prefixed to Clough's Poems (1862); that by his widow prefixed to his Poems and Prose Remains (2 vols. 1869); S. Waddington's Clough: a Monograph (1883); and Memoir of Anne Clough (1897). [Kluff.]

Clovio, GIULIO, or JURNI GLOVICHISCH (1498-1578), miniaturist, was born in Croatia, and died at Rome, having for fifty years been a monk. See Life by J. W. Bradley (1890).

Clovis (old Ger. Chlodwig, modern Ger. Ludwig, Fr. Louis), Merovingian king, was born in 465 A.D., and succeeded his father, Childeric (481), as king of the Salian Franks, whose capital was Tournai. His first achievement was the overthrow of the Gallo-Romans under Syagrius, near Soissons. He then took possession of the whole country between the Somme and the Loire, and established himself in Soissons. In 493 he married Clotilda (q.v.). She was a Christian, and earnestly desired his conversion. In a great battle with the Alemanni near Cologne, Clovis as a last resource invoked the God of Clotilda, offering if victorious to turn Christian. The Alemanni were routed, and on Christmas Day Clovis and several thousands of his soldiers were baptised by Remigius, Bishop of Rheims. In 507, love of conquest concurring with orthodox zeal, Clovis marched against the Arian Visigoth, Alaric II., whom he defeated and slew at Vouglé, near Poitiers, taking possession of the whole country as far as Bordeaux and Toulouse; but he was checked at Arles by the Ostrogoth Theodoric. Clovis now took up his residence in Paris, where he died in 511.—Clovis II., son of Dagobert, reigned over the Franks from 688 to 656.

Clowes, WILLIAM (c. 1540-1604), surgeon, served with Leicester in the Low Countries and on board the fleet that defeated the Armada. He became surgeon to the queen, and after a prosperous practice in London retired to Plaistow in Essex. He wrote five books in clear and vigorous English.—His son, WILLIAM (1582-1648), was also a well-known surgeon. [Klooz.]

Clowes, WILLIAM (1779-1847), born at Chichester, in 1808 started the London printing business carried on by his son, WILLIAM (1807-83).

Clusoret, GUSTAVE PAUL, communist, was born in Paris, 13th June 1823, served in the June insurrection of 1848, the Crimea, Algeria, under Garibaldi, and the American civil war on the Federal side, becoming a general in 1862, and after the war founding the New York New Nation. He returned to Paris in 1868, took a prominent part in the Commune (1871), escaped to England, America, and Switzerland, returned to France under the amnesty (1880), and in 1888 was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. He published Mémoires (1888), and died 22d August 1900.

Clutterbuck, ROBERT (1772-1831), who was born and died at Watford, wrote The History of Hertfordshire (3 vols. 1815-27).

Cluverius, or CLÜVER, PHILIPP (1580-1622), the founder of historical geography, was born at Danzig, studied law at Leyden, and visited Norway, England, Scotland, France, Italy, &c. See Life by Parschi (Vienna, 1891).

Clyde, LORD. See CAMPBELL, SIR COLIN.

Clytæmnestra, in Homeric legend, the wife of Agamemnon.

Coates, ROBERT (1772-1848), 'Romeo Coates,' a Bath beau and miserable amateur actor, was born in Antigua, came to England about 1780, and died in London. See Life by Robinson (1891).

Coats, SIR PETER (1808-90), and THOMAS (1809-83), two brothers, thread manufacturers at Paisley, of which they were both munificent benefactors. The former was knighted in 1869.

Cobbe, FRANCES POWER (1822-1904) was born at Newbridge near Dublin, and went to school at Brighton. Her interest was early aroused in theological questions; and her mother's death led her to Theodore Parker, whose counsels are contained in his famous Sermon of the Immortal Life. Her father, too, died in 1857, when, leaving Newbridge, she travelled in Italy and the East, and wrote Cities of the Past (1864) and Italics (1864). A strong Theist, a supporter of women's rights, and a prominent anti-vivisectionist, she published since 1857 more than thirty works, among them Friendless Girls (1861); Criminals, Idiots, Women, and Minors (1869); Darwinism in Morals (1872); The Hopes of the Human Race Hereafter and Here (1874); Re-echoes (1876); The Peak in Darien (1882); Scientific Spirit of the Age (1888); and an Autobiography (1894).

Cobbett, WILLIAM, born at Farnham, Surrey, on 9th March 1762, was the son of a small farmer, and grandson of a day-labourer. From scaring crows the boy rose to be ploughman; but a visit to Portsmouth and a sight of the fleet had spoiled him for farming, when, in May 1783, a sudden freak took him to London. He reached it with just half-a-crown, and for nine months was quill-driver to a Gray's Inn attorney. Enlisting then in the 54th Foot, he first spent a year at Chatham, where he mastered Lowth's English Grammar, and read through a whole lending library—Swift's Tale of a Tub had been his boyhood's delight. Next he served as sergeant-major in New Brunswick (1785-91), meanwhile studying rhetoric, geometry, logic, French, and fortification. On his return he obtained a most flattering discharge; in February 1792 married; but in March went to France to get out of a court-martial on three of his late officers, whom he had taxed with pecculation. Six months later he sailed for America. At Philadelphia he taught English to French refugees; and, as 'Peter Porcupine,' wrote fierce onslaughts on Dr Priestley, Tom Paine, and the native Democrats. Twice he was prosecuted for libel, and in 1800 he returned to England. The Tories welcomed him with open arms; and in 1802 he started his famous Weekly Political Register, which, with one three-months' break in 1817, continued till his death. But, Tory first, it altered its politics in 1804, till at last it became the most uncompromising champion of Radicalism. A great lover of the country, Cobbett settled at Botley in Hampshire, where he planted, farmed, and went in for manly sports; a true soldiers' friend, he got two years in Newgate (1810-12) for his strictures on the flogging of militiamen by German mercenaries. In 1817 money muddles and dread of a second imprisonment drove him once more across the Atlantic; and he farmed in Long Island till, in 1819, he ventured back again. Botley had to be sold, but he started a seed-farm at Kensington, and stood for Coventry (1821) and Preston (1826). Both times he failed; but his ill-advised trial for sedition (1831) was followed next year by his return for Oldham. On 18th June 1835 he died at Normanby farm, near Guildford, and was buried at Farnham. The Rural Rides (new ed. with notes by Pitt Cobbett, 1885) are unsurpassable. They were a reprint (1830) from the Register, and followed or were followed by Porcupine's Works (12 vols. 1801), the excellent and entertaining English Grammar (1818), the savage History of the Reformation (1824-27), the Woodlands (1825), the shrewd, homely Advice to Young Men (1830), and forty or fifty more works. Cobbett was further the originator of Hansard's Debates (1806), and of Howell's State Trials (1809). See Lord Dalling's Historical Characters, and Lives by E. Smith (1878) and E. I. Carlyle (1904).

Cobbold, RICHARD (1797-1877), author of Margaret Catchpole (1845) and other works, was born at Ipswich, and for fifty years was rector of Wortham, near Diss.—His mother, ELIZABETH COBBOLD (1767-1824), published some wonderful poetry; and his third son, THOMAS SPENCER COBBOLD (1828-86), lectured in London on botany, zoology, comparative anatomy, geology, and helminthology. He wrote Entozoa (1864), Tape-worms (1866), Human Parasites (1882), &c.

Cobden, RICHARD, 'the Apostle of Free Trade,' was born at Heyshott, near Midhurst, Sussex, 3d June 1804. His father had to sell his farm in 1814; and Richard, the fourth of his eleven children, was sent for five years to a 'Dotheyboys' school in Yorkshire. In 1819 he was received into an uncle's warehouse in London, where he showed great aptitude both as clerk and commercial traveller. In 1828 he and two friends entered into a partnership for selling calicoes by commission in London. They set up an establishment for calico-printing in Lancashire in 1831, and in 1832 Cobden settled in Manchester. In 1835 he visited the United States, and in 1836-37 the Levant. The result was two pamphlets, England, Ireland, and America (1835), and Russia (1836), the former preaching free-trade and non-intervention, the latter directed against 'Russophobia.' He contested Stockport unsuccessfully on free-trade principles in 1837. In 1838 seven merchants of Manchester founded the Anti-Corn-law League; its most prominent member was Cobden. His lectures all over the country and his speeches in parliament (to which Stockport returned him in 1841) were characterised by clear, quiet persuasiveness; and to them was in great part due, as Peel acknowledged, the abolition of the corn laws in 1846. Cobden's zeal for free trade in corn had, however, to such a degree withdrawn his attention from private business that he was now a ruined man, and a subscription of £80,000 was raised in recognition of his services; with this in 1847 he repurchased Dunford, the farmhouse in which he was born. As his health, too, had suffered, he travelled for fourteen months in Spain, Italy, Russia, &c., and during his absence was elected for both Stockport and the West Riding; he chose the latter constituency. He shared Bright's unpopularity for opposing the Crimean war; and on Palmerston's appeal to the country to support him in his Chinese policy, of which Cobden was a strenuous opponent, he retired from the West Riding and contested Huddersfield, where, however, he was defeated (1857). In 1859 he revisited America, and meanwhile was elected for Rochdale. Palmerston offered him the Presidency of the Board of Trade; but Cobden felt bound to decline. Ill-health forbade his taking further part in parliamentary proceedings, but in 1859-60 he arranged the treaty of commerce with France. Cobden spoke out strongly in favour of the North during the American civil war, and in 1864 strenuously opposed intervention in favour of Denmark. He died in London, April 2, 1865, and was buried at Lavington, Sussex. His Speeches on Questions of Public Policy were edited by John Bright and Thorold Rogers (1870). See Life by John Morley (2 vols. 1881); Sir E. Watkin's Alderman Cobden (1891); and Mrs Salis Schwabe's Reminiscences of Cobden (1895).

Cobet, CAREL GABRIEL (1813-89), a Dutch Hellenist, born in Paris, and from 1846 a professor at Leyden.

Cobham, LORD. See OLDCASTLE.

Coccaio, MERLINO. See FOLENGO.

Cocceius, or KOCH, JOHANNES (1603-69), theologian, born at Bremen, in 1636 became professor of Hebrew at Franeker, and in 1650 of Theology at Leyden. His Hebrew Lexicon (1669) was the first tolerably complete one. [Kok-seeyus.]

Cocceji, HEINRICH FREIHERR VON (1644-1719), born at Bremen, studied in Leyden from 1667 to 1670, and then went to England. In 1672 he became professor of Law at Heidelberg, in 1689 at Utrecht, and in 1690 at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. In 1713 the emperor made him a baron. His work on civil law (Juris Publici Prudentia, 1695) was long a text-book.—His youngest son, SAMUEL (1679-1755), born at Heidelberg, also in 1703 became professor at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and was ultimately Frederick the Great's chancellor. He reformed the Prussian administration of justice, and wrote on law. See a monograph by Trendelenburg (Berl. 1863). [Kok-tsay'ye.]

Coccius, ERNST (1825-90), a Leipzig oculist.

Cochba. See BAR-COCHBA.

Cochlaeus, or DOBENECK, JOHANN (1479-1522), Luther's opponent, was born near Nuremberg, and died a canon of Breslau. See German monographs by Otto (1874) and Getz (1886).

Cochrane, LORD. See DUNDONALD.

Cochrane, ROBERT, a Scottish architect or mason, by James III. created Earl of Mar. Angus and other lords hanged him, with three more royal minions, over Lauder Bridge in 1482.

Cockburn, SIR ALEXANDER, G.C.B., judge, was born 24th December 1802, in 1822 entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1829 was called to the bar, and soon became distinguished as a pleader before parliamentary committees. In 1847 he became Liberal M.P. for Southampton, in 1850 a knight and Solicitor-general, in 1851 Attorney-general, in 1856 Chief-justice of the Common Pleas, in 1858 a baronet (in succession to an uncle), and in 1859 Lord Chief-justice. He prosecuted in the Palmer case, and presided over the Wainwright and Tichborne cases. He represented Britain in the Alabama arbitration at Geneva. He died 20th November 1880. [Ko'burn.]

Cockburn, ALISON, poetess, was born 8th October 1718, the daughter of Robert Rutherford of Fairniele, Selkirkshire. In 1731 she married Patrick Cockburn, advocate, and in 1753 was left a widow, with an only son who predeceased her in 1780. She died 23d January 1795, having for sixty years and more been a queen of Edinburgh society. Of her lyrics the best known is the exquisite version of The Flowers of the Forest ('I've seen the smiling of Fortune beguiling'), commemorating a wave of calamity that swept over Ettrick Forest, and first printed in 1765. In 1777 she discerned in Walter Scott 'the most extraordinary genius of a boy'; in 1786 she made Burns's acquaintance. See her Letters (edited by Craig-Brown, 1900).

Cockburn, HENRY, Scottish judge, was born 26th October 1779, perhaps at Cockpen, but more probably in the Parliament Close of old Edinburgh. He entered the High School in 1787, and the university in 1793. Dugald Stewart's lectures 'were like the opening of the heavens;' and through a debating club he became the companion of Jeffrey, Horner, and Brougham, from whom he imbibed Whig opinions. He was called to the Scottish bar in 1800; and in 1807 his uncle, the all-powerful Lord Melville, gave him an advocate-deputeship—a non-political post, from which, on political grounds, he 'had the honour of being dismissed' in 1810. He rose, however, to share with Jeffrey the leadership of the bar, and with Jeffrey was counsel for three prisoners accused of sedition (1817-19). A zealous supporter by pen as well as by tongue of parliamentary reform, he became Solicitor-general for Scotland under the Grey ministry in 1830; had the chief hand in drafting the Scottish Reform Bill; was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University (1831); in 1834 was made, as Lord Cockburn, a judge of the Court of Session; and three years later a lord of justiciary. He died, 26th April 1854, at Bonally Tower, his beautiful home by the base of the Pentlands since his marriage in 1811. He contributed to the Edinburgh Review, and was author of an admirable Life of Jeffrey (1852) and of four posthumous works: Memorials of his Time (1856; new ed. 1909), Journal, 1831-44 (2 vols. 1874), Circuit Journeys (1888), and Trials for Sedition in Scotland (1888).

Cockburn, PIERS, a freebooter of Henderland, near St Mary's Loch, whose execution at Edinburgh in 1529 suggested the exquisite Border Widow's Lament.

Cocker, EDWARD (1631-75), a London school-master, whose Arithmetick (1678), the first English work really adapted to commerce, has passed through over a hundred editions.

Cockerell, CHARLES ROBERT (1788-1863), a London architect, who travelled in the Levant and Italy 1810-17, was professor of architecture in the Royal Academy 1840-57, and built the Taylor Buildings at Oxford.—His father, SAMUEL PEPYS COCKERELL (1754-1827), was also an architect; and so was his second son, FREDERICK PEPYS COCKERELL (1833-78).

Cockerill, JOHN (1790-1840), was born at Haslingden, Lancashire, the son of William Cockerill (1759-1832), an inventor who in 1807 established a machine factory at Liège. John and an elder brother, having in 1812 taken over their father's business, in 1815 started a woollen factory at Berlin, and in 1817 the famous works at Seraing.

Cockton, HENRY, comic novelist, was born in London in 1807, and died 26th June 1853 at Bury St Edmunds, where in 1841 he had married and taken to mating. Unless for their illustrations, all of his ten works are almost forgotten but one—Valentine Vox, the Ventriloquist (1840).

Codrington, SIR EDWARD, admiral, was born of a good old Gloucestershire family, 27th April 1770, and entered the navy in 1783. In 1794 he was lieutenant of Lord Howe's flagship in the action off Ushant on the glorious 1st of June. At Trafalgar, in 1805, he was captain of the Orion, and leader of a squadron. He afterwards served in the North Sea, in Spanish waters, and in North America, and rose to the rank of vice-admiral in 1821. In 1826 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, and took the leading part in the battle of Navarino, which destroyed the Turkish navy, 20th October 1827. He received the Grand Cross of the Bath, with Russian and French orders; but the battle being considered an 'untoward event,' was recalled. He became admiral of the red in 1837, and in 1839 commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. He was M.P. for Devonport 1832-39. He died April 28, 1851. See Memoir by his daughter, Lady Bourchier (2 vols. 1873).—One son, GENERAL SIR WILLIAM JOHN, G.C.B. (1804-84), was commander-in-chief in the Crimea from 11th November 1855.—Another, ADMIRAL SIR HENRY JOHN, K.C.B. (1808-77), took part in the destruction of St Jean d'Acre, and served in the Baltic in 1854-55.

Cody, WILLIAM FREDERICK ('Buffalo Bill'), was born in Scott County, Iowa, 26th February 1845, and in 1863 started his 'Wild West Show,' which he first brought to Europe in 1887.

Coehoorn, MENNO, BARON VAN (1641-1704), the 'Dutch Vauban,' was born near Leeuwarden, and died at the Hague. [Koo-hoarn.]

Coello, ALONSO SANCHEZ (c. 1515-90), Spanish portrait-painter.—CLAUDIO COELLO (1621-93), Spanish religious painter.

Coffin, CHARLES HAYDEN, singer and actor, was born at Manchester of American parentage in 1862.

Coggeshall, RALPH DE, abbot from 1207 to 1218 of the Cistercian abbey of Coggeshall, was a native of Cambridgeshire, and wrote a Latin Chronicle, edited by J. Stevenson in 1875.

Cogniet, LEON (1794-1880), historical and portrait painter, was born and died in Paris.

Cogswell, JOSEPH GREEN, LL.D. (1786-1871), bibliographer, born at Ipswich, Mass., studied at Harvard and Göttingen, and was professor of Geography at Harvard from 1820 to 1823, when he established the Round Hill School with Bancroft (q.v.). He next edited the New York Review (1836-42), and, with Halleck and Washington Irving, assisted in planning the Astor Library, of which from 1848 he was superintendent.

Cogulniceanu, MICHAEL (1817-91), Roumanian historian and statesman.

Coke, SIR EDWARD, jurist, was born of a good old Norfolk family, at Mileham, 1st February 1552. From Norwich school he passed in 1567 to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1571 to Clifford's Inn, in 1572 to the Inner Temple; and he was called to the bar in 1578. His rise was rapid—from recorder of Coventry (1585) to member for Aldeburgh (1589), Solicitor-general (1592), Speaker of the House of Commons (1593), Attorney-general (1594), Chief-justice of the Common Pleas (1606), Chief-justice of the King's Bench and privy councillor (1613). Meanwhile he had married twice, first, in 1582, Bridget Paston, who brought him £30,000, and died 27th June 1598; next, nineteen weeks later, Lady Elizabeth Hatton, the granddaughter of his patron, Lord Burghley. The rancour shown by him in the prosecutions of Essex, Raleigh, and the Gunpowder conspirators (1600-3-5) has gained him little credit with posterity; but from 1606 he stands forth as a vindicator of the national liberties, opposing, unlike Bacon, every illegal encroachment on the part of both church and crown. Alone of twelve judges, he resisted the royal prerogative; and in the Overbury case he showed an indiscreet zeal to come at the real truth. His removal from the bench on most trivial grounds (November 1617) was aggravated by a quarrel with his wife; and though ten months afterwards he was recalled to the council, his conduct in parliament from 1620 as a leader of the popular party, an opponent of Spain and of monopolies, estranged him for ever from the court. In 1621-22 he suffered nine months' duration in the Tower; still, old though he was, he carried his opposition into the next reign, the Petition of Right (1628) being largely his doing. He died at Stoke Poges, 3d September 1634, and was buried at Tittleshall in Norfolk. Coke's four Institutes (1628-44) deal with tenures, statutes, criminal law, and the jurisdiction of the several law-courts. The first of these, and the most famous, which in 1832 reached a 19th edition, is the so-called Coke upon Littleton—a commentary that, in spite of its puerile etymologies, has still a real, if mainly historical, value. Eleven of the thirteen parts of his epoch-making Law Reports were published during his lifetime (1600-15); and the whole, translated out of the original French and Latin, fills 6 vols. in Thomas and Fraser's edition (1826). See Lives by Woolrych (1826) and W. Johnson (2 vols. 1837). [Pronounced Cooke in his lifetime.]

Coke, THOMAS (1747-1814), Methodist bishop, born at Brecon, graduated in 1768 at Oxford, and became a curate in Somerset, but in 1777 joined the Methodists, and was attached to the London circuit. He nine times visited America, and died in the Indian Ocean on a missionary voyage to Ceylon. He published, besides religious works, extracts from his American Journals (1790), a History of the West Indies (3 vols. 1808-11), and, with Henry Moore, a Life of Wesley (1792).

Coke, T. W. See LEICESTER OF HOLKHAM.

Colard, MANSION, the first printer of Bruges, of French extraction, died in 1484.

Colbert, JEAN BAPTISTE, French statesman, was born at Rheims, 29th August 1619, obtained a post in the War Office, and in 1651 entered the service of Mazarin. When in 1661 he became the chief minister of Louis XIV., he found the finances in a ruinous condition, and immediately began his reforms. Dishonest administrators were imprisoned; farmers of the state-revenues were forced to yield up the resources of the crown; the debts of the state were reduced by arbitrary composition; and in all the departments of finance order and economy were introduced, so that in ten years the revenue was more than doubled. Agriculture was improved and commerce extended, roads and canals were made. He reorganised the colonies in Canada, Martinique, and St Domingo, and founded others at Cayenne and Madagascar. He found France with a few old rotten ships, and in a few years had provided her with one of the strongest fleets in the world, with well-equipped arsenals, and a splendid body of seamen. He improved the civil code, and introduced a marine code. The Academies of Inscriptions, Science, and Architecture were founded by him. In short, Colbert was the patron of industry, commerce, art, science, and literature—the founder of a new epoch in France. His aim was to raise the strength of France by developing every side of the national life. In this—often by arbitrary measures—he entirely succeeded during the early part of Louis's reign, but the wars and the extravagance of the court undid all that had been accomplished. Colbert died 6th September 1683, bitterly disappointed, and hated by the people as the cause of their oppressive taxes. See his Lettres, Instructions et Mémoires (8 vols. 1862-82); Lives by Clément (3d ed. 1892), Neymarck (1877), Gourdault (6th ed. Tours, 1885), and Dussieux (1886); and Cosnac's Mazarin et Colbert (1892). [Kol-bay'r.]

Colburn, HENRY, a London publisher, who in 1814 started the New Monthly Magazine, and died 16th August 1855.

Colburn, ZERAH (1804-40), born in Vermont, U.S., displayed such powers of calculation that in 1810 his father left Vermont to exhibit him. He answered in twenty seconds such questions as 'How many hours in 1811 years?' and a few years later solved much more complicated problems with equal rapidity. He was shown in Great Britain and Paris; from 1816 to 1819 he studied at Westminster School at the expense of the Earl of Bristol. His father died in 1824, and he returned to America; here he was a Methodist preacher for nine years, and from 1835 professor of Languages at Norwich, Vt. His remarkable faculty disappeared as he grew to manhood.

Colby, THOMAS FREDERICK (1784-1852), entered the Engineers in 1801, rose to the rank of major-general, and from 1802 to 1846 was engaged in the ordnance survey, its director from 1820. See Memoir by Portlock (1869).

Colchester, CHARLES ABBOT, LORD, Speaker of the House of Commons, was born at Abingdon, 14th October 1757. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1779 entered the Middle Temple. In 1792 his practice was bringing him £1500 per annum; in 1794 he received the post, worth £2700, of clerk of the rules in the Court of King's Bench. Returned to parliament as a strong Tory in 1795, he improved in his first session the legislation regarding temporary and expiring laws; and it is due to his exertions that municipal bodies receive a copy of all new acts as soon as they are printed. To him too we mainly owe the Private Bill Office and the royal record commission, whose proceedings he for many years superintended. But his greatest service was in the Act (1800) for taking the first census. Speaker from 1802 until 1817, he then received a pension of £4000 a year, and was created Baron Colchester, his father having been rector of All Saints, Colchester. He died 7th May 1829. See his Diary and Correspondence (3 vols. 1861), edited by his son Charles, second Lord Colchester (1798-1867), who was postmaster-general in 1858.

Cole, GEORGE. See COLE, VICAT.

Cole, SIR HENRY, was born at Bath, 15th July 1808, educated at Christ's Hospital, and became assistant-keeper of the Records in 1838. He wrote much for the newspapers, and, as 'Felix Summerly,' produced about twenty children's books. He was chairman of the Society of Arts, did valuable service on the committee of the Great Exhibition of 1851, founded the South Kensington Museum, and in 1860 became its director. Made a K.C.B. in 1875, he died 18th April 1882. See his Autobiography (2 vols. 1884).

Cole, THOMAS (1801-48), born at Bolton, removed to America in 1819, where he became one of the best-known landscape-painters. In 1830 two of his pictures appeared in the Royal Academy, and he afterwards made sketching tours through England, France, and Italy; but all his best landscapes were American.

Cole, VICAT, landscape-painter (especially of Surrey scenes), was born at Portsmouth, 17th April 1833, the son of the painter, George Cole (1810-83). From 1853 a frequent contributor to Royal Academy exhibitions, he was elected an A.R.A. in 1870, and an R.A. in 1880. He died 6th April 1893. See Life by Chignell (3 vols. 1899).

Cole, WILLIAM (1714-78), Cambridge antiquary, the friend of Horace Walpole, took Anglican orders, but was always inclined to Catholicism. He left his MSS. to the British Museum.

Colebrooke, HENRY THOMAS, the pioneer of Sanskrit scholarship, was born in London, 15th June 1765, the son of Sir George Colebrooke, banker, and chairman of the East India Company. He was educated at home, and in 1782 obtained a writership in the Bengal service. His duties as revenue officer at Tirhut led him to make a minute study of Bengal husbandry, and his Remarks thereon (Calcutta, 1795) formed so searching a criticism of the existing policy that the work could not be published in England. At Purneah his legal functions led him to study Indian law and learn Sanskrit; and he began in 1794 publishing essays on Indian religion, poetry, and science in the Asiatic Researches. Removed in 1795 to the magistracy of Mirzapur, he translated from the Sanskrit the Digest of Hindu Law on Contracts and Successions (4 vols. 1798). On his return from a mission to Nagpur (1799-1801) he was appointed a judge of the new court of appeal at Calcutta and honorary professor of Hindu Law and Sanskrit at the college of Fort William. Yet he contrived during this busy period to publish the first (and only) volume of his Sanskrit Grammar (1805), and to write his famous articles on the Vedas, the Jains, &c. He obtained a seat on the council (1807), retired in 1814, and died in London, 10th March 1837. See Life by his son, Sir T. E. Colebrooke (1873), and Max Müller's Biographical Essays (1884).

Colenso, JOHN WILLIAM, Bishop of Natal, was born at St. Anstall, January 24, 1814, and graduating in 1836 from St. John's College, Cambridge, as second wrangler, was elected a fellow. In 1838 he became an assistant-master at Harrow, in 1842 a tutor at Cambridge, and in 1846 rector of Farnceet St. Mary in Norfolk. He published Miscellaneous Examples in Algebra in 1848, Plane Trigonometry in 1851, and Village Sermons in 1853, in which same year he was appointed first Bishop of Natal. He soon mastered the Zulu language, prepared a grammar and dictionary, and translated the Prayer-book and part of the Bible. In a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1861) he objected to the doctrine of eternal punishment. He became convinced of the improbability of many statements of facts and numbers in the Bible; and The Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua Critically Examined (7 parts, 1862-79) brought down upon its writer an avalanche of criticism, and was condemned in both Houses of Convocation. In 1864 he was deposed from his see by his Metropolitan, Bishop Gray of Capetown; but on appeal the Privy-council declared the deposition 'null and void' (1865); and in 1866 the Court of Chancery ordered the payment of his income, with arrears. Bishop Gray next publicly excommunicated him, and consecrated a new bishop with nearly the same diocese. In 1874 Colenso visited England, conferred with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and pleaded the cause of Langalibalele, a dispossessed Zulu chief. He was author of Ten Weeks in Natal (1855); The New Bible Commentary Literally Examined (1871-74); Lectures on the Pentateuch and the Moabite Stone (1873); and a volume of Sermons (1873). His works in algebra and arithmetic are still standard school-books. He died at Durban, Natal, June 20, 1883. See Life by Sir G. W. Cox (2 vols. 1888).

Colepeper, JOHN, a native of Sussex, served abroad, and was returned for Kent in 1640 to the Long Parliament. There he pursued a course much the same as Hyde's (see CLARENDON), and in 1642 was created Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1643 Master of the Rolls, and in 1644 Lord Colepeper. He died 11th June 1660.

Coleridge, SAMUEL TAYLOR, was born October 21, 1772, at Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, where his father was vicar and master of the grammar-school. A singularly precocious child, he was sent in his ninth year to Christ's Hospital, and here plunged with eagerness into a whole library of literature, reading Homer and Virgil for the mere pleasure of it. He translated the hymns of Synesius, and studied works on medicine in Latin, on metaphysics in Greek, but during the last of his eight years at school suffered much from rheumatic fever and other ailments. During his first year at Jesus College, Cambridge (1791), he did good work in classics, and became one of four selected candidates for the Craven scholarship in 1793; but chiefly gave himself up to general literature, and turned a strong Liberal. He got into money difficulties, became depressed, and, fleeing to London, enlisted in the 15th Dragoons; but was bought out, and returned to Cambridge, to leave it, however, without a degree. At Bristol in 1794 he got engaged to Sara Fricker, a sister-in-law of Southey and of Lovell, and formed with them the Quixotic plan of emigration to the banks of the Susquehanna, where they were to found a Communist 'Pantiscracy.' After a visit to London, where he renewed his acquaintance with his schoolfellow Lamb, he began a course of miscellaneous lecturing on literary and political subjects. Joseph Cottle, the Bristol bookseller, offered him thirty guineas for a volume of poems, with a guinea for every additional hundred lines; and on the strength of this he married Sara Fricker (1795), and went to a small cottage at Clevedon. But we soon find him in Bristol getting his volume of poems ready for the press (it was published in April 1796), and starting a weekly journal, the Watchman, which only reached its tenth number—the generous Cottle bearing all the loss. Coleridge next preached in the Unitarian chapels around Bristol. Another friend—Thomas Poole of Nether Stowey—provided him with a small house and garden; and to Stowey in 1797 Coleridge removed with his wife and child. Poole also very generously raised a sum of money to provide an annuity. In 1796 Wordsworth and Coleridge exchanged visits; in July 1797 the Wordsworths moved to Alfoxden; and during that winter Coleridge was their almost daily companion. Wordsworth and he discussed the principles of poetry, and planned the Lyrical Ballads (1798), that memorable little volume to which Coleridge contributed the Ancient Mariner. While living at Stowey, Coleridge still preached occasionally; but in 1798 he accepted an annuity of £150 from the brothers Wedgwood, given to him on the condition that he would devote his life wholly to poetry and philosophy. In that year he started with the Wordsworths for Germany, and studied German at Ratzeburg and Göttingen, returning to England in June 1799. Next winter he went up to London, and there translated Wallenstein. He now made fresh attempts at journalism, and for a few months wrote both prose and verse for the Morning Post. In July 1800 he went north to Keswick, whither Southey followed him in 1803, whilst the Wordsworths were already settled at Grasmere. Rheumatism and neuralgia had ere this tortured Coleridge; he had had recourse to the anodyne of opium; and little by little the habit grew, until the 'Kendal black drop' at length enslaved him. It injured his constitution and killed his imagination; it enfeebled his will and destroyed his sense of truth and honour. In 1803 he started with the Wordsworths on their memorable Scottish tour, but left them in a fortnight. In April 1804 he sailed for Malta to be secretary to the governor, an office for which he was utterly unsuited. From Malta he went to Sicily, to Naples, and to Rome; and in 1806 he returned to England. He began in 1808 what might have been a very remarkable series of lectures at the Royal Institution; but the experiment failed. He projected a new weekly paper, The Friend, printed at Penrith at his own expense, which survived from August 1809 to March 1810. The habit of opium-eating could not now be hidden from his friends; the Wordsworths tried their utmost to befriend him, but were misunderstood, and an estrangement lasted for years.

During Coleridge's later years in London he tried the experiment of lecturing on Shakespeare. Occasionally his appearances were brilliant; more usually they were absolute failures; but his conversational powers increased. All his life he had been in the habit of receiving gifts freely from such friends as the Beaumonts and Wedgwoods, Wordsworth and De Quincey; and though he occasionally did generous things to others, his neglect of his own family put a severe strain upon the tie that bound these friends to him. From 1816 he lived at Highgate with Mr and Mrs Gillman. Though a wreck of his former self, as he grew older the baneful opium-habit lessened; he was able to do a good deal of miscellaneous writing, and he became a sort of oracle to a circle of worshippers. In 1828 he took a short tour with the Wordsworths to the Rhine. He died 23d July 1834, and was buried at Highgate. As a poet, critic, and philosopher Coleridge was a star of the first magnitude in the firmament of letters. He was marked as a poet by originality, insight, grace, musicalness, deft subtlety of thought, naturalness, and charm of diction; and he may be said to have inaugurated a new era by his poetic idealism. He was one of the most suggestive of critics. Though not profoundly learned, he was very widely read; and he did more than any one to leaven English philosophy, literature, and theology with the spirit of Germany. Coleridge's works include: Poems (1796); Wallenstein (1800); The Friend (1809-10); Remorse (1813); Christabel, Kubla Khan, &c. (1816); The Statesman's Manual (1816); Sibylline Leaves (1817); Biographia Literaria (1817); Aids to Reflection (1825); Literary Remains (4 vols. 1836-38); Confessions of an Enquiring Spirit (1840); Essay on Method (1845); and Anima Poete (1895). See, besides reminiscences by Allsop, Cottle, De Quincey, Lamb, &c., and the references in the memoirs of Wordsworth and Southey, works on Coleridge by Brandl (1882), Traill (1884), Dykes Campbell (in his admirable edition of the works, 1893; separately published 1894); and his grandson Ernest Hartley Coleridge (Coleridge's Letters, 1895).

Coleridge's eldest son, HARTLEY, born at Clevedon, Somerset, 19th September 1796, was brought up by Southey at Greta Hall, and was educated at Ambleside school and Merton College, Oxford. His scholarship was great but unequal; his failures to win the Newdigate filled him with 'a passionate despondency;' and when at length he had gained with credit an Oriel fellowship he forfeited it by intemperance. He spent two years in London, tried taking pupils at Ambleside, occasionally writing for Blackwood's Magazine, lived some time at Grasmere, and then went to live at Leeds with one Bingley, a publisher, for whom he wrote biographies, published under the titles of Biographia Borealis (1833) and Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire (1836). Bingley also printed a small volume of his poems in 1833. Hartley subsequently lived at Grasmere, with two short intervals of teaching at Sedburgh grammar-school. Provided for by an annuity, he continued to write poetry, and edited Ford and Massinger. His days were spent in fitful study, lonely reverie, and wanderings over the Lake Country, with occasional lapses into intemperance. He died 6th January 1849. His poetry is graceful, tender, and sincere, and he is greatest in the sonnet. His Poems were collected by his brother Derwent, with a Memoir (2 vols. 1851); also his Essays and Marginalia (2 vols. 1851).

SARA, the gifted daughter of the great Coleridge, was born 23d December 1802, at Greta Hall, Keswick, and brought up by Southey. In 1822 she translated Dobrizhofer's Latin Account of the Abipones, and in 1825 the 'Loyal Servitor's' memoirs of the Chevalier Bayard. In 1829 she married her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, and helped to edit her father's writings. She died 3d May 1852. Her own works were Pretty Lessons for Good Children (1834) and Phantasmion (1837), a fairy-tale. Her Memoirs and Letters were edited by her daughter in 1873.—Her son, HERBERT COLERIDGE (1830–61), educated at Eton and Balliol, was called to the bar, but devoting himself to comparative philology, worked for the Philological Society's dictionary, and wrote a Thirteenth Century Glossarial Index (1859) and an essay on King Arthur.

JOHN DUKE COLERIDGE, LORD COLERIDGE (1821–94), was the eldest son of the judge Sir John Taylor Coleridge (1790–1876), the poet's nephew and Keble's biographer. Educated at Eton and Oxford, he became successively Solicitor-general (1868), Attorney-general (1871), Chief-justice of the Common Pleas (1873), and Lord Chief-justice of England (1880).

Coleridge-Taylor, SAMUEL, born in London, 15th April 1875, the son of a West African and an Englishwoman, composed Hiawatha (1898–1900) and other cantatas and orchestral works.

Coles, COWPER PHIPPS (1819–70), born at Ditcham Park, Hampshire, became captain in the navy in 1856. He designed a kind of turret-ship which sank with him off Cape Finisterre.

Colet, JOHN, born in London about 1467, was the son of Sir Henry Colet, twice Lord Mayor. Colet studied at Oxford, and about 1493 travelled to Italy. Here he became acquainted with the views of Savonarola, which subsequent study and experience led him to regard with increasing approval. Having returned to England in 1496, and been ordained priest, he lectured at Oxford on the Epistles of St Paul, and attracted great attention, his principles of interpretation being at every point opposed to those of the scholastic theologians. In 1498 Erasmus came to Oxford, and it is one of Colet's chief claims to remembrance that he powerfully influenced that scholar's opinions on the proper methods of Scripture interpretation and on the value of the scholastic philosophy. In 1505 Colet was made Dean of St Paul's, and continued to deliver lectures on different books of Scripture, which gave rise to much diversity of opinion; charges of heresy were brought against him, but Archbishop Warham refused to support them. With the large fortune Colet inherited from his father he founded St Paul's School in 1509–12. He died of dropsy, 16th September 1519. See Seebohm's Oxford Reformers (2d ed. 1869), and Life by the Rev. J. H. Lupton (1887; new ed. 1909).

Colfax, SCHUYLER (1823–85), American statesman was born at New York, and died at Mankato, Minnesota. Originally a newspaper editor, in 1868 he was elected vice-president of the United States, in Grant's first term. Implicated, apparently unjustly, in the Crédit Mobilier charges of 1873, he spent the rest of his life in political retirement. See Life by Hollister (1886).

Coligny, GASPARD DE, born at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 16th February 1519, early distinguished himself in the wars of Francis I. and Henry II. In 1552 he was made admiral of France, though he never commanded at sea; in 1557 he saved his country by holding St Quentin with a handful of men for seventeen days against the army of Spain. It was during his imprisonment, after the capture of this town, that he embraced Protestantism, to the furtherance of which the rest of his life was consecrated. After the defeat of Dreux (1562), where Condé was taken prisoner, Coligny drew off the Huguenot remnant into Normandy; in the second Huguenot war, on Condé's death (1569), he was appointed generalissimo and brought about the favourable peace of St Germain (1570). Catherine de Medici, however, alarmed at the growing power of the Huguenots and at Coligny's ascendancy over young Charles IX., determined by one desperate stroke to regain her power; and Coligny was one of the first victims in the massacre of St Bartholomew, 24th August 1572. He was the noblest Frenchman of his time. His religious zeal was purely disinterested, and he had France's welfare deeply at heart. His great aim was to make the Huguenots a national party, and to defeat the schemes of Spain, who he saw was bent on supremacy. See Lives by Blackburn (Phila. 1869), Bersier (trans. 1884), Delaborde (Par. 1880), and Whitehead (1904). [Kol-ee-n-ye-e.]

Colins, ALEXANDER (c. 1526–1612), sculptor, was born at Mechlin, and died at Innsbruck.

Collard, FREDERICK WILLIAM (1772–1860), a London piano-manufacturer, born at Wivelscombe, Somerset, like his brother and partner, WILLIAM FREDERICK (1776–1866).

Colle, RAFFAELLO DEL (c. 1490–1566), an Italian religious painter.

Colleoni, BARTOLOMEO (1400–75), a famous condottiere, born near Bergamo. See Life by Oscar Browning (1891).

Colley, SIR GEORGE, born in 1835, went as an ensign in the 2d or Queen's Foot to Cape Colony in 1854. He was a border magistrate in 1857–58, surveyed the Trans-kei, and served with his regiment in China in 1860. He was then major of brigade at Plymouth, and a professor at the Staff College. He ably managed the transport service in the Ashanti expedition, and in 1875 accompanied Sir Garnet Wolseley to Natal, where he was colonial treasurer, and prepared a valuable report and map of the Transvaal and Swaziland. From 1876 to 1880, except for brief service in Zululand and the Transvaal, he was private secretary to Lord Lytton, then viceroy in India. Appointed governor and commander-in-chief of Natal in April 1880, he commanded against the Boers at Laing's Nek and Ingogo, and fell, shot through the forehead, at Majuba Hill, February 27, 1881. See Life by Sir W. Butler (1899).

Collier, ARTHUR (1680–1732), was born at Steeple Langford rectory, Wiltshire, studied at Oxford, and himself became rector of Langford in 1704. At Balliol he had devoted himself to the study of Descartes and Malebranche; and his Clavis Universalis (1713, but written 1703) coincides remarkably with Berkeley's Theory of Vision (1709). See Life by R. Benson (1837).

Collier, JEREMY, nonjuror, was born at Stow cum Quy, Cambridgeshire, 23d September 1650. His father was a clerical schoolmaster at Ipswich, and here and at Caius College, Cambridge, he was educated, afterwards becoming rector of Ampton near Bury St Edmunds, and lecturer at Gray's Inn. His reply to Burnet's Inquiry into the State of Affairs (1688) cost him some months in Newgate. He next waged warfare on the crown with incisive pamphlets, and was arrested in 1692 on suspicion of being involved in a Jacobite plot. In 1696 he gave absolution to the would-be assassins Friend and Parkyns on the scaffold, for which offence he was outlawed. In 1697 he published his Short View of the Immorality of the English Stage, which fell like a thunderbolt among the wits. Congreve and Vaubright answered angrily, and were crushed anew by Collier. Dryden in the preface to his Fables (1700) acknowledged that he had been justly reproved. Collier continued to preach to a congregation of nonjurors, and was consecrated bishop in 1713. He upheld the 'usages,' and laid himself open to a charge of holding Romish views. He died April 26, 1726. Of his forty-two books and pamphlets, those on the stage alone are still remembered. His largest works were the Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary (4 vols. folio, 1701-21), and An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain (2 vols. folio, 1708-14; new ed. by Lathbury, 1852).

Collier, JOHN (1708-86), the Lancashire poet, 'Tim Bobbin,' was born at Urmston, near Manchester, the son of the curate of Stretford, and from 1729 to his death in 1786 was usher or master of a school at Milnrow, near Rochdale. He early wrote verse and painted grotesque pictures; his rhyming satire, The Blackbird, appeared in 1739, and his View of the Lancashire Dialect (in humorous dialogue), his most notable production, in 1775. See Life by Col. Fishwick, prefixed to his Works (Rochdale, 1895).

Collier, JOHN PAYNE, born in London, 11th January 1789, became in 1809 a parliamentary reporter for the Times, next for the Morning Chronicle, and, called to the bar in 1829, wrote regularly for the latter down to 1847. His real literary career commenced in 1820 with The Poetical Decameron. From 1825 to 1827 he issued a new edition of Dodsley's Old Plays, and in 1831 his History of English Dramatic Poetry, and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration. Appointed librarian by the Duke of Devonshire, he from 1835 to 1839 published New Facts regarding Shakespeare, followed by an edition of the plays (8 vols. 1842-44), and Shakespeare's Library (1844), a reprint of the histories, novels, and early dramas on which Shakespeare drew. In 1852 he announced his discovery of an extensive series of marginal annotations in a 17th-century hand on a copy of the second Shakespeare folio (1631-32) he had bought—the 'Perkins folio.' These he published as Notes and Emendations to Shakespeare, and calmly lifted them into his 1853 edition of Shakespeare. The emendations were furiously applauded or furiously assailed; the best Shakespearean students were more or less sceptical. Collier's alleged discovery of his suspiciously long-lost notes of Coleridge's lectures on Shakespeare and Milton, delivered in 1811, was also called in question. When at last in 1859 the folio was sent to the British Museum for examination, it was conclusively proved that the boasted emendations were recent fabrications. Collier died at Maidenhead, 17th September 1883, and after his death some manipulated books were discovered in his own library. See Dr Ingelby's Complete View of the Shakspeare Controversy (1861); Collier's own An Old Man's Diary (1871-72); and Life and Bibliography by Wheatley (1885).

Collings, JESSE, born at Littleham-cum-Exmouth in Devonshire in 1831, became head of a Birmingham business, and took an increasingly active part in municipal and public life. He entered parliament as Radical member for Ipswich in 1880, and has been specially identified with the Agricultural Labourers' Union and the passing of measures for promoting allotments and small holdings ('three acres and a cow'). A Unionist, he was made a privy councillor in 1892, and under-secretary for the Home Office in 1895.

Collingwood, CUTHBERT, LORD, admiral, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 26th September 1750. He entered the navy at eleven, and from 1778 his career was closely connected with that of Nelson, whom he followed up the ladder of promotion step by step. Among the great naval victories in which he bore a prominent part, were those of Lord Howe off Brest in 1794; of Lord Jervis off Cape St Vincent in 1797; and of Trafalgar in 1805, where he held the second command. A peerage was his reward. After several years' uneventful service in the Mediterranean, he died at sea, March 7, 1810, and was buried beside Nelson, in St Paul's. See his Correspondence and Life (1828), and shorter Lives by W. Davies (2d ed. 1878) and Clark Russell (1891).

Collins, ANTHONY, deist, was born 21st June 1676, at Heston, near Hounslow. He passed from Eton to King's College, Cambridge, and became the disciple and friend of John Locke. In 1707 he published his Essay concerning the Use of Reason; in 1709 Priestcraft in Perfection. In 1711 he visited Holland, where he made the friendship of Le Clerc; in 1713 appeared his Discourse on Free-thinking, best known of all his works, to which Bentley replied in his famous Remarks. In 1713 Collins made a second visit to Holland; in 1718 he became treasurer for Essex, and in 1724 issued his Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. He died 18th December 1729.

Collins, CHARLES A. See COLLINS, WILLIAM.

Collins, JOHN CHURTON (1848-1908), who graduated from Balliol College, Oxford, in 1872, was a learned critic and editor of English classics, and in 1904 became professor of English Literature at Birmingham. See Life by his son (1911).

Collins, MORTIMER, born the son of a Plymouth solicitor, June 29, 1827, and educated at private schools, resigned in 1856 a mathematical mastership in Guernsey to devote himself to literature. He settled at Knowl Hill in Berkshire, and kept up an incessant activity in the varied forms of articles on current politics, novels, and playful verses until his death, 28th July 1876. Of his numerous novels the chief are Sweet Anne Page (1868); Marquis and Merchant (1871); Two Plunges for a Pearl (1872); Mr Carington, by 'Robert Turner Cotton' (1873); Transmigration (1874); From Midnight to Midnight (1875); and A Fight with Fortune (1876). See Life (1877) by his second wife, who died March 17, 1885, and who collaborated with him in several works.

Collins, WILLIAM, poet, was born at Chichester, 25th December 1721, the son of a hatter, who was twice mayor. From the prebendal school of his native city he passed in 1733 to Winchester, and thence in 1741 to Oxford, as a deny of Magdalene. He took his B.A. in 1743; and having been pronounced 'too indolent even for the army,' and dissuaded from entering the church, as the sole alternative he came to London and sought to make a living by literature. He now fell into 'irregular habits,' and was at times reduced to the greatest straits; Dr Johnson once rescued him from the bailiffs by obtaining an advance from a bookseller on the promise of Collins to translate the Poetics of Aristotle. It was during this period, however, that he wrote his Odes, upon which his fame as a poet now rests. They attracted no notice at the time of their publication (1747), and they were little valued even by Gray and Dr Johnson. By the death of an uncle in 1749, Collins inherited £2000, which enabled him to retire to Chichester, and apparently to pursue a regular course of study. It was about this time that he met Home, the author of Douglas, and gave him his Ode on the Superstitions of the Highlands, a poem in which, says Lowell, 'the whole Romantic School is foreshadowed.' It was first published in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh (1788). Before 1753 Collins felt the approaches of the mental disease to which he finally succumbed, and sought relief in a visit to France. On his return he gradually became worse, and his reason completely gave way, though he sometimes had lucid intervals. He died on 12th June 1759, so unknown to fame that no newspaper of the day has any notice of his death. See memoir by W. Moy Thomas, prefixed to Works (Aldine ed. 1892).

Collins, WILLIAM, R.A., landscape and figure painter, was born in London, September 18, 1788, of a Wicklow family. In 1807 he entered the Royal Academy as a student; in 1812 his 'Sale of the Pet Lamb' was sold for 140 guineas; and from this time his pictures became popular. He exhibited 169 works, of which the best known are the 'Blackberry Gatherers' and 'The Bird-catchers' (1814), 'Scene on the Coast of Norfolk' (1815), 'The Fisherman's Departure' (1826), 'As Happy as a King' (1830), and 'Early Morning' (1846). Collins was elected an R.A. in 1820; studied and sketched in Italy in 1836-38; and died in London, February 17, 1847. See Life (1848) by his elder son, William Wilkie Collins.—His second son, CHARLES ALLSTON COLLINS (1828-73), in early life painted Pre-Raphaelite pictures which are valued by collectors. In 1860 he married the younger daughter of Charles Dickens, and having already turned his attention to literature, produced The Eye-witness essays (1860), two novels, &c.

Collins, WILLIAM WILKIE, novelist, elder son of William Collins, R.A., was born in London, 8th January 1824. He was educated partly at Highbury, but during 1836-39 was with his parents in Italy. After his return he spent four years in business, and then entered Lincoln's Inn; but gradually took to literature, the Life of his father (1848) being his earliest production. To it succeeded Antonina, or the Fall of Rome (1850), Basil (1852), Hide and Seek (1854), The Dead Secret (1857), The Woman in White (1860), No Name (1862), Armadale (1866), The Moonstone (1868), The New Magdalen (1873), &c.—in all, fully a score of novels and collections of novelettes. He died 23d September 1889. See Swinburne's Studies in Prose and Poetry (1894).

Collinson, PETER (1694-1768), botanist and naturalist, was born at Hugal Hall, near Windermere, and became a manufacturer of hosiery.

Collinson, SIR RICHARD (1811-83), admiral and arctic navigator 1850-54, was born at Gateshead. See Journal of H.M.S. Enterprise, with a memoir by his brother (1889).

Collot d'Herbois, JEAN MARIE (1751-96), born in Paris, had been a provincial actor, but was attracted by the Revolution back to Paris, where his impudence, his loud voice, and his Almanach du Père Gérard, secured his election to the National Convention. In 1793 he became president of the Convention and a member of the murderous Committee of Public Safety. Sent by Robespierre to Lyons, he took bloody revenge by guillotine and grapeshot on the inhabitants for having once hissed him off the stage. He joined in the successful plot against Robespierre (1794), but himself was expelled from the Convention, and banished to Cayenne (1795), where he died. [Ko'lo-der-bwah!]

Colman, GEORGE, 'the Elder,' playwright and manager, was born in 1732 at Florence, the son of the English envoy. He was educated at Westminster and Oxford, and called to the bar in 1755. In 1760 his first piece, Polly Honeycombe, was produced at Drury Lane with great success; next year came The Jealous Wife, and in 1766 The Claudestine Marriage, written in conjunction with Garrick. In 1767 he purchased, with three others, Covent Garden Theatre, and held the office of manager for seven years, when he sold his share. In 1776 he purchased the Haymarket Theatre from Foote. In 1785 he had a stroke of paralysis, and he died in confinement 14th August 1794.—His son, GEORGE COLMAN, 'the Younger,' was born October 21, 1762, and educated at Westminster, Oxford, and Aberdeen. During his father's illness he acted as manager of the Haymarket, and on his death the patent was transferred to him. As Examiner of Plays from 1824 he showed himself both arrogant and finical. In industry he rivalled his father, and he made money by his John Bull, Iron Chest, and other dramatic writings; but his 'Myihsheer Van Dunck' has outlived them. He died 17th October 1836. See his Random Records of My Life (1830).

Colman, ST., an Irish monk of Iona, who in 661 became bishop of Lindisfarne, but in 664 withdrew to Iona on the defeat of the Celtic party at the Council of Whitby. He died in Mayo, 8th August 676.

Colman, SAMUEL, American painter, born in Portland, Maine, 1832, studied in Europe in 1860-62, was elected a member of the National Academy in 1862, and first president (1866-71) of the American Society of Painters in Water-colours. His pictures include scenes from Algeria, Germany, France, Italy, and Holland.

Colnaghi, PAUL (1751-1833), printseller, from Italy came to Paris, and then settled in London.

Colomb, SIR JOHN CHARLES READY, a high authority on naval matters, was born 1st May 1838, the son of Gen. G. T. Colomb, and rose to be captain in the Royal Marine Artillery 1854-60. He was Conservative M.P. for Bow and Bromley 1886-92, and for Yarmouth 1895-1906; in 1888 he was made a K.C.M.G. He died 27th May 1909.

Colonna, a Roman family, which took its name from a village among the Alban Hills. From it have sprung a pope (Martin V., q.v.), several cardinals, generals, statesmen, and noted scholars, and VITTORIA COLONNA (c. 1492-1547). The daughter of the Constable of Naples, at four years old she was betrothed to a boy of the same age; at seventeen they were married. After her husband's death in the battle of Pavia (1525), Vittoria found her chief consolation in solitude and the cultivation of the Muse. During seven years of her widowhood she resided alternately at Naples and Ischia, and then in the convents of Orvieto and Viterbo. Later she lived in Rome, where she died in February 1547. She was the loved friend of Michelangelo, admired by Ariosto, and the intimate associate of the reforming party at the papal court. Her poems appeared at Parma in 1538; the best edition is by Visconti (Rome, 1840). See her Correspondence (Turin, 1888), Mrs H. Roscoe's Vittoria Colonna, her Life and Poems (1868), studies by Von Reumont (1881), the Hon. Alethea Lawley (1888), and Maud Jerrold (1906).

Colonna, GIOVANNI PAOLO (c. 1640-95), church composer and head of the Bologna Conservatorio.

Colonsay, LORD. See M'NEILL.

Colquhoun, ARCHIBALD ROSS, born off the Cape in March 1848, travelled extensively for engineering, political, and journalistic purposes.

First Administrator of Mashonaland, he wrote many works of travel and politics. [Ko-hoon'.]

Colquhoun, JOHN, second son of Sir James Colquhoun of Luss, was born in Edinburgh, 6th March 1805, studied at Edinburgh University, served in the Dragoons 1829-34, and became a supreme authority on sport in Scotland. His Moor and Loch (1840) was much extended and improved in the 4th (1878) and 5th (1884) editions. Rocks and Rivers appeared in 1849; Salmon Casts and Stray Shots, 1858; and Sporting Days, 1866. He died at Edinburgh, 27th May 1885.—His uncle, JOHN CAMPBELL COLQUHOUN (1785-1854), wrote much on mesmerism. He was sheriff-depute of Dumbartonshire from 1815.

Colquhoun, PATRICK (1745-1820), born at Dumbar-ton, became in 1782 provost of Glasgow, and in 1792 a London police-magistrate. He was indefatigable in forwarding reforms, and wrote innumerable pamphlets, besides Police of the Metropolis (1795) and Population and Wealth of the British Empire (1814).

Colston, EDWARD (1636-1721), a Bristol merchant and philanthropist, Tory and high-churchman. He bestowed over £70,000 in establishing or endowing almshouses, schools, and other public benefactions. From 1689 he lived chiefly at Mortlake. His 'day' falls on 13th November, and is celebrated yearly at Bristol in dinners held by Conservative, Liberal, and non-political societies founded in honour of his memory.

Colt, SAMUEL (1814-62), inventor, born in Hartford, Conn., ran away to sea in 1827, and about 1832 travelled over America, lecturing on chemistry. In 1835 he took out his first patent for a revolver, which after the Mexican war was adopted for the U.S. army. He expended over $2,500,000 on an immense armoury in Hartford, where he died, and where his widow erected a handsome Episcopal church to his memory.

Colton, CHARLES CALEB (c. 1780-1832), clergyman, sportsman, gambler, suicide, and author of the aphoristic Lacon (2 vols. 1820-22).

Columba, COLUM-CILLE or COLM, ST., was born at Gartan, County Donegal, 7th December 521, the son of a chief related to several of the princes then reigning in Ireland and in the west of Scotland. He studied under St Finnian at Moville on Strangford Lough and under another St Finnian at Clonard; in 546 he founded the monastery of Derry, and in 553 that of Durrow. The belief that he had caused the bloody battle of Culdremhne in 561 led to his excommunication and exile from his native land. Accompanied by twelve disciples, he found a resting-place in the little island of Hy (Iona or I Colum-cille), and having planted a monastery there (563), he set himself to convert the Northern Picts; and he and his followers founded monasteries on the Pictish mainland, the Western Islands, and the Orkneys. The parent house of Iona exercised supremacy over all these, as well as over the Columban churches in Ireland and those afterwards established in the north of England. In his system the bishops were subordinate to the abbots, though episcopal orders were recognised and bishops only could ordain. The Columban churches kept Easter on a different day from the Roman churches, and their clergy had a peculiar tonsure. Columba's health began to fail in 593, and he died 9th June 597. An Altus published by Dr Todd in the Liber Hymnorum has been ascribed to him by unbroken tradition. On the night before his death he was engaged on a transcript of the Psalter, and the Annals of Clonmacnois state that he wrote three hundred books with his own hand. See the Life of him by Adarnan (q.v.), as edited by Reeves (1857 and 1874), and by Fowler (1895), and Skene's Celtic Scotland (vol. ii. 1877).

Columban, or COLUMBANUS, ST., sometimes called 'the younger Columba,' was born in Leinster in 543, studied under St Comgall at the monastery of Bangor in Down, about 585 went to Gaul with twelve companions, and founded the monasteries of Anegray, Luxeuil, and Fontaine in the Vosges country. His adherence to the Celtic Easter involved him in controversy; and the courage with which he rebuked the vices of the Burgundian court led to his expulsion. After a year or two at Bregenz, on Lake Constance, he passed into Lombardy, and in 612 founded the monastery of Bobbio, in the Apennines, where he died 21st Nov. 615. His writings, all in Latin, comprise a monastic rule, six poems on the vanity of life, seventeen sermons, and a commentary on the Psalms (first published at Rome in 1878). See Latin Life by the monk Jonas (Eng. trans. 1896), Montalembert's Monks of the West, Miss Stokes's Six Months in the Apennines (1892), and her Three Months in the Forests of France (1895).

Columbus, CHRISTOPHER (Latinised from the Italian Cristoforo Colombo; Spanish, Cristóbal Colon), discoverer of the New World, was born at Genoa in 1447, the son of a wool-comber, and was bred to the same trade. But at fourteen he went to sea, fought with Tunisian galleys, and about 1470, wrecked in a sea-fight off Cape St Vincent, reached the shores of Portugal on a plank. In Lisbon he married Filipa Moniz. As early as 1474 he had conceived the design of reaching India by sailing westward—a design in which he was encouraged by the Florentine astronomer Toscanelli; in 1477 he 'sailed 100 leagues beyond Thule,' probably to or beyond Iceland; and, having also visited the Cape Verd Islands and Sierra Leone, he began to seek a patron for his intended expedition. He applied to John II. of Portugal; later by letters to Henry VII. of England; then to the powerful Duke of Medina Celi, who referred him to Isabella the Catholic, queen of Castile. After an adverse judgment from a board of advisers mainly ecclesiastics, his plans were rejected, but afterwards reconsidered; and finally, after seven years of alternate encouragement and repulse, they were accepted by Ferdinand and Isabella in April 1492. On Friday, 3d August, Columbus set sail from the bar of Saltes, an island near Palos, in command of the small Santa Maria, with 50 men, and attended by two little caravels, the Pinta and the Niña, the whole squadron comprising only 120 adventurers. He first made the Canary Islands; and though he found it hard to keep up the courage and patience of his crews, new land was descried on Friday, 12th October—now believed to have been Watling's Island in the Bahamas. He then visited Cuba and Hispaniola (Hayti), planted a small colony, and set sail with his two caravels (for the flagship had been wrecked). After an exceedingly tempestuous voyage, he re-entered the port of Palos, March 15, 1493, and was received with the highest honours by the court. He sailed on his second voyage on 25th September, with three carracks and seventeen small caravels, and on 3d November sighted Dominica in the West Indies. After a succession of wretched quarrels with his associates, and a long and desperate illness in Hispaniola, he returned to Spain much dejected in 1496. His third voyage, begun in 1498, resulted in the discovery of the South American mainland. In 1500 Columbus and his brother were sent home in irons by a newly-appointed royal governor; but the king and queen repudiated this action, and restored Columbus to favour. His last great voyage (1502-4), along the south side of the Gulf of Mexico, was accomplished in the midst of great hardships and many distresses, Spanish jealousy of the foreigner working against him on sea no less than at court. He died at Valladolid, in Spain, May 20, 1506, and was buried in a monastery near Seville, whence in 1536 his remains and those of his son Diego were removed to Santo Domingo, in Hispaniola. In 1796 they were said to have been transferred to the cathedral at Havana; and brought to Spain in 1809, they were deposited (1902) in Seville cathedral. A man of ardent impulse and poetical imagination, Columbus was hardly the stuff that leaders are made of; consequently he failed to control the turbulent and adventurous spirits among his followers. Although an honestly and earnestly religious and truly conscientious man, he was not seldom guilty of acts which subsequently brought him many compunctions of conscience. Irritable and impetuous, he was, nevertheless, magnanimous and benevolent. His conduct in the capture and sale of slaves, though justified by the jurists and divines of the time, was indignantly condemned by the queen, and can only be explained by the desire of Columbus and the crown to obtain some revenue from his new discoveries, and by the expectation that while detained in slavery the natives might become christianised.—His brother BARTHOLOMEW, who died in Cuba in 1514, assisted him effectively in his labours.—Another brother, GIACOMO (called in Spain Diego), also assisted him in his West Indian government.—Christopher's eldest son, Diego (c. 1480-1526), was the heir to his honours, merits, and misfortunes; while a natural son, Don Fernando (1488-1539), wrote an important Life of his father (Italian translation, Venice, 1571). See the Lives by Irving (1831), St John (1850), Crompton (1859), Helps (1868), Traducci (Eng. trans. 1891), Elton (1892), C. K. Adams (1892), and Markham (1892); his letters, edited by Major (1870); the Journal of his first voyage (ed. Markham, Hakluyt Soc. 1893); Winsor's Columbus (1891); and works by HARRISSE (1895-1900), Thacher (1904), and F. Young (1906).

Columella, L. JUNIUS MODERATUS, Roman writer on agriculture, was born at Gades in Spain, and flourished about 60 B.C. He resided for some time in Syria but chiefly at Rome, and died probably at Tarentum. His De Re Rustica, in 12 books, treats of arable and pasture lands, culture of vines, olives, &c., care of domestic animals, &c., gardening (in dactylic hexameters), arboriculture, &c. The best edition is Schneider's, in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ (4 vols. Leip. 1794-97).

Colvin, JOHN RUSSELL, born at Calcutta in May 1807, was educated at St Andrews and the East India College at Haileybury, and in 1826 went out to Bengal. Private secretary to Lord Auckland from 1836 to 1842, in 1854 he became lieutenant-governor of the North-Western Provinces. He died in the fort of Agra, then besieged by the mutineers, 9th Sept. 1857. See the Life in the 'Rulers of India' series by his son, Sir Auckland Colvin (1895).—That son, born in 1838, was educated at Eton and Haileybury, entered the India Civil Service in 1858, in 1880 was appointed English Controller-general in Egypt, in 1881 was made a K.C.M.G., in 1887-92 was lieutenant-governor of the N.W. Provinces, and died 26th March 1908.

Colvin, SIR SIDNEY, born at Norwood, Surrey, 18th June 1845, studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he gained the chancellor's medal for English verse (1865), and, graduating in 1867 as third classic, became a fellow in 1869. He was elected Slade professor of Fine Art at Cambridge in 1873, and director of the Fitzwilliam Museum in 1876, a post which he resigned on becoming keeper of the Department of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum (1884). His writings, for periodicals or in book-form, are marked by accurate scholarship and poetic feeling, and deal with Albert Dürer, Flaxman, Landor, Keats, R. L. Stevenson, &c.

Combe, ABRAM (1785-1827), an Edinburgh socialist, a disciple of Robert Owen.

Combe, GEORGE, phrenologist and moral philosopher, was born, a brewer's son, in Edinburgh, October 21, 1788. He became a Writer to the Signet in 1812, and practised till 1837, when he devoted himself to popularising his views on phrenology and education. Through Spurzheim he became a convert to phrenology, and wrote Essays on Phrenology (1819) and Elements of Phrenology (1824, 9th ed. 1862). But his most important production is The Constitution of Man (1828; 10th ed. 1893), which was violently opposed as inimical to revealed religion. He numbered amongst his friends Cobden, Robert Chambers, and 'George Eliot.' He travelled and lectured in the United Kingdom, Germany, and America, and published Notes on the United States (1841). Combe married, in 1833, Cecilia (1794-1868), daughter of Mrs Siddons; he died 14th August 1858. Other works were Lectures on Popular Education (1833), Moral Philosophy (1840), Principles of Criminal Legislation (1854), The Currency Question (1855), The Relation between Science and Religion (1857). Combe's ideas on popular education were carried out for some years in a secular school which he founded in Edinburgh in 1848, where the sciences were taught, including physiology and phrenology. See Life by C. Gibbon (1878); and Combe's views and articles on Education, collected by Jolly (1879).—His brother, ANDREW, M.D., was born in Edinburgh, October 27, 1797, and in 1823 commenced to practise there. In 1836 he received the appointment of physician to the king of the Belgians, but his health failing, he returned to Scotland, where in 1838 he became a physician to Queen Victoria. He died at Gorgie, near Edinburgh, August 9, 1847. His Principles of Physiology (1834) reached a 15th edition in 1860. See Life by George Combe (1850). [Koaam.]

Combe, WILLIAM, author of Dr Syntax, was born at Bristol in 1741, and educated at Eton and Oxford, which he quitted without a degree. 'Godson' (or natural son) of a rich London alderman, who died in 1762, leaving him £2150, he led for some years the life of an adventurer, now keeping a princely style at the fashionable watering-places, anon a cook at Douai, and a common soldier. The last forty-three years of his life were passed mostly within the 'rules' of the King's Bench debtors' prison; but he died at Lambeth, 19th June 1823. Of his eighty-six works published between 1774 and 1824, the Three Tours of Dr Syntax (1812-21) alone are remembered, and even they owe much to Rowlandson's illustrations. [Koom.]

Combermere, STAPLETON-COTTON, VISCOUNT, field-marshal, son of Sir Robert Salusbury Cotton, Bart., of Combermere Abbey, Cheshire, was born 14th November 1772 at Llewenny Hall, Denbighshire. Educated at Audlem and Westminster School, he entered the army in 1790, and in 1794 was made lieutenant-colonel of a new regiment of light dragoons, with whom he served four years in India. In 1808 he proceeded to the Peninsula; in 1809 succeeded to the baronetcy; and in 1810 was appointed to the command of the whole allied cavalry. He was present at the battles of Talavera, Llerena, Salamanca, the Pyrenees, Orthez, and Toulouse; in 1814 was created Baron Combermere; and, though not at Waterloo, commanded the cavalry of the army of occupation in France. He was commander of the forces in the West Indies, 1817-20; commander-in-chief in Ireland, 1822-25; and commander in India, 1825-30, where in 1827 he captured the Ját fortress of Bhartpur. Made a viscount in 1827, Constable of the Tower in 1852, and a field-marshal in 1855, he died 21st February 1865. See his Correspondence (2 vols. 1866).

Combes, FRANÇOIS (1816-90), historian, was born at Albi, and died at Bordeaux.

Comenius, or KOMENSKI, JOHN AMOS, educational reformer, was born 28th March 1592, in Moravia, either at Comna or at Nivnitz. His parents belonged to the Moravian Brethren. He studied at Herborn (1612) and then at Heidelberg, became rector of the Moravian school of Prerau (1614-16) and minister at Fulnek, but lost all his property and library in 1621, when that town was taken by the Imperialists. Settling at Lissa in Poland (1628), he here worked out his new theory of education, wrote his Didactica Magna, and was chosen bishop of the Moravian Brethren in 1632. In 1631 he published his Janua Linguarum Reserata, and in 1639 his Pansophiæ Prodomus. In 1641 he was invited to England by parliament to assist in reforming the system of public instruction; but owing to the outbreak of the Civil War there, he went to Sweden (1642). He returned to Lissa in 1648, and in 1650 went to Saros-Patak, Hungary. Here he composed his Orbis Sensualium Pictus (Nurem. 1658), the first picture-book for children. Finally, he settled in Amsterdam, and died at Naarden 15th November 1671. See Lives by Laurie (1881) and Kvacala (German, 1892), and Keating's translation of The Great Didactic (1896).

Comgall, St (c. 515-602), founded about 558 the great abbey of Bangor, in County Down.

Comines, PHILIPPE DE (1445-1509), a French statesman and historian, born at the castle of Comines near Courtrai, in 1463 entered the court of Burgundy, but in 1472 passed over to the service of Louis XI. of France. He was rewarded with the rich fief of Talmont, wedded the heiress of Argenton, and became one of Louis's most trusted advisers. Louis's death brought him the loss of much property, and even eight months' imprisonment in an iron cage; but in 1493 he was restored to a measure of favour. He accompanied Charles VIII. on his Italian expedition (1494), was present at the battle of Fornovo, and met Machiavelli. He held places and pensions under Louis XII. His Mémoires (1524; best ed. by Chantelauze, 1881), dealing mainly with Louis XI., but partly with Charles VIII., are the earliest French example of history as distinguished from the chronicle; Danett's English translation (1601) was edited by C. Whibley in 1897. See his Lettres et Négotiations, edited by Kervyn de Lettenhove (Brussels, 1867-68), and Whibley's Literary Portraits (1904). [Kom-ee-n'.]

Com'modus, LUCIUS AURELIUS (161-192 A.D.), from 180 Roman emperor, was the son of the great Marcus Aurelius and the profligate Faustina. He was carefully educated, but lived to become one of the most worthless and bloody wretches that ever disgraced a throne. At his father's death he was fighting the Marcomanni on the upper Danube, but at once concluded a treaty, and hastened to Rome. After the discovery of his sister Lucilla's plot against his life in 183, he gave uncontrolled vent to his savagery. At length his mistress, Marcia, finding her own name marked down in his tablets for death, tried first to poison him, then had him strangled by Narcissus, a famous athlete.

Common, ANDREW AINSLIE, astronomer at Ealing, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 7th August 1841, and died in 1903.

Comne'nus, a family, originally Italian, of which many members occupied the Byzantine throne from 1057 to 1185 and that of Trebizond from 1204 to 1461. See ALEXIUS, ISAAC, and ANNA COMNENA.—DAVID COMNENUS, the last in Trebizond, was executed at Adrianople in 1462, with all his family, by Mohammed II. The attempt to derive the Bonaparte family from a branch of the Comneni settled in Corsica is baseless.

Comonfort, YONACIO (1812-63), President of Mexico for two months in 1857-58.

Comparetti, DOMENICO, born at Rome 27th June 1835, in 1859 was appointed to the chair of Greek at Pisa and subsequently at Florence and at Rome. Among his works are one on Greek dialects in South Italy (1866), Virgil the Magician (1872; Eng. trans. 1895), Homer and Pisis-tratus (1881), Canti et Racconti del Popolo Italiano (1869 et seq., in conjunction with D'Ancona), and Book of Sindibad (Folklore Soc. 1882).

Compton, HENRY (1632-1713), youngest son of the second Earl of Northampton, had seen some military service, when in 1662 he entered the church; in 1674 he became Bishop of Oxford, and in 1675 of London. Suspended for two years under James II., he cordially welcomed William of Orange.

Comte, AUGUSTE, the founder of Positivism, was born 19th January 1798 at Montpellier. At the Lycée there he was distinguished equally for his aptitude for mathematics and his resistance to official authority; at the École Polytechnique in Paris (1814-16) he took the lead in a protest of the students against the manners of one of the tutors, and was expelled. A few months were spent with his parents, and then Comte returned to Paris, where for a time he made a scanty living by teaching mathematics. Already, it seems, he had freed himself from the influence of all existing social and religious theories, and a reforming zeal was beginning to possess his mind, when in 1818 he came into contact with Saint-Simon, by whom his inclination towards the reconstruction of thought and life was strengthened. Comte remained for six years the disciple and collaborator of the older thinker; but there gradually became apparent a disagreement of aim and method, and the necessity felt by Comte of asserting the independence of his own conceptions led to a violent rupture. In 1825 Comte married, but the union proved unhappy, and after seventeen years of intermittent discord ended in a separation. In 1826 Comte began a course of lectures in exposition of his system of philosophy, which was attended by several eminent men of science, but the course was for a few months interrupted by an attack of insanity. His labours were afterwards resumed, and during the publication of his Philosophie Positive (6 vols. 1830-42) he made his livelihood chiefly as examiner and tutor in the École Polytechnique. After these positions were taken from him, owing to the prejudices of his colleagues, he resumed the private teaching of mathematics, but in his later years he was supported entirely by a 'subsidy' from J. S. Mill, Grote, and other friends. In 1845 Comte became acquainted with Clothilde de Vaux, and until her death within a year afterwards a close intimacy was maintained between them. On Comte's side it was a pure and passionate attachment, and its influence is clearly shown in his later works, especially in the most important of these, the Politique Positive. Comte died 5th September 1857, and was buried in Père-la-Chaise.

The aim of the Positive philosophy is to organise our knowledge of the world, of man, of society into a consistent whole. All human conceptions are regarded as having passed through a theological and then a metaphysical stage into a positive or experiential stage. The abstract sciences form a hierarchy—mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, sociology. The sociological development is from militarism to industrialism; the fullest life, according to the Positive polity, is that which rests on the fullest knowledge. The main office of a reorganised spiritual power is to strengthen the social tendencies of man at the expense of the personal or individual. In the Positive religion (it being impossible to affirm or deny the idea of a Deity) the object of reverence and love is Humanity, a unity consisting of all men and women, past, present, and to come, whose lives are devoted to the well-being and progress of the race.

Comte's works are Cours de Philosophie Positive (6 vols. 1830-42; freely translated into English and condensed by Harriet Martineau, 2 vols. 1853), Traité Élémentaire de Géométrie Analytique (1843), Traité d'Astronomie Populaire (1845), Discours sur l'Ensemble du Positivisme (1848), Système de Politique Positive (4 vols. 1851-54; Eng. trans. 1875-77), and Catéchisme Positiviste, ou Sommaire Exposition de la Religion Universelle (1852; trans. 1883). Comte's Testament was published with a good many of his letters in 1884. See John Morley's Critical Miscellanies (1886). [Convt.]

Comyn, CUMMING, or CUMYN, a family which took its name from the town of Comines, near Lille, on the Franco-Belgian frontier. While one branch remained there, and gave birth to Philippe de Comines (q.v.), another followed William of Normandy to England. In 1069 the Conqueror made Robert of Comines, or Comyn, Earl of Northumberland; his younger son, William, became Chancellor of Scotland about 1133. By 1250 his descendants in Scotland included four Earls (Buchan, Menteith, Angus, and Athole) and thirty-two belted knights of the name of Comyn; but seventy years afterwards this great house was overthrown. See BRUCE, and Mrs Cumming-Bruce's Family Records of the Bruces and the Comyns (Edin. 1870).

Conant, THOMAS JEFFERSON (1802-91), biblical scholar, filled chairs of Languages in various colleges. He made new versions of both Old and New Testaments, translated Gesenius' Hebrew grammar, and was one of the American committee for the revision of the Old Testament.

Condé, LOUIS I. DE BOURBON, PRINCE DE, younger brother of Antony of Bourbon, king of Navarre, was born 7th May 1530. During the wars between Henry II. and Spain, he distinguished himself at the siege of Metz, the battle of St Quentin, and the capture of Calais from the English. On Francis II.'s accession (1559), Condé, like his brother, joined the Huguenots, took part (1560) in the unlucky Conspiracy of Amboise against the Guises, and escaped execution only by the death of the king. The regent, Catharine de Médicis, the Guises' bitter enemy, made concessions to the Huguenots, and Condé became governor of Picardy. The massacre of Huguenots at Vassy by Guise (1562) led to the first civil war, and Condé and Coligny gathered a Huguenot army; but at Dreux Condé was defeated and taken prisoner. In the second Huguenot war (1567-69) Condé had coins struck with the inscription: 'Louis XIII., first Christian king of France;' but at Jarnac (1569) he was defeated, taken prisoner, and shot.

His great-grandson, Louis Prince de Condé, known as 'the Great Condé,' was born 8th September 1621, and educated by the Jesuits at Bourges. In 1643, as generalissimo of the French forces, he defeated the Spaniards at Rocroi; and in 1644 and 1645 he defeated the Bavarians at Freiburg and Nordlingen. The capture of Dunkirk followed in 1646, and a great victory at Lens in 1648 over the famous Spanish infantry. The court party came to terms with the Fronde by his help; but Condé gave such offence to the queen and Mazarin by his arrogance that they imprisoned him and his brothers for a year. But popular feeling forced Mazarin to leave Paris and set Condé at liberty, who ere long raised an army and began the third war of the Fronde. At Bleneau he defeated the royal troops, but was at length forced by Turenne to Paris, where he was defeated, and a peace was concluded (1653). Its terms, however, Condé would not accept, and going over to Spain, served for six years against his country. The battle of the Dunes, near Dunkirk, where Turenne, aided by 6000 of Cromwell's Ironsides, defeated the Spaniards, put an end to the war. Yet so formidable was Condé still, that the young king found it advisable to restore him to all his honours and estates. In the next war with Spain, Franche Comté was overrun by his advice and help (1668). In 1674 he fought his last battle at Seneffe, against William of Orange. It lasted seventeen hours, and both sides claimed the victory. On Turenne's death in 1675, Condé succeeded him in the command of the army on the Rhine, but his health now rendered him unfit for active service. Retiring to Chantilly, he lived there till his death on 11th December 1686, associating much with Molière, Racine, Boileau, and La Bruyère. He had always scoffed at religion, but the year before his death he announced his conversion, and took especial pleasure in the society of Bossuet. He had no political genius, and as a commander he owed his successes more to fiery energy than to military talent. See Lives by Mahon (French, 1842; English, 1845) and Fitzpatrick (2d ed. 1874); and the Duc d'Anville's Histoire des Princes de Condé (7 vols. 1862-97). [Convt.-day.]

Conder, JOSIAH (1789-1855), a London bookseller, editor, author.—His grandson, LIEUT.-COL. CLAUDE REIGNIER CONDER, born at Cheltenham, 29th Dec. 1848, entered the Royal Engineers in 1870, and was employed in the Palestine Exploration survey 1872-77. He afterwards served in Egypt and Bechuanaland, and then on the staff of the Ordnance Survey at home. He has written much on Palestine. He died 16th February 1910.

Condillac, ÉTIENNE BONNOT DE MABLY DE, a French philosopher, the founder of Sensationalism, was born of a noble family at Grenoble, 30th September 1715. As a child his delicate health delayed his progress in education; but in youth he numbered among his friends Rousseau, Diderot, Duclos, &c. Many of his works were composed for his pupil, the Duke of Parma, grandson of Louis XIV.; and he was titular Abbé de Mureaux. He was chosen a member of the French Academy of Sciences in 1768. He died on his estate of Flux, near Beaugency, on August 3, 1780. He based all knowledge on the senses. Among his works were Essai sur l'Origine des Connaissances Humaines (1746), Traité des Systèmes (1749), Traité des Sensations (1754), Logique (1781), and Langue des Calculs (1798). The first of several editions of his Œuvres Complètes appeared in 1798. See monographs by Robert (Paris, 1869), Réthoré (1864), Dewaule (1892), and Saltykov (1901). [Kon^d-dee'yak.]

Condorcet, MARIE JEAN ANTOINE NICOLAS CARITAT, MARQUIS DE, was born, the son of a cavalry officer, at Ribemont, near St Quentin, on September 17, 1743. In childhood he breathed the closest atmosphere of clerical and aristocratic exclusiveness, with the result of making him in after years the enemy of all privilege and a thorough-going sceptic. At thirteen, after distinguishing himself in the Jesuit school at Rheims, he began his mathematical studies at the College of Navarre in Paris. His success was rapid and brilliant; and the high approval of Clairaut and D'Alembert determined his future. His Essai sur le Calcul Intégral (1765) obtained for him a seat in the Academy, and he became perpetual secretary in 1777. He took an active part in the Encyclopédie. On the outbreak of the Revolution he made eloquent speeches and wrote famous pamphlets on the popular side, was sent by Paris to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and in 1792 became president of the Assembly. He voted that the king should receive the most severe punishment except death, and, as deputy for Aisne in the National Convention, he sided usually with the Girondists. Accused and condemned by the extreme party, he found refuge in the house of a generous lady, Madame Vernet, for eight months; but, driven to change his place of concealment, was recognised and lodged in the jail of Bourg-la-Reine, where he was found dead the next morning, 8th April 1794. In his Progrès de l'Esprit Humain (1794), written in hiding, he insisted on the justice and necessity of establishing a perfect equality of civil and political rights between the individuals of both sexes, and proclaimed the indefinite perfectibility of the human race. His complete works have been issued in 1804 (21 vols.) and 1847-49 (12 vols., with a Life by Arago). See his correspondence with Turgot (1883), and Life by Robinet (1893) and Cahen (1904). Confucius is a Latinised form of the Chinese K'ung Fū-tsze, or 'the Master K'ung,' K'ung being the family name of the sage, and Fū-tsze the denomination applied to him by his disciples. He was born in 551 B.C., at Ch'ieh village, in the state of Lû, a part of the present province of Shan-tung. His lineage is traced through the dukes of Sung to the kings of the Shang or Yin dynasty. His father, a distinguished soldier, died in the child's third year, leaving the mother in straitened circumstances. The sage tells us that 'at fifteen his mind was set on learning, and at thirty he stood firm in his convictions.' He married at nineteen, and had a son Li and two daughters. About the time of his marriage we find him in charge of the public stores of grain and of the public herds; in 531 he commenced his career as a teacher. In 501 the duke of Lû appointed him governor of the town of Chung-tû, where a marvellous reformation in the manners of the people speedily took place. The next year saw him first minister of works, and next minister of crime; and for three years Confucius was the idol of the people. But this success did not last long. The prosperity of the state awakened the jealousy and fears of its neighbours, who brought about a breach between Confucius and his duke; and in 497 Confucius left Lû, not returning till 485 or 484. During this long period he visited many states, attended always by a company of his disciples. On his final recall to Lû by a new duke, he was well received, but did not re-enter political life. In his last years he is said to have put the finishing hand to his labours on the ancient writings. He himself tells us that he reformed the music to which the ancient odes were sung, and edited the odes themselves; probably then also he wrote the only classical work assigned to his own pencil—the Ch'un Ch'ü, embracing the events in the history of Lû from 722 to 481 B.C. In the Confucian Analects, or memorabilia compiled soon after his death, we have abundant information of the Master's sayings and doings. It is often said that Confucianism is a system of morality without religion. That Confucius was emphatically a moral teacher is true; his greatest achievement as such was his formulating the golden rule, 'What you do not wish done to yourself, do not do to others.' And though this high morality was not without a religious sanction, we do not find in Confucius the expressions of a fervent piety, and his model or ideal man does not commune with God or implore forgiveness. Duke Ai, who had been unable to follow his counsels, caused a temple to be built, where sacrifices or offerings should be presented to the sage from generation to generation. Succeeding dynasties have done honour to him by titles and offerings; and none more so than the present Manchû-Tartar dynasty. The law requires a temple to Confucius in every market-town in the empire; the worship paid to him here is extended to more than one hundred and fifty of his disciples and followers. Twice a year the emperor goes to the imperial college in Peking, and does homage to Confucius. The lineal representative of the sage has the title of kung or duke, and ranks next to the members of the imperial house. See Legge's Chinese Classics, vol. i. (1861), and Confucius' Life and Teaching (6th ed. 1887); German works by Plath (1866-75), Faber (1873), and Gabelentz (1888); and G. G. Alexander's Confucius the Great Teacher (1891).

Congreve, RICHARD (1818-99), Positivist evangelist, was born at Leamington, and educated under Arnold at Rugby. Of Wadham College, Oxford, he was a scholar, fellow, and tutor, but resigned after having become definitively a disciple of Comte. In 1855 he published a good edition of Aristotle's Politics. Later works are Lectures on the Roman Empire of the West (1855), Elizabeth of England (1862), and Essays (1874), besides many Positivist sermons and addresses.

Congreve, WILLIAM, the greatest master of the English comedy of repartee, was born at Bardsey, near Leeds, and baptised on February 10, 1670. He was educated at Kilkenny and at Trinity College, Dublin; and in London he entered the Middle Temple. His first publication was Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled (1691), a novel of cross-purposes and disguises; his translation of the eleventh satire of Juvenal appeared in Dryden's Juvenal and Persius (1692). In January 1693 his comedy the Old Bachelor was brought out under Dryden's auspices, and had a brilliant success. His second comedy, the Double Dealer, which appeared in November 1693, was in every way stronger than the Old Bachelor, but the satire on the heartless sexual morals of the time was too serious to please the people satirised. The Mourning Muse of Alexia, a poetic dialogue on Queen Mary's death, was as full of artificial conceits as Incognita. Love for Love, the finest prose comedy in the English language, was produced in 1695. So late as 1842 Macready revived it (modified of course) at Drury Lane, and there have been still later revivals (as in 1871). Abundant and brilliant as is the wit, the coruscations do not, as in Congreve's other plays, outdazzle the sweeter and softer light of the humour; and the characterisation is true, some of it beautiful. In 1697 Congreve's one tragedy, the Mourning Bride, appeared. The honours it received in the 18th century were as excessive as the contempt it met with in the 19th; although no doubt it is full of improbabilities. Congreve was next busily occupied in the famous Jeremy Collier controversy, defending the morality of the new stage. Congreve's last play, The Way of the World (1700), though quite as full of intellectual brilliance as Love for Love, and evidently written with more care, not to say labour, lacks the humorous impulse seen in Congreve's masterpiece. It was received with comparative coldness, and Congreve wrote no more for the stage; but he lived till January 19, 1729. Socially his life was one unbroken success, in spite of some physical suffering. Leigh Hunt's (1840) was long the standard edition; but the plays were edited for the 'Merrmaid Edition' by A. C. Ewald (1888), and by Street in 1895. See the Life of Congreve by E. Gosse (1888).

Congreve, Sir William (1772-1828), eldest son of Sir William Congreve, Bart., Comptroller of the Woolwich Laboratory, passed through Woolwich Academy, and in 1808 invented the Congreve rocket. He became an F.R.S. and M.P. for Gatton.

Conington, John, classical scholar, was born at Boston, 10th August 1825. He was educated at Beverley, and for five years at Rugby, obtained a demyship at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1843, and next year carried off the Hertford and Ireland scholarships. In 1846 he migrated to University College, where in 1848 he was elected a fellow. Determining not to take orders, he tried the study of law, but soon abandoned it, and was Latin professor at Oxford from 1854 until his untimely death at his native place, 23d October 1869. His greatest work is his edition of Virgil (3 vols. 1861-68), with its singularly subtle and suggestive essays. In his last years he gave himself much to translation, the results of which were his metrical version of the Odes of Horace (1863); the Aeneid (1866), in Scott's ballad-metre; the Iliad (1868), in the Spenserian stanza; and the Satires and Epistles of Horace (1869), in the couplet of Pope. In 1872 appeared his edition of Persius and his Miscellaneous Writings (2 vols.), with a short Life by Prof. H. J. S. Smith.

Conkling, Roscoe (1829-88), born in Albany, New York, 30th October 1829, was admitted to the bar in 1850, sat in congress as a Republican in 1858-62 and 1864-66, and was elected to the U.S. senate in 1867, 1873, and 1879. In 1876 he received ninety-three votes for the presidential nomination; in 1880, by his support of Grant, and opposition to Blaine, divided the Republicans into two sections.

Connaught, Arthur William, Duke of, third son of Queen Victoria, was born at Buckingham Palace, 1st May 1850, entered Woolwich Academy in 1866, in 1879 married the Princess Louise Margaret of Prussia (b. 1860). After commands in Egypt, &c., he became Inspector-General (1904), and Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean (1907).

Conolly, Arthur (1807-c. 1842), educated at Rugby and Addiscombe, went out to India, and had risen to be captain, when he was executed at Bokhara, with Col. Stoddart, whose rescue had been the object of his mission. In 1829-30 he had journeyed overland to India by way of St Petersburg, Astrabad, and Kandahar.

Conolly, John (1794-1866), physician, born at Market Rasen, Lincolnshire, graduated at Edinburgh in 1821, and in 1827 settled in London, where he was for two years a professor in University College. From 1839 to 1844 he was resident physician at Hanwell Asylum; afterwards he was visiting physician. Under him mechanical restraint was discontinued; and although his views were admittedly not original, to him the revolution in our asylum management is mainly due. See Memoir by Sir James Clark (1869).

Conrad, or Konrad I., king of the Germans, was the son of the Count of Franconia, and nephew of the Emperor Arnulf. Elected king on the extinction of the direct Carolingian line in 911, he gradually re-established the imperial authority over most of the German princes, carried on an unsuccessful war with France, and at last fell mortally wounded at Quedlinburg (918) in a battle with the Hungarians.

Conrad II. (c. 990-1039), elected king of the Germans in 1024, was the son of the Duke of Franconia. In 1026 he crossed the Alps, chastised the rebellious Italians, was crowned at Milan, and was anointed Roman emperor by the pope. He was soon recalled to Germany to put down four revolts, which he achieved by 1033. In 1032 he succeeded to the kingdom of Burgundy; in 1036 a fresh rebellion recalled him to Italy; but this time he was forced to grant various privileges to his Italian subjects. Shortly after his return he died at Utrecht.

Conrad III. (1093-1152), the first Hohenstaufen king of the Germans, was the son of Frederick of Swabia. While under twenty, he had bravely supported Henry V., who in return granted him the duchy of Franconia. He unsuccessfully contested the crown of Italy with the Emperor Lothair of Saxony, on whose death the princes of Germany, fearing the growing preponderance of the Guelph party, offered Conrad the throne, and he was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, 21st February 1138. He was immediately involved in a quarrel with Henry the Proud, Duke of Bavaria and Saxony, and head of the Guelphs in Germany; and the struggle was continued under Henry's son, Henry the Lion (q.v.). When St Bernard of Clairvaux preached a new crusade, Conrad set out for Palestine with a large army (1147). A new Bavarian rebellion was defeated before his death at Bamberg.

Conrad of MONTFERRAT held Tyre against Saladin, and was stabbed by an assassin in 1192.

Conrad von Würzburg, poet, died at Basel in 1287. His unfinished Trojan War, in 60,000 lines, is inferior to his smaller narrative poems.

Conrad, JOSEPH, born in 1857 the son of a patriotic Warsaw editor, became a naturalised British subject, a sailor, and a powerful English novelist; Typhoon and Nostromo being two of some fifteen novels and plays.

Conradin of SWABIA (1252-68), the last Hohenstaufen emperor, was the son of Conrad IV. (1237-54). His uncle, Manfred (q.v.), had assumed the crown of Sicily on a rumour of Conradin's death, and Pope Clement VI.'s hatred of the Hohenstaufens led him to offer the crown of the Two Sicilies to Charles of Anjou, who invaded Italy and slew Manfred at Benevento (1266). But the Neapolitans, detesting their new master, sent deputies to Bavaria to invite Conradin to assert his rights. Conradin accordingly appeared in Italy with 10,000 men, gained several victories over the French, but was defeated near Tagliacozzo, 22d August 1268, and taken prisoner along with Frederick of Baden. With the pope's consent, they were executed at Naples.

Conrart, VALENTIN (1603-75), a founder of the French Academy, from 1634 its first secretary.

Consalvi, ERCOLE (1757-1824), who was born and died at Rome, was made cardinal and secretary of state by Pope Pius VII. (1800), and concluded the concordat with Napoleon (1801). At the Congress of Vienna he secured the restoration of the Papal States; as papal secretary he suppressed all monopolies, feudal taxes, and exclusive rights. He was a liberal patron of science and art. See Life by E. Daudet (Par. 1866).

Conscience, HENDRIK (1812-83), Flemish novelist, was born at Antwerp, and died at Brussels, director since 1866 of the Wiertz Museum. His Phantazy (1837), a fine collection of tales, and his most popular romance, De Leeuw van Vlaenderen (1838), early made his name dear to his fellow-countrymen; but it was his series of charming pictures of quiet Flemish life, beginning with Hoe man schildert wordt (1843), that, through translations, carried his name over Europe. A complete edition of his works appeared at Antwerp (10 vols. 1867-80). See Lives by Eekhoud (Brussels, 1881) and Pol de Mont (Haarlem, 1883).

Considérant, VICTOR-PROSPER, Socialist, was born at Salins, dep. Jura, 12th October 1808, and entered the army, which, however, he soon left to promulgate Fourier's doctrines. On the death of his master (1837), Considérant became head of his school, and edited the Phalange. An Englishman, Mr Young, having advanced money, Considérant established a socialist colony or Phalanstère in Eure et Loire; but the experiment failed, and with it the Phalange. Of his numerous writings the chief is the Destinée Sociale. In 1849 he was accused of high treason, and fled from France. In Texas he founded a community, La Réunion, which flourished for a time. He returned to France in 1869, and died 27th Dec. 1893. See Life by Coignet (1895). [Con^d-see-day-ron^d.]

Constable, ARCHIBALD, publisher, was born at Carnbee, Fife, 24th February 1774, and became a bookseller's apprentice in Edinburgh (1788-95). He then started as a bookseller at the Cross of Edinburgh, and speedily gathered round him the chief book-collectors of the time. He died into publishing, bought the Scots Magazine in 1801, and was chosen as publisher of the Edinburgh Review (1802). He published for all the leading men of the time, and his quick appreciation of Scott became the envy of the book-trade. In 1812 he purchased the copyright of the Encyclopaedia Britannica for over £13,000. In the crisis of 1826 Constable & Co. failed for over £250,000. The only noteworthy issue of Constable after this failure was his celebrated Miscellany. He died July 21, 1827. See Archibald Constable and his Literary Correspondents, by his son, Thomas Constable (3 vols. 1873).

Constable, HENRY (1562-1613), poet, the son of Sir Robert Constable of Newark, at sixteen entered St John's College, Cambridge, early turned Catholic, and betook himself to Paris. He was pensioned by the French king, and seems to have been employed in confidential missions to England and Scotland. He died at Liège. In 1592 was published his Diana, a collection of twenty-three sonnets; two years later, the second edition, containing seventy-six, but some by his friend, Sir Philip Sidney, and other poets. See editions by W. C. Hazlitt (1859) and J. Gray (1897).

Constable, JOHN, R.A., landscape-painter, was born at East Bergholt, Suffolk, where his father was a landowner and miller, 11th June 1776. Educated at Lavenham and Dedham, he assisted his father for a year in the mill (1794); but his love of art was irrepresible, and Sir George Beaumont prevailed on his family to send him to London. Here he arrived in 1795; and, after a year spent in his old employment, he in 1799 entered the schools of the Royal Academy, to whose exhibition he sent a work in 1802. In 1816 he married Mary Bicknell; and in 1828, on the death of her father, solicitor to the Admiralty, an inheritance of £20,000 enabled Constable to devote himself exclusively to his beloved but unremunerative landscape work. In 1821 he won the best artistic triumph of his life, in the applause which greeted his 'Hay-wain' in the Paris Salon. Not less marked was the impression produced by his 'White Horse,' at Lille in 1825. Both gained gold medals and exercised a powerful influence upon landscape art in France. In 1819 he was elected A.R.A., in 1829 R.A. His later years were saddened by the deaths of his wife and his friend Archdeacon Fisher, by ill-health, and by great depression of spirits; but he worked steadily at his art, though his landscapes still were frequently unsold. He was engaged upon 'Arundel Mill and Castle' at the time of his sudden death, 31st March 1837. Three of his finest landscapes, the 'Valley Farm,' 'Cornfield,' and 'Hay-wain,' were already in the National Gallery in 1888, when five more were gifted by the painter's family. His 'Salisbury Cathedral' is at South Kensington, where and in the British Museum his work in water-colour and pencil may be studied. See books by C. R. Leslie (1843), C. J. Holmes (1902), Lord Plymouth (1903).

Constans, youngest of Constantine the Great's three sons, in 337 A.D. received Ilyricum, Italy, and Africa as his share of the empire. After the defeat and death of his elder brother Constantine (340), Constans became sole ruler of the West till his death in 350.—CONSTANS II. (630-68), elder son of Constantine III., as Emperor of the East from 641 made himself odious by cruelty, and was found drowned in his bath.

Constant, BENJAMIN (1845-1902), a lifelong Parisian, was a painter first of Eastern subjects, latterly of portraits. [Kon^d-ston^d.]

Constant de Rebecque, HENRI BENJAMIN, author and politician, was born of French Huguenot ancestry at Lausanne, 23d October 1767. Educated at Oxford, Erlangen, and Edinburgh, he in 1795 settled in Paris as a publicist. He entered the Tribunate in 1799, but was banished from France in 1802 for denouncing the despotic acts of Napoleon. After travelling in Germany and Italy with Madame de Staël, he settled at Göttingen. On Napoleon's fall in 1814 he returned to Paris; during the Hundred Days became one of Napoleon's Councillors, though previously he had styled Napoleon a Genghis Khan; and after the second restoration of the Bourbons wrote and spoke in favour of constitutional freedom. He was returned to the Chamber of Deputies in 1819, and became the leader of the liberal Opposition. He died 8th December 1830. De la Religion (5 vols. 1824-31) is a notable work. He likewise wrote a remarkable novel, Adolphe (1816), a short story of love and disillusion. His Correspondence appeared in 1844, his Œuvres Politiques in 1875, his letters to Madame Récamier and his family in 1882-88, and his Journal Intime in 1895.

Constantine I., surnamed 'the Great,' Roman emperor, otherwise FLAVIUS VALERIUS AURELIUS CONSTANTINUS, was born c. 274, at Naissus, in Upper Moesia. He was the eldest son of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and first distinguished himself as a soldier in Diocletian's famous Egyptian expedition (296), next under Galerius in the Persian war. In 305 the two emperors Diocletian and Maximian abdicated, and were succeeded by Constantius Chlorus and Galerius. Constantine joined his father, who ruled in the West, at Boulogne on the expedition against the Picts, and ere Constantius died at York (306) he proclaimed his son his successor. Galerius did not dare to quarrel with Constantine, yet he granted him the title of Cæsar only, refusing that of Augustus. Political complications now increased, until in 308 there were actually no less than six emperors at once—Galerius, Licinius, and Maximian in the East; and Maximian, Maxentius his son, and Constantine in the West. Maxentius drove his father from Rome, and after some intrigues, Maximian died by suicide (309). Maxentius threatened Gaul with a large army. Constantine crossing the Alps by Mont Cenis, thrice defeated Maxentius, who was drowned after the last great victory at the Milvian Bridge near Rome (312). Before the battle a flaming cross inscribed 'In this conquer' was said to have caused Constantine's conversion to Christianity; and the edict of Milan (313), issued conjointly with Licinius, gave civil rights and toleration to Christians throughout the empire. Constantine was now sole emperor of the West; and by the death of Galerius in 311 and of Maximian in 313, Licinius became sole emperor of the East. After a war (314) between the two rulers, Licinius had to cede Illyricum, Pannonia, and Greece; and Constantine for the next nine years devoted himself vigorously to the correction of abuses, the strengthening of his frontiers, and the chastising of the barbarians. Having in 323 again defeated Licinius, and put him to death, Constantine was now sole governor of the Roman world. He chose Byzantium for his capital, and in 330 inaugurated it under the name of Constantinople ('City of Constantine'). Christianity became a state religion in 324, though paganism was not persecuted. In 325 was held the great Church Council of Nicæa, in which the court sided against the Arians. Yet it was only shortly before his death that Constantine received baptism. The story of his baptism at Rome by Pope Sylvester in 326, and of the so-called Donation of Constantine, long treated as an argument for the temporal power of the papacy, is utterly unhistorical. His later years were stained with bloodshed, especially the execution of his eldest son Crispus (326) for treason and of his own second wife Fausta (327) on some similar charge. He proposed to divide the empire between his three sons by Fausta, Constantius, Constantine and Constans; but in 340 Constantine II. lost his life in war with Constans. Constantine the Great himself died on 22d May 337. See E. L. Curtis' Constantine (1881), and J. B. Firth's (1905).

CONSTANTINE III. reigned part of 641 only; CONSTANTINE IV., emperor in 668-685, gave up much territory to the Bulgarians, Serbs, and Croats; CONSTANTINE V., called Iconoclast and other uncomplimentary names, was a capable but unscrupulous ruler from 741 to 775, always at feud with the monks; CONSTANTINE VI. was nominally ruler from 780 to 797; CONSTANTINE VII., called Porphyrogenitus (912-959), favoured peace, literature, and learning, and wrote historical and political works; CONSTANTINE VIII.—X. were insignificant; CONSTANTINE XI. (1403-53), last emperor of the Eastern Empire, came to the crown as a Palæologus in 1448, and fell fighting the Turks at the great siege of Constantinople.

Constantine Nikolaevitch (1827-92), grand-duke of Russia, second son of the emperor Nicholas I., and brother of Alexander II., in the Crimean war commanded the Russian fleet in the Baltic, and held the English and French armaments in check before Cronstadt. In 1862 he became viceroy of Poland, and in 1865 president of the council of the empire; in 1882 he was dismissed from his dignities on the ground of revolutionary views, while his eldest son, Nicholas, was banished to Tashkend.

Constantius Chlorus, nephew of Claudius II. and father of Constantine (q.v.), became Cæsar in 292 A.D., had Britain, Gaul, and Spain as his government, and after re-establishing Roman power in Britain and defeating the Alemanni, became Augustus in 305, but died at York in 306.—(2) CONSTANTIUS, third son of Constantine I., was Roman emperor, 337-361 A.D. He fought with the Persians; and after the death in 350 of his brother Constans, became sole emperor.

Contarini, a Venetian family, was one of the twelve that elected the first doge, and furnished between 1043 and 1674 eight doges, four patriarchs, and many generals, statesmen, artists, poets, and scholars.—CARDINAL GASPARO CONTARINI (1483-1542) was Venetian ambassador at the court of Charles V., and papal legate at the Diet of Ratisbon (1541), where he displayed great moderation.—SIMONE (1563-1633) was Venetian ambassador at several Italian courts, in Spain, in Constantinople, &c., and was a Latin poet.—LUDOVICO (1629-53) was ambassador in Paris. [Kon-ta-ree'nee.]

Conti, HOUSE OF, a younger branch of the Bourbon House of Condé (q.v.). Its founder, Armand de Bourbon Conti (1629-66), brother of the great Condé, took his title from the little town of Conti, near Amiens. Though feeble and deformed, and set aside for the church, he took with ardour to the career of arms, but after 1657 retired from the world.—LOUIS ARMAND (1661-85), his eldest son, died childless after a short but promising career in arms.—Another son, FRANÇOIS LOUIS (1664-1709), Prince de la Roche-sur-Yon et de Conti, was educated under the eyes of Coudé, and in his first campaign in Hungary covered himself with glory, but falling into disgrace with the court, was banished to Chantilly. Subsequently he served under the Duc de Luxembourg, and took a brilliant part in the victories of Steinkirk and Neerwinden. In 1697 he narrowly escaped being made king of Poland. On his return to France he was still coldly received by Louis, but in 1709 received the command of the army of Flanders, only to die 22d February of the same year.—The last of the line was LOUIS FRANÇOIS JOSEPH (1734-1807). Conway, HENRY SEYMOUR (1721-95), field-marshal and statesman, Horace Walpole's friend.

Conway, HUGH, the pseudonym of Frederick John Fergus, who was born 26th December 1847, the son of a Bristol auctioneer. He adopted it from the school frigate Conway, stationed on the Mersey, which he entered in 1861; but his father did not wish him to be a sailor, and in 1868, after some years as a clerk, he succeeded to the auctioneer business, employing his leisure in writing clever newspaper verse and tales. Some songs of his appeared in 1878, a volume of verse in 1879; but it was his melodramatic story, Called Back (vol. i. of Arrowsmith's Bristol Library, 1884), that made him famous. Fergus sold his share in the auctioneer's business, and went to London, but died of malarial fever at Monte Carlo, 15th May 1885.

Conway, MONCURE DANIEL, born in Virginia, 17th March 1832, entered the Methodist ministry in 1850, but, after a divinity course at Cambridge, became a Unitarian preacher in Washington in 1854, and in Cincinnati in 1857. He was a strong opponent of slavery, and in 1863 came to England to lecture on the war. In London he became head of the South Place Institute (for advanced religious thought), which he finally gave up in 1897, wrote much for the press, and published Demonology and Devil-lore (1879), Thomas Carlyle (1881), Pine and Palm (1887), Life of Paine (1892), an autobiography, and other books. He died in November 1907.

Conway, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS (1789-1828), an English actor who in a fit of insanity drowned himself off Charleston, U.S.

Conway, SIR WILLIAM MARTIN, born at Rochester in 1856, and educated at Trinity, Cambridge, was art professor at Liverpool 1885-88, and Cambridge 1901-4. Knighted in 1895, he has written Climbing in the Karakoram Himalayas (1894), The First Crossing of Spitsbergen (1897), &c.

Conybeare, WILLIAM JOHN (1815-57), joint-author with Dean Howson of a widely-known Life and Epistles of St Paul (1851), was the eldest son of William Daniel Conybeare (1787-1857), the geologist, who in 1844 became dean of Llandaff. He was educated at Westminster and Trinity, Cambridge, became a fellow, and in 1842 was appointed principal of Liverpool Collegiate Institution, which ill-health compelled him to exchange in 1843 for the vicarage of Axminster. Essays (1856) and a novel were his only other works.

Cook, EDWARD DUTTON, was born in London, a solicitor's son, 30th January 1829, spent four years in his father's office, then entered a railway office, which he left to follow his literary and artistic tastes. He studied painting and engraving, wrote a successful melodrama, acted as dramatic critic for the Pall Mall (1867-75) and then for the World till his death, 11th September 1883. Among his sixteen works were half-a-dozen novels, A Book of the Play (1876), Hours with the Players (1881), and On the Stage (1883).

Cook, ELIZA (1818-89), minor poetess, daughter of a London tradesman, contributed to magazines from an early age, and issued volumes of poetry in 1838, 1864, and 1865. She conducted Eliza Cook's Journal (1849-54), much of it republished as Jottings from my Journal (1860) and Diamond Dust (1865).

Cook, JAMES, navigator, was born at Marton, in Cleveland, Yorkshire, the son of an agricultural labourer, 28th October (possibly November) 1728. For a time in a haberdasher's shop, he ran away to sea, was bound apprentice to Whitby shipowners, and spent several years in the coasting and Baltic trade. In 1755 he entered the navy, and in 1759 became master. He was for ten years engaged in surveying about the St Lawrence and the shores of Newfoundland. In 1768-71, in command of the Endeavour, he conveyed to the Pacific the expedition for observing the transit of Venus. On the return, New Zealand was circumnavigated and charted; the east coast of Australia was surveyed and taken possession of for Britain; the strait between Australia and New Guinea was sailed through, and the voyage completed by way of Java and the Cape of Good Hope. Cook, now a commander, was given the command of a second voyage of discovery in the Resolution and Adventure, in 1772-75, to discover how far the lands of the Antarctic stretched northwards, and sailed round the edge of the ice, reaching 71° 10' S., in long. 110° 54' W. During the intervals between the Antarctic voyages, Cook visited Tahiti and the New Hebrides, and discovered New Caledonia and other groups. Owing to Cook's precautions, there was only one death among his crews during all the three years. Captain Cook's next and last voyage (1776-79) was to discover a passage round the north coast of America from the Pacific, and was by way of the Cape, Tasmania, New Zealand, the Pacific Islands, the Sandwich Islands (now discovered), and the west coast of North America, which he surveyed from 45° N. as far as Icy Cape in Behring Strait, where he was compelled to turn back, reaching Karakakoa Bay in Hawaii, in January 1779. The natives, at first friendly, suddenly changed their attitude; and on February 14, when Cook landed with a party to recover a stolen boat, set upon them with sudden fury, Cook being clubbed and stabbed to death. Cook did more than any other navigator to add to our knowledge of the Pacific and the Southern Ocean. An account of the first voyage originally appeared in Hawkesworth's Voyages (vols. ii. and iii., 1773); the narrative of the second was written by Cook himself (2 vols. 1777); that of the third was partly by Cook and partly by Captain King (3 vols. 1784). His own journal of the first voyage was edited by Wharton in 1893. See Lives by Kippis (1788, reprinted 1883), Besant (1890), and Kitson (1907).

Cook, JOSEPH, LL.D. (1838-1901), preacher, born at Ticonderoga, New York, graduated at Harvard and Andover, and after three years' preaching went to Europe in 1871, where he studied in Germany, and made a tour of the Mediterranean countries. In 1873 he turned lecturer; and he had published Biology (1877), Heredity (1878), Marriage (1878), Labor (1879), Socialism (1880), Occident and Orient (1884-86), &c.

Cook, THOMAS, railway excursion and tourist pioneer, was born at Melbourne, Derbyshire, November 22, 1808, and died 18th July 1892, his first railway trip (a temperance one) being made from Leicester to Loughborough in 1841. See Fraser Rae, The Business of Travel (1891).

Cooke, BENJAMIN (1734-93), composer of glees, anthems, &c., was organist of Westminster Abbey from 1762, as from 1802 was his son, ROBERT, who drowned himself in 1814.

Cooke, GEORGE FREDERICK, actor, born in Westminster in 1756, made his debut at Brentford in 1776, and between 1784 and 1800 attained a front rank in his profession in spite of drinking habits. From 1801 to 1810 he played at Covent Garden both in comedy and in tragedy, and rivalled Kemble in the public favour. His best characters were Richard, Shylock, Iago, Sir Giles Overreach, and Sir Pertinax MacSycophant. In 1810 he visited America, and died in New York city, 26th September 1811. A monument marks his grave, erected in 1821 by Edmund Kean, who regarded Cooke as the greatest of actors. See Life by William Dunlap (1813).

Cooke, HENRY, D.D. (1788-1868), from 1829 to 1867 was a prominent Belfast Presbyterian minister. See Life by Porter (3d ed. 1875).

Cooke, JOHN ESTEN (1830-86), novelist, biographer, &c., was born at Winchester, Virginia.

Cooke, MORDECAI CUBITT, mycologist, was born at Horning, Norfolk, 12th July 1825.

Cooke, THOMAS (1703-56), hack-writer and translator of Hesiod, &c., was born at Braintree.

Cooke, THOMAS SIMPSON (1782-1848), a tenor singer and composer, born in Dublin, and from 1815 connected with Drury Lane, London.

Cooke, SIR WILLIAM FOTHERGILL (1806-79), electrician, born at Baling, was educated at Durham and Edinburgh, served in the Indian army from 1826 to 1831, and after studying medicine at Paris and Heidelberg, took up telegraphy, and in 1837 entered into partnership with Prof. Wheatstone. In 1845 they patented the single needle apparatus; in 1846 Cooke formed a company, which paid £120,000 for the partners' earlier patents. In 1867 Cooke and Wheatstone received the Albert gold medal; Wheatstone was knighted in 1868 and Cooke in 1869.

Cookworthy, WILLIAM (1705-80), porcelain manufacturer, the discoverer of kaolin near St Austell, was a Plymouth druggist and Quaker, born at Kingsbridge, Devon.

Cooper, ABRAHAM (1787-1868), battle-painter, elected an A.R.A. in 1817 and an R.A. in 1820, was born in London, and died at Greenwich.

Cooper, ASHLEY. See SHAFESBURY.

Cooper, SIR ASTLEY, surgeon, was born, a clergyman's son, at Brooke Hall, Norfolk, 23d August 1768. From sixteen a medical student in London and Edinburgh, he lectured on anatomy at St Thomas's Hospital (1789) and at the College of Surgeons (1793), in 1800 became surgeon to Guy's, and in 1813 professor of Comparative Anatomy in the College of Surgeons. An essay on the loss of the membrana tympani gained him, in 1802, the Copley medal of the Royal Society, of which he was elected a fellow in 1805. In 1804-7 appeared his great work on Hernia, which was followed by Dislocations and Fractures (1822), Anatomy and Diseases of the Breast (1829-40), Anatomy of the Thymus Gland (1832), &c. His annual income, which in the fifth year of his practice was only £100, had in 1813 risen to £21,000. In 1817 he tried the bold (but unsuccessful) experiment of tying the aorta; in 1820 removed a tumour from the head of George IV., and was made a baronet. In 1827 he became president of the College of Surgeons, in 1828 sergeant-surgeon to the king, and in 1830 vice-president of the Royal Society. He died 12th February 1841, and was buried in the chapel of Guy's Hospital. Surgery, hitherto 'frightful alternatives or hazardous compromises,' was by him raised into a science. See Life (1843).

Cooper, CHARLES ALFRED, born at Hull, 16th September 1829, in 1868 became assistant-editor, and in 1880-1906 was editor, of the Edinburgh Scotsman. See his An Editor's Retrospect (1896).

Cooper, CHARLES HENRY (1808-66), born at Great Marlow, from 1849 was town-clerk of Cambridge, and wrote on its annals, worthies, &c.

Cooper, JAMES FENIMORE, American novelist, was born at Burlington, New Jersey, September 15, 1789. His father, a wealthy Quaker and Federalist member of congress, removed to Cooperstown, New York, then in a wild frontier region of great natural beauty. Cooper entered Yale College in 1803, was expelled during his third year, in 1806 shipped as a common sailor, and in 1808 entered the navy as a midshipman. He rose to the rank of lieutenant, but in 1811 resigned his commission and married Susan, a sister of Bishop De Lancey of New York. His first novel, Precution (1819), was a failure; and the thirty-two which followed it were of extremely unequal quality. The best were the stories of the sea and of Red Indians—The Spy (1821), The Pilot (1823), The Last of the Mohicans (1826), The Prairie (1826), The Red Rover (1831), The Bravo (1831), The Pathfinder (1840), The Deerslayer (1841), The Two Admirals (1842), Wing-and-Wing (1842), and Satanstoe (1845). His other writings include a meritorious Naval History of the United States (1839; abridged edition, 1841), and Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers (1846). After visiting England and France, he was U.S. consul at Lyons (1826-29), and then travelled in Switzerland and Italy till 1831. His later years were much disturbed by literary and newspaper controversies and actions for libel, in nearly all of which he was successful, conducting his own lawsuits, and usually pleading his own cases. He died at Cooperstown, September 14, 1851. See Life by Lounsbury (1882).

Cooper, PETER (1791-1883), manufacturer and philanthropist, was born and died in New York. He erected large ironworks in Baltimore in 1828, and in 1830 constructed the first locomotive engine ever built in America. He afterwards built an iron-wire factory in New York and blast-furnaces in Pennsylvania; and promoted the laying of the Atlantic cable. To provide the working-classes with educational advantages, he erected and endowed the Cooper Union (1854-59) in New York. See Life by Mrs Carter (1889).

Cooper, SAMUEL (1609-72), miniaturist, was born and died in London.

Cooper, THOMAS, the Chartist poet, born at Leicester, 28th March 1805, was apprenticed to a shoemaker at Gainsborough, taught himself Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and French, and at twenty-three turned schoolmaster and Methodist preacher. After reporting for some Midland newspapers, he became leader of the Leicester Chartists in 1841, lectured in the Potteries during the riots in August 1842, and got two years for seditious in Stafford jail. Here he wrote The Purgatory of Suicides, a poem in the Spenserian stanza, and Wise Saws and Modern Instances, a series of tales, which were both published in 1845. In 1848 he began to lecture on history and politics in London, and set up two short-lived penny weeklies. He published two novels, Alderman Ralph (1853) and The Family Feud (1854), and in 1855, relinquishing sceptical opinions he had held since his imprisonment, became a Christian lecturer. In 1867 his friends purchased him an annuity; and he had just got a pension of £200 when he died 15th July 1892. See his Autobiography (1872) and Thoughts at Fourscore (1885).

Cooper, SIR THOMAS SIDNEY (1803-1902), animal-painter, knighted in 1901 in the ninety-eighth year of his life, was born at Canterbury, was successively coach-painter, scene-painter, and drawing-master, lived three years at Brussels (1827-30), and was elected an A.R.A. in 1845 and an R.A. in 1867. See his My Life (2 vols. 1890).

Coote, SIR EYRE (1726-83), born at Ash Hill, Co. Limerick, entered the army early, and from 1754 to 1762 served in India. It was he who induced Clive to risk the battle of Plassey (1757); in 1760 he defeated Lally at Wandiwash; and his capture of Pondicherry in 1761 completed the downfall of the French in India. Made a K.B. in 1770, Coote in 1779 assumed the command-in-chief in India, and in 1781, by his rout of Hyder Ali at Porto Novo, a second time saved the presidency. He died at Madras.

Cope, CHARLES WEST, subject-painter, was born at Leeds, 28th July 1811, the son of a landscape-painter. Educated at Marlow and Leeds, he studied at the Royal Academy and in Italy, and produced a long series of sacred, historical, and domestic subjects. He was elected an A.R.A. in 1843, an R.A. in 1848; and from 1867 to 1874 was professor of Painting. He retired in 1883. He was an original member of the Etching Club. He died at Bournemouth, 20th August 1890. See his Reminiscences (1891).

Cope, EDWARD DRINKER (1840-97), naturalist and palaeontologist, born in Philadelphia.

Cope, SIR JOHN, K.B., was a cornet in 1707, and in 1742 commanded the troops sent to assist Maria Theresa. On the landing of Prince Charles Edward in 1745, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland. After a fruitless march to the Highlands, he returned by sea to Dunbar, and on 21st Sept. was routed at Prestonpans. 'A little, dressy, finical man,' Cope died 28th July 1760. See Life by Cadell (1899).

Copernicus, NICOLAS, founder of the modern astronomy, was born 19th February 1473, at Thorn, in West Prussia, then a part of Poland. His father was a Germanised Slav, his mother a German; and Poland and Germany both claim the honour of producing him. Brought up under his uncle, the prince-bishop of Ermland, from 1491 on he studied mathematics, optics, and perspective at Cracow university, and in 1496 canon law at Bologna. In 1497 he was appointed canon of Frauenburg, the cathedral city of Ermland, on the Frisches Haff. The year 1500 he spent at Rome, where he lectured on astronomy, and (6th November) 'observed an eclipse of the moon.' In 1501 he began the study of medicine at Padua; in 1503 he was at Ferrara made doctor of canon law; in 1505 he left Italy for Prussia. 'Scholasticus' of Breslau till 1533, and canon of Frauenburg, yet he never became a priest. As medical attendant on his uncle, he lived with him from 1507 till 1512 in the princely castle of Heilsberg, 46 miles from Frauenburg, where he had toilsome duties. After his uncle's death in 1512, he lived at Frauenburg, not merely studying the stars, but executing with vigour and success the offices of bailiff, military governor, judge, tax-collector, vicar-general, physician, and reformer of the coinage. His difficulties were increased by the intrigues and wars by which West Prussia was restored to the Teutonic Knights and incorporated with Brandenburg. The De Revolutionibus, proving the sun to be the centre of the universe, he completed in 1530; in 1542 he was seized with apoplexy; and on 24th May 1543 the first printed copy of the work was touched by his dying hands. Copernicus also published a Latin translation of the Epistles of Theophylactus Simocatta and a treatise on trigonometry. See Lives by Gassendi (Par. 1654), Von Hipler (1873), Polkovski (Warsaw, 1873), and Dr Prowe (3 vols. Berlin, 1883-84).

Copland, JAMES (1791-1870), physician, was born at Deerness, Orkney, studied at Edinburgh, and settled in London in 1820. He wrote a Dictionary of Practical Medicine (3 vols. 1832), &c.

Copleston, EDWARD (1776-1849), born at Offwell rectory, Honiton, became a scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford (1791), a fellow of Oriel (1795), professor of Poetry (1802), provost of Oriel (1814), dean of Chester (1826), and Bishop of Llandaff and dean of St Paul's (1828). His Advice to a Young Reviewer is a piece of admirable irony. See Memoir (1851) and Remains (1854).

Copley, JOHN SINGLETON, portrait and historical painter, was born 3d July 1737, at Boston, Mass. His parents, both of English extraction, had emigrated from Limerick in the previous year. His mother in 1747 remarried a portrait-painter, Peter Pelham (d. 1751), and Copley at sixteen himself was executing portraits; in 1755 Washington sat to him. In 1766-67 he sent over works for exhibition in London; and in 1774 he left for England. He was well received by Reynolds, West, and Strange, and was commissioned to paint the king and queen for Governor Wentworth. Passing to the Continent in August, he studied in Italy, and returned to London in the end of 1776. His 'Youth rescued from a Shark,' presented by him to Christ's Hospital School, was followed by 'The Death of Chatham' (1779-80) and the still finer 'Death of Major Pierson' (1783)—both in the National Gallery. In 1789-90 he executed the immense 'Siege and Relief of Gibraltar,' now in the Guildhall. Among his other works are 'The Surrender of Admiral De Winter;' 'Charles I. demanding the Five Members,' now in Boston; 'Charles I. signing Stafford's Death-warrant;' and 'The Assassination of Buckingham.' Elected an A.R.A. in 1777 and an R.A. in 1779, he died 9th September 1815, leaving a son, the future Lord Lyndhurst (q.v.). See Lives by Perkins (1873) and a granddaughter, Mrs Amory (1882).

Coppée, FRANÇOIS (1842-1908), poet, was born in Paris. For three years a war-office clerk, he early gave himself to poetry, and with Le Reliquaire (1866) and Les Inimities (1867) gained the front rank of the 'Parnassiens.' Later volumes of poetry were Les Humbles, Le Cahier Rouge, Olivier (his one long poem), Les Récits et les Élégies, and Contes en Vers. His earliest dramatic poem, Le Passant (1869), owed much to Sarah Bernhardt, and was followed by Deux Douleurs, L'Abandonnée, Le Luthier de Crémone, La Guerre de Cent Ans, Madame de Maintenon (1881), Severo Torelli (1883), Les Jacobites (1885), and Le Pater (1890). Dramatic critic for some years to La Patrie, Coppée entered the Academy in 1884, and won fame in yet another field by his Contes en

Prose, Vingt Contes Nouveaux, and Contes Rapides. See study by Lescure (1889). [Kop-pay.]

Coquelin, Benoît Constant, actor, born a baker's son at Boulogne, 23d January 1841, was admitted to the Conservatoire in 1859, and having gained the second prize for comedy, made his début at the Théâtre Français, December 7, 1860. For over a quarter of a century he played here with unbroken success, both in classical pieces and in rôles created by himself, in the broader aspects of comedy standing without a rival. He died 27th January 1909.—His brother, Alexandre (b. 16th May 1848), also a member of the Comédie Française, died a fortnight after Coquelin ainé. [Kok-lan^d.]

Coquerel, Athanase Laurent Charles (1795–1868), from 1830 an eloquent minister of the French Reformed Church in his birthplace, Paris. His writings, all marked by earnestness and liberal sympathies, include a reply to Strauss (1841), six collections of sermons (1842–56), and Christologie (1858).—His son, Athanase Josué Laurent (1820–75), born at Amsterdam, was a still more 'advanced' theologian, and in 1862 was through Guizot's influence ousted from the ministry. He died at Fismes, in Marne. Among his works were an edition of Voltaire's letters on toleration (1863) and Jean Calas (1857). See Life by Stroehlin (Par. 1885). [Kok-rel.]

Corais, or Coray, Adamantios (1748–1833), Hellenist, born at Smyrna, abandoned mercantile pursuits, and in 1785 settled as a doctor in Paris. He published editions of Greek classics, Atakta, ou Mélanges sur la Littérature Grecque Moderne (5 vols. Paris, 1828–35), &c. See his Autobiography (Par. 1829–33) and posthumous papers and letters (5 vols. Athens, 1881–91); and a Greek Life by Therianos (3 vols. Trieste, 1889–90).

Coram, Thomas, philanthropist, was born at Lyme Regis, Dorsetshire, in 1667 or 1668. A shipwright seemingly, in 1694 he was settled at Taunton, Massachusetts, and in 1719 in London, after suffering shipwreck off Cuxhaven. In London he interested himself in the settlement of Georgia and in planting English artisans in Nova Scotia; but he had ere this begun his long agitation for the foundation of a founding hospital. Children were first admitted in 1741. More thoughtful for others than for himself, Coram fell into poverty, so in 1745 his friends raised an annuity of £161. He died 29th March 1751. His portrait was painted by Hogarth, a warm patron of his scheme.

Corbet, Richard (1582–1635), poet-bishop, the son of a gardener at Ewell, Surrey, from Westminster School passed to Broadgates Hall, Oxford, and thence to Christ Church. He had been vicar of Cassington, Oxfordshire, and Stewkley, Bucks, as well as a prebendary of Salisbury, when in 1620 he was made Dean of Christ Church. In 1624 he was consecrated to the see of Oxford, and in 1632 translated to Norwich. Corbet's Poems (1647; ed. by Gilchrist, 1807) reflect the jovial temper of the man. His longest piece is Iter Boreale, a holiday-tour of four students; the best and best-known is the Fairies' Farewell.

Corbet, Robert, a naval captain whose brutality to his men was hardly expiated by his gallant death in an engagement with two French frigates off Mauritius, 13th September 1810.

Corbet, William (1779–1842), born in County Cork, and expelled from Trinity College, Dublin, for treasonable conduct, entered the French army, and was made a general of division for his services in Greece during 1828–31. See Madden's United Irishmen (3d series, 1846).

Corbould, Richard (1757–1831), painter and book-illustrator, father of the landscape-painter, Henry Corbould (1787–1844), who was the father of the historical painter, Edward Henry Corbould (1815–1905).

Corday, Charlotte, whose full name was Marie Charlotte Corday d'Armands, was born at St Saturnin, near Sées (Orne), 27th July 1768. Of a noble family, she yet welcomed the Revolution, for from Voltaire she had imbibed 'philosophic' theories, from Plutarch ideas of antique heroism. But the Jacobins horrified her; and her hatred of their acts was intensified by converse with Girondists who had fled to Caen. She resolved to rid her country of one of the heads of the Jacobins, and came with that view to Paris. Whether to slay Robespierre or Marat was decided by the demand of the latter for two hundred thousand more victims. Twice she failed to obtain an audience, but on the evening of 13th July 1793 she was admitted on the plea of important news from Caen. She found Marat in his bath, and her pretended denunciation of the fugitive Girondists called forth the remark: 'I will have them all guillotined at Paris.' Straightway she drove her knife to his heart; he died with a stifled cry. Charlotte was brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal, where she gloried in the act. In the Conciergerie she sat to the artist Hauser; on the evening of 17th July she was guillotined. See works by Dubois (1838), Vatel (3 vols. 1872), Mrs Van Alstine (1889), Austin Dobson (1890), Mary Jeaffreson (1894), and R. Focke (1895).

Corderius, or Mathurin Corderier (1478–1564), Latin grammarian, was born in Normandy, turned Protestant, and settled at Geneva.

Cordier, Charles (1827–1905), sculptor, was born at Cambrai, and settled in Paris.

Corelli, Arcangelo (1653–1713), a composer, surnamed 'Il divino,' was born at Fusignano near Bologna; visited Paris and Germany as a violin-player; and ultimately settled at Rome. His concertos, sonatas, and minor pieces for the violin mark an epoch in chamber music, and had great influence on Bach. A selection of his sonatas was edited by Joachim. [Ko-rel'lee.]

Corelli, Marie, novelist, Charles Mackay's adopted daughter, was born 1st May 1864, and has written A Romance of Two Worlds (1886), Thelma (1887), Wormwood (1891), The Soul of Lilith (1892), Barabbas (1893), The Sorrows of Satan (1895), The Mighty Atom (1896), God's Good Man (1904), &c.

Coriolanus, Caius, or Cneus Marcius, a haughty Roman patrician, surnamed Coriolanus from his heroism at the capture of the Volscian town of Corioli (493 B.C.). The plebeians having refused to elect him to the consulship, he argued during a famine against the gratuitous distribution of the corn from Sicily unless the plebeians should give up their tribunes, but lately instituted. For this he was banished. He took refuge with the Volscians, and aided them against Rome. His victories alarmed the Romans, who on his approach (488 B.C.) sent deputations to plead with him. He was deaf to every entreaty. At last, the noblest matrons, headed by his mother Veturia, and his wife Volturnia, leading her two children, came to his tent. Their tears moved him, and he led back the Volsci.

Cormenin, Louis Marie de la Haye, Vicomte de (1788-1868), publicist, was born in Paris.

Cornaro, a Venetian noble family, two of whose members were: (1) CATERINA (1454-1510), married King James II. of Cyprus in 1472, after whose death eight months later she was kept in mild imprisonment by the Venetians until 1489, when she set up a kind of court for poets and scholars at Asolo, near Bassano.—(2) LUIGI (1467-1566), at forty finding his health much impaired by intemperance, adopted strict rules both in meat and drink, by which means he prolonged a cheerful old age almost to a hundred years. At eighty-three he published his famous Discorsi della Vita Sobria (Eng. trans. 1779). [Kor-nah-ro.]

Corneille, Pierre, greatest tragic dramatist of France, was born at Rouen 6th June 1606. Trained for the bar, he tried to obtain a practice in his birthplace, but in 1629 removed to Paris, where his comedy Mélite, already performed at Rouen, proved highly successful. It was followed by Citandre, La Veuve, La Galerie du Palais, La Suivante, and La Place Royale. In these early pieces intricate and extravagant plots are handled with ingenuity, but the writer's poetic genius flashes out only in occasional verses. For a time Corneille was one of Richelieu's 'five poets,' engaged to compose plays on lines laid down by the cardinal; among the pieces thus produced were Les Tuileries, L'Aveugle de Smyrne, and La Grande Pastorale. Corneille, however, was too independent to retain Richelieu's favour. Médée (1635) showed a marked advance on his earlier works; and in 1636 the Cid took Paris by storm. Richelieu ordered his literary retainers to write it down; but adverse criticism was powerless against the general enthusiasm. Horace, founded on the story of the Horatii, and Cinna, appeared in 1639; Polyeucte, a noble tragedy, in 1640; and La Mort de Pompée in 1641. Le Menteur (1642) entitles Corneille to be called the father of French comedy as well as of French tragedy. Théodore was brought out in 1645, and Rodogune in 1646. Between 1647—when he was made an academicien—and 1653 Corneille produced Héraclius, Don Sanche d'Aragon, Andromède, Nicomède, and Pertharite. These pieces, of which the last was damned, show a decline in dramatic and poetic power; and Corneille occupied himself with a verse translation of the Imitatio Christi. He returned to the stage in 1659 with Œdipe, which was followed by La Toison d'Or, Sertorius, Sophonisbe, Othon, Agésilas, Attila, and Tite et Bérénice (1670). In 1671 he joined Molière and Quinault in writing the opera Psyché. His last works were Pulchérie (1672) and Suréna (1674). After his marriage in 1640 he lived habitually in Rouen until 1662, when he settled in Paris. During his later years his popularity waned before that of Racine, an inferior poet but more dexterous playwright, whose cause was espoused by Boileau and the king. Corneille died in Paris 1st October 1684. The best editions are by Lefèvre (12 vols. 1854) and Marty-Laveaux (12 vols. 1862-67). See works by Guizot (1852; trans. 1857), Taschereau (1828; new ed. 1855), Trollope (Lond. 1881), Lodge (Balt. 1891), Bonquet (1888), Fagnat (6th ed. 1892), Liéby (1892), and Lanson (1898).

His brother, THOMAS (1625-1709), was born at Rouen, and himself was a dramatist of merit, his tragedies—Camma, Laodice, Pyrrhus, Bérénice, Timocrate, Ariane, Bradecante, &c.—being in general superior to his comedies. He also wrote a verse-translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses. He was made a member of the Academy in 1685.

Cornelisz, Lucas (1495-c. 1552), a Dutch subject and portrait-painter, was born at Leyden, the son of Cornelis Engelbrechtsen, the master of Lucas van Leyden. He was instructed in art by his father, but to support his large family had to act as a cook, whence his sobriquet of Kok ('the cook'). He visited England about 1527, and was appointed by Henry VIII. royal painter, but about 1532 passed to Italy, and during 1535-47 was employed by the court of Ferrara. JAKOB CORNELISZ, who flourished at Amsterdam about 1500-30, and CORNELIS CORNELISZ (1562-1638), of Haarlem, were also painters. Cornelius, Peter von, Neapolitan painter, was born at Düsseldorf, 23d September 1783, and in 1809 removed with his widowed mother to Frankfurt. In 1811 he went to Rome, and joined the group of Veit, Schadow, and Overbeck. While at Rome he aided in the decoration of the Casa Bartoldi, and gained wide reputation by two cartoons, 'Joseph interpreting the Dream' and 'Joseph recognising his Brethren.' From Rome he passed to Düsseldorf, where he became director of the academy; in 1819 he was called to Munich. Here he remained till 1841, and executed the large frescoes of Greek mythology in the Glyptothek and the New Testament frescoes in the 'Ludwig's Church,' which was built to give scope for his genius. In 1841 he was appointed director of the Berlin Academy. Among his productions at Berlin are the frescoes for the Campo Santo, or royal burial-place, the finest his 'Four Riders of the Apocalypse.' He died in Berlin, 6th March 1867. See Life by Förster (2 vols. 1874).

Cornwallis, Caroline Frances (1786-1858), daughter of a Kentish clergyman, mastered Latin and Greek thoroughly, and corresponded with many eminent persons. Her refusal to wed Sismondi did not forfeit his friendship, and she lived much in Italy. Her Philosophical Theories (1842) was the first of twenty 'Small Books on Great Subjects'—Ragged Schools, Criminal Law, Greek Philosophy, &c. She died at Lidwells, Kent. See her Letters and Remains (1864).

Cornwallis, Charles, Marquis, son of the first Earl Cornwallis, was born in London, December 31, 1738, and was educated at Eton and the Military Academy of Turin. Having served as aide-de-camp to the Marquis of Granby during part of the Seven Years' War, and been returned for the family borough of Eye (1760), in 1766 he was made a colonel, in 1770 Constable of the Tower, and in 1771 a major-general. Though personally opposed to taxing the American colonists, he accepted a command in the war, and with an inferior force defeated Gates at Camden in 1780, and more than held his own at Guilford (1781). But his operations were hampered by the incapacity of Howe and Clinton; and at length he was forced to surrender at Yorktown, Virginia, 19th October 1781—a disaster that proved the ruin of the British cause in America. In 1786 he was appointed governor-general of India and commander-in-chief, and distinguished himself by his victories over Tipoo Sahib and by unwearied efforts to promote the welfare of the natives. He returned from India in 1793, to be made Marquis. As lord-lieutenant of Ireland, with Castlereagh for secretary, he crushed the '98 rebellion and showed a rare union of vigour and humanity. As plenipotentiary to France he negotiated the peace of Amiens in 1802. Reappointed governor-general of India in 1804, he died at Ghazipur, October 5, 1805. See his Correspondence, edited by Charles Ross (3 vols. 1859), and his Life by W. Seton-Karr (1890).

Corot, JEAN BAPTISTE CAMILLE, landscape-painter, was born at Paris, 26th July 1796, and educated at Rouen. He became an assistant in a Paris drapery establishment, but in 1822 took up the systematic study of art. In 1825 he settled in Rome; in 1827 returned to Paris, and contributed his 'Vue prise à Narni' and his 'Campagne de Rome' to the Salon. His main sketching ground was at Barbizon, in the Forest of Fontainebleau; but he made two other visits to Italy in 1835 and 1843. His earlier productions are precise in execution, and it was not until about 1840 that he asserted his full individuality, and developed his style, characterised by great breadth and delicacy, and sacrificing accuracy of detail to unity of impression and harmony of general effect. He made way slowly, but wealth and fame came to him in the end. At the Salon he won medals in 1833, 1848, 1855, and 1867; in 1846 he received the Cross of the Legion of Honour, and in 1867 became an officer of the order. He died in Paris, 23d February 1875. Among his masterpieces are 'Danse de Nymphes,' 'Macbeth,' 'Homère et les Bergers,' 'Orphée,' 'Joueur de Flûte,' and 'Le Bûcheron.' See French Lives by Dumesnil (1875), Robaut (1880), Rousseau (1884), and Roger-Miles (1891), and an English one by D. C. Thomson (1892). [Kor'o.]

Correggio, ANTONIO ALLEGRI DA, was so styled from a small town 20 miles E. of Parma, where he was born about 1494, and studied art under his uncle and three other masters. In 1514 he painted for the Franciscan convent a 'Virgin Enthroned,' now in the Dresden Gallery; in 1518 he began his great series of mythological frescoes for the convent of San Paolo at Padua. From 1521 to 1524 he was engaged upon 'The Ascension' in the cupola of the Benedictine church of San Giovanni. The decoration of the cathedral of Parma was commissioned in 1522. Meanwhile Correggio was also much occupied with easel-pictures. Among these are the 'Ecce Homo' (National Gallery, London) and his very celebrated Adoration of the Shepherds, known as 'La Notte' or 'The Night,' commissioned in 1522, now in the Dresden Gallery, a work of marvellous softness and delicacy. Five years later he painted 'Il Giorno,' an exquisite picture of St Jerome (Parma Gallery). In 1530 Correggio removed from Parma to his native town, and purchased an estate. The 'Jupiter and Antiope' of the Louvre, the 'Education of Cupid' of the National Gallery, the 'Danae' of the Borghese Gallery, and the 'Leda' of the Berlin Museum, have been assigned to the painter's later years; the 'Reading Magdalene,' of which the picture in the Dresden Gallery is now regarded as merely a 17th-century copy, was completed in 1528. He died at Correggio, 5th March 1534, and was buried in the Franciscan church there. His only son Pomponio was born in 1521, and was alive in 1593. He also was a painter, and an altarpiece by him is in the Academy at Parma. See Julius Meyer's article in Allgemeines Künstler-Lexicon (1870; trans. 1876), a French Life by Mignat (2d ed. 1885), the Life by Corrado Ricci (trans. 1896), and that by Sturge Moore (1906). [Kor-rejfo.]

Corri, DOMENICO (1746-1825), composer, was born in Rome, in 1771 came to Edinburgh, and in 1787 removed to London, where he entered into partnership with his son-in-law Dussek (q.v.).

Corsen, WILHELM PAUL (1820-75), philologist, was born at Bremen, studied under Boeckh and Lachmann, was professor at Schulpforta from 1846 to 1866, and then settled in Berlin. His earliest great work is his treatise on the pronunciation of Latin (2 vols. 1858-59; 2d ed. 1868-70); the second (2 vols. 1874-75) tried to prove against the world that Etruscan was cognate with Latin.

Coort, CORNELIS (c. 1533-78), engraver, born at Hoorn in Holland, settled in Rome.

Cort, HENRY (1740-1800), navy agent in London, was also the inventor of 'puddling' processes, and a great ironmaster. Ruined by a prosecution, he was ultimately pensioned.

Cortes, HERNANDO, the conqueror of Mexico, was born at Medellin, in Estremadura, in 1485, of noble family, and studied at Salamanca. He sailed for San Domingo in 1504, and accompanied Velazquez in his expedition to Cuba. Fired by discoveries of Alvarado and others, Velazquez fitted out an expedition against Mexico, the command of which he gave (1518) to Cortes. The armament with which he entered on the conquest of the vast and civilised empire consisted of 550 Spaniards, some 250 Indians, twelve or fifteen horses, and ten brass guns. Refusing to obey orders sent from Velazquez to supersede him, he landed first at Yucatan, and fought his first battle at Tabasco. At San Juan de Ulua messengers from Montezuma, king of Mexico, reached him, bringing presents. Having founded Vera Cruz, and burnt his ships, he marched to Tlascalca, whose warlike inhabitants, subdued after hard fighting, became henceforward his faithful allies. After some delay he started on his march to Mexico, with his Tlascalcan allies; and at Cholula an ambuscade, prompted by Montezuma, was frustrated by his sleepless vigilance. On 8th November 1519 he reached the capital, a city situated in a great salt lake, and approached by three long causeways, with draw-bridges at the ends. At the lowest estimate its inhabitants exceeded 300,000. Montezuma was audaciously carried off to the Spanish quarters, and constrained to submit to a public act of vassalage to Spain, as well as to give gold to the value of 100,000 ducats. But meantime the Mexican hatred of the invaders was beginning to surmount their fear, and in the sixth month of his imprisonment Montezuma asked Cortes to depart. The conqueror craved delay; and learning that eighteen ships under Narvaez had arrived in the bay of San Juan, despatched against him by Velazquez, Cortes left Alvarado in command, and hastened with a handful of men to meet Narvaez, whose 800 men he easily defeated and induced to embrace his cause. And now he heard from Alvarado that the Spaniards were besieged in their quarters in Mexico. Cortes at once marched to his lieutenant's relief, and found himself face to face with a whole nation in arms under Montezuma's brother. A general attack was made upon him, and not repulsed without a desperate struggle. Montezuma died during the fighting. Cortes burned the two great idols of Mexico, but saw that he must leave the capital. The start was made at midnight, 1st July 1520; but in the difficult passage by pontoons over the gaps in the causeways, the Spaniards were assailed by such furious and overwhelming multitudes that the retreat became a confused and hopeless rout. In that awful night Cortes lost 450 Spaniards, forty-six horses, his artillery, 4000 Indian allies, and most of the Mexican prisoners. At Otumba, whither the miserable survivors retreated, they were once more encompassed with an innumerable host, but a desperate battle ended in victory. The exhausted Spaniards were kindly received by their Tlascalan allies, and Cortes proceeded to repair his disaster. He had still 550 foot soldiers, with forty horsemen and eight or nine cannon. Supported by 10,000 Indian allies, and with a fleet of brigantines built at Tlascalca, he began the formal siege of Mexico. After destroying innumerable canoes on the lakes, he made a series of simultaneous incursions along the causeways. The Mexicans were filled with the fury of despair, and although famine and pestilence fought for the Spaniards—fifty thousand Mexicans perishing during the siege—the city had to be destroyed before it could be taken. It fell at length, 13th August 1521, after a siege of several months. Cortes was formally appointed governor and captain-general of New Spain in 1522. He next sent out Alvarado to the conquest of Guatemala, Sandoval to the north, and Christoval de Olid to Honduras. The last rebelled, and Cortes set out to subdue him; but before his arrival Christoval had been assassinated, so he returned to New Spain (1526), to find Ponce de Leon invested with the powers of government. In May 1528 he arrived in Spain, was received with honour by Charles V., and created a marquis. He returned in July 1530 as captain-general, but not as civil governor, of New Spain. Poor and broken in health, he returned to Spain in 1540, accompanied Charles in his unhappy expedition against Algiers, and died neglected near Seville, 2d December 1547. His body, carried to Mexico in 1562, was finally deposited in Mexico city. See the Life by Helps (1871), and Prescott's History. [Kor-tays.]

CORVISART-DESMARETS, JEAN NICOLAS, BARON DE (1755–1821), Parisian doctor, professor at the Collège de France, and introducer of percussion in studying heart diseases, was born at Vouziers in Champagne.

CORY, formerly JOHNSON, WILLIAM (1823–92), the author of Ionica, Poems (1858–77; new ed. 1905), was assistant-master at Eton from 1845 to 1872, and died at Hampstead. See his Letters and Journals, edited by Cornish (1897).

CORYATE, THOMAS (c. 1577–1617), born at Odcombe rectory, Somerset, entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford, in 1596, but left without a degree, and after James I.'s accession lived by his wits, or rather his wit, about court. In 1608 he set out on a journey afoot of 1975 miles through Paris, Lyons, Turin, Venice, Zurich, and Strasburg, and in 1611 published Coryat's Crudities: Hastily gobled up in Five Moneths' Travels (new ed. 1905). Dedicating his travel-worn shoes in Odcombe church, he started for Constantinople, Greece, Smyrna, Alexandria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Persia, Afghanistan, and Agra. He died at Surat.

COSIN, JOHN, Bishop of Durham, was born in 1594 at Norwich. Educated there and at Caius College, Cambridge, he became a fellow, secretary to Bishop Overall of Lichfield, chaplain to Bishop Neill of Durham, prebendary of Durham, rector of Elwick, archdeacon of the East Riding, rector of Brancepeth, inaster of Peterhouse, Cambridge (1635), and dean of Peterborough (1640). An intimate friend of Laud, he had already come into collision with the Puritans about his ritualistic reforms, and, deprived in 1644 of his benefices, retired to Paris, where for nineteen years of exile he kept up a Church of England service. At the Restoration he recovered his preferments, and in December 1660 was consecrated Bishop of Durham. During his first seven years he spent £34,500 upon his two castles, his cathedral, the library at Durham, and deeds of general benevolence. Imperious in temper, he sternly repressed Puritan and Roman Catholic recusancy alike; for, however devoted to ancient ritual and order, he hated Popery, and never ceased to regret the perversion of his own 'lost son' who had turned Roman Catholic. He died in London, 15th January 1672. All Cosin's writings are inconsiderable save his Collection of Private Devotions (1627), which was denounced by Prynne in his Brief Survey of Mr Cosin's Cozening Devotions. A lasting service to the church was his contribution, invaluable from his profound liturgical learning, to the final revision (1661) of the Prayer-book. Cosin's works were collected in the 'Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology' (5 vols. 1843–55). His Correspondence was edited by Canon Ornsby (2 vols. Surtees Soc. 1868–72). [Cuz'n.]

COSTA, LORENZO (c. 1460–1535), painter, was born at Ferrara, and died at Milan.

COSTA, SIR MICHAEL, conductor and composer, was born at Naples, 4th February 1810. Trained at the conservatorio there, he settled in England (1828), and in 1831 his ballet of Kenilworth was produced with success. He was conductor at the King's Theatre (1832), at Covent Garden (1846), to the Philharmonic Concerts (1846), and to the Sacred Harmonic Society (1848). His oratorio Eli, produced at the Birmingham Festival of 1855 (where he conducted till 1879), raised him to eminence; Naaman, less successful, was first sung at Birmingham in 1864. From 1857 till 1877 he conducted at the Handel Festival, and in 1871 he became director of Her Majesty's Opera. He was knighted in 1869. Costa composed ballets and operas, including Malek Adhel (1838) and Don Carlos (1844). He died at Brighton, 29th April 1884.

COSTELLO, LOUISA STUART (1799–1877), authoress, was born in Ireland, and in Paris and London painted miniatures from about 1814 to 1835, when she published Specimens of the Early Poetry of France, in which she was aided by her brother DUDLEY (1803-65). But it was her bright descriptions of travel in Auvergne, Béarn and the Pyrenees, North Wales, Venice, and the Tyrol, that made her really popular. Her semi-historical novels on Catharine de' Medici, Mary of Burgundy, and Anne of Brittany were read in their day. From 1852 she received a civil list pension of £75 until her death at Boulogne.

Coster (c. 1370-1440), the usual name of LAURENS JANSZON, according to the Dutch the inventor of printing, who was born and died at Haarlem. He is supposed to have made his great invention between 1420 and 1426, to have been sacristan (Koster) at Haarlem, and to have died of the plague. No question has caused more discussion than that between Coster and Gutenberg; for the former's claim see Hessels' Haarlem the Birthplace of Printing (1888).

Cosway, RICHARD (1740-1821), miniaturist, born at Tiverton, studied art in London, and was elected A.R.A. in 1770, R.A. in 1771. He painted oil-subjects à la Correggio, but it was in portraiture that he made his mark, and soon his miniatures were 'not only fashionable, but the fashion itself.' The Prince of Wales appointed him painter-in-ordinary, and Mrs Fitzherbert and all the beauties sat to him. His small female full-lengths with the faces finished in water-colour, though slight in execution, are full of exquisite grace; and his ivory miniatures are delicate and valuable. Personally Cosway was vain and eccentric. In 1781 he married the Irish-Italian MARIA HADFIELD, herself a skilful artist. She separated from him, and died after 1826. See Daniell's Catalogue Raisonné of Cosway's Work (1890), and the Life of him by Williamson (1905).

Cotelierus, the Latinised name of the French patristic scholar, Jean Baptiste Cotelier (1629-86).

Cotes, ROGER, mathematician, born at Burbage, near Leicester, July 10, 1682, from St Paul's School, London, passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1705, and Plumian professor of Astronomy and Natural Philosophy in 1706. He was elected F.R.S. in 1711, and took orders in 1713. His admirable preface explaining the Newtonian philosophy, and answering objections to gravitation, is prefixed to the second edition (1713) of Newton's Principia. He died 5th June 1716. 'Had Cotes lived,' said Newton, 'we might have known something.'

Cotgrave, RANDLE, the author of our earliest French dictionary, was a native of Cheshire; was admitted scholar of St John's College, Cambridge, in 1687; became secretary to Lord Burghley; and was alive as late as 1682, in which year he carried the second edition of his dictionary through the press. The first edition had appeared in 1611, and editions revised by James Howell were issued in 1650, 1660, and 1673.

Cotman, JOHN SELL, a leading water-colour landscapist of the 'Norwich School,' was born 16th May 1782, and educated at Norwich grammar-school, till, about 1798, he went up to London to study art, and there made Turner's acquaintance. In 1807 he returned to Norwich, where he taught drawing and published etchings and engravings of local architecture, brasses, &c. In 1834 he became, through Turner, drawing-master in King's College, London, but his later years were clouded by much suffering. He died 24th July 1842.—His sons, MILES EDMUND (1810-58) and JOSEPH JOHN (1814-78), were landscape-painters. See Binyon, Crome and Cotman (1906).

Cotta, a publishing-house established at Tübingen in 1640. The family came originally from Italy. Its most prominent members have been Johann Friedrich (1701-79), theological professor at Tübingen, Göttingen, and Jena; and his grandson, Johann Friedrich, Freiherr Cotta von Cotten-dorf (1764-1832). Educated at Tübingen, and for some time an advocate, in 1787 he undertook the family business, and in 1795 established the famous Horen, a literary journal, under Schiller's editorship. Already in 1793 he had sketched out the plan for the Allgemeine Zeitung (1798). The Almanach für Damen (1798) and other periodicals were no less successful. Cotta now likewise published the works of Schiller, Goethe, Herder, Fichte, Schelling, Jean Paul, Tieck, Voss, the Humboldts, &c. In 1810 he moved to Stuttgart, and in 1824 introduced the first steam printing-press into Bavaria. In the diet of Würtemberg, and afterwards as president of the Second Chamber, he was ever the fearless defender of constitutional rights; he was, too, the first Würtemberg proprietor who abolished serfdom on his estates. He was succeeded by his son, Georg (1796-1863); and he by his son Georg Astolf (1833-76).

Cottin, SOPHIE, née RISTRAU (1770-1807), born at Paris (not Tonneins), married at seventeen a Parisian banker, who left her a childless widow at twenty. For comfort she turned to letters, wrote verses and a lengthy history, and in fiction won unfading laurels. She had already written Claire d'Albe (1799), Mathilde (1805), &c., when in 1806 she wrote Élisabeth, ou les Exilés de Sibirie, a story stamped with real unsought pathos. [Kotlan?]

Cottle, JOSEPH (1770-1853), from 1791 to 1799 a Bristol bookseller, remembered as the first publisher of Southey, Coleridge, and Wordsworth. His own verses are forgotten, but his Early Recollections (1837; 2d ed. 1847) is still a chief source for our knowledge of the Lake poets.—His elder brother, AMOS SIMON COTTLE (1768-1800), educated at Bristol and Cambridge, wrote various works, including Icelandic Poetry (1797).

Cotton, CHARLES (1630-87), the friend of Izaak Walton and translator of Montaigne, was born at his father's estate of Beresford in Staffordshire. His father, himself a man of great ability, was a warm friend of Ben Jonson, Selden, Donne, and other illustrious men. The boy travelled on the Continent, and early wrote verses which were handed about among his friends. In 1656 he married his cousin Isabella, sister of the famous Colonel Hutchinson. Though a sincere loyalist, he seems to have lived securely enough under the Commonwealth, and the decay of his father's estate was due mainly to unprosperous lawsuits. In 1664 Cotton issued anonymously his burlesque poem, Scarronides, or the First Book of Virgil Travestie, added to in later editions in grossness as well as in bulk. Later works are his Voyage to Ireland in Burlesque (1670), Burlesque upon Burlesque (1675), Planter's Manual (1675), and a treatise on fly-fishing contributed in 1676 to the fifth edition of Walton's Complete Angler. In 1685 appeared his translation of Montaigne's Essays—a masterpiece. See his Life and Poetry by Sombower (1911).

Cotton, GEORGE EDWARD LYNCH, D.D., born in 1813, was educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge, and from 1836 was a master at Rugby under Arnold and Tait; in Tom Brown's School Days he appears as 'the young master.' In 1852 he became head of Marlborough College, which he raised to a position among the first schools of England, and in 1858 Bishop of Calcutta, where his schools for the children of the poorer Anglo-Indians and Eurasians are monuments of the services he rendered to education. He was drowned in the Ganges, 6th October 1866. See Memoir (1871).

Cotton, JAMES SUTHERLAND, born in Madras Presidency, 17th July 1847, from Winchester passed to Oxford, and became a fellow of Queen's. Called to the bar in 1874, he assisted Sir W. Hunter (q.v.) in his works upon India, and edited the Academy from 1881 to 1896.

Cotton, JOHN (1585-1652), born in Derby, was a tutor at Cambridge, and from about 1612 held a charge at Boston, Lincolnshire. Cited for his Puritan views before Laud, he in 1633 fled to Boston, Mass., where he preached till his death. His works, nearly fifty in number, include a catechism, forms of prayer, and his defence against Roger Williams of the civil authority in religious matters.

Cotton, SIR JOHN HYNDE, BART. (c. 1685-1752), from 1708 to 1734 was Jacobite M.P. for the city or county of Cambridge.

Cotton, SIR ROBERT BRUCE, antiquary, was born at Denton, Hunts, 22d January 1571. From Westminster School (the famous Camden his master) he passed to Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1585. At Cotton House in Westminster, on the site of the present House of Lords, he accumulated books, manuscripts, coins, &c., and practised large hospitality. His papers read before the Antiquarian Society spread wide the reputation of his learning; King James knighted him in 1603, created him a baronet in 1611, and frequently consulted him. But he kept the scholar in prison for eight months in connection with the Overbury case (1615-16). Cotton, returned to parliament in 1604, from about 1620 identified himself with the constitutional opposition to the crown. His protest against the proposed debasement of the coinage (1626), his frank criticism of kingcraft in his Raigne of Henry III. (1627), his Dangers wherein the Kingdom now Standeth (1628), and the frequent meeting in his house of Eliot, Pym, Selden, and Coke, marked him out to the court as an enemy. A seemingly ironical tract, A Proposition to Bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments, having fallen into Wentworth's hands, it was found on inquiry that the original was in Cotton's library, from which a copy had been made, though without his knowledge. Cotton was flung into prison, but released on the occasion of the birth of an heir to the throne (29th May 1630). His library, however, was not restored to him; and he pined and died, 6th May 1631. Fourteen of his tracts were collected as Cotton's Posthuma in 1651.—His son, SIR THOMAS COTTON (1594-1662), had the books restored to him; and his great-grandson, SIR JOHN COTTON (1679-1731), in 1700 bestowed them on the nation.

Cotton, SIR STAPLETON. See COMBERMERE.

Couch, JONATHAN (1789-1870), Cornish naturalist, for sixty years doctor at his native village Polperro.—His son, RICHARD QUILLER COUCH (1816-63), was also a naturalist, an antiquary, and Cornish scholar, from 1845 a doctor at Penzance; and his son, SIR ARTHUR THOMAS QUILLER-COUCH, is the novelist 'Q.' who, born at Bodmin, 21st Nov. 1863, and educated at Clifton and Trinity, Oxford, settled in 1891 at Fowey. He completed R. L. Stevenson's St Ives, and wrote Dead Man's Rock (1887), The Splendid Spur (1889), Noughts and

Crosses (1891), Blue Pavilions (1891), The Delectable Duchy (1893), Is (1896), &c. [Kootch.]

Coucy, RAOUL OF RENAULT, CASTELLAN DE, a French Trouvère or court poet of about 1207-18, to whom fifteen poems are ascribed (ed. by Fath, Heid, 1833). He was named after the Château de Coucy, near Laon, and he it was, according to legend, whose heart was unwittingly eaten by his mistress, the lady of Fayel, through the device of her jealous husband. [Koos-see.]

Coulanges. See FUSTEL DE COULANGES.

Coulomb, CHARLES AUGUSTIN DE (1736-1806), born at Angoulême, experimented on friction, and invented the Torsion Balance for measuring the force of magnetic and electrical attraction.

Courayer, PIERRE FRANÇOIS (1681-1776), a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Rouen, and died in London, having had to leave France in 1728 on account of his defence of Anglican orders.

Courbet, GUSTAVE, the founder of realism in painting, was born at Ornans, Franche-Comté, 10th June 1819. In 1839 he was sent by his father, a well-to-do farmer, to study law in Paris, but the bent of his nature was towards art. In 1841 he took to landscape work, painting in the Forest of Fontainebleau. In 1844 he began to exhibit at the Salon; and his works created a great sensation in 1850. His hunting scenes and animal subjects are especially vigorous and spirited. In 1871 he joined the Commune, and was concerned in the destruction of the Vendôme Column (16th May), for which, next September, he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine for its restoration, his pictures being sold in 1877 towards that purpose. On his release he retired to Tour-de-Peilz, near Vevey, where he died 31st December 1877. See Lives by H. d'Iderville (1878) and Estignard (1897), and Muther's Modern Painting (1907-8).

Courier de Méré, PAUL LOUIS, a brilliant French writer, was born in Paris, January 4, 1772, and studied at the Collège de France and the Châlons School of Artillery. He then served for seventeen years in the army, but his interest lay wholly in study, especially of Greek. From the field of Wagram (1809) he was carried insensible to Vienna; thenceforth he devoted himself to letters. He settled at Florence, where he became embroiled with the Laurentian librarian over a MS. of Longus. The quarrel led to the Lettre à M. Renouard, in which Courier's incomparable ironic faculty was first revealed. He removed to Paris in 1812, and in 1814 settled on his estate of Varetz in Touraine. In 1816 he issued the Pétition aux Deux Chambres, a scathing exposure of the wrongs of the peasantry. He continued the attack in witty letters to the Censeur; his masterpiece, Simple Discours de Paul Louis, Vigneron (1821), derided the scheme to purchase Chambord for the Duc de Bordeaux by a 'national offering.' For this he underwent two months' imprisonment in Sainte Pélégie, where he got to know Béranger. On Sunday, May 10, 1825, he was found shot dead by an assassin. See memoir in Armand Carrel's edition of his works (4 vols. 1834) and an admirable essay by Mr H. Traill in the Fortnightly for Feb. 1877. [Koor-gay.]

Courtenay, SIR WILLIAM (c. 1796-1838), the name assumed in 1832 by a crazy Cornishman, John Nicholls Thom, who claimed to be a Knight of Malta, and who, having gathered a hundred scythe-armed followers, was shot in the 'battle' of Bosenden, in Kent, 31st May 1838. See Chambers's Journal for October 1838.

Courthope, WILLIAM JOHN, C.B., born at Malling vicarage, near Lewes, in 1842, was educated at Harrow and New College, Oxford, where in 1895-1901 he was professor of Poetry. In 1892-1907 he was First Civil Service Commissioner. Among his works are The Paradise of Birds (1870), Addison (1884), Life of Pope (1889), and History of English Poetry (6 vols. 1895-1909).

Courtney of Penwith, Lord (Leonard Henry Courtney), was born, a banker's son, at Penzance, July 6, 1832. Educated at St John's College, Cambridge, he graduated second wrangler and first Smith's prizeman in 1855, and became a fellow in 1856. In 1858 he was called to the bar, and from 1872 to his visit to India (1875-76) filled the chair of Political Economy at University College, London. He wrote for the Times, and his pamphlets and magazine articles placed him among the ablest and most advanced doctrinaire Liberals, an early advocate for proportional representation and a wide extension of local government. He was returned for Liskeard in 1876 and in 1885 for the Bodmin division of Cornwall. He was Under-secretary of State first in the Home and next in the Colonial Office, in 1882-84 was Financial Secretary to the Treasury, and in 1886-92 chairman of Committees and Deputy-speaker. In 1906 he was created a baron.

Courvoisier, BENJAMIN, a French valet hanged for the murder of his master, Lord William Russell (1767-1840). [Koor-vwahz-yay.]

Cousin, JEAN (1501-c. 1590), French sculptor, glass-stainer, and painter, was born at Soucy, near Sens. See two works by Didot (1872).

Cousin, JEAN, a navigator of Dieppe, for whom, and not Pinzon, has been claimed the discovery of Brazil in 1500. See article by Captain Gambier in Fortnightly for January 1894.

Cousin, VICTOR, philosopher, was born in Paris, November 28, 1792. Appointed in 1815 assistant-professor to Royer-Collard, he threw himself heartily into the reaction against the sensualistic philosophy of the 18th century, and became an exponent of the Scottish metaphysicians. In 1817 he visited Germany, and studied Kant, Jacobi, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. For his liberalism he was in 1821 deprived of his offices; and on a second visit to Germany in 1824-25 he was arrested as a Carbonarist at Dresden, and detained for six months at Berlin. On his return to France he took a decided stand against the reactionary policy of Charles X., and, reinstated at the Sorbonne in 1827, exerted great influence on numerous devoted pupils. During 1820-27 he published his editions of Proclus and Descartes and part of his celebrated translation of Plato. After the revolution of 1830, when his friend Guizot became prime-minister, Cousin was made a member of the Council of Public Instruction, and in 1832 a peer of France and Director of the Ecole Normale. In 1840 he was elected a member of the Academy, and became Minister of Public Instruction in the cabinet of Thiers. The revolution of 1848 found in Cousin a friend, and he aided Cavaignac's government. After 1849 he disappeared from public life, living for many years in the Sorbonne; he died at Cannes, 13th January 1867. His philosophy is eclecticism: sensualism, idealism, scepticism, and mysticism he held to be incomplete rather than false. His brilliant lectures and attractive personality revived the study of philosophy in France. Cousin's chief works are Fragments Philosophiques (1826), three works on the history of philosophy and ethics (1827-41), a treatise on Kant's philosophy (1842), Études sur les Femmes et la Société du XVII^e Siècle (1853), his famous Du Vrai, du Beau, et du Bien (1854; 23d ed. 1881), books on Aristotle, Locke, Kant, and Pascal, and his editions of Abelard and Pascal's Pensées. See works by Janet (1855), Jules Simon (1887; trans. by Masson, 1888), and Barthélemy St Hilaire (3 vols. 1895). [Koo-zanw.]

Cousins, SAMUEL, engraver, born at Exeter, 9th May 1801, in 1814 was apprenticed to S. W. Reynolds, the mezzotinter, and in 1826 started on his own account, and produced the 'Master Lambton' after Lawrence, which at once established his reputation. It was followed by a long series of admirable plates after Reynolds, Lawrence, Landseer, Leslie, Millais, Leighton, &c. He was elected an A.R.A. in 1835 and a Royal Academician Engraver in 1855; he retired in 1880. To the Academy he presented £15,000 to found annuities for poor artists. He died 7th May 1887. See Memoir by G. Pycroft (1887).

Coustou, the name of a French family of sculptors, including Nicolas (1658-1733), his brother, Guillaume (1678-1746), and the latter's son, Guillaume (1716-77).

Couthon, GEORGES (1756-94), born at Orcet, near Clermont, in Auvergne, was an advocate at the outbreak of the Revolution. Sent by Puy de Dôme to the National Convention, he, spite of his crippled limbs, made himself conspicuous by his shrieking hatred of the priesthood and the monarchy. He became a bloodthirsty partisan of Robespierre, and in July 1793 a member of the Comité de Salut Public. At Lyons he crushed the insurrection with merciless severity, and outdid himself after his return to the Convention with his frothy ravings against Pitt and England. Robespierre's fall brought down Couthon also; he was thrown into prison, delivered by the mob with whom he was popular, recaptured by the soldiers of the Convention, and executed, along with St Just and Robespierre. [Koo-tong'.]

Coutts, THOMAS (1735-1822), banker, was the son of an Edinburgh merchant and banker, who was lord provost in 1742-44. He founded the London banking-house of Coutts & Co. with his brother James, and on his death in 1778 became sole manager. Keen and exact in matters of business, although charitable and hospitable in private, he left £900,000. By his first wife, a servant of his brother's, he had three daughters, who married the Earl of Guilford, the Marquis of Bute, and Sir Francis Burdett; in 1815 he married Harriot Mellon (q.v.). See BURDETT-COUTTS, and a book by Richardson (1900).

Coventry, SIR JOHN, a staunch cavalier who had sat in the Long Parliament (1640), and at the Restoration was made a Knight of the Bath. Elected for Weymouth in 1667, he asked, during a debate on playhouses (Oct. 1670) a question reflecting on the king's amours. Charles and his minions were furious, and one December night Coventry was pulled from his coach and his nose slit to the bone. The 'Coventry Act' made maiming a capital offence. Coventry died in 1682.

Coverdale, MILES, born in Yorkshire in 1488, studied at Cambridge, was ordained priest at Norwich in 1514, joined the Austin Friars at Cambridge, and probably imbibed his liking for the new doctrines from the prior Robert Barnes, who was burned as a Protestant in 1540. According to Foxe, Coverdale was at Hamburg with Tyndale in 1529. His own translation of the Bible appeared in 1535, with a dedication to Henry VIII., and secured the royal license in 1537. The Prayer Book retains the Psalms of this translation, and many of the finest phrases in our authorised version of 1611 are directly due to Coverdale. In 1538 Coverdale was sent by Cromwell to Paris to superintend another English edition of the Scriptures. Francis I. had granted a license, but during the printing an edict was issued prohibiting the work. Many of the sheets were burned, but the presses and types were hastily carried over to London. Grafton and Whitchurch, the noted printers of that day, were thus enabled to bring out in 1539, under Coverdale's superintendence, the 'Great Bible,' which was presented to Henry VIII. by Cromwell. The second 'Great Bible,' known also as 'Cramer's Bible' (1540), was also edited by Coverdale, who on Cromwell's fall found it expedient to leave England. While abroad he married, received the degree of D.D. from Tübingen, and acted as Lutheran pastor in Rhenish Bavaria. In March 1548 he returned to England, was well received through Cramer's influence, and in 1551 was made Bishop of Exeter. On Mary's accession he was deprived of his see, but was suffered to leave the country, at the earnest intercession of the king of Denmark, whose chaplain, Dr Macchabæus (MacAlpine), was Coverdale's brother-in-law. From Denmark he passed to Westphalia and Geneva. Returning to England in 1559, he did not resume his bishopric, but was made D.D. by Cambridge in 1563, and in 1564 was collated by Grindal to the living of St Magnus, near London Bridge, which he resigned from growing Puritan scruples about the liturgy in 1566. He continued to preach, but died in February 1568. Most of Coverdale's works, including his letters, were edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. George Pearson (2 vols. 1844-46). See Memorials of Miles Coverdale (1838) and F. Fry's The Bible by Coverdale (1867).

Cowell, EDWARD BYLES (1826-1903), a great Sanskrit scholar, born at Ipswich, was educated at Ipswich grammar-school and Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and in 1856 sailed for Calcutta, to fill the chair of History in the new Presidency College, becoming also soon after principal of the Sanskrit College. He returned home in 1864, and was elected in 1867 professor of Sanskrit at Cambridge and in 1874 a fellow of Corpus. In 1896 Oxford made him a D.C.L.

Cowell, JOSEPH LEATHLEY (1792-1863), midshipman, portrait-painter, and comedian, was born near Torquay of the good old family of Witchett, and died in London, having from 1821 acted chiefly in America. See his Autobiography (1844). His son, SAMUEL HOUGHTON COWELL (1820-64), comedian and comic singer, was born in London, and died at Blandford; and a granddaughter was Miss Bateman (q.v.).

Cowen, SIR FREDERIC HYMEN, composer, born at Kingston, Jamaica, 29th January 1852, was brought as a child to England. He early showed decided musical talent, which was cultivated by a course of study under Benedict and Goss, as also at Leipzig and Berlin. Among his works are the operas Pauline (1876), Thorgrim (1890), Signa (1893), and Harold (1895); the cantatas The Rose Maiden, Sleeping Beauty, The Water Lily, &c.; oratorios (including Ruth, 1887); half-a-dozen symphonies, one of which, No. 3 (Scandinavian), is esteemed throughout Europe; a number of overtures, pianoforte pieces, and minor works, and over 200 songs. In 1888-92 and from 1900 he was conductor to the Philharmonic; in 1896 in Manchester, Liverpool, and Bradford. He conducted the Scottish Orchestra 1900-10. He was knighted in 1911.

Cowley, ABRAHAM, in his own day considered the greatest of English poets, was born in London, 1618, the seventh and posthumous child of a stationer. Attracted to poetry by the Fairie Queen, he wrote excellent verses at ten, and at fifteen published five poems. From Westminster School he proceeded in 1637 to Trinity College, Cambridge, and while here wrote, among many other pieces, a large portion of his epic the Davideis, its hero King David. During the Civil War he was ejected from Cambridge (1644), but at St John's, Oxford, studied for other two years. In 1646 he followed Henrietta Maria to Paris, was sent on royalist missions, and carried on her correspondence in cipher with the king. He returned to England in 1656, was arrested, released on £1000 bail, and, perhaps as a blind, took the Oxford M.D. (1657). On Cromwell's death he again went to Paris, returned to England at the Restoration, was disappointed in his hope of the mastership of the Savoy, but at length received a comfortable provision. He died at Chertsey, 28th July 1667, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Cowley's Davideis, Pindarique Odes, Mistress, and graceful essays are in Grosart's edition (1881), and Waller's (1905-6).

Cowley, HANNAH, née PARKHOUSE (1743-1809), who was born and died at Tiverton, from 1776 wrote thirteen lively dramatic works, including The Belle's Stratagem (1782), and several volumes of feeble Della Cruscan verse.

Cowley, HENRY RICHARD CHARLES WELLESLEY, EARL (1804-84), the son of the first Baron Cowley, a younger brother of Wellington, was secretary or ambassador to Vienna, Constantinople, Switzerland (1848), the Germanic Confederation (1851), and Paris (1852-67). He was created Earl Cowley in 1857 and a K.G. in 1866.

Cowper, WILLIAM COWPER, EARL (c. 1664-1723), became a barrister in 1688, M.P. for Hertford in 1695, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in 1705, Baron Cowper in 1706, Lord Chancellor in 1707 and 1714, and Earl Cowper in 1718, in which year he resigned, and from a Whig became a leader of the opposition.—His brother, SPENCER COWPER (1669-1727), M.P. and judge, was tried in 1699 for the murder of a Quakeress, Sarah Stout. See Paget's Paradoxes (1874). [Koo-per.]

Cowper, WILLIAM, surgeon and anatomist, was born at Petersfield, in Sussex, in 1666, settled as a surgeon in London, and died 8th March 1709.

Cowper, WILLIAM, was born at Berkhamstead rectory, Hertfordshire, 15th November 1731. Among his schoolfellows at Westminster were Churchill the poet and Warren Hastings; on leaving he was articled to an attorney, and called to the bar in 1754. In 1759 a sinecure appointment, as 'Commissioner of Bankrupts,' gave him a certain independence; in 1763 he was appointed Clerk of the Journals of the House of Lords. He had always been subject to fits of despondency; and the discovery that the appointment involved a so-called examination before the bar of the House unmanned him altogether. A fixed idea that every one was hostile to him took possession of his mind; and he several times attempted to make away with himself. He fell into a state of religious despair; but in a private asylum at St Albans he was restored by judicious treatment. In 1765 he drifted to Huntingdon, where he became an inmate in the family of Mr Unwin, a retired clergyman, who, with his wife and two children, lived a life of almost perpetual devotion, into which Cowper plunged, spending most of his time in religious exercises and correspondence.

Cowper continued to reside with Mrs Unwin after her husband's death (July 1767), but they soon removed to Olney, where John Newton, then curate, acquired complete influence over the gentle invalid; under him, Cowper worked among the poor, devoting his whole time to pious exercises and good works. In 1773 his insanity returned; in Newton's vicarage he remained for more than a year, refusing to return to his own house. After his recovery (never complete) he lost the companionship of Newton, who was presented in 1779 to a London rectory. The effect of his departure was miraculous; obviously the constant intercourse with him, aided by the sameness of life, had a depressing effect upon Cowper. The old gloom reappears in letters to Newton, while in correspondence with (young) Unwin he is full of playfulness. To the quiet of this period we probably owe the tranquillised state of mind which makes Cowper's poetry contrast so strangely with his early experiences. Mrs Unwin perceived that variety of occupation was necessary to Cowper; he followed with docility her suggestions, and when she bade him write poetry he did so. His first volume (1782) consisted of several poems on abstract subjects, a poetical dialogue called 'Table Talk' being added to enliven the book. It is to the playful command of a new and valued friend, Lady Austen, now (1781) living in Newton's deserted vicarage, that we owe Cowper's greatest work, The Task. She it was told him the story of John Gilpin (the poem appeared first in the Public Advertiser, 1784), and was his better angel. Cowper was apparently engaged to marry Mrs Unwin, but this project was defeated by a return of mental illness (not by Mrs Unwin's jealousy of Lady Austen, as is often said). How his friendship with Lady Austen was interrupted is not known, but in 1783 she retired to Bristol, and Cowper writing to (young) Unwin declared the friendly relations at an end. The Task, published in 1785, had a powerful effect on the literary tastes of the time; in it Cowper was the first to protest against the smoothness and artificial perfection Pope had established. In his blank verse he took that splendid instrument from Milton's hand, without Milton's grandeur of tone yet with a sweetness and serious power all his own; and in the poem we have Nature's very face painted by one who loved her for herself.

On Lady Austen's departure, Cowper partially fell into his old melancholy, until in 1786, a cousin, Lady Hesketh, appeared as necessary comforter; and his translation of Homer (1791) was carried on under her influence. She procured the removal of the sad poet and his ailing companion to Weston-Underwood, near Olney, where they received from the Throckmortons much consolation in their waning days. He also translated poems from the French of Mme. de la Mothe Guyon and the Latin and Italian poems of Milton; and sixty-seven of the Olney Hymns are his work. In 1787 he had another lapse, and again attempted suicide. From this attack he never completely recovered, and Mrs Unwin in 1791 had a stroke of paralysis. In 1794 a pension of £300 was assigned to him. When Mrs Unwin died in 1796 he heard the news not without emotion, and, growing gradually weaker, died peacefully, 25th April 1800, at East Dereham, Norfolk, his home for the last five years. Out of the gloom of his last waning years came two of his most beautiful and touching poems, 'To My Mother's Picture' and 'My Mary.' The standard edition of Cowper's works is that by Southey (15 vols. 1834-1837, 1853-54). Others are those of Grimsuawe (8 vols. 1835), the Aldine (1865), and the Globe (1870); editions of the letters by Benham (1884), of the poems by Bailey (1905) and Milford (1905); selections by Mrs Oliphant and Mrs Meynell. See Lives by Hayley (2 vols. 1803; 4th ed. 4 vols. 1812), Goldwin Smith ('Men of Letters' series, 1880), and Thomas Wright (1892). [Koo'per.]

Cox, DAVID, landscape-painter, was born at Deritend, a suburb of Birmingham, 29th April 1783. His father was a blacksmith, and he worked at the forge for a time; after studying drawing under Joseph Barber, he was a travelling scene-painter. He next took lessons in London from John Varley; in 1805-6 visited North Wales, which to the end of his life was his favourite sketching-ground; and taught as a drawing-master from 1814 to 1826 in Hereford, publishing A Treatise on Landscape Painting. In 1813 he joined the Society of Painters in Water-colours, to whose exhibitions he was a regular contributor. From 1827 till 1841 London was his headquarters, but he was constantly sketching in the country, and occasionally made brief visits to the Continent, executing water-colours of noble quality. In 1839 he turned his attention seriously to oil-painting, and executed about a hundred works in oil. These are less widely known than his water-colours, but they are of at least equal quality. In 1841 he settled at Harborne, near Birmingham, where he died 15th June 1859. It was during this period that he produced his greatest works. They mainly owe their inspiration to the scenery of North Wales, and especially of Bettws-y-Coed, which he visited every autumn. Among his oil pictures are 'Lancaster Castle' (1846); 'Peace and War' (1846), 18½ by 24 in., for which Cox received £20, but which fetched £3602 in 1872; 'The Vale of Clwyd' (1846 and 1848); 'The Skylark' (1849); 'Boys Fishing' (1849); and 'Bettws-y-Coed Church.' Among his very numerous water-colours are 'Lancaster Sands' (1835); 'Ulverston Sands' (1835); 'Bolton Abbey' (1847); 'Welsh Funeral' (1850); and 'Broom Gatherers on Chat Moss' (1854). His water-colour 'The Hayfield' fetched £2950 in 1875. See Lives by N. N. Solly (1875) and William Hall (1881).—His son, DAVID Cox the younger (1809-85), was also a water-colour painter.

Cox, EDWARD WILLIAM (1809-79), barrister, recorder of Helston and Portsmouth, spiritualist, and originator or proprietor of the Law Times, Field, Queen, and Exchange and Mart, was born at Taunton, and died very rich at Moat Mount, Middlesex. He published much on law, Conservatism, dreams, &c.

Cox, SIR GEORGE WILLIAM (1827-1902), solar mythologist, was educated at Rugby School and Trinity College, Oxford. He took orders in 1850, and after holding curacies in Devonshire and an assistant-mastership at Cheltenham, became vicar of Bekesbourne in Kent and afterwards rector of Scrayingham, York. In 1877 he succeeded to his uncle's baronetcy. Among his works are Tales of Ancient Greece (1868), Aryan Mythology (1870), History of Greece (1874), Comparative Mythology and Folklore (1881), Lives of Greek Statesmen (1886), and Life of Colenso (1888).

Cox, RICHARD (1500-81), reformer, was born at Whaddon, Bucks, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, and became headmaster of Eton, dean successively of Lincoln, Christ Church, and Westminster (1549), a refugee in Frankfurt (1555-58), where he contended bitterly with Knox, and Bishop of Ely (1559).

Cox, ROBERT (1810-72), of Gorgie, near Edinburgh, an anti-Sabbatarian writer.

Coxe, HENRY OCTAVIUS, librarian, was born at Bucklebury vicarage, Berkshire, September 20, 1811. Educated at Westminster and Worcester College, Oxford, he entered the manuscript department of the British Museum in 1833. In 1838 he became a sub-librarian of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, and in 1860 its head; here his marvellous knowledge and patient kindness made him the very ideal of the librarian. Already in 1857 he had been sent to the Levant on a tour of discovery, which resulted indeed in his finding many codices, though the grasping greed of the monks made it impossible to buy them. Coxe held several curacies near Oxford, and in 1868 became rector of Wytham. He died July 8, 1881. Among his works were editions of Roger of Wendover's Chronicle (5 vols. 1841-44) and Gower's Vox Clamantis (1850), and his Catalogues of MSS. in the Oxford colleges (1852) and of the Bodleian MSS. (1853-54). See Dean Burgon's Lives of Twelve Good Men (1888).

Coxe, WILLIAM (1747-1828), author of History of the House of Austria and thirteen other works of history and travel, was born in London, and from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1768. As tutor to the sons of four persons of quality, he spent much of twenty years on the Continent; and he died, a prebendary of Salisbury and archdeacon of Wilts, at Bemerton rectory.

Coxie, MICHAEL (1497-1592), painter, was born and died at Mechlin.—His son, RAFAEL COXIE (1540-1616), was an inferior painter.

Coxwell, HENRY TRACEY (1819-1900), aéronaut, born at Wouldham rectory, near Rochester, was educated for the army but settled as a surgeon-dentist in London. From boyhood he had taken a keen interest in ballooning, and in 1845 established the Aérostic Magazine, since then making some 700 ascents—the most remarkable in 1862, when he reached, with Mr Glaisher, a height of seven miles. See his My Life and Ballooning Adventures (2 vols. 1887-88).

Coyne, JOSEPH STIRLING (1803-68), playwright, born at Birr, King's County, died in London.

Cozens, ALEXANDER, water-colour painter, was one of the two natural sons of Peter the Great by a woman from Deptford who accompanied the Czar to Russia. After studying in Italy, he came to England in 1746, and died in London, 23d April 1786.—His son, JOHN ROBERT COZENS (1752-c. 1799), also a water-colour landscape-painter, in 1776 visited Switzerland, and in 1783 returned from Italy. In 1794 his mind gave way, and in his later days he was befriended by Sir George Beaumont and Dr Munro. Turner and Girtou copied his drawings, and Constable pronounced that 'his works were all poetry; that he was 'the greatest genius that ever touched landscape.'

Crab, ROGER (c. 1621-80), hermit, served (1642-49) in the Parliamentary army and then set up in business as a 'haberdasher of hats' at Chesham, Bucks; but in 1651 sold off his stock-in-trade, distributing the proceeds among the poor, and took up his residence in a hut, his sole drink water, and his food bran, turnip-tops, dock-leaves, and grass. He published The English Hermit, Dagon's Downfall, and a tract against Quakerism; and died at Bethnal Green.

Crabbe, GEORGE, poet, was born on Christmas Eve of 1754, at Aldeburgh, on the Suffolk seaboard. His father, 'salt-master' and warehouse-keeper, was a clever, strong, violent man; the mother, a meek, religious woman; and of three brothers, one perished captain of a slaver, another was lost sight of in Honduras. George, the eldest, got some schooling at Bungay and Stowmarket, then from 1768 to 1774 was surgeon's apprentice at Wickham-Brook and Woodbridge. In his first place he had to help the ploughboy; in his second he fell in love with Sarah Elmy ('Mira'), who lived with her uncle, a wealthy yeoman, at Parham. A spell of drudgery in his father's warehouse—nine months in London, picking up surgery cheaply—some three years' struggling practice at Aldeburgh—at last in April 1780, with £3 in his pocket, he sailed again for London, resolved to try his fortune in literature. Eight years before he had written verses for Wheble's Magazine; he had published Inebriety, a Poem (Ipswich, 1775); and now his Candidate soon found a publisher, unluckily a bankrupt one. A season of penury, dire as Chatterton's, was borne by Crabbe with pious bravery; he had to pawn clothes and instruments; appeals to Lords Thurlow, North, Shelburne, met no response; and early in 1781 he saw himself threatened with arrest for debt, when he made his case known to Burke. Burke proved a generous patron; from the hour of their meeting Crabbe was a 'made man.' He stayed at Beaconsfield; he met Fox, Johnson, and Reynolds; Thurlow gave him £100; Dodsley brought out his Library; and the very next winter he was ordained to the curacy of his native town. He resided as domestic chaplain to the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle (1782-85); married Miss Elmy (1783); held four livings in Dorset, Leicester, and Lincoln shires, but spent thirteen happy years in Suffolk, at Parham, Great Glemham, and Rendham (1792-1805); returned to Muston, his Leicestershire rectory; and his wife having died there in 1813, exchanged it the next year for Trowbridge in Wiltshire. His gentle, kindly life, in which botanising had given place to fossil-hunting, was broken now and again by visits to London; he witnessed the Bristol riots (1831), as fifty-one years before he had witnessed those of Lord George Gordon; and on 3d February 1832 he died at Trowbridge. Three novels, a treatise on botany, and poems untold all perished in grand yearly 'incremations;' but still Crabbe published The Village (1783), The Newspaper (1785), The Parish Register (1807), The Borough (1810), Tales (1812), Tales of the Hall (1819), for which last and the earlier copyrights Murray paid him £3000. An admirable life by his son, the Rev. GEORGE CRABBE (1785-1857), vicar of Bredfield, Suffolk, is prefixed to Crabbe's Works (8 vols. 1834). See also Sir Leslie Stephen's Hours in a Library, the works (ed. Ward 1905-7), Lives by Keble (1888), Ainger (1903), and (especially) Huchon (1907).

Crackenthorpe, HUBERT M. (1865-96), the author of Wreckage, Vignettes, &c., was found dead in the Seine. See his Last Studies (1897).

Craddock, CHARLES EGBERT, the pen-name of Mary Noailles Murfree, born about 1850 at Grantlands near Murfreesborough, Tenn. She has written In the Tennessee Mountains (1884), Where the Battle was Fought (1884), Down the Ravine (1885), The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountain (1885), Phantoms of the Footbridge (1895), &c.

Craig, ALEXANDER (c. 1567-1627), a worthless Scottish poet, was born at, and died near, Banff.

Craig, Sir James Gibson (1765-1850), an Edinburgh Whig, made a baronet in 1831.

Craig, Sir James Henry (1748-1812), a British general who served with distinction in America, the Netherlands, the Cape, Sicily, &c.

Craig, John, Scottish Reformer, was born in 1512, next year lost his father at Flodden, and was educated at St Andrews. He joined the Dominicans there, but fell under suspicion of heresy, and after a brief imprisonment (1536) went to Rome. Through Cardinal Pole he gained admission to the Dominican convent of Bologna; but Calvin's Institutes converted him to Protestantism. On 18th August 1559 he was lying in the dungeon of the Inquisition, condemned to suffer next morning at the stake, when Pope Paul IV. died, and the mob set the prisoners at liberty. A bandit befriended him; a dog brought him a purse of gold; he escaped to Vienna, and there preached in his friar's habit, one of his hearers being the Archduke Maximilian. Presently the new pope, learning his whereabouts, demanded his surrender; but Maximilian gave him a safe-conduct, and in 1560 he returned to Scotland. In 1563 he was appointed coadjutor to Knox; in 1567 incurred some censure for proclaiming, under strong protest, the bans between Mary and Bothwell: and in 1572 was sent to 'illuminate the dark places' in Angus and Aberdeenshire. He came back to Edinburgh in 1579 as a royal chaplain, had a share with Melville in the Second Book of Discipline, and drew up the 'Confession of Faith.' He died 12th Dec. 1600. See Memoir by T. G. Law prefixed to facsimile reprint of his Short Summe of the whole Catechisme (1883).

Craig, Sir Thomas (1538-1608), writer on feudal law, was born either at Craighntray (Aberdeenshire) or in Edinburgh. From St Andrews he passed in 1555 to Paris, and in 1563 was admitted a Scottish advocate, being next year appointed justice-depute of Scotland, and in 1573 sheriff-depute of Edinburgh. Besides an epithalamium on Queen Mary's marriage with Darnley, several more Latin poems, and the masterly Jus Feudale (1608; 3d ed. 1732), he wrote De Unione Regnorum (Scottish Hist. Soc. 1910), and Latin treatises on James VI.'s right to the English throne and on the homage controversy between Scotland and England. James wanted to knight him in 1603, and, on his declining, gave him the title off-hand. See Life by P. F. Tytler (1823).

Craigie, Pearl, née Richards ('John Oliver Hobbes'), novelist, born at Boston, U.S., in 1867, married 1887, in 1892 turned Catholic, in 1895 got a divorce, and died in 1906. She wrote Some Emotions and a Moral (1891); The Sinner's Comedy (1892); Study in Temptations (1893); The Gods, some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham (1895); The Herb-moon (1896); The Ambassador (a play, 1898); The School for Saints (1898); Robert Orange (1900).

Craik, George Lillie (1798-1866), born at Kennoway, Fife, studied for the Church at St Andrews, but came to London in 1826, and in 1849 became professor of History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast. Among his works were Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties (1831), History of Literature and Learning in England (6 vols. 1844), History of British Commerce (3 vols. 1844), Spenser (1845), Bacon (1846-47), The English of Shakespeare (1856), and History of English Language and Literature (1861; 9th ed. 1883).—His youngest daughter, Georgiana Marion Craik (1831-95), born in London, married Mr A. W. May, and from 1857 published over thirty novels—Lost and Won (1859) the most popular.

Craik, Mrs. Dinah Maria Mulock, the author of John Halifax, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent, 20th April 1826. Settling in London at twenty, she published The Ogilvies (1849), Olive (1850), The Head of the Family (1851), and Agatha's Husband (1853). She never surpassed or even equalled her John Halifax, Gentleman (1857), its scene laid at Tewkesbury, which has been translated into French, German, Italian, Greek, and Russian. A pension (1864) of £60 she set aside for authors less fortunate than herself; in 1865 she married Mr George Lillie Craik, nephew of the above-named and a partner in the publishing house of Macmillan, and spent a period of quiet happiness and literary industry at Corner House, Shortlands, Kent, where she died 12th October 1887. Much of Mrs Craik's verse is collected in Thirty Years' Poems (1881). She produced in all forty-six works—viz. fourteen more novels and several volumes of prose essays, including A Woman's Thoughts about Women (1858) and Concerning Men, and other Papers (1888).

Cramer, Johann Baptist (1771-1858), pianist, was born at Mannheim, the son of Wilhelm Cramer (1745-99), a musician who settled in London in 1772. From 1788 the son undertook concert tours on the Continent, and gained a high reputation. He founded in 1828 the musical publishing firm which bears his name, and after some years' residence in Paris died in London. Most of his compositions are forgotten, but his Studies is an important work. [Krah-mer.]

Cranach, Lucas, painter, so named from Kronach, near Bamberg, where he was born 4th October 1472. He seems to have been instructed by his father, and, becoming in 1504 court-painter at Wittenberg to the Elector Frederick, was ennobled. In 1509 he accompanied an embassy to the Emperor Maximilian, and while in the Netherlands portrayed the future Charles V. In 1537, and again in 1540, he was elected Burgomaster of Wittenberg. He repaired to Augsburg in 1550 to share the captivity of John Frederick, and on the Elector's release (1552) went with him to Weimar, where he died 16th October 1553. His paintings include sacred and a few classical subjects, hunting-scenes, and portraits. He was closely associated with the German Reformers, many of whom (including Luther and Melancthon) were portrayed by himself and his pupils. A 'Crucifixion' in the Stadtkirche, Weimar, is his masterpiece. His wood engravings are numerous. Of three sons, all painters, the second, Lucas the Younger (1515-86), painted so like his father that their works are difficult to distinguish. See German works by Heller (1821), Schuchardt (3 vols. 1851-71), Warnecke (1879), and Lindau (1883). [Kran'ach.]

Cranborne, Viscount. See SALISBURY.

Cranbrook, Gathorne Gathorne Hardy, Earl (1814-1906), was born at Bradford, the son of John Hardy, Esq., of Dunstall Hall, Staffordshire. Educated at Shrewsbury and at Oriel College, Oxford, he was called to the bar in 1840, and in 1856, after unsuccessfully contesting Bradford nine years earlier, was returned as a Conservative by Leominster. In 1865 he defeated Mr Gladstone in the celebrated Oxford University election; in 1878 he was made Viscount and in 1892 Earl Cranbrook. He was Under-secretary for the Home Department (1858-59), President of the Poor-law Board (1866-67), Home Secretary (1867-68), War Secretary (1874-78), Secretary for India (1878-80), and Lord President of the Council (1885-92). See Life by his son (1910).

Crane, STEPHEN (1870-1900), born at Newark, N.J., became known as a novelist through The Red Badge of Courage (1895).

Crane, THOMAS FREDERICK, folklorist, born in New York City, July 12, 1844, was educated at Ithaca, New York, and graduated at Princeton in 1864. He was appointed assistant-professor of Modern Languages at Cornell in 1868, professor of Spanish and Italian there in 1872, and professor of Romance Languages in 1881. His best-known work is Italian Popular Tales (1885).

Crane, WALTER, painter and socialist, was born at Liverpool, 15th August 1845, the son of a portrait-painter, Thomas Crane (1808-59). He himself was trained as an artist, and much of his work consists of book-illustrations. We may name his Toy-books (1869-75), The Baby's Opera (1877), The Sirens Three (1885), and Resurgence (1891), in both which last the poetry as well as the designs is his. In 1862 he exhibited 'The Lady of Shalott' at the Academy, and he was a constant contributor to the Grosvenor from its foundation in 1877. His pictures nearly always deal, in decorative and archaic fashion, with imaginative subjects, such as 'The Riddle of the Sphinx' (1887). He has also produced many very delicate landscapes in water-colours, and has designed wall-papers and decorations. He was art-director to the city of Manchester (1893-96), to Reading College (1898), and principal of the Royal College of Art, South Kensington (1898-99).

Cranmer, THOMAS, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born of a good old family at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, 2d July 1489. He learned his grammar of a 'marvellous severe schoolmaster,' who seems to have cowed his spirit: still, his father trained him in all manly exercises. By his widowed mother he was sent in 1503 to Jesus College, Cambridge, where in 1510 he obtained a fellowship. He forfeited it by his marriage with 'black Joan' of the Dolphin tavern, but regained it on her death before the year's grace was up; and taking orders in 1523, proceeded D.D., and became a divinity tutor. In 1529 the plague was raging in Cambridge, and Cranmer removed with two pupils to Waltham. Here he met Fox and Gardiner; and their talk turning on the divorce, Cranmer suggested an appeal to the universities of Christendom. The suggestion pleased Henry VIII.; so Cranmer became a counsel in the suit. He was appointed a royal chaplain and archdeacon of Taunton; was attached to the household of Anne Boleyn's father (Anne at the time being Henry's paramour); and was sent on two embassies, to Italy in 1530 and to Germany in 1532. At Rome the pope made him grand penitentiary of England; at Nuremberg he had married a niece of the Reformer Osiander, when a royal summons reached him to return as Warham's successor in the see of Canterbury. He sent his wife secretly over, and himself following slowly, was consecrated on 30th March 1533. He took the oath of allegiance to the pope, with a protest that he took it 'for form's sake.' In May Cranmer pronounced Catharine's marriage null and void ab initio, and Anne's, four months earlier, valid; in September he stood godfather to Anne's daughter Elizabeth. It was the same throughout the entire reign. Cranmer annulled Henry's marriage with Anne Boleyn (1536), divorced him from Anne of Cleves (1540), informed him of Catharine Howard's prenuptial frailty, and strove to coax her into confessing it (1541). Sometimes he raised a voice of timid entreaty, on Anne Boleyn's behalf, on Cromwell's; still, if Henry said they were guilty, guilty they needs must be. He did what he dared to oppose the Six Articles (1539), one of which made the marriage of priests punishable with death; but he failed to stick to his opposition, and sent away his own wife to Germany, whence he did not recall her till 1548.

A kindly, humane soul, yet he was not ahead of his compeers—More, for instance, or Calvin—in the matter of religious toleration. We cannot acquit him of complicity in the burning of Frith and Lambert for denying Transubstantiation (1533-38), of Friar Forest for upholding the papal supremacy (1538), of two Anabaptists (1538), of Joan Bocher for denying Christ's humanity (1550), and of a Dutch Arian (1551). With the dissolution of the monasteries he had little to do; but he bestirred himself in promoting the translation of the Bible and a service-book, in curtailing the number of holy days, and in negotiating an eirenicon with foreign Reformers. On the path, indeed, towards Protestantism, he was ever in advance of Henry VIII., though to Henry he surrendered his right of private judgment as completely as ever Ultramontane to Pope. Henry repaid him with implicit confidence, and twice saved him from the plots of his enemies (1543-45).

On 25th January 1547 Henry died, and Cranmer sang mass of requiem for his soul. He had been slowly drifting into Protestantism; but now the intruding tide swept him onward through all those religious changes by which the mass was converted into a communion—changes stereotyped in the Second Prayer-book of 1552. During this as during the preceding reign he meddled little with affairs of state, though he was one of the council of regency. What he did do was not too creditable. In gross violation of the canon law he signed Seymour's death-warrant; he had a chief hand in the deposition and imprisonment of Bishops Bonner, Gardiner, and Day; and won over by the dying boy-king's pleading, he reluctantly subscribed the instrument diverting the succession from Mary to Lady Jane Grey (1553). Herein he was guilty of conscious perjury, yet, the twelve days' reign over, he made no attempt to flee. On 14th September he was sent to the Tower, on 13th November was arraigned for treason, and, pleading guilty, was condemned to die. In March 1554 he was removed to Oxford. He bore himself bravely and discreetly in a scholastic disputation, as also upon his trial before the papal commissioner, whose jurisdiction he refused to recognise. In October from the jail he witnessed Latimer's and Ridley's martyrdom; and on 14th February 1556 he was formally degraded. And now in rapid succession he signed seven recantations, each more submissive than its predecessor. The last he transcribed on 21st March, and forthwith they brought him to St Mary's Church. If not before, he learned at least now from the sermon that he must burn; anyhow, when they looked for him to read his recantation, instead he retracted all that he had written. With a cheerful countenance he then hastened to the stake, and, fire being put to him, thrust his right hand into the flame, and kept it there, crying: 'This hath offended! Oh this unworthy hand!' Among Cranmer's forty-two writings, the chief of which have been edited by Jenkyns (4 vols. 1833) and Cox (2 vols. Parker Society, 1844-46), may be noticed his prefaces to the Bible (1540) and the First Prayer-book (1549); the Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum (1571); and A Defence of the Doctrine of the Sacrament (1550). See Narratives of the Reformation, edited by Nichols (Camden Society, 1859), with a sketch of Cranmer by Ralph Morice, his secretary; and Lives by Strype (1694), Gilpin (1784), Todd (1831), Le Bas (1833), Dean Hook (Lives of the Archbishops, vols. vi.-vii. 1868), Collette (1887), Mason (1898), Pollard (1905).

Cranworth, ROBERT MONSEY ROLFE, LORD (1790-1868), Lord Chancellor in 1852-58 and 1865-67, was the son of the rector of Cranworth, Norfolk, and graduated from Trinity, Oxford, in 1812.

Crashaw, RICHARD, religious poet, was born in London about 1613, the only son of the Puritan poet and clergyman, William Crashaw (1572-1626). From the Charterhouse he proceeded in 1631 to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and in 1637 became a fellow of Peterhouse. His Catholic leanings prevented him from receiving Anglican orders, and in 1644 he lost his fellowship for refusing to take the Covenant. He went to Paris, embraced Catholicism, and suffered great distress, until after 1646, through Cowley, he was introduced to Queen Henrietta Maria, who recommended him at Rome; and in April 1649 he became a sub-canon at Loretto, but died four months afterwards. In 1634 Crashaw published a volume of Latin poems Epigrammatum Sacrorum Liber (2d ed. 1670), in which occurs the famous line on the miracle at Cana: 'Nympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit' (the modest water saw its God and blushed); in 1646 appeared his Steps to the Temple, republished at Paris in 1652, under the title Carmen Deo Nostro, with 12 vignette engravings designed by Crashaw. His works have been edited by Grosart (1872-88), Tutin (1893 and 1905), and Waller (1904).

Crassus, LUCIUS LICINIUS (140-91 B.C.), orator, in 95 was elected consul, along with Quintus Scævola; and during their consulship was enacted a rigorous law banishing from Rome all who had not the full rights of citizens, which was one of the chief causes of the Social War. Crassus is one of the speakers in Cicero's De Oratore, and indeed represents the writer's own opinions.—MARCUS LICINIUS, surnamed Dives, the triumvir, born before 115 B.C., the son of a partisan of Sulla, who on the return of Marius and Cinna to Rome in 87 made away with himself. Cinna subjected the boy to a jealous surveillance, to escape which he went to Spain. He afterwards joined Sulla (83), and distinguished himself in the battle against the Samnites at the gates of Rome. As prætor he crushed the Servile revolt by the conquest of Spartacus at the battle of Lucania (71), and in 72 was made consul with Pompey, a colleague whom he hated. Cæsar valued the friendship of Crassus, the richest of Roman citizens. Plutarch estimates his wealth at over 7000 talents, and Pliny states that his lands were worth 8000 talents (say £2,000,000). About 60, Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus entered into the first triumvirate. In 55, as consul with Pompey, Crassus had Syria assigned him for his province, and in war against the Parthians, misled by a treacherous guide, he was utterly defeated in the plains of Mesopotamia. Retreating towards Armenia, he was beguiled into a conference with the Parthian general, Surenas, and slain. His head was sent to Orodes, who poured melted gold into the lips, saying: 'Sate thyself now with that of which in life thou wert so greedy.' See Oman's Seven Roman Statesmen (1902).

Cratinus (c. 519-424 B.C.), a Greek comic poet, who did not begin to exhibit till sixty-five. Next to Eupolis and Aristophanes, he best represents the Old Attic comedy. He limited the number of actors to three, and was the first to add to comedy the interest of pungent personal attack; even Pericles did not escape. Aristophanes repaid him in kind, but his allegation of habitual intemperance Cratinus himself admitted and defended humorously. Of his twenty-one comedies, nine of which obtained the first public prize, we possess only some fragments, collected in Meineke's Fragmenta Comicoorum Græcorum (Berl. 1840).—A younger CRATINUS, a contemporary of Plato, belonged to the Middle Comedy.

Cratippus, a Peripatetic philosopher, a native of Mitylene, and a contemporary of Cicero, whose son Marcus he instructed at Athens in 44 B.C. Pompey visited him after Pharsalia, and Brutus turned aside to Athens to hear him, even while making preparations to meet Octavian and Antony. Nothing that he wrote has survived.

Craven, LADY. See ANSPACH.

Craven, MRS AUGUSTUS (1808-91), Catholic novelist, was born in London, the daughter of a French emigré, M. de la Ferronnays, who after the Restoration was French ambassador at St Petersburg and Rome, and for a time French foreign minister. In 1834 Pauline de la Ferronnays married the young diplomatist, Augustus Craven (died 1884), a grandson of the Margravine of Anspach. Among her novels, written in French and translated into English, are Anne Severin, Elaine, Lina, and Lucia; but she is best known by her Récit d'une Sœur (1865), a record of tender affection, bereavement, and mystical piety. See Life by Mrs Bishop (1895).

Craven, WILLIAM (1606-97), a zealous adherent of the Queen of Bohemia, was the son of a London citizen, and in 1627 was created Lord, in 1664 Earl of, Craven.

Crawford, THOMAS (c. 1530-1603), of Jordan-hill, Renfrewshire, in 1570 captured Dumbarton Castle from Queen Mary's adherents by escalade.

Crawford, THOMAS, sculptor, born in New York City 22d March 1814, in 1834 went abroad for his studies, and settled in Rome, where he at first worked under Thorwaldsen. Many of his earlier groups have found a place in Boston collections; his later works include the fine Washington monument at Richmond and the bronze figure of Liberty surmounting the dome of the capitol at Washington. Stricken with blindness in 1856, Crawford died in London, 10th October 1857.—His son, FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD (1854-1909), novelist, was born in Tuscany. He had his education at Concord, N. H., Trinity College, Cambridge, Karlsruhe, and Heidelberg. At Rome he devoted himself to the study of Sanskrit, and during 1879-80 was engaged in press work at Allahabad, where he was admitted to the Catholic Church. His first novel, Mr Isaacs (1882), was succeeded by Dr Claudius (1883), A Roman Singer and An American Politician (1884), Zoroaster (1885), Saracinesca (1886), Marzio's Crucifix (1887), With the Immortals (1888), The Ralstons (1895), Casa Braccio (1896), The Heart of Rome (1903), &c.

Crawford, WILLIAM HARRIS (1772-1834), born in Virginia, practised law at Lexington, Georgia, and was elected to the state senate in 1802 and to the U.S. senate in 1807 and 1811. Appointed minister to France in 1813 and secretary of the treasury in 1816, he was a Democratic candidate for the presidency in 1824.

Crawford and Balcarres, ALEXANDER WILLIAM CRAWFORD LINDSAY, EARL OF, born at Muncaster Castle, Cumberland, 16th Oct. 1812, and educated at Eton and Trinity, Cambridge, succeeded his father in 1869. His researches into the annals of his own house enabled him in 1848 to establish his father's claim to the Crawford title as 24th earl (cre. 1398). A great book collector, he wrote Letters from the Holy Land (1838), Progression by Antagonism (1846), Sketches of the History of Christian Art (1847), Lives of the Lindsays (1849), and The Earldom of Mar (1882). He died in Florence, 13th December 1880; his body, stolen over seven months before from the mausoleum at Dunecht, near Aberdeen, was found in a wood close by in July 1882.—His son and successor, JAMES LUDOVIC LINDSAY, F.R.S., born 28th July 1847, was elected president of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1878-80, and received the Edinburgh LL.D. in 1882. In 1888 he presented to the nation the admirably equipped observatory at Dunecht; and the apparatus, with the magnificent astronomical library, was transferred to the new observatory (1896) on Blackford Hill, Edinburgh.

Crawford, GEORGE, who died at Glasgow in 1748, published a Scottish peerage in 1716.

Crawford, JOHN (1783-1868), orientalist, was born in Islay, and died in London, having served (1803-27) as an East Indian army doctor.

Crazer, GASPARD DE (1584-1669), a Flemish historical and portrait painter, born at Antwerp, lived first at Brussels and afterwards at Ghent.

Creasy, SIR EDWARD SHEPHERD, born at Bexley, Kent, in 1812, from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, and in 1834 was elected a fellow. Called to the bar in 1837, he went on the home circuit for over twenty years, and in 1840 was appointed professor of History at London University, in 1860 chief-justice of Ceylon, and knighted. In 1870 he came home invalided on a year's leave of absence, in 1871 went out again, but had to return finally in 1873, and died at Hampton Wick, January 27, 1878. He was author of The Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World (1851), Invasions of England (1852), History of the Ottoman Turks (1854-56), &c. [Krees-sie.]

Crébillon, PROSPER JOLYOT DE, dramatist, was born at Dijon, January 13, 1674, and educated in Paris for the law. His tragedy of Idoménée was successfully produced in 1708. It was followed by Atrée et Thyeste (1707), Électre (1709), and Rhadamiste et Zénobie (1711), his masterpiece. After writing several other pieces, Crébillon fell into neglect and produced nothing for over twenty years. He was then pushed forward as a dramatic rival to Voltaire by Madame de Pompadour, elected to the Academy, awarded a pension of 1000 francs, and appointed royal censor and a royal librarian. His Catilina was brought out with great success in 1748. Among his other works were Xerxes, Sémiramis, Pyrrhus, and Le Triumvirat, the last written when he was eighty-one. He died June 17, 1762. There are editions of his works by Perelle (2 vols. 1828) and Vitu (1885).—His younger son, CLAUDE PROSPER JOLYOT DE CRÉBILLON, was born in Paris, February 14, 1707. After writing a number of slight pieces for the stage, he acquired great popularity as an author of filthy fictions. In 1740 he married an Englishwoman, Lady Stafford. The indecency of his Le Sopha, conte moral, having offended Madame de Pompadour, he was banished from Paris for five years, but on his return in 1755 was appointed to the censorship. He died forgotten, April 12, 1777. [Kray-bee-yow.]

Credi, LORENZO DI (1459-1537), painter, was the fellow-pupil, lifelong friend, and executor of Leonardo da Vinci, and lived and died at Florence. He painted mainly Holy Families, and executed his works with great care. [Kray-dee.]

Crech, THOMAS (1650-1700), translator of Lucretius, was born at Blandford, became headmaster of Sherborne and rector of Welwyn, Herts, and hanged himself for love or penury.

Crech, WILLIAM (1745-1815), an Edinburgh bookseller, Lord Provost in 1811-13, who published the first Edinburgh edition of Burns, the works of Blair, Beattie, and Dugald Stewart, and Mackenzie's Mirror and Lounger.

Creighton, MANDELL (1843-1901), historian, born at Carlisle, from Durham School gained a postmastership at Merton College, Oxford, in 1862, and was elected a fellow in 1866. He became vicar of Embleton, Northumberland, in 1875, first professor of Ecclesiastical History at Cambridge in 1884, Bishop of Peterborough in 1891, and of London (1896). His chief works are Simon de Montfort (1876), History of the Papacy during the Reformation Period (5 vols. 1882-94), and the sumptuous Queen Elizabeth (1897).

Crémieux, ISAAC ADOLPHE (1796-1850), jurist and politician, born of Jewish parents at Nîmes, became a Paris advocate in 1830, in 1842 entered the Chamber, and in 1848 was a member of the provisional government. Imprisoned at the coup d'état, in 1876 he was made a senator. He founded the Alliance Israélite Universelle. [Kraym-yuh.]

Cresswell, SIR CRESSWELL (1794-1863), born in Newcastle, from 1858 was judge of the newly-created Probate and Divorce Court, and died in London through a carriage accident.

Crestien de Troies. See CHRÉTIEN.

Creswick, THOMAS, landscape-painter, was born at Sheffield 5th February 1811. He removed to London in 1828, when two of his pictures were exhibited at the Academy. Creswick loved to paint the streams and wooded dells of his native land; the figures introduced were often from the brush of Ainsdell, Cooper, Frith, &c. He was also a book-illustrator. Elected an A.R.A. in 1842, an R.A. in 1851, he died 28th December 1869. [Krez-ik.]

Creuzer, FRIEDRICH (1771-1858), born at Marburg, from 1804 to 1845 was professor of Philology and Ancient History at Heidelberg. His first and greatest work was his perversely ingenious Symbolik und Mythologie der alten Völker, besonders der Griechen (4 vols. Leip. 1810-12). See Life by B. Stark (Heid. 1874). [Kroit-ser.]

Crewe, LORD. See HOUGHTON.

Cribb, TOM (1781-1848), prize-fighter, was born at Bitton, Gloucestershire, and died at Woolwich.

Crichton, JAMES, the 'Admirable,' son of the Lord Advocate, Robert Crichton, was born at Ellilock, Sanquhar, 19th August 1560, and educated at St Andrews, where George Buchanan was his tutor, and where he graduated M.A. in 1575. He was for two years in France, apparently in the French army. In 1579 at Genoa he delivered a Latin oration before the senate; in 1580 at Venice he addressed a Latin poem to the then Aldus Manutius, who issued a handbill announcing a great scholastic disputation in which Crichton, athlete, scholar, poet, and linguist, was to take part. In 1581 (according to Aldus) Crichton went to Padua and overcame all the scholars there in public disputations. At the end of 1583 Aldus issued an edition of Cicero's De Universitate, dedicated to Crichton's memory. This evidence of his death was disbelieved, as a James Crichton, now known to have been a kinsman, was in Milan in 1584-85, and published Latin poems there. In 1601 Thomas Wright, in Passions of the Mind, related that when in Italy he heard that a young (unnamed) Scotsman, 'of most rare and singular parts,' was basely slain by an Italian prince in disguise. John Johnston, in Heroes Scoti (1603), states that Crichton was killed at Mantua by a son of the duke in a nocturnal brawl. This is proved by Mantuan state papers to have occurred on 3d July 1582. It is doubtful whether it was a deliberate murder, as the people believed, or whether, as the prince asserted, each claimed the wall, and failed to recognise the other before Crichton was mortally wounded and the prince's companion killed. Johnston first used the epithet 'admirable' ('omnibus in studiis admirabilis'); but Crichton owes his popular reputation mainly to Sir Thomas Urquhart, who wrote a fantastic account of him (Discovery of a most exquisite Jewel, 1652)—largely accepted by later biographers, including P. F. Tytler (1819), as well as by Harrison Ainsworth in a novel (1837). Even Aldus's testimony to Crichton's versatility is weakened by the fact that he was prone to extravagant praise. Crichton's extraordinary powers of memory are, however, corroborated by Burchelati, a physician of Treviso, in his Epitaphiorum Dialogi Septem (1583); and there is no reason to doubt his linguistic facility or his skill as a fencer. But his numerous printed Latin verses and prose essays indicate no special capacity. See D. Crichton in the Proc. Soc. Antiq. Scot. (1909). [Kri'ton; old Scotch, Krih-ton, the ch as in loch.]

Crillon, LOUIS DES BALBES DE BERTON DE (1541-1615), surnamed 'Le Brave,' was born at Murs in Provence. Under Francis of Lorraine, Duke of Guise, then the model of chivalry, he was trained for war, and, still a boy, covered himself with glory at the siege of Calais and the capture of Guines. He distinguished himself further at Dreux, Jarnac, and Moncontour. Wounded at Lepanto (1571), he was yet sent to carry the news of the victory to the pope and the French king. He abhorred the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but took part in the siege of La Rochelle in 1573. When the peace with Savoy was concluded, Crillon retired to Avignon, and ended his days in the exercise of piety and penance. See Life by Montrond (5th ed. 1874). [Kree-yon.]

Crisp, STEPHEN (1628-92), a Colchester Quaker propagandist, who travelled in Holland and Germany. See Life by C. Fell Smith (1892).

Crispi, FRANCESCO (1819-1901), statesman, was born at Ribera in Sicily, and was called to the bar at Palermo, but joining the revolutionary movement of 1848, had to flee to France. He organised the successful movement of 1859-60, and re-entered Sicily with Garibaldi. In the restored kingdom of Italy he became deputy, president of the chamber, minister, and in 1887-90, and again in 1894, premier—a member of the Left, strongly anti-clerical, and maintaining the alliance with Germany at the cost even of alienating France. In 1895 strenuous efforts were made to discredit him by connecting him with a series of bank scandals; in 1896 the Abyssinian disaster of Adowa compelled his resignation. [Kris-pee.]

Crispin, Sr, under the reign of Diocletian fled, with his brother Crispinian, from Rome and worked as a shoemaker in the modern Soissons, whilst striving to spread Christianity. In 287 he and his brother suffered martyrdom by being thrown into molten lead.

Cristofori, or CRISTOFALI, BARTOLOMMEO (1655-1731), harpsichord-maker, the inventor of the pianoforte, was born at Padua, and died at Florence. See Life by Puliti (Flor. 1874).

Critchett, GEORGE, ophthalmic surgeon, born in London in 1817, from 1846 was assistant-surgeon and (1861-63) surgeon to the London Hospital, and in 1876 became ophthalmic surgeon and lecturer at the Middlesex Hospital, where his operations acquired a European fame. He died in 1882, leaving a successor in his son, SIR GEORGE ANDERSON CRITCHETT (b. 1845), baronet (1908).

Critias, a pupil of Socrates, but rather a hearer than a doer of his word. On his return to Athens from banishment, he headed the oligarchical party, and was afterwards the worst of the thirty tyrants set up by the Spartans (404 B.C.). In the same year he fell at Munychia, resisting Thrasylbulus and the exiles. He had a high reputation as an orator, and besides wrote poetry.

Crivelli, CARLO (c. 1435-93), painter, born at Venice, worked much at Ascoli. At Lord Dudley's sale (1892) his 'Virgin and Child, with Saints,' fetched 7000 gs. for Berlin. [Kri-vel'lee.]

Crockett, SAMUEL RUTHERFORD, novelist, was born of farmer stock near New Galloway in Kirkcudbright in 1359, and educated at Castle-Douglas and Edinburgh University, becoming in 1886 Free Church minister at Penicuik, near Edinburgh. He resigned his charge for a purely literary career in 1895. From his college years, and during a residence abroad as tutor, he contributed to the periodicals, especially verse. A volume of poems by him, Dulce Cor, appeared in 1886, and in 1893 he attained to fame by his sketches, The Stickit Minister. The Riders (1894) had a great success, and was followed by Mad Sir Ughtred, The Play Actress, The Lilac Sun-bonnet (1894), Men of the Moss Hags (1895), Cleg Kelly (1896), Grey Man of Auchendrayne (1896), Lad's Love (1897), Lochinvar (1897), The Red Axe (1898), &c.

Crockford, WILLIAM (1775-1844), a London fishmonger, founded a famous gaming club (1827).

Croesus, the last king of Lydia, succeeded his father, Alyattes, in 560 B.C. He made the Greeks of Asia Minor his tributaries, and extended his kingdom eastward from the Ægean to the Halys. His conquests, his mines, and the golden sand of the Pactolus made his wealth proverbial. But his beloved son Atys was killed while hunting, and the only son left him was dumb; whilst Cyrus defeated and made him a prisoner (546). As to his death, nothing is known. [Kree-zus.]

Croft, SIR HERBERT, BART. (1751-1816), from 1786 vicar of Prittlewell, Essex, but from 1802 a bankrupt debtor on the Continent, wrote a memoir of Dr Young for Johnson's Lives of the Poets, besides Love and Madness (1780), &c.

Croft, WILLIAM (1677-1727), musician, born at Nether Eatington, Warwickshire, in 1700 became a chorister in the Chapel Royal, in 1704 joint-organist, and in 1707 sole organist. In 1708 he succeeded his old teacher, Dr Blow (q.v.), as organist of Westminster Abbey and choirmaster of the Chapel Royal; and in 1713 he took his Mus. Doc. at Oxford. Thirty of his anthems for state ceremonies were printed in 1724.

Crofts, ERNEST, R.A. (1847-1911), battle-painter, born at Leeds, was educated at Rugby, studied art in London and at Düsseldorf, and became Keeper of the Royal Academy.

Croke, RICHARD (1489-1558), an early Greek scholar, who was born and died in London, studied at Cambridge, Oxford, and Paris, lectured on Greek at Leipzig and at Cambridge after his return (1517) to England. Ordained a priest in 1519, he was sent to Italy (1529-30) to further Henry VIII.'s divorce, and in 1531 became rector of Long Buckby, near Daventry.

Croke, THOMAS W., D.D. (1824-1902), born near Mallow, in 1874 became R.C. Bishop of Auckland, New Zealand, and in 1870 Archbishop of Cashel. He was a strong Nationalist.

Croker, JOHN WILSON, was born at Galway, 20th December 1780, the son of the surveyor-general of Irish customs. After four years at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1800 he entered Lincoln's Inn, but in 1802 was called to the Irish bar. Two satires on the Irish stage and on Dublin society (1804-5) proved brilliant hits; so did his Sketch of Ireland Past and Present (1807), a pamphlet advocating Catholic emancipation. In 1809 he helped to found the Quarterly, to which he contributed 260 articles. He had entered parliament for Downpatrick in 1807; and now in 1809 he was rewarded with the lucrative secretaryship of the Admiralty for his warm defence of the Duke of York in re Mary Anne Clarke (q.v.). That post he held till 1830, and then retired with a pension of £1500. After 1832, he refused to re-enter parliament; he would not even take office under Peel, his old friend (1834); and with Peel he broke utterly on the repeal of the Corn Laws (1846). He died 10th August 1857. Among the seventeen works that he wrote or edited were his Stories for Children from English History (1817), which suggested the Tales of a Grandfather; the Suffolk Papers (1823); his Boswell's Johnson (1831); and Essays on the Early French Revolution (1857). He is better remembered for his onslaught on Keats, and Macaulay's onslaught on him (Macaulay 'detested him more than cold boiled veal'); and as the originator of the term Conservative, a founder of the Athenæum Club, and the 'Rigby' of Disraeli's Coningsby—the jackal of 'Lord Monmouth' (the Marquis of Hertford). See his Correspondence and Diaries, edited by Jennings (3 vols. 1884).

Croker, THOMAS CROFTON, Irish folklorist, was born at Cork, 15th January 1798, and in 1814 was apprenticed to a Quaker merchant, but four years later got a clerkship in the Admiralty through John Wilson Croker, a friend, though no relation, of his father's. He retained this post till 1850, and died at Old Brompton, 8th August 1854. As a boy of fourteen he had begun to collect songs and legends of the Irish peasantry; in 1818 he sent Moore nearly forty old Irish melodies; and in 1825 published anonymously his Fairy Legends and Traditions of the South of Ireland, a work which charmed Scott and was translated into German by the brothers Grimm (1826). A second series followed in 1827, and the whole reached a 6th edition in 1882. Of nearly twenty more works the best were Researches in the South of Ireland (1824), Legends of the Lakes (1829); reissued as Killarney Legends, 1876), The Adventures of Barney Mahoney (1832), and Popular Songs of Ireland (1839). See Life by his son, prefixed to the 1859 edition of the Fairy Legends.

Croll, JAMES, physicist, was born in 1821 at Little Whitefield, near Coupar-Angus. His received an elementary-school education, but in science was wholly self-trained. Successively millwright, insurance-agent, and keeper of the museum of Anderson's College, Glasgow, he was on the Scotch Geological Survey 1867-81. Made an F.R.S. and LL.D. in 1876, he died at Perth, 15th Dec. 1890. Among his works were The Philosophy of Theism (1857), Climate and Time (1875), Climate and Cosmology (1886), Stellar Evolution (1889), and The Philosophical Basis of Evolution (1890). See his Autobiography (1896).

Croly, GEORGE, LL.D. (1780-1860), poet, romance-writer, biographer, and preacher, was born at Dublin, and educated at Trinity College. He took orders in 1804, and coming in 1810 to London, in 1835 became rector of St Stephen's, Walbrook. From 1817 he published some forty works—the best-known the romance of Salathiel. See Memoir prefixed to his Book of Job (1863).

Crome, JOHN ('Old Crome'), landscape-painter, the chief of the 'Norwich School,' was born in that city, the son of a poor weaver, 22d December 1768. After serving as an errand-boy to a physician, he was apprenticed to a house-painter (1783); but through Mr T. Harvey of Catton procured employment as a drawing-master, and was permitted by him to study works by Gainsborough and the Dutch masters in his collection. He was mainly influential in founding, in 1803, the Norwich Society of Artists, of which he was president in 1808. He occasionally visited London, where he exhibited in the Academy and the British Institution; and a tour through Belgium and France in 1814 resulted in 'The Fishmarket on the Beach, Boulogne,' and 'The Boulevard des Italiens, Paris.' But his subjects were nearly always derived from the scenery of his native county, which, though founding on the Dutch landscapists, he treated in a singularly direct and individual fashion. His works realised only most moderate prices during his lifetime; but he is now recognised as one of the great English landscapists. He practised, though rarely, as a water-colour painter; and his etchings of 'Norfolk Picturesque Scenery' were published in 1834. He died, 22d April 1821, at Norwich.—His eldest son, JOHN BERNAY CROME (1794-1842), painted landscapes in a similar style, often sold for his father's.

Cromek, ROBERT HARTLEY (1770-1812), an engraver, born in Hull, published Blair's Grave with Schiavonetti's engravings after Blake. He visited Scotland to collect and publish the Reliques of Burns (1808) and Select Scottish Songs (1810), and meeting Allan Cunningham, published his fabrications in Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song (1810).

Cromer, EVELYN BARING, EARL (since 1901), maker of Egypt, was born at Cromer in 1841, and entered the Royal Artillery in 1858. He had been secretary to his cousin, Lord Northbrook, then Viceroy of India (1872-76), controller-general of Egyptian finance (1879-80), and finance minister of India (1880-83). In 1883-1907 he was consul-general and minister in Egypt. He is a G.C.B., K.C.S.I., O.M., was made a baron in 1892, a viscount in 1899, and took part in English public life. See Life by Traill (1897), and his own Modern Egypt (1908).

Crompton, SAMUEL, inventor of the spinning-mule, was born, the son of a small farmer, at Firwood near Bolton, Lancashire, December 3, 1753. When he was old enough, he assisted his mother (a widow from 1759) in the farm, wove, and fiddled at Bolton theatre. At twenty-one he was so much annoyed at the breaking ends of yarn that he set to work to invent a spinning-machine better than Hargreaves'. After five years' labour, in 1779 he framed a machine which produced yarn of such astonishing fineness that the house was beset by persons eager to know the secret. His machine was such that any mechanic who saw it could carry away the leading features, so he could not leave the house for fear of his discovery being stolen. He had spent every farthing he had; he had no funds wherewith to obtain a patent; and a Bolton manufacturer persuaded him to disclose the invention to the trade, under the promise of a liberal subscription: all that he got was £67, 6s. 6d. Soured by this treatment, in the course of time he saved money enough to begin manufacturing on a small scale at Oldhams, near Bolton, and latterly at Bolton, but not till his rivals had a hopeless start of him. After the use of the mule had told distinctly on British manufacturing prosperity, a sum of between £400 and £500 was raised for him by subscription, and efforts were made to procure him a national reward. Five thousand pounds was all he obtained in 1812, and he returned to Bolton almost broken-hearted. He tried bleaching at Over Darwen, then failed as partner in a cotton firm. Some friends purchased him an annuity of £63. He died at Bolton, June 26, 1827. See Life by French (2d ed. 1860).

Cromwell, OLIVER, was born at Huntingdon, April 25, 1599, the grandson of Sir Henry Cromwell, and great-grandson of a Welshman, Richard Williams, who took the surname of his patron, Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex. His mother was a daughter of Sir Thomas Steward of Ely, apparently quite unconnected with the Royal Stewarts. He was first-cousin to John Hampden. Educated at Huntingdon grammar-school and at Sydney-Sussex College, Cambridge, he seems to have carried away a modest share of classical and general culture, and went to London to study law. In 1617 his father died, leaving him a moderate estate at Huntingdon; and in 1620 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Bourchier, a London merchant. He embraced Puritanism in its most enthusiastic form, and supported the ministry of its proscribed preachers. In 1628 he sat for Huntingdon in the stormy third parliament of Charles, raising his voice against Romanising ecclesiastics; and then returned to farming at Huntingdon, whence he removed to St Ives and afterwards to Ely, where property had been left him by his uncle. He appears to have come into collision as a local patriot with the king's commissioners for the drainage of the Fens. He sat for Cambridge in the Short and Long Parliaments (1640); in the latter, though no speaker, he was vehement on the Puritan side. When war broke out (1642) he vigorously organised his district for the parliament; and as captain of a troop of horse fought at Edgehill. Now he formed his unconquerable Ironsides, combining rigid discipline with strict morality and organised enthusiasm. While the cause of the parliament was depressed elsewhere, his constancy, capacity, and courage upheld it in the eastern counties, which had formed themselves into an association. In 1644 he, under Manchester, joined the Scots before York, and at Marston Moor the charges of his cavalry decided the day. He now stood forth as the leader of the Independent and thoroughgoing party against the Presbyterian moderates; and while the Presbyterian and aristocratic generals were set aside by the Self-denying Ordinance, he, under Fairfax, led the new model army to decisive victory at Naseby, June 14, 1645. As representative of the army in its contest with the Presbyterian parliament, he marched on London, and coerced the parliament. It was no doubt under his directions that Joyce carried off the king from Holmby, though it seems that Cromwell desired to make terms with the king. As a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, the king, while he was negotiating with the parliament, was carrying on intrigues with his partisans in England and Scotland, which brought on the second Civil War and the invasion of England by Hamilton. After swiftly quelling the insurrection in Wales, Cromwell marched northwards, and totally destroyed the invading army of Hamilton at Preston. The soldiery now clamoured for justice on the king; and Cromwell, despairing of any arrangement with the faithless Charles, brought him to trial, and signed the death-warrant (January 1649). The Commonwealth having been established, Cromwell suppressed the Levellers, and was next sent to Ireland to end the civil war still raging there. This he did effectually, and on the whole humanely, though it cost some strokes of sanguinary severity, the necessity for which he himself deplored. On his return from Ireland he (Fairfax having declined) took the command against the Scots, who had called in Charles II. Invading Scotland, he was out-generalled by Leslie, and was in extreme peril, when a false move of the Scots enabled him to win the decisive victory of Dunbar. The royalists proper having marched into England, he followed, and on September 3, 1651, at Worcester, gained his victory which ended the Civil War—his 'crowning mercy.' He now declared for a constitutional settlement and an amnesty; while the parliament, reduced by revolutionary expulsions to the 'Rump,' was bent on perpetuating its own power. After fruitless negotiations Cromwell turned it out with unwise violence and contumely. Supreme power being now in the hands of himself and the other chiefs of the army, he called the Puritan convention, nicknamed the Barebones Parliament; but the Barebones Parliament proving too visionary and revolutionary, was dismissed, and supreme power reverted to Cromwell and his officers.

Cromwell was now declared Protector under an instrument which provided for government by a single person with one (reformed) House of Parliament and a Council of State, the Protector's nominees to which required election by the parliament (December 16, 1653). The Protector's power of legislating by ordinance till parliament should meet was largely used by Cromwell for reorganisation and reform. But when parliament met, it fell to questioning his authority, and he was compelled to exclude the disaffected by a test. His second parliament, from which the recalcitrants were excluded at the outset, offered him the title of king. Cromwell wavered; but the stubborn resistance of the republican soldiers decided him to decline the offer. The Upper House was, however, restored; the Protector was empowered to name his successor; fixed revenue was voted to him; and he was installed as Protector with a ceremonial resembling a coronation. When parliament met again, its two Houses fell into a collision which compelled Cromwell to dissolve it; and his power thenceforth rested upon the army, though it was his constant desire to revert to constitutional government. His protectorate was a perpetual conflict with republican resistance on the one hand and with royalist plots and risings on the other, while his life was constantly threatened by royalist assassins. Yet he was able to inaugurate a great policy, home and foreign. He reorganised the national church on the principle of comprehension, including all but Papists, Prelatists, and Antitrinitarians, while the ministry was weeded by commission. He upheld toleration as far as he could, and curbed the persecuting tendencies of parliament. For law reform he did his best. He united Scotland and Ireland to England, giving them both representation in parliament. Scotland, having free trade with England, enjoyed great prosperity under his rule. Ireland he sought to make a second England in order and industry, though his measures were high-handed. He saved the universities from the fanatics, put good men at their head, and encouraged letters. But his foreign policy brought him most renown. Under him the Commonwealth became the head and protectress of Protestant Europe. He made peace with Holland, tried to form a league of all the Protestant states, and protected the Waldenses. In the interest of religious liberty and commerce he allied himself with France against Spain. He took Jamaica, and Blake's naval victories over the Spaniards brought at once glory and treasure. His troops, with those of France, won the battle of the Dunes, and he obtained Dunkirk. He sedulously fostered British commerce, and by the hand of Blake chastised the pirate-states of Barbary. His boast that he would make the name of Englishman as respected as that of Roman had been justified. His court was simple and frugal, yet dignified; and though there was a strain of coarseness in his character (as illustrated in occasional horseplay), his bearing in public upheld the majesty of the state. His speeches are very rough and unmethodical, but they are marked by sense, force, and intensity. He was fond of music, and not without regard for art. It seems that his government was striking root; but disease and care, together with grief at the death of his favourite daughter, Lady Claypole, cut short his life. He died September 3, 1658, and the fabric of government which his mighty arm had sustained fell speedily to the ground. Of his greatness as a soldier and statesman there can be no question, but it is difficult to pronounce how far ambition mingled with higher motives; religious enthusiasm is often associated with fanaticism and self-deception. He was laid with great pomp in the tomb of the kings at Westminster, but after the Restoration his body was gibbeted at Tyburn and afterwards buried there. See Noble (1787) and Waylen (1892; new ed. by J. G. Cromwell, 1897) for the family history; Carlyle, Cromwell's Letters and Speeches (1846); Lives or Studies by Goldwin Smith (1867); F. Cromwell, RICHARD, born October 4, 1626, was the third son of Oliver, but by the deaths of two elder brothers, Robert and Oliver, became his father's heir. He was an amiable and popular but weak man, devoted to field-sports and pleasure. When the Protector had been empowered to nominate his successor, an effort was made to train Richard to the work of government, but in vain. Scarcely had he entered on the Protectorship when the forces of anarchy, both parliamentary and military, broke loose; finding himself unable to restrain them, and deep in debt, he abdicated in May 1659. After the Restoration he lived abroad as John Clarke; but he returned to England about 1680, and lived and died (July 12, 1712) at Cheshunt.

Cromwell, THOMAS (malleus monachorum, 'the hammer of the monks'), was born about 1485, the son of a Putney blacksmith, cloth-shearer, brewer, and innkeeper. During eight or nine years passed on the Continent (1504-12) he seems to have served as a common soldier, to have been befriended at Florence by Frescobaldi the banker, to have acted as clerk at Antwerp and to a Venetian merchant, to have visited Rome, and to have traded on his own account at Mildeburg. Anyhow, by 1513 he was back in England and married; there, step by step, he rose to wealth and importance as a wool-stapler and a scrivener, half usurer, half lawyer, having originally been bred to the law. Wolsey employed him as early as 1514; through Wolsey, probably, he got into parliament (1523); he was Wolsey's chief agent in the unpopular work of suppressing certain smaller monasteries for the endowment of his colleges at Ipswich and Oxford (1525); and finally he became his factotum and secretary. He was cheaply faithful to the cardinal, aiding him not only by quick-witted advice and by pleading his cause in parliament, but even with £5 out of his own savings. Withal, he made himself friends of Wolsey's enemies; and his fidelity ingratiated him with Henry VIII. Him Cromwell promised to make the richest king ever in England, and counselled him to cut the knot of the divorce by declaring himself supreme head of the church. Counsel and promise were carried into effect by the Act of Supremacy (1534) and by the dissolution of the monasteries (1536-89). To abolish papal authority, break the power of the church, humble the nobility, and make the king absolute, were Cromwell's aims; in their accomplishment he stuck at nothing. At heart, it would seem, still a Catholic—for so late as 1535 he bequeathed £46 for a priest to sing mass for his soul—he yet did his utmost to Protestantise the English Church; and that English 'Terror,' in which perished More and Fisher and hundreds of lowlier victims, set in with Cromwell's rise and ebbed with Cromwell's fall. Among the posts and honours showered on him were those of privy-councillor (1531), chancellor of the exchequer (1533), secretary of state and master of the rolls (1534), vicar-general (1535), lord privy seal and Baron Cromwell of Oakham (1536), knight of the Garter and dean of Wells (1537), lord great chamberlain (1539), and finally, on 17th April 1540, Earl of Essex. The hatred all men bore him, the Catholic reaction, and Henry's aversion to Anne of Cleves, the coarse Lutheran consort of Cromwell's choosing, combined to effect his ruin: less than eight weeks after his elevation to the earldom he was sent to the Tower. His entreaties for 'Mercy, mercy!' availed him nothing; as little did his filthy revelations of Henry's discourse with him touching Anne of Cleves. Condemned under a bill of attainder, he was bunglingly beheaded on Tower Hill, 28th July 1540. See Life by Merriman (1902).

Crook, GEORGE, American soldier, born in Ohio in 1828, graduated at West Point in 1852, served in California till 1861, and was actively engaged throughout the civil war, in which he rose to the rank of major-general. He served against the Indians in Idaho (1866-72), in Arizona (1872-75), and crushed the great rising in Wyoming and Montana (1875-77). He died 21st March 1890.

Crookes, SIR WILLIAM (kt. 1897), O.M., born

In London in 1832, was a pupil and assistant of Hoffmann at the Royal College of Chemistry, next superintended the meteorological department of the Radcliffe Observatory, Oxford, and from 1855 lectured on Chemistry at the Science College, Chester. In 1859 he founded the Chemical News, and in 1864 became also editor of the Quarterly Journal of Science. He was elected F.R.S. in 1863 and vice-president of the Chemical Society in 1876, and in 1880 was awarded by the Académie des Sciences 3000 francs and a gold medal. In 1898 he was president of the British Association at Bristol. He is a high authority on sanitation; discovered the metal thallium in 1861, the sodium amalgamation process in 1865, &c.; improved vacuum tubes and promoted electric lighting; invented the radiometer (1873-76); and is the author of Select Methods of Chemical Analysis (1871), and of works on beetroot sugar, dyeing, and calico-printing. His spiritualistic faith is expounded in Researches in the Phenomena of Spiritualism (1874).

Cross, MARIAN. See ELIOT, GEORGE.

Cross, RICHARD ASSHETON CROSS, VISCOUNT, born at Red Scar, Preston, 30th May 1823, was educated at Rugby and Trinity, Cambridge, and called to the bar in 1849. Entering parliament as a Conservative in 1857, he was home secretary (1874-80 and 1885-86), in 1886 was made a viscount, then to 1892 was secretary of state for India, and in 1895-1900 was lord privy seal.

Crosse, ANDREW (1784-1855), electrician, born at Fyne Court, Somerset, was educated at Bristol and at Brasenose, Oxford. His principal researches were as to the artificial formation of minerals by processes of electrical deposition and the improvement of wines, cider, &c., by electricity. His announcement in 1837 that under certain circumstances organisms (of the genus Acarus) appeared in solutions of inorganic substances excited much attention but more ridicule. See Memoir (1857) by his second wife (d. 1895), and her Red Letter Days of my Life (1892).

Crossley, SIR FRANCIS (1817-72), carpet-manufacturer and philanthropist, was born and died at Halifax, for which he was Liberal M.P. from 1852 till 1859 (then for the West Riding), and to which he presented a public park (1857) at a cost of £41,000, besides almshouses and an orphanage. He was made a baronet in 1863.

Crotch, WILLIAM, composer, was born at Norwich, 5th July 1775. A carpenter's son, at two he could play God Save the King, and in 1779 was performing in London as a musical prodigy. In 1797 he became professor of Music at Oxford, and in 1822 first principal of the Royal Academy of Music. He composed many pieces for the organ and piano, two oratorios, ten anthems, &c., and wrote Elements of Musical Composition (1812) and Styles of Music of all Ages (1807-18). He died suddenly at Taunton, 29th December 1847.

Crowe, CATHERINE, née STEVENS (1800-76), born at Borough Green, Kent, in 1822 married Lieut.-col. Crowe, and spent great part of her after-life in Edinburgh. Her mind was morbid and despondent, ever hovering on the border-line of insanity, which it crossed once in one violent but brief attack. Her translation of Kerner's Seeress of Prevorst (1845) prepared the way for her well-known Night-side of Nature (1848), a collection of stories of the supernatural. She wrote also tragedies, juvenile books, and novels—the best Susan Hopley (1841) and Lilly Dawson (1847).

Crowe, MRS. See BATEMAN, KATE JOSEPHINE.

Crowe, SIR JOSEPH ARCHER, art-writer, born in London, 20th October 1825, studied art for seven years in Paris and travelled on the Continent, where in 1847 he met Cavalcaselle (q. v.). He was a special correspondent in the Crimea, Indian Mutiny, and the Franco-Austrian war; and in 1857-59 was director of the School of Art at Bombay. In 1860 he was appointed consul-general at Leipzig and afterwards at Düsseldorf; in 1882 commercial attaché at Paris. Made a G.B. in 1885, a K.C.M.G. in 1890, he died at Würzburg, 7th Sept. 1896. See his Reminiscences (1895).

Crowquill, ALFRED. See FORRESTER.

Crowther, SAMUEL ADAJAI (1812-91), bishop of the Niger territory, born in Ochugu, to the east of Dahomey, was carried off as a slave in 1819, and sold more than once, but taken by a British man-of-war and landed at Sierra Leone in 1822. He was baptised in 1825, taking the name of a London vicar; conducted a mission school at Regent's Town; accompanied the Niger expeditions of 1841 and 1854; was ordained in London in 1842, and consecrated bishop in 1864. A D.D. of Oxford, he translated the Bible into Yoruba. See his Life (1888).

Cruden, ALEXANDER, born at Aberdeen, 31st May 1701, took his M.A. at Marischal College, but for a short time was under restraint. On his release he left Aberdeen, and, after ten years' tutoring, in 1732 started as a bookseller in London. In 1737 appeared his admirable Concordance of the Holy Scriptures. It was dedicated to Queen Caroline, who promised to 'remember him,' but died a few days later. Cruden now relapsed into insanity, and for ten weeks was kept in a madhouse, as again for a fortnight in 1753. Earning meanwhile his livelihood as a press-reader, he assumed the title of 'Alexander the Corrector,' and in 1755 began to go through the country reproving Sabbath-breaking and profanity. But many a good and kindly action was interwoven with his crack-brained courtships, his dreams of knighthood and a seat in parliament. He was just back from a visit to Aberdeen when he died at his prayers in his Islington lodgings, 1st November 1770. See Life by A. Chalmers, prefixed since 1824 to the Concordance.

Cruikshank, GEORGE, was born in London, September 27, 1792, the son of Isaac Cruikshank (c. 1756-1811), who, as well as his eldest son, ISAAC ROBERT CRUIKSHANK (1789-1856), was also a caricaturist. He thought at first of the sea as a profession, but, some of his sketches having come under the notice of a publisher, was induced to illustrate children's books and songs. The Scourge (1811-16) afforded scope for his genius, and from thenceforth he pursued this his true vein. His illustrations for Hone's political squibs attracted attention; but in the exquisite series of coloured etchings contributed to the Humorist (1819-21), and in the etchings to the Points of Humour (1823-24), his true artistic power began to be visible. This finest period of his art culminated in the etchings to Peter Schlemihl (1823) and to Grimm's German Popular Stories (1824-26), which latter, now extremely scarce, was reproduced in 1868, with a preface by Mr Ruskin. Similar in artistic aims and method are the spirited little woodcuts contributed to Italian Tales (1824), Mornings at Bow Street (1824-27), and Clark's Three Courses and a Dessert (1830). His numerous plates in Bentley's Miscellany and Ainsworth's Magazine mark a third period, in which he aimed at greater elaboration and completeness, and frequently attained great power of tragic design. The finest specimens of this period are the great series to Dickens's Oliver Twist and Ainsworth's Jack Sheppard, Guy Fawkes, The Tower of London, Windsor Castle, and The Miser's Daughter, of which, as of Oliver Twist, he thirty years afterwards claimed the chief authorship. Among the best productions of his later years are the large and elaborate etchings to Brough's Life of Sir John Falstaff (1858). As a water-colourist he left work marked by considerable skill and delicacy; and in his late years he devoted himself to oil-painting, showing more humour, fervour, and inventive ability than artistic power. His 'Worship of Bacchus' (1862) is a vigorous protest against drunkenness; and to the cause of temperance he also devoted many of his designs, especially the powerful series of The Bottle (1847). He died 1st February 1878, and is buried in St Paul's. There are collections of his works in the British Museum, Royal Aquarium, and South Kensington Museum. The last, presented in 1884 by his widow, numbers 3481 items. See G. W. Reid's Catalogue (8 vols. 1871), Marchmont's The Three Cruikshanks (1898), and Lives by Bates (2d ed. 1879), Jerrold (2d ed. 1883), and Stephens (1891). [Krook-shank.]

Crusenstolpe, MAGNUS JAKOB (1795 - 1865), political writer and novelist, was born at Jönköping, and died at Stockholm. [Kroo-sen-stol'pay.]

Crusius, CHRISTIAN AUGUST (1715-75), philosopher, died a professor at Leipzig. [Kroo-zi-ooos.]

Cruveilhier, JEAN (1791-1874), born at Limoges, became professor of Pathology at Montpellier in 1824 and of Pathological Anatomy in Paris in 1836. [Kree-vayl'yay.]

Csoma de Körös, ALEXANDER (1784-1836), a Hungarian traveller and philologist, born in the Transylvanian village of Körös, studied at Nagy-Enyed and Göttingen. In 1820 he started for Central Asia, finding his way in Asiatic dress by Bagdad and Teheran to Bokhara, thence by Kabul and Lahore to Cashmere and Tibet, which he visited for the third time (1827-31). At Calcutta he completed his Tibetan grammar and dictionary and was appointed librarian to the Asiatic Society, but in January 1836 he started on another journey to Tibet, only to die of fever six days after reaching Darjeeling. See English Life by Dr Theodore Duka (1885). [Chó'mo.]

Ctesias, a Greek historian of Persia, was physician to Artaxerxes Mnemon, and accompanied him in the expedition against his rebellious brother Cyrus, 401 B.C. See Gilmore's edition of The Fragments of Ktesias' Persika (1888).

Ctesibius, a Greek inventor in mechanics, flourished at Alexandria about 250 B.C.

Cubitt, SIR WILLIAM (1785-1861), born at Dilham, Norfolk, had been a miller, cabinet-maker, and millwright until 1812, and then chief-engineer in Ransome's works at Ipswich, in which he was a partner 1821-26. He removed to London in 1823. The Bute docks at Cardiff, the South-Eastern Railway, and the Berlin water-works were by him. He also invented the treadmill; and for his services in connection with the Great Exhibition buildings he was knighted in 1851.

Cudlip, Mrs. See THOMAS, ANNIE.

Cudworth, RALPH, chief of the 'Cambridge Platonists,' was born in 1617 at Aller, in Somerset, in 1632 entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1639 was elected a fellow, and became a popular tutor. In 1645 he was appointed Master of Clare Hall and regius professor of Hebrew; in 1650 rector of North Cadbury, Somerset, and in 1654 Master of Christ's College; in 1662 rector of Ashwell, Hertfordshire; and in 1678 prebendary of Gloucester. He died at Christ's College, July 26, 1688. His True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678), portentously learned, ample, and discursive, aimed to establish the reality of a supreme divine Intelligence against materialism; to vindicate the eternal reality of moral ideas; and to prove moral freedom and responsibility. The marvellously impartial statement of his antagonists' arguments brought on him the charge of Arianism and even atheism. His sermon before the House of Commons (1647) shows the best features of the Latitudinarian school. His important Treatise Concerning Eternal Morality was published in 1781, but many of his MSS. still lie unprinted. See Tulloch's Rational Theology (1872); Martineau's Types of Ethical Theory (1885); and monographs by C. E. Lowrey (New York, 1884) and W. R. Scott (1891).

Cueva, JUAN DE LA (c. 1550-1607), a Spanish poet and dramatist, born at Seville.

Cujacius, properly JACQUES DE CUJAS or CUJAS (1522-90), jurist, was born at Toulouse and died a professor at Bourges. His complete works were edited by Fabrot (10 vols. Paris, 1658), and were frequently republished—as at Turin in 1874. See works by Berriat-Saint-Prix (Par. 1821) and Spangenberg (Leip. 1822).

Cullen, PAUL, cardinal, was born near Ballitore, County Kildare, April 27, 1803. After a brilliant course in the Propaganda College at Rome he was ordained priest in 1829, and was successively vice-rector and rector of the Irish College in Rome and rector of the Propaganda College. In 1850 consecrated archbishop of Armagh and primate of Ireland, he commenced a vigorous and uncompromising ultramontane reign of eight-and-twenty years, in which he established lasting memorials to his memory in new churches, schools, convents, and hospitals. He denounced mixed education, and opposed all revolutionary opposition to the crown. His denunciations of Fenianism made him many enemies among the more hot-headed Irishmen but greatly increased the respect of English Protestants. Translated to Dublin in 1852, he was created a cardinal priest in 1866, the first Irishman to attain that dignity. He died at Dublin, Oct. 24, 1878.

Cullen, WILLIAM, physician, was born at Hamilton, 15th April 1710. After some experience as an apprentice apothecary in Glasgow, on board ship, and in London, he studied at Edinburgh under Munro, and started practice in his native town. William Hunter (q.v.) was a pupil. In 1740 Cullen graduated M.D. at Glasgow, established himself there as a physician, and lectured on medicine. In 1751 he was appointed to the chair of Medicine, but in 1755 removed to Edinburgh, where for thirty-five years he occupied successively the chairs of Chemistry, Institutes of Medicine, and Medicine, besides teaching clinically in the Infirmary. To him is largely due the recognition of the important part played by the nervous system in health and disease. Many of his speculations as to reflex nervous action of sensory and motor fibres and the connection of sensory and motor nerves are accepted facts. He bitterly opposed the Brunonian system (see BROWN, JOHN). He died 5th February 1790. Cullen's chief works are Synopsis Nosologie Methodice (1769); Institutions of Medicine (1772); Practice of Physic (1776-84); Treatise of Materia Medica (1789). See Life by Thomson and Craigie (2 vols. 1832-59).

Culpeper, JOHN. See COLEPEPER.

Culpeper, NICHOLAS (1616-54), born in London, studied at Cambridge, and started in 1640 to practise astrology and physic in Spitalfields. In 1649 he published an English translation of the College of Physicians' Pharmacopœia, A Physical Directory, renamed in 1654 Pharmacopœia Londinensis, or the London Dispensatory. This infringement of a close monopoly, together with his Puritanism, brought Culpeper many enemies. In 1653 appeared The English Physician Enlarged, or the Herbal. Both books had an enormous sale, and both are included in Dr Gordon's collective edition of his Works (4 vols. 1802).

Culpeper, SIR THOMAS (1578-1662), born of good Kentish family, studied at Hart Hall, Oxford, and at one of the Inns of Court, was knighted in 1619, and bought Leeds Castle in Kent, where, or at Greenway Court, near Hollingbourn, he mostly lived. His Tract against Usurie (1621) contended for the reduction of interest to six per cent.—His third son, SIR THOMAS (1626-97), studied at University College, Oxford, and having made the grand tour, and been knighted soon after the Restoration, retired to Greenway Court. Besides editing his father's treatise in 1668, he himself wrote pamphlets on usury. He wrote also Essayes or Moral Discourses (1655-71).

Culverwel, NATHANAEL, one of the Cambridge Platonists, born in Middlesex, entered Emmanuel College in 1633, was elected fellow in 1642, and died about 1651. His vigorous Light of Nature (1652) was edited in 1857 by John Brown, D.D., of Edinburgh, with an essay by Cairns. See Campagnac's Cambridge Platonists (1902).

Cumberland, RICHARD (1631-1718), born in London, was educated at St Paul's School and Magdalene College, Cambridge, and became rector of Brampton, Northamptonshire (1658), vicar of All Saints, Stamford (1667), and bishop of Peterborough (1691). He was a man of great acquirements and of simple piety; his frequent saying, 'a man had better wear out than rust out,' explains his high idea of episcopal duty. His De Legibus Naturæ (1672), written in reply to Hobbes, founds morality on a utilitarian basis.

Cumberland, RICHARD, playwright, was born 19th February 1732 in the lodge of Trinity College, Cambridge. He was the great-grandson of Bishop Cumberland and maternal grandson of Dr Richard Bentley. From Bury St Edmunds and Westminster, where he was contemporary with Cowper, Churchill, and Warren Hastings, he passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a fellow at twenty. Becoming private secretary to Lord Halifax, he gave up his intention of taking orders. As secretary to the Board of Trade (1776-82), he undertook a secret mission to Spain (1780) which cost him £4500, a sum that ministers refused to reimburse when the Board was suppressed. Having obtained a compensation allowance of about half his salary, Cumberland retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he wrote farces, tragedies, comedies, pamphlets, essays, and two novels, Arundel and Henry. Of his comedies may be named The West Indian, The Brothers, The Fashionable Lover, The Jew, and The Wheel of Fortune. Cumberland is alluded to in Goldsmith's Retaliation with not unkindly satire as 'the Terence of England, the mender of hearts;' in Sheridan's Critic he is gibbeted as 'Sir Fretful Plagiary.' He died at Tunbridge Wells, 7th May 1811. See his rambling Memoirs (2 vols. 1807).

Cumberland, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF (1721-65), second son of George II., adopting a military career, was wounded at Dettingen in 1743, and defeated, not ingloriously, at Fontenoy by Marshal Saxe in 1745. Sent next to crush the Young Pretender's rebellion, he did so effectually at Culloden (1746), and by his cruelties earned the lasting title of 'Butcher' to set off against his reward of £25,000 a year. In 1747 he was defeated by Saxe at Laffeld, and in 1757 had to surrender at Kloster-Zeven, after which he retired. See Military Life by the Rev. A. N. Campbell-Maclachlan (1876).—Also see CLIFFORD and ERNEST AUGUSTUS.

Cumming, CONSTANCE FREDERIKA GORDON, was born at Ayltrey, Elginshire, 26th May 1837, the sister of the lion-hunter. She lived two years in Ceylon and two in Fiji, also visiting Tahiti, China, Japan, California, Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, and has written At Home in Fiji (1881), A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-war (1882), Fire Fountains—Hawaii (1883), Wanderings in China (1885), Two Happy Years in Ceylon (1891), Memoires (1904-5), &c.

Cumming, JOHN, expounder of prophecy, was born in Fintray parish, Aberdeenshire, 10th November 1807. He took his M.A. at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1827, and from 1832 to 1879 was minister of the Scottish Church, Covent Garden, London. Edinburgh University gave him its D.D. in 1844. He died 5th July 1881. His works number over a hundred.

Cumming, ROUALEYN-GEORGE GORDON, the African lion-hunter, was born 15th March 1820, the second son of Sir William-Gordon Gordon-Cumming of Ayltrey. Educated at Eton, he entered the Madras Cavalry in 1838, served for a time in Canada, and joined the Cape Mounted Rifles in 1843; but he soon resigned his commission, and, till his return to England in 1848, engaged in those famous hunting exploits narrated in his Five Years of a Hunter's Life (1850) and The Lion-Hunter of South Africa (1858). He died at Fort Augustus, 24th March 1866.

Cummins, MARIA SUSANNA, novelist, born at Salem, Mass., April 9, 1827, began to write in 1850 for the Atlantic Monthly and other magazines. Of The Lamplighter (1854) 40,000 copies sold in two months; later novels were Mabel Vaughan (1857), El Fureidis (1860), and Haunted Hearts (1864). She died at Dorchester, October 1, 1866.

Cunard, SIR SAMUEL (1787-1865), born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, succeeded early as a merchant and shipowner, came to England in 1838, joined with George Burns, Glasgow, and David M'iver, Liverpool, in founding (1839) the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and obtained a contract for the mail service between Liverpool and Halifax, Boston, and Quebec. The first passage (1840) was the Britannia in 14 days 8 hours. Iron steamers were introduced in 1855, and paddle-wheels gave way entirely to the screw after 1862. Cunard was created a baronet in 1859. See The Cunard Line (1893).

Cunningham, ALLAN, poet and man of letters, was born in Keir parish, Dumfriesshire, 7th December 1784. His father was factor to Miller of Dalswinton, and therefore neighbour to Burns at Ellisland; and Allan, a boy of twelve, followed at the poet's funeral. At ten he was apprenticed to a stone-mason brother, but continued to give all his leisure to poring over songs and stories. His first publications were his sham-antique verse and prose contributions to Cronie's Remains of Nithsdale and Gallovay Song (1810). Hogg he already knew, and these gained him the acquaintance of Scott, with whom 'Honest Allan' was always a great favourite. He now removed to London, and became one of the best-known writers for the London Magazine, as well as from 1815 to 1841 manager in Chantrey's studio. Among his works were Traditional Tales of the English and Scottish Peasantry (1822); Songs of Scotland, Ancient and Modern (1825); Lives of British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects (6 vols. 1829-33); and Life of Wilkie (3 vols. 1843). He died in London, 30th October 1842. Of his five sons, Captain JOSEPH DAVEY (1812-51), and Major-general SIR ALEXANDER (1814-93), both served in the Indian army; the former wrote a good History of the Sikhs (1849), and the latter many books on Indian architecture and statistics; PETER (1816-69), an antiquary and man of letters, is remembered by his Handbook of London (1849; recast by H. Wheatley, 3 vols. 1891); and FRANCIS (1820-75), also an Indian soldier, edited Marlowe, Massinger, and Ben Jonson.

Cunningham, JOHN, D.D., LL.D. (1819-93), born at Paisley, in 1845 became minister of Crieff, and in 1886 succeeded Principal Tulloch at St Andrews. He wrote The Church History of Scotland (1859; new ed. 1883), &c.

Cunningham, WILLIAM, D.D., was born at Hamilton in 1805, educated at Duns and Edinburgh, and ordained minister at Greenock in 1830. He was called to Trinity College Church, Edinburgh, in 1834, and soon became a leader in the Disruption controversy. He was appointed professor of Theology in the Free Church College in 1843, of Church History in 1845, and its principal on Chalmers's death in 1847. He was moderator of the Free Assembly in 1859, when he received a testimonial of over £7000. He died at Edinburgh, 14th December 1861. His literary executors published from his MSS. Historic Theology (1862), Reformers and Theology of the Reformation (1862), and Discussions on Church Principles (1863). See Life by Rainy and Mackenzie (1871).

Cunobelinus. See CYMBELINE.

Cupples, GEORGE (1822-91), was born at Legerwood manse in Berwickshire, and died, after long illness, at Newhaven, near Edinburgh. His Green Hand (1856) was based on a voyage to India at sixteen, which sickened him of the sea; afterwards he studied the arts and theology for eight years at Edinburgh University. In 1858 he married Ann Jane Douglas (1840-98), author since 1867 of upwards of forty books, chiefly for children; himself he published only three or four more. See the Memoir by J. Hutchison Stirling appended to Cupples's Scotch Deer-hounds (1894).

Curci, CARLO MARIA (1809-91), an Italian Jesuit expelled for heterodoxy in 1877. [Koor-tchee.]

Curton, WILLIAM, D.D., LL.D. (1808-64), Syriac scholar, born at Westbury, Shropshire, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, took orders, but in 1837 entered the British Museum as assistant-keeper of MSS. Here he brought to light a Syriac version of the Epistles of Ignatius (q.v.) and other MSS. He was a canon of Westminster.

Curie, PIERRE (1859-1906), and his wife (Marie Sklodowska, born at Warsaw), worked jointly at Paris on magnetism and radio-activity, and discovered radium.

Curll, EDMUND (1675-1747), a notorious London bookseller, whom Swift delighted to insult, and Pope gibbeted in the Dunciad. He was twice (1716 and 1721) at the bar of the House of Lords for publishing matter regarding its members; was tried and convicted for publishing obscene books (1725), fined (1728) for the issue of Nun in

Her Smock and De Usu Flagrorum, and pilloried for his Memoirs of John Ker of Kersland. His announcement of Mr Pope's Literary Correspondence (1735) led to the seizure of the stock, and furnished Pope (who instigated its publication) with a sufficient excuse for the issue of an authentic edition (1737-41). Curll did not deal solely in 'garbage, as a list of his contains 167 standard works. His Curliad (1729) is styled a 'hypercritic upon the Dunciad Variorum.' It was of Curll's biographies that Arbuthnot wittily said they had added a new terror to death.

Curran, JOHN PHILPOT, Irish orator, was born at Newmarket in County Cork, July 24, 1750. At Trinity College, Dublin, he was as idle and reckless as he had been at school, but yet learnt something of law: and the boisterous taproom debates of his life in Dublin and London shaped him into an orator. After two years at the Middle Temple, London, he was called to the Irish bar in 1775. Here his conviviality, wit, and vehement eloquence soon made him a prominent figure, and led to his being employed in many of the greatest causes of the time. In 1782 he became King's Counsel, and in 1783 was returned to the Irish parliament for Kilbeggan. He became a strong supporter of Grattan, but his eloquence proved less effective in the House than before an Irish jury. His sarcastic retorts involved him in duels, of which, in the course of his career, he fought five, all fortunately without serious harm. Although a staunch Protestant, Curran had a warm sympathy with his suffering Catholic countrymen, and was constant in his unavailing appeals on their behalf to government. With his defence of Archibald Hamilton Rowan in 1792 commenced the long series of defences in state-trials which have shed such a lustre on his name. The insurrection broke out in 1798, but was speedily suppressed, whereupon the prosecutions of its leaders at once began; Curran flung himself into their defence with heroic energy. Then came the Union, which Curran had always opposed as 'the annihilation of Ireland.' His own health was now shattered, and domestic troubles darkened his later years. His wife eloped with a clergyman, and his youngest daughter, Sarah, died in Sicily a few months after the hapless fate of her lover, Robert Emmet. (MacDonagh's Viceroy's Postbag, 1904, deals with Curran as a 'heartless and inhuman scoundrel' in her regard.) After Pitt's death (1806) Curran was Master of the Rolls in Ireland till 1814. He died in London, 14th October 1817. His remains were interred in Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin, in 1834. See Lives by his son, W. H. Curran (1819), A. Stephens (1817), O'Regan (1817), and Phillips (1850), also that by T. Davis, prefixed to his Speeches (1855).

Currie, JAMES, the earliest editor of Burns, was born at Kirkpatrick-Fleming manse, Dumfriesshire, 31st May 1756. He spent five years at Cabin Point, Virginia, in a mercantile situation (1771-76), then studied medicine at Edinburgh and Glasgow; and, settling in Liverpool in 1780, soon obtained a good practice. His chief medical work was the able Reports on the Effects of Water in Febrile Disease (1797); but he is best remembered by his edition of Burns (1800; 7th ed. 1813), with a Life and criticism of the poet's writings, which he undertook solely for the benefit of Burns's family. He died at Sidmouth, 31st August 1805. See Life by his son (1831).

Curtis, BENJAMIN ROBBINS (1800-74), and GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS (1812-94), two brothers, born at Watertown, Mass., both writers on legal subjects, and the latter also a biographer. See Memoir of the former (2 vols. 1879).

Curtis, GEORGE WILLIAM, born in Providence, Rhode Island, 24th February 1824, after four years in Europe (1846-50) joined the staff of the New York Tribune, and was one of the editors of Putnam's Monthly from 1852 to 1869. He commenced the 'Editor's Easy Chair' papers in Harper's Monthly in 1853, and became principal leader-writer for Harper's Weekly on its establishment in 1857. A novel, Trumps (1862), and most of his books appeared first in these journals. He died at New York, 31st August 1892. See Lives by Winter (1893), Chadwick (1893), and Cary (1894).

Curtius, ERNST, born September 2, 1814, at Lübeck, studied at Bonn, Göttingen, and Berlin, visited Athens with Brandis in 1837, and next accompanied Ottfried Müller in his travels through Greece. Tutor (1844-49) to the Crown Prince Frederick of Prussia, in 1856 he succeeded Hermann as professor at Göttingen, whence he was recalled in 1868 to Berlin. From 1853 a member of the Academy of Sciences, he was one of its permanent secretaries 1871-93. He died July 11, 1896. Among his works are Klassische Studien (1840), Naxos (1846), Poloponnesos (1851-52), Olympia (1852), Die Ionier (1855), Die Topographie Kleinasiens (1872), Ephesos (1874), Altertum und Gegenwart (1875-82), Griechische Geschichte (1857-61; 5th ed. 1881 et seq.; Eng. trans. by A. W. Ward, 1868-76), and Die Ausgrabungen zu Olympia (1877-78).—His brother, GEORG CURTIUS, one of the greatest Greek scholars, was born at Lübeck, April 16, 1820, and studied at Bonn and Berlin. After teaching at Dresden and Berlin, he became in 1849 extraordinary, in 1851 ordinary, professor of Classical Philology at Prague, at Kiel in 1854, at Leipzig in 1862. He died August 12, 1885. The chief of his many works were Griechische Schulgrammatik (1852; 20th ed. 1890; Eng. trans. 1863); Erläuterungen to the foregoing (1863; trans. by Abbott, 1870); Grundzüge der Griechischen Etymologie (1858; trans. by Wilkins and England, 1875-76); and Das Griechische Verbum (1873-76; trans. by same, 1880). The famous Studien zur Griech. und Lat. Grammatik (10 vols. 1868-77) contained papers by him, Brungmann, Fick, G. Meyer, Windisch, &c. See Monograph by Windisch (1887). [Koor'tzee-ooos.]

Curtius, METTUS or METTIUS, a noble Roman youth who in 362 B.C. is said to have leapt on horseback into a chasm which had opened in the forum, and which the soothsayers declared could only be filled by throwing into it the most precious treasure of Rome.

Curtius, QUINTUS, a Roman historian, who about 41-54 A.D. wrote De Rebus Gestis Alexandri Magni, in ten books, of which the first two have been lost and the text of the remainder is imperfect. It has little value as history; but its style, if mannered, is elegant. The editio princeps was published at Venice about 1471. Modern editions are those of Mitzell (1841), Zumpt (2d ed. 1864), Vogel (1875-80), and Schmidt (1886). See a French monograph by Bosson (1887).

Curwen, JOHN, the apostle of the Tonic Solfa system, was born at Heckmondwike, Yorkshire, 14th November 1816, the son of an Independent minister, and himself in 1844 was settled as Independent minister at Plaistow. In 1841 he began to advocate the solfa system; in 1843 his Grammar of Vocal Music appeared; in 1864 he resigned his ministry and gave himself wholly to the cause. He died at Heaton Mersey, Lancashire, 6th May 1880. See Memorials (1882).

Curzon, OF KEDLESTON, GEORGE NATHANIEL, EARL, born 11th Jan. 1859, eldest son of Lord Scarsdale, rector of Kedleston, Derby, was educated at Eton and Balliol, Oxford, and elected a fellow of All Souls. Entering parliament in 1886, he was under-secretary of state for India 1891-92, for foreign affairs 1895-98, viceroy of India, with an Irish peerage (1899-1905), chancellor of Oxford University (1907), and a representative peer (1908), and in 1911 was made an earl of the United Kingdom. He has written on Eastern questions and on university reform.

Curzon, ROBERT, LORD ZOUCHÉ (1810-73), born in London, was educated at the Charterhouse and Christ Church College, Oxford, travelled in the Levant (1833-37), was an attaché at Constantinople, succeeded his mother as fourteenth Baron Zouche, and died at Parham Park, Petworth. His best known work, Visit to Monasteries in the Levant (1849), reached a 6th ed. in 1881.

Cusa, NICOLAUS OF (1401-64), born at Cusa or Kues on the Moselle, in the archbishopric of Treves, was the son of a poor fisherman named Chryppis or Krebs, and studied at Deventer with the Brothers of the Common Life and at Padua. As archdeacon of Liège he took a prominent part in the Council of Basel, insisting in De Concordantia Catholica that the pope was subordinate to Councils; but ultimately he sided with the pope, and was made bishop of Brixen in Tyrol and cardinal. As papal legate he visited Constantinople to promote the union of the Eastern and Western churches; and he made a disciplinary visitation of the German monasteries. He exposed the false Isidorian decretals, was in advance of his time in science, denounced perverted scholasticism in De Docta Ignorantia, taught that the earth went round the sun, and in pantheistic tendencies and otherwise was a precursor of Giordano Bruno. See German monographs by Düx (1848), Scharpf (1871), and Glossner (1891).

Cushing, CALEB (1800-79), American statesman, born in Salisbury, Mass., was admitted to the bar in 1821, sat in the state legislature and senate, and was elected to Congress in 1835-43. He arranged the first treaty between China and the United States in 1844; raised and commanded a regiment in the war with Mexico; and was U.S. attorney-general in 1853-57, counsel for the U.S. at the Geneva Conference in 1872, and minister to Spain in 1874-77.

Cushing, PAUL. See WOOD-SEYS, ROLAND.

Cushman, CHARLOTTE SAUNDERS (1816-76), an actress, who was born and died at Boston, U.S., appeared first in opera in 1834, and as Lady Macbeth in 1835. In 1844 she accompanied Macready on a tour through the northern states, and afterwards appeared in London, where she was well received in a range of characters that included Lady Macbeth, Rosalind, Meg Merrilees, and Romeo—her sister Susan (1822-59) playing Juliet. She retired from the stage in 1875.

Cust, SIR EDWARD (1794-1878), general and military historian, was born and died in London, the sixth son of the first Lord Brownlow.

Cust, ROBERT NEEDHAM, LL.D. (1821-1909), born at Cockayne-Hatley, Bedfordshire, was educated at Eton, and entered the Indian civil service. He held important posts in North India, in 1864-65 was a member of the legislative council and returned to England in 1869. He published works on the modern languages of the East Indies (1878), of Africa (1882), and of Oceania, as well as Linguistic and Oriental Essays (3 series, 1880-91), Pictures of Indian Life (1881), Evangelisation of the Non-Christian World (1894), &c.

Custer, GEORGE ARMSTRONG, born in Ohio in 1839, graduated at West Point in 1861, and served with distinction through the civil war. As a cavalry commander in the west, he several times defeated the hostile Indians; but on 15th May 1876 he attacked 9000 Sioux on the Little Big Horn, in Montana, and he and his 1100 men were all destroyed. See Life by Whittaker (1878).

Cuthbert, Sr., was born about 635—by one legend in Ireland, the son of a petty king; but by another in Landerdale, then part of Northumbria. In 651 he was certainly a shepherd boy there, and while watching his flock by night had a vision which made him resolve to become a monk. The same year he entered the monastery of Old Melrose, and in 660 accompanied its abbot Eata to Ripon. In consequence of the dispute about Easter, Eata returned to Melrose (661), and Cuthbert, having accompanied him, was elected prior. In 664 he left Melrose for the island monastery of Lindisfarne, of which he became prior, his old master, Eata, being abbot. But in 676 he quitted Lindisfarne for a hermit's cell built with his own hands on one of the Farne group. Here, in 684, he was visited by Egfrid, king of Northumbria, who came entreating him to accept the bishopric of Hexham. He reluctantly complied, but shortly after exchanged the see of Hexham for that of Lindisfarne. Still thirsting after solitude, at the end of two years he returned to his cell, where he died 20th March 687. The fame of St Cuthbert had been great during his life; it became far greater after his death. Churches were dedicated to him from the Trent and Mersey to the Forth and Clyde. His body remained (incorrupt, as was believed) at Lindisfarne till 875, when the monks, bearing it on their shoulders, fled inland from the Danes. After many wanderings it found a resting-place at Chester-le-Street in 883; in 995 it was translated first to Ripon and then to Durham. Here, inclosed in a costly shrine, and believed to work miracles daily, it remained till the Reformation. The grave was opened in 1826, when inside a triple coffin his skeleton was found, still entire, wrapped in five robes of embroidered silk. Until the Reformation no woman was suffered to approach his shrine. See the ancient Lives by Bede, Simeon of Durham, and Reginald of Durham, and the modern ones by Raine (1828), Eyre (1849; 3d ed. 1887), and Fryer (1830).

Cutler, SIR JOHN (c. 1608-93), a miserly London merchant, who yet was a liberal benefactor of Gresham College. He died worth £300,000.

Cutts, JOHN CUTTS, LORD (1661-1707), one of William III.'s and Marlborough's generals, who served in Ireland and the Low Countries, was probably born at Arkesden, near Saffron-Walden, and died in Dublin.

Cuvier, LÉOPOLD CHRÉTIEN FRÉDÉRIC DAOBERT, foremost of comparative anatomists, better known by his adopted literary title, Georges Cuvier, was born 24th August 1769, at Montbéliard, then belonging to Württemberg, his ancestors being Huguenot refugees. He studied for the ministry at Stuttgart; and his love for zoology was confirmed by residence as a tutor on the Normandy coast (1788-94). In 1795 through Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire he was appointed assistant professor of Comparative Anatomy in the Jardin des Plantes, and elected a member of the French

Institute; in 1803 he became permanent secretary of the Academy of Sciences. After the Restoration he was made Chancellor of the University of Paris, admitted into the cabinet by Louis XVIII., and in 1826 created grand-officer of the Legion of Honour. His opposition to the royal measures restricting the freedom of the press lost him the favour of Charles X.; but under Louis-Philippe he was made a peer of France in 1831, and next year Minister of the Interior. He died of paralysis, May 13, 1832. In his plans for national education, in his labours for the French Protestant Church, and in scientific work, he was alike indefatigable. He was conspicuous for an unsurpassed grasp of facts rather than for originality or power of generalisation, and proved a formidable opponent of the Theory of Descent. Although his four types—Vertebrate, Mollusc, Articulate, and Radiate—are now known to give a false simplicity to nature, his structural method made classification more natural. Now also palæontology was linked to comparative anatomy. Among Cuvier's more important works are: Leçons d'Anatomie Comparée (1801-5); L'Anatomie des Mollusques (1816); Les Ossements Fossiles des Quadrupèdes (1812); Histoire naturelle des Poissons (1828-49), written in concert with Valenciennes. Best known is Le Règne Animal distribué d'après son Organisation (1817), which has passed through so many editors' hands. See Mrs R. Lee's Memoirs of Baron Cuvier (1833), Pasquier's Éloge (1833), Carns's Geschichte der Zoologie (1872), Haeckel's History of Creation (1876), and Dncrotay de Blainville's Cuvier et Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire (1890). [Fr. pron. nearly Keev-yay.]

Cuyp, or KUYP, JACOB GERRITS, 'Old Cuyp' (c. 1575-1649), a portrait-painter of Dordrecht.—His son, ALBERT CUYP (1620-91), who was born and died at Dordrecht, excelled in cattle, moonlights, wintry landscapes, still waters with ships, horse-markets, hunts, camps and cavalry-fights, and golden sunlight. A fine example of his art has realised over £5000. England is particularly rich in his works. [KÛp.]

Cymbeline, in Shakespeare's play, a king of Britain, whose original was Holinshed's half-historical Cunobelinus, who died c. 43 A.D., and of whom several coins are extant.

Cynewulf, an old English poet, probably of the eighth century, identified by some with Cynewulf, bishop of Lindisfarne (737-80). Four poems, Juliana, Christ, Elene, and The Fates of the Apostles have his name worked into the text in runes. These and others attributed to him have been edited singly and in groups by Grein and Wülker, Gollancz, Holthansen, Strunk, Cook, Krapp, and others. Some lines from The Dream of the Rood appear on the Ruthwell Cross, Dumfriesshire. See Dr Kennedy's translation, and its introduction (1910). [Kee ne-woolf.]

Cyprian, St. Thascius Cecilius Cyprianus, one of the great Fathers of the church, was born about 200 A.D., probably at Carthage; and, after teaching rhetoric there, became a Christian about 245. He was made a bishop in 248, when his zealous efforts to restore strict discipline soon brought him a host of enemies. In the Decian persecution he had to seek safety in flight; and after his return to Carthage in 251 the rest of his life was a constant struggle to hold the balance between severity and leniency towards the 'Lapsed' (i.e. those who had conformed for a time to heathenism). Excommunicated by the Roman bishop Stephen for denying the validity of heretic baptism, at a synod at Carthage in 256

Cyprian maintained that the Roman bishop, spite of the primacy of Peter, could not claim a judicial authority over other bishops. On 14th September 258 he suffered martyrdom under the Emperor Valerian. His zeal, fidelity, and self-denial were undeniable. His writings consist of Epistles and treatises which are themselves pastoral epistles of a bishop to his flock (see the translation by Wallis, 2 vols. 1869). In De Catholice Ecclesie Unitate he holds that the unity of the church is founded upon the episcopate, not of Rome, but of the universal church. See Lives by Poole (1840; new ed. 1890), Peters (Ratisbon, 1877), Fechtrop (Munich, 1878), Freppel (3d ed. Par. 1890), and Archbishop Benson (1897), and Hartel's edition of his works (Vien. 1868-71). [Sip-ri-an.]

Cyrenius, a Grecised form of Publius Sulpicius Quirinus, named in Luke ii. as governor of Syria. He was appointed governor in 6 A.D., but may have also held the post some years earlier.

Cyril and Methodius, apostles of the Slavs, were brothers, and natives of Thessalonica. Cyril, born in 827, had been a disciple of Photius, and was surnamed 'the philosopher.' The Tartar Khazars to the north-east of the Black Sea having about 860 asked the Emperor Michael III. to send them Christian missionaries, Cyril was sent and made many converts. The Bulgarians of Thrace and Mœsia were evangelised by Methodius, who baptised their king Bogoris in 861. At the request of the Duke of Moravia, the brothers went thither, prepared a Slav translation of the Scriptures and chief liturgical books, and won the hearts of the people from the Roman missionaries. The two brothers were summoned to Rome to explain their conduct, and Cyril died there in 869. Methodius, who in the same year was consecrated at Rome Bishop of the Moravians, completed the evangelisation of the Slavs. Called to Rome a second time in 879 to justify his celebration of the mass in the native tongue, he gained the approval of Pope John VIII., returned to his diocese in 880, and probably died at Hradisch on the March, 6th April 885. Both brothers are recognised as saints by the Roman Catholic Church, after having been condemned as Arians by several popes. The Cyrillic alphabet, modified out of the Greek by Cyril, superseded a more ancient Slavonic alphabet. See German works by Ginzler (2d ed. 1860), Dümmler and Miklosich (1870), and Bonwetsch (1885). [Sir-ri-l.]

Cyril of Alexandria, Sr, one of the Fathers of the church, was born at Alexandria, and brought up under the care of his uncle Theophilus, whom, after some years spent as a monk in the Nitrian desert, he succeeded as patriarch of Alexandria in 412. He forthwith closed the churches of the Novatians, and in 415 expelled the Jews from the city. With the shameful murder of Hypatia (q.v.) he was at least indirectly connected. The latter part of his life was spent in the relentless persecution of Nestorius (q.v.). The council of Ephesus in 431 condemned Nestorius, with his doctrine of the two natures in Christ. After this, John of Antioch and his adherents (numbering from 30 to 40 bishops), who had arrived at Ephesus too late, constituted a synod of their own, which condemned Cyril. The emperor confirmed both of these depositions; but Cyril kept his patriarchate till his death in 444. Among his extant works are a defence of Christianity, written against the Emperor Julian in 433; a series of homilies and treatises on the Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Worship of God in spirit and in truth. The best edition is that of Aubert (7 vols. Paris, 1638). See Kopallik, Cyril von Alexandria (Mainz, 1881).

Cyril of Jerusalem, Sr (c. 315-386), ordained presbyter about 345, tried to be neutral during the Arian controversies, and in 351 was ordained Bishop of Jerusalem. He was twice expelled from his see, in 353 and by a synod at Constantinople in 360; but on the accession of Julian in 361 he returned to his flock till 367, when, by order of Valens, he was again expelled. He returned again on the death of Valens in 378, and took part, on the orthodox side, in the second council of Constantinople. His Katêchêsis (instructions to catechumens) have been edited by Touttêe (Paris, 1720; new ed. 1844), and by Reischl and Rupp (1845-60). There is a translation in the Oxford Library of the Fathers (1838). See works by Gonnêt (1870) and Mader (1891).

Cyrillus Lucaris. See LUCARIS.

Cyrus the Great (Kurus), the founder of the Persian empire, was the fourth in a line of kings of Anzan or Susiana (called by the Hebrews Elam) who formed a branch of the Persian royal dynasty of the Achæmenides (q.v.). According to Herodotus, Cyrus was the son of Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media, and the Persian Cambyses. He was to have been killed by Astyages had not a herdsman saved him till he was old enough to be sent to Persia. This and the very different stories of Xenophon and others have been superseded by the evidence of recently discovered monuments. Cyrus was the son of Cambyses I., grandson of Cyrus I., and great-grandson of Teispes, conqueror of Elam, who was also the great-grandfather of Hystaspes, the father of Darius (q.v.). In the sixth year of Nabonidus, king of Babylon (549 B.C.), Cyrus, 'king of Elam,' conquered Astyages, king of Media, made him a prisoner, and took his capital, Ecbatana. By 546 he was 'king of Persia.' In 538, favoured by a revolt of the tribes on 'the Lower Sea,' or Persian Gulf, he advanced on Babylon from the south-east, and, after giving battle to the army of Akkad, took Sippara (Sipharvaim) and Babylon itself 'without fighting.' The account of the siege of Babylon by Cyrus recorded by Herodotus must therefore be erroneous. Cyrus, a polytheist and an idolater, at once began a policy of religious conciliation. The nations who had been carried into captivity in Babylon along with the Jews were restored to their native countries, and allowed to take their gods with them. The empire of Lydia had fallen before the army of Cyrus eight years before (in 546), and after the conquest of Babylonia he was master of all Asia from the Mediterranean to the Hindu Kush. The conqueror's hold over Asia Minor and Syria was much strengthened by his friendly relations with the Phœnicians and the Jews; in the Old Testament he is called the Shepherd and the Anointed of Jehovah. After he had extended his empire from the Arabian desert and the Persian Gulf in the south, to the Black Sea, the Caucasus, and the Caspian in the north, he died in 528—according to Herodotus and Diodorus, during an unsuccessful struggle with Tomyris, queen of the Massagete, on the Jaxartes. Three years before he had made his son and successor Cambyses 'king of Babylon.' The Cyropædia of Xenophon is a historical romance. See Sayce's Introduction to Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther (2d ed. 1887); also his Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments (1883). [S'rus.]

CYRUS THE YOUNGER, second son of Darius Nothus and Parysatis, was born in 424 B.C., conspired against his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon (404), was sentenced to death, but afterwards pardoned and even restored to his dignity as satrap of Asia Minor. In 401 he left Sardis at the head of 100,000 Asiatics and 13,000 Greek mercenaries, encountered his brother at Cunaxa, 500 stadia from Babylon, and was there defeated and slain. See XENOPHON.

Czartoryski, ADAM GEORGE, son of Prince Adam Czartoryski (1734-1823), was born at Warsaw, 14th January 1770, and educated at Edinburgh and London. He fought against Russia in the Polish insurrection of 1794, and, sent to St Petersburg as a hostage, gained the friendship of the Grand-duke Alexander and the confidence of the Emperor Paul, who made him ambassador to Sardinia. When Alexander ascended the throne he appointed him assistant to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. As curator of the university of Wilna (1803) he exerted all his influence to keep alive a spirit of nationality; and when some of the students were sent to Siberia, Czartoryski resigned his office. Into the Revolution of 1830 he threw himself with all his heart. He was elected president of a provisional government, and summoned a national diet which in January 1831 declared the Polish throne vacant and elected Czartoryski head of the national government. He immediately devoted half of his large estates to the public service; and, though in August he resigned his post, continued to fight as a common soldier. After the suppression of the rising, Czartoryski—excluded from the amnesty and his Polish estates confiscated—escaped to Paris, where he afterwards resided, the liberal friend of his poor expatriated countrymen. In 1848 he freed all his serfs in Galicia, and during the Crimean war he endeavoured to induce the allies to identify the cause of Poland with that of Turkey. He refused the amnesty offered to him by Alexander II., and died near Paris, 15th July 1861. See his Memoirs, translated by Gielgud (1888). [Tchar-to-ris'kee.]

Czermak, JOHANN NEPOMUK (1828-73), physiologist, the founder of laryngoscopy, was born in Prague, studied at Vienna, Breslau, and Würzburg, and was professor successively at Cracow, Pesth, Jena, and Leipzig. His collected works were published in 1879. [Tcher-mak.]

Czerny, KARL (1791-1857), pianist and composer, was born and died at Vienna. He studied under Beethoven and Clementi, and himself taught Liszt, Thalberg, and Döhler.

Czerny George (1766-1817), the Turkish Karadjordje, or 'Black George', the leader of the Servians in their struggle for independence, after the treaty of Slobosje (8th July 1808) was elected governor and recognised as Prince of Servia by the sultan. He had returned from a two years' exile in Austria when he was murdered at the instigation of his rival, Prince Milosch. [Tcher-nee.]

DACIER, ANDRÉ (1651-1722), scholar, born of Protestant parents at Castres, studied at Saumur, and in 1672 came to Paris, where in 1683 he married Anne Lefebvre (1654-1720), his old preceptor's daughter, and two years later with her embraced Catholicism. He subsequently became royal librarian, member of the French Academy, and its perpetual secretary. His works include a Delphin edition of Festus and Verrius Flaccus (1681), as well as indifferent translations of Horace, the Poetics of Aristotle, Epictetus, and Plutarch's Lives. His wife's works include Delphin editions of Florus, Aurelius Victor, and Eutropius; and translations of Anacreon, Sappho, some plays of Plautus and Aristophanes, Terence, the Iliad and the Odyssey. [Dash-yay.]

Da Costa, ISAAC (1798-1860), Dutch poet, was born at Amsterdam, the son of a Portuguese Jew, studied at Leyden, and in 1822, a year after taking his doctorate of philosophy, embraced Christianity. See Dutch Lives by Koenen (1861), Pierson (1865), and Ten Brink (1888).

Daendels, HERMAN WILLEM (1762-1818), a Dutch general, born at Hatten, in Guelderland, from 1808 to 1811 was governor-general of the Dutch East Indies, and in 1815 was entrusted with the organisation of the Dutch colonies on the coast of Africa, where he died. [Dahn'dels.]

Daffy, THOMAS, from 1647 till his death in 1680 a Leicestershire clergyman, who some time before 1673 invented 'Daffy's Elixir.'

Daft, RICHARD, a famous Notts cricketer, was born 2d November 1835, and died in 1900.

Dagobert, the name of several Merovingian French kings, the first reigning 631-8.

Daguerre, LOUIS JACQUES MANDÉ (1789-1851), born at Cormeilles, had been a scene-painter in Paris, when, from 1826 onwards, and partly in conjunction with M. Niepce, he perfected his 'daguerrotype' process. [Da-gerr'; g hard.]

Dahl, JOHANN CHRISTIAN CLAUSEN (1788-1857), a Norwegian landscape-painter, from 1821 professor of Painting at Dresden.

Dahl, MICHAEL (1656-1743), portrait-painter, born at Stockholm, in 1688 settled in London.

Dahlgren, ADOLPH (1809-70), a U.S. rear-admiral, who introduced a new shell-gun in 1850.

Dahl'gren, KARL FREDRIK (1791-1844), Swedish poet and humorist, born at Stensbruk in Ostergötland, studied at Upsala, and from 1815 was a preacher at Stockholm. His works—novels, tales, poems, dramas, &c.—fill 5 vols. (1847-52).

Dahlmann, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH (1785-1860), German historian, was born at Wismar, studied at Copenhagen and Halle, and in 1813 became professor of History at Kiel, in 1829 of Political Science at Göttingen, where he published (1830) his invaluable Quellenkunde der deutschen Geschichte. Banished in 1837 by the King of Hanover, he went to Leipzig, next to Jena, where he wrote his masterpiece, Geschichte von Dänemark (3 vols. 1840-43). In 1842 he became professor of History at Bonn, and in the movement of 1848 headed the constitutional liberals. See Life by Springer (Leip. 1870-72).

Dahn, JULIUS SOPHUS FELIX, publicist, historian, poet, was born at Hamburg, 9th February 1834, the son of the actor, Friedrich Dahn (1811-89). He studied at Munich and Berlin, and became professor of German Jurisprudence at Königsberg and Breslau. He died in January 1912. See his Erinnerungen (1890-93).

Daimler, GOTTLIEB, of Cannstatt, before 1890 invented a petroleum-motor for automobiles.

Daintree, RICHARD (1831-78), geologist, was born at Hemingford Abbots, near St Ives, was educated at Bedford and Christ's College, Cambridge, and from 1852 lived chiefly in Australia.

Dalboquerque. See ALBUQUERQUE.

Dale, DAVID, was born 6th January 1739 at Stewarton, Ayrshire. Apprenticed to a Paisley weaver, he afterwards travelled the country, buying up the homespun linen yarn, about 1763 became clerk to a silk-mercier, then an importer of French and Dutch yarns. On Arkwright's visiting Scotland it was agreed that he and Dale should engage in cotton-spinning together at New Lanark, near the Falls of Clyde. There Dale built mills (1785) and became prosperous. In 1799 he sold these mills to Robert Owen (q.v.), his son-in-law. Dale spent his last years at Glasgow in works of benevolence and in preaching to a church of his own, the 'Old Independents.' He died 17th March 1806.

Dale, ROBERT WILLIAM, D. D. LL.D. (1829-95), from 1853 Congregational minister in Birmingham and author of many works, was born in London. See Life by his son (1899).

D'Alembert, JEAN LE ROND, born in Paris, November 16, 1717, was found the day after his birth near the church of St Jean-le-Rond, whence his name—the surname he himself added long after. He was the illegitimate son of Madame de Tencin and the Chevalier Destouches, and was brought up by the wife of a poor glazier; but his father secured him 1200 francs a year. At the Collège Mazarin the boy showed his lifelong passion for mathematics. On leaving college, he returned to his kind foster-mother, and pursued his favourite studies for thirty years, broken only by two ineffectual attempts to earn a living by law and medicine. In 1741 he was admitted to the Academy of Sciences; in 1743 appeared his epoch-making Traité de Dynamique. Later works were Le Cause générale des Vents (1747); La Précession des Equinoxes (1749); and Différents Points Importants du Système du Monde (1754). Frederick the Great offered him the presidency of the Academy of Berlin in 1752, but he declined to leave France, while accepting a pension of 1200 francs; the French king granted him a similar sum. In 1762 Catharine II. of Russia invited him, but in vain, to undertake the education of her son. D'Alembert was tenderly attached to Mademoiselle L'Espinasse (q.v.), with whom he lived in Platonic affection (1765-76), and whose death was a crushing blow to him. He died October 29, 1783. His Opuscules Mathématiques (8 vols. 1761-80) contain an immense number of memoirs; his Œuvres Littéraires were edited by Bidot (5 vols. 1821), and his Œuvres et Correspondances inédites by C. Henry (1887). For Diderot's great Encyclopédie he wrote the famous Discours Préliminaire, a noble tribute to literature and philosophy. Besides numerous articles in the Encyclopédie (the mathematical portion of which he edited), he published books on philosophy, literary criticism, the theory of music, and a treatise Sur la Destruction des Jésuites (1765). He became secretary to the Academy in 1772, and wrote lives of all the members deceased since 1700—one of the most pleasing of his works. See Life by Bertrand (Par. 1889). [Da-lon'-bair.]

Dalgarno, GEORGE (c. 1626-87), born at Old Aberdeen, studied at Marischal College, and kept a school for thirty years in Oxford, where he died. He wrote the Ars Signorum, vulgo Character Universalis (1661) and Didascalocophus, or the Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor (1680)—both reprinted for the Maitland Club in 1834.

Dalhousie, EARL OF. See MAULE, FOX.

Dalhousie, JAMES ANDREW BROUN-RAMSAY, MARQUIS OF, 'greatest of Indian proconsuls,' was third son of the ninth Earl of Dalhousie, and was born at Dalhousie Castle, Midlothian, April 22, 1812. Educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, he succeeded in 1832, by the death of his only remaining brother, to the courtesy-title of Lord Ramsay. In 1835 he stood unsuccessfully for Edinburgh as a Conservative; in 1837 was elected for Haddingtonshire; in 1838, on the death of his father, entered the House of Peers as Earl of Dalhousie. In 1843 Peel appointed him Vice-president of the Board of Trade, and in 1845 he succeeded Mr Gladstone as President. When Peel resigned office in 1846, Lord John Russell asked Lord Dalhousie to remain at the Board of Trade in order to carry out the regulations he had framed for the railway system. In 1847 he was appointed Governor-general of India—the youngest viceroy ever sent thither. His Indian administration was not less successful in the acquisition of territory than in developing Indian resources and improving the administration. Pegu and the Punjab were conquered; Nagpur, Oudh, Sattara, Jhansi, and Berar annexed. Railways on a colossal scale were planned and commenced; 4000 miles of telegraph were spread over India; 2000 miles of road were bridged and metalled; the Ganges Canal was opened; and important irrigation works all over India were executed. Noteworthy also are Dalhousie's energetic action against suttee, thuggee, female infanticide, and the slave-trade; the organisation of the Legislative Council; the improved training of the civil service, which was opened to all natural-born British subjects, black or white; the development of trade, agriculture, forestry, mining, and the postal service. In 1848 he was made a K.T.; in 1849 received the marquise and the thanks of parliament; and in 1852 was nominated Warden of the Cinque Ports. Broken in health, Dalhousie sailed from Calcutta in March 1856, and on 19th December 1860 he died at Dalhousie Castle. See the Duke of Argyll's India under Dalhousie, &c. (1865). Trotter's Dalhousie (1889), and the Life by Lee Warner (1904).

Dallam, ROBERT (1602-65), born probably in London, was like his father, Thomas Dallam, a celebrated organ-builder.

Dallas, ENEAS. See GLYN, ISABELLA.

Dallas, GEORGE MIFFLIN (1792-1864), was born in Philadelphia, the son of A. J. Dallas (1759-1817), a lawyer of West Indian birth and Scottish descent, who was secretary of the treasury and war-secretary under President Madison. The younger Dallas graduated at Princeton College in 1810. Admitted to the bar, he entered the diplomatic service, and in 1831 was sent to the U.S. senate by Pennsylvania. He was U.S. minister to Russia 1837-1839, and in 1844 was elected vice-president of the United States. In 1846 his casting-vote as president of the senate repealed the protective tariff of 1842, though he had been a Protectionist. Minister to Great Britain 1856-61, he died at Philadelphia. His posthumous writings include Letters from London (1869), a Life of his father (1871), and his Diary.

Dalling, LORD. See BULWER.

Dalou, JULES (1838-1902), sculptor and commandant, was born in Paris. [Da-loo'.]

Dalrymple, ALEXANDER (1737-1808), hydro-grapher, was born at New Hailes, Musselburgh, a younger brother of Lord Hailes (q.v.). In 1752 he sailed for Madras as writer in the East India Company's service; in 1779 became hydrographer to the Company, in 1795 to the Admiralty; and died three weeks after his summary dismissal from the latter office.

Dalrymple, Sir James, the second son of the first Viscount Stair (q.v.), was called to the Scottish bar in 1675, and became a chief clerk of the Court of Session, and in 1698 a baronet. His Collections concerning the Scottish History preceding 1153 (1705) is still of value.

Dalton, John, chemist, was born 6th September 1766, at Eaglesfield, near Cockermonth, the son of a Quaker weaver. He went to a Quaker school at Pardshaw Hall, and after 1781 became assistant in a boarding-school kept by a cousin in Kendal, of which in 1785 he and a brother became the proprietors. Here his love of mathematical and physical studies was developed, and here in 1787 he commenced a meteorological journal continued all his life, recording 200,000 observations. He collected butterflies and gathered a great hortus siccus and herbarium. In 1793 he was appointed teacher of mathematics and the physical sciences in New College, Manchester, and later supported himself in Manchester by private tuition. In 1794 he first described colour-blindness ('Daltonism'), exemplified in his own case and that of his brother. He was an F.R.S. and an associate of the Paris Academy. In 1833 he received a pension of £150, raised in 1836 to £300. In 1837 he had a shock of paralysis, and he died at Manchester, July 27, 1844. His chief physical researches were on mixed gases, the force of steam, the elasticity of vapours, and the expansion of gases by heat; and in chemistry on the absorption of gases by water, on carbonic acid, carburetted hydrogen, &c., while his atomic theory elevated chemistry to a science. Dalton was unquestionably one of the greatest of chemists. In his habits he was simple, in manners grave and reserved but kindly. He 'never found time' to marry. See Lives by Dr Angus Smith (1836), Dr Henry (1854), Lonsdale (1874), and Sir H. Roscoe (1895).

Dalton, John Call (1825-89), physiologist, was born at Chelmsford, Mass., and lived in New York.

Dalyell, or Dalzell, Thomas (c. 1599-1685), the 'Muscovy general,' born at Binns, Linlithgowshire, served in the Rochelle expedition (1628) and in Ireland, was taken prisoner at Worcester (1651), but escaped, and in 1655 entered the service of Russia and fought against the Tartars and Turks. In 1666 appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, he defeated the Covenanters at Rullion Green in the Pentlands. A devoted royalist, he never shaved his beard after Charles I.'s execution.—His descendant, Sir John Graham Dalyell (1775-1851), published a score of works, chiefly on Scottish antiquarian subjects. [Dec-ell.]

Dalziel, Edward (1817-1905), born at Wooler, fifth of the twelve sons of a Northumbrian artist, in 1839 joined his brother George in London, and gradually built up (with him and a third brother, Thomas) the great business of the 'Brothers Dalziel,' wood-engravers.

Damala. See BERNHARDT, SARAH.

Dam'asus, the name of two popes, the first, a Portuguese, in 366-384; and the second in 1048.

Damer, Anne Seymour (1749-1828), amateur sculptress and friend of Horace Walpole, was the daughter of Field-marshal Conway, and in 1767 married the worthless John Damer, who shot himself nine years afterwards.

Damiani, Pietro (1007-72), born at Ravenna, herded swine in boyhood, but rose to be cardinal and Bishop of Ostia (1057). He supported the policy of Hildebrand (Gregory VII.) without sharing his arrogance, and was employed in important missions. He died at Faenza. His letters, speeches, &c., were collected by Cardinal Cajetan (best ed. 4 vols. Ven. 1743). See Life by Neukirch (Gött. 1875). [Du-mee-ah'nee.]

Damianus, St. See COSMAS.

Damien, Father Joseph, born near Louvain, 3d January 1841, from 1873 spiritual guide to the 700 lepers confined on the small Hawaiian island of Molokai. Sent on a mission to Honolulu, and learning of the neglected state of the lepers, he volunteered to cast in his lot with theirs, and became physician of their souls and bodies, their magistrate, teacher, carpenter, gardener, cook, and even gravedigger at need. He long worked on single-handed, but was ultimately joined by another priest. For twelve years he escaped the contagion; but in 1885 the malady appeared in him, yet he continued unabated his heroic labours till near his death, 10th April 1889. See Lives by Clifford (1889) and Cooke (1889), and R. L. Stevenson's Father Damien (1890).

Damiens, Robert François (1714-57), the would-be murderer of Louis XV., was born near Arras. Known in his youth as Robert le Diable, he was by turns a soldier and a servant in Paris; in 1756 he was forced for a robbery to flee to Belgium, but soon ventured back to Paris. Already he had plotted the king's murder, instigated, as was asserted, by the Jesuits. On 4th January 1757 he went to Versailles, next day followed the king about everywhere, and about 6 P.M., as the king was entering his carriage, stabbed him. He was seized, and nearly three months later slowly tortured to death, being finally torn to pieces by four horses. [Dah-mee-onw'.]

Damocles, a courtier and flatterer of the elder Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, who, having extolled the happiness of royalty, was reproved in a singular manner. He was seated at a table, richly spread, but on looking upwards he saw a keen-edged sword suspended over his head by a single horse-hair. [Dam'o-kleez.]

Damon and Pythias (more correctly Phintias), two Pythagoreans of Syracuse, remembered as the models of faithful friendship. Condemned to death by the elder Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, Pythias begged to be allowed to go home to arrange his affairs, and Damon pledged his own life for his friend's. Dionysius consented, and Pythias returned just in time to save Damon from death. Struck by so noble an example, the tyrant pardoned Pythias, and desired to be admitted into their sacred fellowship.

Dampier, William, navigator and hydrographer, was born near Yeovil in 1652. He gained a great knowledge of hydrography in voyages to Newfoundland, Bantam, Jamaica, and Campeachy Bay. After two years among the lawless log-wood cutters of Yucatan, he joined in 1679 a band of buccaneers who crossed the Isthmus of Darien and ravaged the coast as far south as Juan Fernandez. In another expedition (1683), after seizing a Danish ship at Sierra Leone, he coasted along the shores of Chili, Peru, and Mexico, sailing thence across the Pacific, and touching at the Philippines, China, and Australia. Marooned on Nicobar Islands (1688), he made his way in a native canoe to Atcheen, and got back to England (1691), where he published his interesting Voyage round the World (1697). He conducted (1699-1700) a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, in which he explored the north-west coast of Australia, also the coasts of New Guinea and New Britain, giving his name to the Dampier Archipelago and Strait. On the return voyage he was wrecked off Ascension, and lived with his crew on turtles and goats for over two months, until relieved. The old buccaneer was a better pilot than commander, and his cruelty to his lieutenant led to his being court-martialled. Yet in 1703 he was reappointed to the command of two privateers (the master of one of them Alexander Selkirk) to the South Seas, when he was said to have been guilty of drunkenness, brutality, and even cowardice. Dampier returned home at the close of 1707, poor and broken, nor did his angry Vindication re-establish his reputation. Next year he sailed again as pilot to a privateer, which rescued Selkirk, and returned in 1711. He died in March 1715. See Life by Clark Russell (1889), and Masefield's edition of the Voyages (1907).

DANA, CHARLES ANDERSON, born at Hinsdale, N.H., 8th August 1819, spent two years at Harvard, and was a member of the Brook Farm community. During 1848-62 he edited the New York Tribune, which opposed the extension of slavery to new territories; and from 1863 to the close of the war he was assistant-secretary of war. In 1867 he purchased the New York Sun, and successfully managed it on democratic lines. He published translations and anthologies, collaborated in a Life of Grant (1868), and with George Ripley, a former associate at Brook Farm, edited the New American Cyclopaedia (1857-63) and the American Cyclopaedia (1873-76), both in 16 vols. He died at New York, 18th Oct. 1897.

DANA, JAMES DWIGHT, mineralogist and geologist, was born at Utica, N.Y., 12th February 1813. He graduated at Yale in 1833, and was sent out in 1838 as a scientific observer in the U.S. exploring expedition under Wilkes, visiting the Antarctic and Pacific, during which Dana's ship was wrecked. He afterwards with his father-in-law, Silliman, edited the American Journal of Science, and in 1846 was elected professor of Natural History and Geology at Yale. Among his works are System of Mineralogy (1837), Manual of Mineralogy (1848), two treatises on corals, Text-book of Geology (1864), and Hawaiian Volcanoes (1890). He died 14th April 1895.

DANA, RICHARD HENRY, poet and prose writer, was born at Cambridge, Mass., 15th November 1787. He was educated at Harvard, and admitted to the bar at Boston in 1811. In 1818 he became associate editor of the North American Review, to which he contributed largely. His Dying Raven (1821), The Buccaneer (1827), and some others of his poems were warmly praised by critics; but Dana's best work was in criticism. He died at Boston, 2d February 1879.

His son, RICHARD H. DANA, author and lawyer, was born 1st August 1815, and graduated at Harvard in 1837. During a break in his college career, occasioned in part by an affection of the eyes, he shipped as a common sailor, and made a voyage round Cape Horn to California and back. This voyage he described in Two Years before the Mast (1840), the best book of the kind; in 1840 he was admitted to the Massachusetts bar, and was especially distinguished in maritime law. Among his works are The Seaman's Friend (1841) and To Cuba and Back (1859). He also edited Wheaton's International Law, and was a prominent Free-soiler and Republican. He died in Rome, 7th January 1882. See Life by Adams (2 vols. 1890).

DANBY, FRANCIS, painter, was born near Wexford, 16th November 1793. In 1812 he began to exhibit in Dublin; in 1813 he visited London, but at Bristol on the way back his money ran short and he stopped there till 1824. His 'Upas Tree' was exhibited in London (1820); his 'Disappointed Love' (1821); his 'Delivery of Israel out of Egypt' (1825), which gained him his election as an A.R.A.; and his 'Opening of the Sixth Seal' (1828). From 1829 to 1841, owing to domestic troubles largely of his own making, he lived abroad, chiefly on the Lake of Geneva, painting little, and boating. After his return to England, he settled in 1847 at Exmouth, where he died 9th February 1861. His 'Fisherman's House—Sunset' (1846) is now in the National Gallery. His three sons, John, James Francis, and Thomas, were all landscape-painters.

DANBY, LORD. See LEEDS, DUKE OF.

DANCE, GEORGE (1700-68), architect, designed the Mansion House (1739) and many other London buildings.—His son, GEORGE DANCE (1741-1825), rebuilt Newgate (1770-83), and was one of the original Royal Academicians.

DANCER, ANN. See BARRY, SPRANGER.

DANCER, DANIEL (1716-94), the Pinner miser, who lived on a few pence a day, went swathed in hay-bands, and died worth £3000 a year.

DANCKERTS, HENRY (c. 1630-80), engraver and architectural painter, was born at the Hague and died at Amsterdam, having resided in England during 1668-79.

DANCOURT, FLORENT CARTON (1661-1725), French dramatist, actor, and court favourite, became devout in his old age, which he spent in retirement in the country. He excelled in depicting the stupidity of the peasantry and the follies of the bourgeoisie. See works by Barthélemy (1882) and Lemaître (1882). [Dons-koor.]

DANDOLO, ENRICO (c. 1108-1205), a Venetian, eminent in learning, eloquence, and knowledge of affairs, who in 1173 was sent as ambassador to Constantinople, and in 1192 was elected doge. As such he defeated the Pisans, and in 1201 marched at the head of the crusaders, and subdued Trieste and Zara, the coasts of Albania, the Ionian Islands, and Constantinople, 17th July 1203. When the Emperor Alexius was murdered by his own subjects, Dandolo laid siege to Constantinople and took it by storm 13th April 1204. He established there the empire of the Latins, and caused Count Baldwin of Flanders to be chosen emperor.—GIOVANNI DANDOLO was doge, 1280-89; FRANCESCO, 1328-39; ANDREA, 1342-54.

DANGERFIELD, THOMAS (1650-85), inventor of the Meal-tub Plot, was the son of a farmer at Waltham in Essex, and had been a thief, vagabond, and soldier on the Continent, pseudo-convert to Catholicism, coiner, &c., when in 1679 he accused the Presbyterians of plotting to destroy the government. Imprisoned when this was shown to be a lie, he excused himself as having been deceived by a tale invented by the Roman Catholics to screen a plot of their own against the king's life. Papers proving this would, he alleged, be found in a meal-tub in the house of a lady (who was tried and acquitted). He himself was now whipped and pilloried, and on returning from Tyburn was killed by a blow in the eye from the cane of a bystander.

Daniel, according to the book in the Bible which bears his name, was one of the Jews carried to Babylon, and gained a high position at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius, and Cyrus. In the Hebrew canon the book, which nowhere claims to be written by Daniel, is not included in the Prophets, but appears among the miscellaneous 'Writings.' Objections to the Danielic authorship were made by Porphyry in the 3d century A.D.; and modern critics hold that the book was not written till the religious persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, about 168-165 B.C.

Daniel, GEORGE (1616-57), a forgotten Cavalier poet, of Beswick, near Beverley. Dr Grosart edited his poems (4 vols. 1878).

Daniel, SAMUEL, poet, was the son of a music-master, and was born in 1562 near Taunton. He entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1597, but left it without a degree. He was some time tutor at Wilton to William Herbert, son of the Earl of Pembroke, afterwards at Skipton to Anne Clifford, daughter of the Earl of Cumberland. In 1604 he was appointed to read new plays; in 1607 became one of the queen's grooms of the privy chamber, and in 1615-18 had charge of a company of young players at Bristol. Retiring then to a farm which he possessed at Beckington, in Somerset, he died there in October 1619. Daniel was highly commended by Lodge, Carew, and Drummond of Hawthornden, although Ben Jonson described him as 'a good honest man . . . but no poet.' Coleridge, Lamb, and Hazlitt unite in praising him. As a sonneteer Daniel is exquisite; some of the 'Delia' series rank near the best sonnets in English. His works include also epistles, masques, and dramas; but his chief production is a poem in eight books, A History of the Civil Wars between York and Lancaster. His Defence of Ryme (1602) is in admirable prose. Dr Grosart reprinted his works (5 vols. 1885-96).

Daniel, WILLIAM BARKER (c. 1764-1833), an unbefitted clergyman and sportsman, compiler of the well-known Rural Sports (2 vols. 1801).

Daniell, EDWARD THOMAS, a Norfolk clergyman and artist, who went to the East, and died of malaria at Adalia in Asia Minor, September 24, 1842. See Memoir by F. R. Beecheno (1889).

Daniell, JOHN FREDERIC, F.R.S., D.C.L. (1790-1845), born in London, while engaged in a sugar-refining work studied chemistry and meteorology. In 1831 he became Chemistry professor in King's College, London; in 1839 published his Introduction to Chemical Philosophy. In 1843 he obtained all the three medals of the Royal Society. He invented a hygrometer (1820), a pyrometer (1830), and the Daniell electric battery.

Daniell, THOMAS, R.A. (1749-1840), landscape-painter, was born at Kingston-on-Thames, and with his nephew, WILLIAM DANIELL, R.A. (1769-1837), painted in India during 1784-94.

Dan'necker, JOHANN HEINRICH VON (1758-1841), sculptor, was born at Waldenbuch, near Stuttgart, and from 1790 was professor of Sculpture in that city. His masterpiece, 'Ariadne on the Panther' (1816), is at Frankfurt.

Dannreuther, EDWARD (1844-1905), pianist and professor at the Royal College of Music in London, was born at Strasburg. [Dan'roi-ter.]

D'Annunzio, GABRIELE, Italian realist, was born in 1864 at Francavilla. The Triumph of Death and others of his works—novels, plays, and poems—have appeared in English and French.

Dante Alighieri, 'that singular splendour of the Italian race,' as Boccaccio, his first biographer, calls him, was born, a lawyer's son, at Florence in May 1265. He was baptised Durante, afterwards contracted into Dante; and the old biographers loved to dwell on the appropriateness of both names, 'the much-enduring' and 'the giver.' In his Vita Nuova, the New (i.e. probably Early) Life, he relates how he first set eyes on 'the glorious lady of his heart, Beatrice,' he then being about nine years of age, and she a few months younger. To Boccaccio, and to his statement alone, we owe the generally accepted fact that she was the daughter of Folco Portinari, for Dante himself never gives the slightest clue as to her family name. That chance meeting in May 1274 determined the whole future course of the poet's life. The story of his boyish but unquenchable passion is told with exquisite pathos in the Vita Nuova. There is no evidence that any similar feeling was aroused in the heart of Beatrice herself. She was married early to one Simone de' Bardi, but neither this nor the poet's own subsequent marriage interfered with his pure and Platonic devotion to her, which became even intensified after her death, on June 9, 1290. Shortly after Dante married Gemma Donati, daughter of a powerful Guelph family. That it proved an unhappy marriage is a mere conjecture, based on the fact that after Dante's exile he never appears to have seen his wife again. In 1289 Dante fought at Campaldino, where Florence defeated the Ghibellines, and was at the capitulation of Caprona. He was registered in one of the city guilds—that of the Apothecaries—being entered as 'Dante d'Aldighieri, poeta.' In 1300, after filling minor public offices, and possibly going on some embassies abroad, he attained to the dignity of one of the six priors of Florence—a dignity lasting for only two months. It was towards the 'White Guelphs' or more moderate section that his sympathies tended; as prior he procured the banishment of the heads and leaders of the rival factions, showing characteristic sternness and impartiality to Guelph and Ghibelline, White and Black, alike. Shortly afterwards the leaders of the Whites were permitted somehow to return. The partiality thus shown was a prominent feature in the accusation against Dante; but he had a complete answer in the fact that then he was no longer in office.

In 1301, in alarm at the threatened interference of Charles of Valois, Dante was sent on an embassy to Rome to Pope Boniface VIII. From that embassy he never returned, nor did he ever again set foot in his native city. Charles espousing the side of the Neri or Blacks, their victory was complete; and in January 1302 sentence of banishment went forth against Dante and others, nominally on the baseless charge of malversation in office. This was followed by a yet severer sentence on March 10, which condemned them to be burned alive if ever caught, and which was repeated in 1311 and 1315. Dante's principal halting-places seem to have been—first Verona, in Tuscany, in the Lunigiano, near Urbino, and then Verona again. During this period he is said to have visited Paris; but some of his biographers connect that visit with the period of his early education. Among these is Serravalle, who wrote as late as 1417, and who is also the sole authority for Dante's alleged visit to England and Oxford. Those who, like Boccaccio, take him to France during his exile, suppose him to have been recalled to Italy and politics by the election of Henry of Luxemburg as emperor and his visit to Italy, where no emperor had set foot for more than fifty years. The exile's hopes were now roused to the highest pitch, but were finally crushed by Henry's unexpected death on August 24, 1313, after which Dante took refuge in Romagna, and finally in Ravenna, where for the most part he remained until his death, on September 14, 1321. He was buried with much pomp at Ravenna, and there he still lies, restored in 1865 to the original sarcophagus. Dante had seven children, six sons and one daughter, Beatrice, a nun at Ravenna; but his family became extinct in the 16th century. A cast was taken from his face after death, so that we have an absolutely authentic record of his features.

The dates and sequence of his various works are matter of conjecture. Doubtless the Vita Nuova is the earliest. By far the most celebrated is the Divina Commedia, in which he purposes 'to say of Beatrice that which never yet was said of any woman.' In this vision of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven we have an encyclopaedic view of the highest culture and knowledge of the age on philosophy, history, classical literature, physical science, morals, theology, expressed in the sublimest and most exquisite poetry, and with consummate power and beauty of language. The Divina Commedia may be said to have made the Italian language, which was before so rude and unformed that Dante himself hesitated to employ it on such a theme, and is said to have commenced his poem in Latin. No work probably in the world, except the Bible, has given rise to so vast a literature. To say nothing of nearly six hundred MSS. in which it was copied before printing became common, there have been published about three hundred editions; it has been a hundred times translated into various European languages; and of commentaries, introductions, essays, and monographs there is no end. The next most important work is the fragment called the Convito, or Banquet, which takes the form of a commentary on some canzoni, or short poems, of the author, of which there are only three, though the work, if completed, would have contained fourteen. The De Monarchia (in Latin) expounds Dante's theory of the divinely-intended government of the world by a universal emperor acting in harmony with a universal pope. Another unfinished work, De Vulgari Eloquentia, discusses the origin of language, the divisions of languages, and the dialects of Italian in particular. Canzoniere is a considerable collection of short poems, canzoni, sonnets, &c.; and, finally, we have a dozen epistles addressed mainly to leading statesmen or rulers. There are also some Eclogues and other minor works, as well as several of doubtful authenticity.

The best editions are: For the Commedia, Brunone Bianchi, Fraticelli, Scartazzini (3 vols.), and Witte; for the De Monarchia and the Vita Nuova, Witte; for the complete works, Fraticelli, Giuliani (all except the Commedia), and Edward Moore, D.D. (Oxf. 1894). See also the invaluable Bibliografia Dantesca of Colomb de Batines, continued by Carpellina and by Petzholdt (to 1880); L. G. Blanc's Vocabolario Dantesco; A Shadow of Dante, by Maria Francesca Rossetti; Moore's Dante and his Early Biographers (1890) and Studies in Dante (1896-97); Boswell's Vita Nuova and its Author (1895); Butler's translation of Scartazzini's German Companion to Dante (1894); and his own Dante: his Times and his Work (1895); and various works by Vernon and by Paget Toynbee. English verse translations are by Cary, Wright, Cayley, Pollock, Longfellow, Plumptre, Hazelfoot, E. Lee Hamilton, Rossetti, and Sibbald (the last two the Inf. only); and in prose by Dr John Carlyle (Inf. only) and Butler. [Dan-teh A-lee'-gee-ay'-ree; g hard.]

Danton, GEORGES-JACQUES, born of farmer-stock at Arcis-sur-Aube, 28th October 1759, at the outbreak of the French Revolution was practising as an advocate in Paris. Mirabeau recognised his genius, and hastened to attach him to himself. The year before, with Marat and Camille Desmoulins, Danton had instituted the Cordeliers' Club, which soon became the rallying-point of all the hotter revolutionists. There the tall brawny man, with harsh and daring countenance, beetling black brows, and a voice of enormous power, thundered against the aristocrats. His share in the march on the Tuileries (10th August 1792) is very doubtful, but it is certain that immediately thereafter he appears as Minister of Justice. And now the gigantic personality of the man seemed to overshadow all around him. The advance of the Prussians for a moment struck panic to the heart of France; on 2d September Danton uttered the famous words: 'Pour les vaincre, pour les atterrer, que faut-il? De l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace.' Paris was moved with resistless enthusiasm: she poured forth army after army of her sons, but the September massacres in the prisons were an outburst of cowardice and fear. Danton had no share in this atrocity, for which Marat was mainly responsible. Danton voted for the death of the king (January 1793), was one of the nine original members of the Committee of Public Safety, and frequently went on missions to Dumouriez and other republican generals. In the Convention he bent his giant strength to crush the Girondists, or moderate party, on whose fall (October 1793) the extremists found themselves supreme. Henceforth all his energies were devoted at once to fire the hearts of Frenchmen against the foreign enemy and to conciliate domestic hatreds. He strove to abate the pitiless severity of the Revolutionary Tribunal, which he had himself set up; but although Hébert and his party were cut off, Danton's policy of clemency failed to commend itself to the Mountain, whose ferocious instincts saw a more promising leader in Robespierre. For a while Danton went to his native Arcis, and forgot all the machinations of his enemies in the quiet of domestic happiness with his second wife. Soon his friends summoned him to Paris, there to be arrested and brought, on 2d April 1794, with Camille Desmoulins and a group of his friends, before the Revolutionary Tribunal. His defence was sublime in its audacity, its incoherence, its heroism and magnificent buffoonery. The first two days of his trial his mighty voice and passionate eloquence moved the people so greatly that the Committee concocted a decree to shut the mouths of men who had 'insulted Justice'; thus only could they send to his doom the greatest figure that fell in the Revolution (April 5, 1794). See Lives by Bougeart (1861), Robinet (1889), Belloc (1899), and Beesly (1899). [Dons-tow.]

D'Anville, JEAN BAPISTE BOURGUIGNON (1697-1782), a geographer and map-maker, was born and died in Paris. [Dons-vel.]

D'Arblay, MADAME, OF FRANCES BURNAY, was born at LYNN, 13th June 1752, the daughter of Dr Burney (q.v.), then organist there. In 1760 he removed to London; in 1766 his second marriage gave Fanny a kind step-mother. Already at ten she had begun her incessant scribbling of stories, plays and poems, though but two years before she was ignorant of her letters; on her fifteenth birthday, in a fit of repentance for such waste of time, she burned all her papers, but she could not erase from her brain the plot of Evelina. This was sold for £20, and published anonymously in 1778, not even her father having seen the manuscript. He at once recognised his daughter's touch, and soon confided the secret to Mrs Thrale, who, as well as Dr Johnson, petted the gifted young authoress. The praises showered on the book by Johnson, Reynolds, Burke, and the whole world of fashion, might well have turned her head; but, urged to write a comedy, she had the sense to suppress it in deference to the criticisms of her father and Samuel Crisp, the 'daddy' of her letters. Cecilia (1782) was no less successful than her first novel. At Windsor, in the house of Mrs Delany, she became known to the royal family, and in 1786 was appointed second keeper of the robes, with a salary of £200 a year. She soon found her menial duties intolerably tedious, and her health declined; but her veneration for the queen kept her from resigning until compelled by the remonstrances of Burke, Boswell, and Windham. At length in 1791 she retired with a pension of £100, and recovered her health and spirits by travelling in England. At Norbury Park, Mickleham, near Dorking, she met General D'Arblay, a French refugee, and married him on her pension in 1793. Her third novel, Camilla (1796), brought her 3000 guineas, with which she built Camilla Cottage, near Mickleham. It was, however, only a pecuniary success, while her tragedy, Edwy and Elvina, had already been damned in 1795, spite of the acting of Mrs Siddons and Kemble. From 1802 to 1812 she lived at Passy, near Paris, with her husband, who had procured civil employment there, then returned to England with her son, ALEXANDER (1794-1837), tended her father till his death in 1814, and in the same year published her last novel, The Wanderer, another failure. At the first Restoration she joined her husband in Paris, was at Brussels during Waterloo, and soon after returned finally to England with her husband, who died 3d May 1818. Her son was tenth wrangler at Cambridge that year, took orders, became minister at Ely Chapel in 1836, and died of rapid decline. Madame D'Arblay published in 1832 her memoirs of her father, written in a strangely pretentious style, and died 6th January 1840. See her Letters and Diaries (7 vols. 1842-46), her Early Diary (2 vols. 1890), L. B. Seeley's Fanny Burney and her Friends (1889), and Austin Dobson's Fanny Burney (1903).

Darboy, GEORGES, born 16th January 1813 at Fayl-Billot, in Haute-Marne, in 1859 was made Bishop of Nancy, in 1863 Archbishop of Paris. He upheld the Gallican theory, waged a long struggle with the Jesuits, and at the Vatican Council opposed the dogma of papal infallibility, but when it was adopted was one of the first to submit. During the German siege of Paris he was unceasing in labours of benevolence, and under the Commune he refused to leave his flock. Arrested as a hostage by the Communists, 4th April 1871, he was shot in the court of the prison of La Roquette, 24th May. He died like a Christian martyr, words of forgiveness on his lips and his hands lifted in blessing. His two immediate predecessors had likewise died a bloody death—Sibour murdered during the celebration of a religious rite (January 3, 1857); Affre shot down on the barricades (June 1848). See Foulon's Vie de Darboy (1889). [Dar-bwah'.]

Darby, JOHN NELSON (1800-82), the principal

founder in 1830 of the Plymouth Brethren or 'Darbyites,' was born in London, was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Dublin, was for a year or two an Anglican clergyman, and died at Bournemouth. He wrote thirty works. See his Personal Recollections (1881).

D'Arc. See JOAN OF ARC.

Darcy, THOMAS, LORD (1467-1537), a Yorkshire soldier and statesman, ennobled in 1505 and beheaded for his part in the Pilgrimage of Grace.

Dargan, WILLIAM (1799-1867), a great constructor from 1831 of railways in Ireland, was born in Carlow County, and died at Dublin.

D'Argens, JEAN BAPTISTE DE BOYER, MARQUIS (1704-71), a French philosophical writer whose works fill 38 volumes, was born at Aix in Provence and died near Toulon, having resided from 1744 to 1769 at the court of Frederick the Great. See his Mémoires (new ed. Paris, 1807). [Dar-jonv'.]

D'Argenson, RENÉ LOUIS, MARQUIS (1694-1757), a French statesman, was the son of the Marquis d'Argenson (1652-1721) who created the secret police and established the lettres de cachet. He fell a victim in 1747 to the machinations of Madame de Pompadour, as ten years later did his brother, MARC PIERRE, Comte d'Argenson (1696-1764), who became war-minister in 1743. MARC ANTOINE RENÉ D'ARGENSON, Marquis de Pauly (1722-87), René's son, was a bibliographer. See works by Zevort (1880), the Duc de Broglie (2 vols. 1891), and Ogle (1893). [Dar-jonv'-sonv'.]

Darius I. (Hystaspis), born in 548 B.C., was the son of Hystaspes, of the family of the Achæmenides (q.v.), and ascended the Persian throne in 521, after putting to death the Magian Gomates ('Smerdis'), who gave himself out to be Bardes, Cambyse's brother. He had for several years to contend with revolts in all parts of his empire. Babylon resisted him with especial obstinacy for nearly two years (520-19), and, revolting a second time, was again taken (514). He then reorganised the Persian empire, removing the seat of government to Susa, while he pushed his conquests as far as the Caucasus and the Indus. In his expedition against the Scythians in 515, after carrying 700,000 men across the Bosphorus on a bridge of boats, and subduing Thrace and Macedonia, he was led on by the retreating Scythians as far as the Volga, and returned to the Danube with the loss of 80,000 of his warriors. He returned to Susa, leaving Megabazus in Thrace with a large part of his army. His first expedition against the Athenians miscarried through the wreck of his fleet at Mount Athos in 492; the second was decisively defeated at Marathon in 490. He died in 485, before the Egyptian revolt (487) had been subdued and in the midst of preparations for a third expedition against the Athenians, and was succeeded by Xerxes (q.v.). Darius was a Persian by birth, and bred in the Zoroastrian faith, which under him became the state religion.—DARIUS II. (Ochus, called by the Greeks Nothos, 'bastard'), illegitimate son of Artaxerxes I., in 424 B.C. snatched the crown from Sogdianus, his also illegitimate brother, who had slain the rightful king, Xerxes II. He was the tool of the eunuchs and women of his harem, especially his cruel step-sister and spouse Parysatis; and his reign was a long series of miseries, crimes, and revolts ruthlessly suppressed. After the failure of the Sicilian expedition of the Athenians in 415, Darius broke the humiliating treaty of 449. He died at Babylon in 405, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Artaxerxes II.—DARIUS III. (Codomannus), son of a daughter of Artaxerxes II. (q.v.), began to reign in the same year as his conqueror Alexander the Great (336). Defeated at the Granicus (334), at Issus (333), and at Arbela (331), he was slain during his flight by one of his satraps (330).

Dark, JAMES HENRY (1795-1871), the purchaser in 1836 of the lease of Lord's cricket-ground.

Darley, FELIX OCTAVIUS CARR (1822-88), an artist, born in Philadelphia, and best known by his illustrations to Washington Irving's Sleepy Hollow and Rip van Winkle, Judd's Margaret, and Cooper's, Dickens's, and Simms's novels.

Darley, GEORGE (1795-1846), poet and mathematician, was born in Dublin, and from about 1822 led a solitary life in London. His Poetical Works were edited by Colles (1908).

Darling, GRACE (1815-42), born at Bamborough, was the daughter of William Darling (1795-1860), lighthouse-keeper on Longstone, one of the Farne Islands, and with her father, on 7th September 1838, rescued the survivors of the Forfarshire, bound from Hull to Dundee. She died of consumption. See Grace Darling, by E. Hope (1876), and the Journal of William Darling (1886).

Darlington, WILLIAM (1782-1863), botanist, born at Birmingham, Penn., died at Westchester.

Darmesteter, JAMES (1849-94), born of Jewish parentage, at Château-Salins in Lorraine, was educated at Paris, and in 1877 became professor of Zend at the Ecole des Hautes Études, in 1885 at the Collège de France. Besides works on the Zend-Avesta, he wrote Essais de Littérature Anglaise, and a French translation of his wife's poems. She, AGNES MARY F. ROBINSON, born at Leamington in 1857, and afterwards Mme. Duclaux, has published much admirable poetry, a novel, Lives of Emily Brontë, Froissart, Renan, &c.—His brother, ARSENE (1846-88), trained to be a rabbi, passed to the study of mediæval French.

Darnley, HENRY STEWART, LORD (1546-67), the husband of Mary, Queen of Scots (q.v.), was the eldest son of the Earl of Lennox by Lady Margaret Douglas, so a grandson of Margaret Tudor and a cousin of Mary.

Daru, PIERRE ANTOINE, COMTE (1767-1829), financier, poet, and historian, born at Montpellier, at sixteen entered the army, was imprisoned during the Terror, and by Napoleon was made intendant-general in Austria and Prussia, and by Louis XVIII. a peer.—His son, NAPOLÉON (1807-90), opposed the coup d'état, and was proscribed; but became a member of the National Assembly in 1871, of the senate in 1876.

Darusmont, FRANCES, or FANNY WRIGHT (1795-1852), abolitionist and socialist, born at Dundee, lived mostly in America from 1818, in 1838 married (unhappily) a Frenchman, and died at Cincinnati. See Life by Gilbert (1855). [Da-ree-mont'.]

Darwin, CHARLES ROBERT, the discoverer of natural selection, was born at Shrewsbury, February 12, 1809. His grandfather was Dr Erasmus Darwin (q.v.); his father Dr Robert Waring Darwin, F.R.S. (1766-1848); and his mother was a daughter of Josiah Wedgwood. After five years at Shrewsbury grammar-school, he studied medicine at Edinburgh University (1825-27), and then, with a view to the church, entered Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1828. Already at Edinburgh he was a member of the local Plinian Society; he took part in its natural history excursions, and read before it his first scientific paper—on the Flustra or sea-mats. But it was at Cambridge that his biological studies seriously began. Here he became acquainted with Professor Henslow, the botanist, who encouraged his interest also in zoology and geology. In 1831 he took his B.A., and shortly after was recommended by Henslow as naturalist to H.M.S. Beagle, then about to start for a scientific survey of South American waters. He sailed on December 27, 1831, and did not return till October 2, 1836. Meanwhile he visited Tenerife, the Cape Verd Islands, Brazil, Monte Video, Tierra del Fuego, Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, Chili, the Galapagos, Tahiti, New Zealand, Tasmania, and the Keeling Islands, in which last he started his famous theory of coral reefs. It was during this long expedition that Darwin obtained that intimate knowledge of the fauna, flora, and geology of many climes which so admirably equipped him for the great task he was to perform. By 1846 he had published several works on the geological and zoological discoveries of his voyage, on coral reefs, volcanic islands, &c.—works that placed him at once in the front rank of scientists. He formed the friendship of Sir Charles Lyell, was secretary of the Geological Society in 1838-41, in 1839 was elected F.R.S., and in 1839 married his cousin, Emma Wedgwood (1808-96). In 1842 he settled at Down, Kent, where for the rest of his days he passed his time as a country gentleman among his garden, conservatories, pigeons, and fowls. The practical knowledge thus gained (especially as regards variation and interbreeding) was invaluable; and private means enabled him to devote himself unremittingly, in spite of continuous ill-health, to science. At Down he addressed himself to the great work of his life—the problem of the origin of species. After five years' unremitting work, he 'allowed himself to speculate' on the subject, and drew up in 1842 some short notes, which he enlarged in 1844 into a sketch of conclusions for his own use. These embodied in embryo the principle of natural selection, the germ of the Darwinian Theory; but with constitutional caution Darwin delayed publication of his hypothesis, which was only precipitated by accident. In 1858 Mr Alfred Russel Wallace sent home from the Malay Archipelago a memoir addressed to Darwin; and this, to his surprise, Darwin found to contain in essence the main idea of his own theory of natural selection. Lyell and Hooker persuaded him to read a letter of his own of the previous year simultaneously with Wallace's before the Linnean Society, which was accordingly done on July 1, 1858. Hereupon Darwin set to work seriously at once to condense his vast mass of notes, and put into shape his great work on The Origin of Species by means of Natural Selection, published in November 1859. That epoch-making work was received throughout Europe with the deepest interest, was violently attacked and energetically defended, but in the end succeeded in obtaining recognition (with or without certain reservations) from almost all competent biologists. From the day of its publication Darwin continued to work on unremittingly at a great series of supplemental treatises. The Fertilisation of Orchids appeared in 1862, The Variation of Plants and Animals under Domestication in 1867, and The Descent of Man in 1871. The last-named work, hardly less famous than the Origin of Species, derives the human race from a hairy quadrumanous animal belonging to the great anthropoid group, and related to the progenitors of the orang-utan, chimpanzee, and gorilla. In it Darwin also developed his important supplementary theory of sexual selection. Later works were The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals (1873), Insectivorous Plants (1875), Climbing Plants (1875), The Effects of Cross and Self Fertilisation in the Vegetable Kingdom (1876), Different Forms of Flowers in Plants of the same Species (1877), The Power of Movement in Plants (1880), and The Formation of Vegetable Mould through the action of Worms (1881). It is as the great leader of evolutionary biology that Darwin will be mainly remembered. Though not himself the originator of the evolution hypothesis, nor even the first to apply the conception of descent to plant and animal organisms, Darwin was undoubtedly the first thinker to gain for that conception a wide acceptance among biological experts. By adding to the crude evolutionism of Erasmus Darwin, Lamarck, and others his own specific idea of natural selection, he supplied to the idea a sufficient cause, which raised it at once from a hypothesis to a verifiable theory. His kindness, honesty of purpose, devotion to truth, and attachment to his friends, rendered him no less remarkable on the moral and emotional than on the intellectual side of his nature. He died suddenly, April 19, 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See his Life and Letters (1887; with More Letters, 1903) by his son, FRANCIS (born 1848), fellow of Christ's College, reader in Botany at Cambridge.—An elder son, SIR GEORGE HOWARD, K.C.B. (born 1845), educated at Trinity College, since 1883 is professor of Astronomy at Cambridge, distinguished for his work on tides, tidal friction, and the equilibrium of rotating masses. Both are former Presidents of the British Association, and Fellows of the Royal Society.

Darwin, ERASMUS, born near Newark, 12th December 1731, studied at Cambridge and Edinburgh, and at Lichfield became a popular physician and prominent figure from his ability, his radical and freethinking opinions, his poetry, his eight-acre botanical garden, and his imperious advocacy of temperance in drinking. After his second marriage in 1781, he settled in Derby, and then at Breadsall Priory, where he died suddenly 18th April 1802. By his first wife he was grandfather of Charles Darwin; by his second of Francis Galton. His philosophy of nature is inconsequent and untenable, but many of his ideas are original and contain the germs of important truths. Sometimes he is exceedingly happy in seeing analogies in nature; at other times he is quite fantastical. In his verse, too, amid frequent extravagance and incomprehensibility, there burst forth strains of genuine poetry. The 'Loves of the Plants' (1789), a part of his Botanic Garden, was happily burlesqued in the 'Loves of the Triangles' in the Anti-Jacobin. Interest in Darwin's speculations has been revived by the recognition of his partial anticipation of Lamarck's views on evolution and so of his own famous grandson's. His chief prose works are Zoönomia, or the Laws of Organic Life (1794-96) and Phytologia (1799). See works by Krause (trans. 1879) and Brandl (1902 and 1909).

Dasent, SIR GEORGE WEBBE, was born 22d May 1820, in St Vincent, of which his father was attorney-general. He was educated at Westminster School and King's College, London; graduated B.A. from Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1840; and was called to the bar in 1852, in which year also he took his D.C.L. He was (1845-70) a Times assistant-editor, and married a sister of its editor, Mr Delane. He often acted as civil service examiner in English and modern languages, from 1872 to 1892 was a Civil Service Commissioner, and was knighted in 1876. Among his works, besides four novels, are a translation of The Prose or Younger Edda (1842); Popular Tales from the Norse (1859), and Tales from the Fjeld (1874), both from the Norwegian of Asbjørnsen; and translations from the Icelandic of the Saga of Burnt Njal (1861) and the Story of Gislí the Outlaw (1866). His introduction to Asbjørnsen's Popular Tales was a solid contribution to folklore. He died 11th June 1896.

Dash, COUNTESS, the pseudonym of Gabrielle Anna Cisterne de Courtiras, Vicomtesse de Saint-Mars (1804-72), who, born at Poitiers, married early, and, after losing her property, wrote novels, readable enough, if of little worth.

Dashkoff, PRINCESS EKATERINA ROMANOVNA (1748-1810), born at St Petersburg, married Prince Dashkoff at fifteen, and was left a widow three years after. She was an intimate friend of Catharine II., one of the heads of the conspiracy against Peter III. which had secured her the throne. Quarrelling with Catharine, she visited Germany, England, France, and Italy, and made the acquaintance of Garrick, Dr Blair, Dr Robertson, &c. The empress and she were reconciled, but on Catharine's death in 1796 she was ordered by Paul III. to retire to her estates at Novgorod. See autobiography (trans. 1840).

Dashwood, SIR FRANCIS (1708-81), the founder of the profligate 'monks of Medmenham' or 'Franciscans,' succeeded an uncle as Lord Le Despencer in 1762, and was postmaster-general, &c.

Daub, KARL (1765-1836), a speculative theologian, was born at Cassel, studied at Marburg, and became in 1795 professor of Theology at Heidelberg. See works by Rosenkranz (1837) and Strauss (2d ed. 1844). [Dowb.]

Daubenton, LOUIS JEAN MARIE (1716-99), a naturalist, born at Montbar in Burgundy, who wrote much for Buffon's Histoire Naturelle and the Encyclopédie. [Do'bon-tonn.]

Daubény, CHARLES GILES BRIDLE (1795-1867), born at Stratton in Gloucestershire, became professor of Chemistry at Oxford in 1822, of Botany in 1834. He wrote on volcanoes (1820), the atomic theory (1831), &c.

D'Aubigné, JEAN-HENRI MERLE, ecclesiastical historian, was born at Eaux-Vives, near Geneva, 16th August 1794, studied at Berlin under Neander, and in 1818 became pastor of the French Protestant Church in Hamburg. In 1823 he was appointed court-preacher at Brussels; but after the revolution of 1830 he declined the post of tutor to the Prince of Orange, and, returning to Geneva, took part in the institution of the new Evangelical Church, and filled its chair of Church History until his sudden death, October 20, 1872. His Histoire de la Réformation au Seizième Siècle (1835-58) has enjoyed immense popularity; other works were Germany, England, and Scotland (1848); a vindication of Cromwell (1848); Trois Siècles de Lutte en Écosse (1849); and Histoire de la Réformation en Europe au Temps de Calvin (1862-78). See Life by Bonnet (Par. 1874). [Do'been-yay.]

D'Aubigné, THÉODORE AGRIPPA, scholar, was born 8th February 1550 near Pons in Saintonge. Of noble family, but poor, he as a soldier in 1567 distinguished himself in the Huguenot cause, and by Henry IV. was made vice-admiral of Guienne and Brittany. His severe and inflexible character frequently embroiled him with the court; and after Henry's assassination (1610) he withdrew to a life of literary study at Geneva. He died April 29, 1630, leaving a worthless son, Constant, who was father of Madame de Maintenon. D'Aubigné's

Histoire Universelle, 1550-1601 (Amsterdam, 1616-20), in France was burned by the common hangman. His biting satire is shown in his Confession Catholique du Sieur de Sancy and his Aventures du Baron de Fénésté. See his Histoire Secrète, écrite par lui-même (1731); also French studies by Réaume (1883) and Morillot (1884).

Daubigny, CHARLES FRANÇOIS (1817-78), landscape-painter and etcher, was born and died in Paris. See Life by Henriët (1875). [Do'been-ye.]

Daubrée, GABRIEL AUGUSTE (1814-96), geologist and mineralogist, was born at Metz, and from Strasburg was called to Paris in 1861.

D'Aubusson, PIERRE (1423-1503), of noble French family, entered the service of the Emperor Sigismund, and fought against the Turks. Returning to France, he served with the Armagnacs against the Swiss, and covered himself with glory at their defeat near St Jacob (1444). He next joined the order of the Knights Hospitaliers of St John of Jerusalem, and became grand-master in 1476. Mohammed II.'s career of conquest, which threatened to spread over Western Europe, was stayed alone by D'Aubusson and his little colony of Christian soldiers in Rhodes. In May 1480 an army of 100,000 Turks invested the town, but were forced to raise the siege after a month's desperate fighting. [Do'beess-son.]

Daudet, ALPHONSE, born at Nîmes 13th May 1840, after being educated at the Lyons Lycée, was an usher at Alais; but, when only seventeen, set out for Paris with his brother, Ernest (b. 31st May 1837), who became a journalist and novelist of some mark, and both obtained appointments as clerk or private secretary in the office of the Duc de Morny. Alphonse's poem Les Amoureuses (1858) was followed by theatrical pieces (written partly in collaboration), La Dernière Idole (1862), L'Éillet Blanc (1865), Le Frère Aîné (1868), Le Sacrifice (1869), Lise Tavernier, and L'Arlesienne (1872). In the journals appeared some of his best work, Lettres de Mon Moulin (collected 1869), Robert Helmont (1871), Contes du Lundi, and the charming extravaganza of Tartarin de Tarascon (1872), carried further in Tartarin sur les Alpes (1886) and Port Tarascon (1890). Le Petit Chose (1866) is full of pathos and of reminiscences of his own early struggles; Jack (1873) is the story of a bastard; in Fromont Jeune et Risler Aîné (1874) the devotion of a man of business to his firm, his wife, and his brother meets with an evil return. Le Nabab (1877) was a transparent caricature of Morny; the chief parts in Les Rois en Exil (1879) are supposed to have been played also by actual persons; the hero of Numa Roumestan (1882) bears some resemblance to Gambetta; in L'Évangéliste (1883) the Salvation Army was introduced; Sapho (1884) is a tale of the infatuation of a young man for a courtesan; and in L'Immortel (1888) all the author's powers of ridicule are employed to throw discredit on the French Academy. Daudet has been compared with Dickens. He died 16th Dec. 1897, and Le Soutien de Famille came out in 1898.—His wife, JULIE ALLARD (b. in Paris 1845), rendered him not a little assistance, and has herself published several volumes of sketches. See Daudet's autobiographic papers, collected as Trente Ans de Paris (1887) and Souvenirs d'un Homme de Lettres (1888), a work by R. H. Sherard (1894), and one by Daudet's son, Léon (Eng. trans. 1899). [Do-day.]

Daughish, JOHN (1824-64), an Edinburgh M.D. who in 1856 invented aerated bread, was born in London and died at Malvern.

D'Aulnoy, MARIE CATHERINE JUELLE DE

BERNEVILLE, COUNTESS (c. 1650-1705), wrote many tedious romances, but is remembered by her charming Contes des Fées (1698), whose White Cat, Yellow Dwarf, &c., are not altogether unworthy of the inimitable Perrault. [Doal-noah.]

D'Aumale. See AUMALE, DUC D'.

Daumer, GEORG FRIEDRICH (1800-75), was born at Nuremberg, where he taught in the gymnasium, and where Kaspar Hauser (q.v.) was committed to his care. He abandoned pietism for bitter antagonism to Christianity, but in 1859 became a foremost champion of Ultramontanism. His many philosophical writings reflect his varying positions; his poetical works, especially Mahomet (1848), gained a high reputation. He died at Würzburg. [Dow-mer.]

Daumier, HENRI (1808-79), caricaturist, was born at Marseilles and died at Valmondois, in his old age blind and befriended by Corot. See Life by Alexandre (Par. 1888). [Döm'yay.]

Daun, LEOPOLD JOSEPH, GRAF VON (1705-66), born at Vienna, served against the Turks and through the war of the Austrian Succession, in 1754 being made a field-marshal. In the Seven Years' War (1757) he neutralised the Austrian defeat under Browne near Prague by driving Frederick the Great, who had beleaguered that city, to Kolin, and forcing him to evacuate Bohemia. On 14th October 1758 he gained another victory at Hochkirch, and came near to annihilating the Prussian army. In 1759 at Maxen he forced Fink to surrender with 11,000 men. After this, however, he gained no important successes, Frederick having grasped the tactics of 'the Austrian Fabius Cunctator.' [Down.]

Daurat, JEAN (c. 1510-88), a gifted French scholar, as president of the Collège de Coqueret superintended the studies of Ronsard, Du Bellay, Baif, and Belleau. These poets, with whom he was united in the famous Pleiade, he carefully trained for the task of reforming the vernacular and ennobling French literature by imitation of Greek and Latin models. [Do-rah.]

D'Avenant, SIR WILLIAM, poet and playwright, was born in February 1606 at Oxford, where his father kept the Crown, a tavern at which Shakespeare used to stop on the way between London and Stratford. Hence a baseless scandal as to D'Avenant's parentage, which D'Avenant was willing enough to foster. In his twelfth year the precocious boy penned an Ode in Remembrance of Master Shakespeare, not printed, however, until 1638. After a short period of study at Lincoln College, he became page to Frances, Duchess of Richmond; next was in the household of the aged poet, Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke; and in 1628 took to writing for the stage. During the next ten years he produced many plays, the least poor of which were The Cruel Brother (1630) and The Wits (1636). In 1638, at the request of the queen, he was appointed poet-laureate in succession to Ben Jonson. About the same time he lost his nose through an illness—a calamity which laid him open to the merriment of such wits as Snelling and Denham. He afterwards became manager of Drury Lane Theatre, but in the Civil War was flung into the Tower. He soon escaped to France, and returning, so distinguished himself that he was knighted by Charles at the siege of Gloucester (September 1643). D'Avenant again got into difficulties, and was confined in the Tower for two years, where he completed his tedious epic of Gondibert (1651). In 1656 he gave what was practically the first opera in England, with Mrs Coleman as the first actress that ever appeared on an English stage; in 1658 he succeeded in opening a theatre. He died April 7, 1668. A collected edition of his plays, with memoir, was edited by Logan and Maidment (5 vols. Edin. 1872-74). — CHARLES D'AVENANT (1650-1714), his eldest son, studied at Balliol, sat in parliament under James II. and William III., and was commissioner of excise and joint-licenser of plays, secretary to the Commissioners for Union with Scotland, and inspector-general of imports and exports. Among his writings are Discourses on the Revenues of England (1698) and A Discourse upon Grants (1700).

David (Heb., 'beloved'), the second king over Israel, was the youngest son of Jesse, a Bethlehemite, and distinguished himself by slaying Goliath. Saul appointed him to a military command, and gave him his daughter Michal to wife; but he had soon to flee from the king's jealousy. In the cave of Adullam, near Gath, he gathered a troop of 400 freebooters, with whom he ranged through the country between Philistia and the Dead Sea. Saul's expeditions against him put him to great straits, and for over a year David became a vassal of the Philistine king of Gath. After the death of Saul and Jonathan at Gilboa, he reigned seven and a half years in Hebron over the tribe of Judah, while Ishbosheth, Saul's son, ruled the rest of Israel. On the death of Ishbosheth, all Israel chose David as king. He conquered the independent city of Jebus (Jerusalem), and made it the political and religious centre of his kingdom, building a palace for himself on its highest hill, Zion (the 'city of David'), and placing the Ark of the Covenant there under a tent. In the course of a few years the conquest of the Philistines, Moabites, Aramæans, Edomites, and Ammonites reduced the whole territory from Egypt to the Euphrates. The last years of his long reign of thirty-two years in Jerusalem were troubled by attempted revolutions by his sons Absalom and Adonijah. The death of the greatest of the kings of Israel took place at earliest 1018, at latest 993 B.C. 'The sweet singer of Israel' was doubtless the creator of the sublime religious lyric poetry of the Hebrews, though possibly not many of the Psalms as we have them are David's own handiwork.

David, or DEWI, ST, the patron saint of Wales, according to the Annales Cambrie (10th century) died in 601, Bishop of Moni Judeorum, or Menevia, afterwards St Davids. He presided over two Welsh Synods, at Brefni and 'Lucis Victoriae.'

David I., king of Scotland, was the youngest of the six sons of Malcolm Canmore and St Margaret (q.v.). Born c. 1080, he was sent in 1093 to England along with his sister Matilda (who in 1100 married Henry I. of England), and remained for several years at the English court. In 1107, when his elder brother Alexander succeeded to the throne, David became Prince of Cumbria, with a territory which, besides part of Cumberland, included all southern Scotland except the Lothians. By his marriage in 1113 to Matilda, widow of the Norman Earl of Northampton and daughter of the Saxon Earl of Northumbria, he became Earl of Huntingdon. In 1124 he succeeded his brother on the Scottish throne; in 1127 he swore, with the other great barons of England, to maintain the right of his niece, Matilda, to the English crown. In 1135, then, he took up arms on her behalf when Stephen seized the throne, and penetrated into England as far as Durham, where peace was purchased by the confirmation of the earldom of Huntingdon to his son Henry, and the promise of that of Northumberland. In 1138 the war was, however, renewed, and David, deserted by Bruce and others of his Anglo-Norman vassals who owned large estates in England, was signally defeated at the 'Battle of the Standard,' near Northallerton. The next year a second peace was concluded, when the promised earldom of Northumberland was bestowed on Prince Henry. The rest of David's reign—which marks the end of Celtic and the beginning of Fendal Scotland—was devoted to the welding of the different races of Scotland into one nation, the civilisation of the people by the erection of burghs, the promotion of trade, manufactures, and commerce, and the founding or restoration of bishoprics and religious houses. According to Bellenden, 'the crown was left indigent throw ampliation of gret rentis to the kirk,' a state of matters that led James I. (of Scotland) to remark, while standing by David's tomb at Dunfermline, that 'he was ane sair sanct for the crown.' He is often called 'St David,' though he was never formally canonised; but his name was inserted in the calendar prefixed to Laud's Prayer-book for Scotland (1637). He died at Carlisle, 24th May 1153, and was succeeded by his grandson, Malcolm.

David II., only son of King Robert Bruce, was born at Dunfermline, 5th March 1324, and was married in 1328 to Edward II.'s daughter, Joanna. In 1329 he succeeded his father, and in 1331 was crowned, with his child-queen, at Scone. In 1334 the success of Edward Baliol (q.v.) and Edward III.'s victory at Halidon Hill forced David's guardians to send him and his consort to France, whence he returned in 1341. Five years later he invaded England, but at Neville's Cross, near Durham, was utterly routed by the Archbishop of York, 17th October 1346. For eleven years a prisoner, in or near London, and at Odiham in Hampshire, at length in 1357 he was released on promise of a ransom of 100,000 merks, whose non-payment involved him in shameful dependence on England. In 1363 he actually proposed to his parliament that Edward III.'s second son should succeed him on the Scottish throne; and though the proposal was early rejected, the intrigue between the two kings was ended only by David's death at Edinburgh Castle, 22d February 1371. Queen Joanna dying in 1362, David next year had married Margaret Logie, a comely widow, whom he divorced in 1369. By neither marriage had he any issue, so was succeeded by his sister's son, Robert II.

David, FÉLICIEN (1810-76), composer, was born at Cadenet, dep. Vaucluse, and was first a chorister in Aix cathedral, then at twenty entered the Paris Conservatoire. He became an ardent disciple of St Simon and of Enfantin; and finally, on the break-up of the brotherhood in 1833, betook himself, with several of his fellow-dreamers, to the East. From Constantinople the enthusiasts made their way to Smyrna and Cairo; as they had no means, they suffered greatly from want, sickness, and ill-usage. In 1835 he returned to Paris, and published his Méloties Orientales for the pianoforte. They were unsuccessful; and David remained in obscurity till his Désert (1844), a grand 'Ode-symphonie,' had a sudden and complete success. Later works were Moïse au Sinai (1846), Christophe Colomb (1847), La Perle du Brésil (1851), Herculanæum (1859), and Lalla Rookh (1862). In 1862 he was appointed an officer of the Legion of Honour, and in 1869 librarian to the Paris Conservatoire. [Dah-veed.]

David, FERDINAND (1810-73), violinist, was born at Hamburg, studied from thirteen under Spohr at Cassel, and was concertmeister at Leipzig from 1836 till his death at Klosters in the Grisons. See work by Eckardt (Leip. 1888).

David, GERHARD (c. 1460-1523), born at Oude-water in Holland, in 1484 entered the Painters' Guild of Bruges, of which he became dean in 1501. The National Gallery, London, contains his admirable 'Canon and Patron Saints.' See Portfolio for December 1895.

David, JACQUES LOUIS, historical painter, was born at Paris, 31st August 1748. He gained the 'prix de Rome' in 1774, and at Rome devoted himself to drawing from the antique. On his return to France his 'Belisarius' (1780) procured his admission to the Academy. Soon afterwards he married, and visited Italy again and also Flanders. It is in the works of this period, such as the 'Oath of the Horatii' (1784), 'Death of Socrates' (1788), and 'Brutus Condemning his Son' (1789), that the classical feeling is first clearly visible. David entered with enthusiasm into the Revolution, and in 1792 became a representative for Paris in the Convention. He voted for the death of Louis XVI., was a member of the Committee of Public Safety, and was the artistic director of the great national fêtes founded on classical customs. After Robespierre's death he was twice imprisoned, and narrowly escaped with his life. Released in 1795, he produced his masterpiece, 'The Rape of the Sabines' (1799), and in 1804 was appointed court painter by Napoleon. After the Bourbon restoration he was banished in 1816 as a regicide, and died at Brussels, 29th December 1825. See Le Peintre David, by his grandson (1880).

David, PIERRE JEAN, sculptor, known as David d'Angers, was born at Angers, 12th March 1789. In spite of the opposition of his father, a wood-carver, he resolved to become an artist; and, tramping to Paris in 1808, placed himself under Jacques Louis David, the painter. In 1811 his relievo of the 'Death of Epaminondas' gained the 'grand prix,' and David proceeded to Rome, where he became intimate with Canova. In 1816 he returned to France. A statue of the Great Condé established his reputation; and in 1826 he was elected to the Institute and appointed a professor in the School of the Fine Arts. During the July revolution, David fought in the ranks of the people; in 1835-37 he executed the pediment of the Pantheon; in 1848 his republicanism procured him a seat in the Constituent Assembly. After the coup d'état he was exiled, but soon returned from Greece to France. He died 5th January 1856. In the Angers museum 200 of his works are preserved, as well as 400 of his medallions and many drawings. See Life by Jouin (1878-90).

Davids, THOMAS WILLIAM RHYS, born at Colchester, 12th May 1843, and educated at Brighton and Breslau, in 1866 entered the Ceylon civil service as a writer, in 1877 was called to the bar in London, and became professor of Pali and Buddhist Literature in University College, London, and of Comparative Religion in Manchester.

Davidson, ANDREW BRUCE, D.D., LL.D., Hebraist, born in Aberdeenshire in 1831, was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and at the Free Church College, Edinburgh, where in 1863 he was appointed to the chair of Hebrew and Old Testament exegesis. He died Jan. 1902.

Davidson, JOHN, poet, born at Barrhead, Renfrewshire, 11th April 1857, in 1890 came to London, and from 1885 to his suicide in 1909 published volumes of verse and prose.

Davidson, RANDALL THOMAS, born 7th April 1848 at Muirhouse near Edinburgh, studied at Harrow and Trinity College, Oxford; and was successively chaplain to Archbishop Tait and to the Queen, Dean of Windsor, Bishop of Rochester (1891) and of Winchester (1896), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1903). He wrote the life of Archbishop Tait (his father-in-law) in 1891.

Davidson, SAMUEL, D.D., LL.D. (1807-98), exegete, born near Ballymena, was professor successively at Belfast and in a Congregationalist college at Manchester, but, regarded as too 'advanced,' resigned in 1857. His works include Sacred Hermeneutics (1843), Treatise on Biblical Criticism (1852), Introduction to the Old and New Testaments (5 vols. 1862-68), Canon of the Bible (1877), and Doctrine of Last Things (1883). He died 1st April 1898.

Davidson, THOMAS (1838-70), the 'Scottish probationer,' was born near Jedburgh, studied at Edinburgh, and in 1864 was licensed as a U.P. preacher. See Life by Rev. James Brown (1877).

Davidson, THOMAS (1840-1900), author of works on mediæval philosophy, Rosmini, education, art, &c., was born at Deer in Aberdeenshire, studied at Aberdeen, and, going out to the States in 1867, settled at Cambridge, Mass., in 1873, an indefatigable and original thinker, teacher, and lecturer. Aristotle and Educational Ideals and A History of Education were published in 1900.

Davies, CECILIA (c. 1750-1836), a vocalist, like her sister MARIANNE (1744-c. 1816), who also played Benjamin Franklin's armonica.

Davies, CHRISTIAN, 'Mother Ross' (1667-1739), was born at Dublin and died at Chelsea Pensioners' Hospital, having in 1693 enlisted as a private, and served through Marlborough's campaigns. She was many times married. See Menie Dowie's Women Adventurers (1893).

Davies, JOHN (1565-1618), poet and writing-master, was born at Hereford. His poems, not without merit but prolix and tedious, were collected by Dr Grosart (2 vols. 1873).

Davies, SIR JOHN, poet and statesman, was born of a good family at Tisbury, Wiltshire, in 1569. At sixteen he entered Queen's College, Oxford, whence he passed to the Middle Temple. He was called to the bar in 1595, but was disbarred three years later for breaking a stick in the dining-hall over the head of a wit whose raillery had provoked him. He returned to Oxford, but in 1601, after ample apologies, was readmitted to the Middle Temple, and was returned to parliament for Corfe Castle. On the death of Elizabeth he accompanied the official commissioners to the Scottish court and quickly came into favour with James I., who sent him in 1603 as solicitor-general to Ireland. Three years later he was appointed Irish attorney-general and was knighted. He supported severe repressive measures, and took part in the plantation of Ulster. He was for some time speaker of the Irish parliament; but was returned to the English parliament in 1614 for Newcastle-under-Lyme, and practised as king's serjeant in England. He had been nominated chief-justice a month before his death of apoplexy, 7th December 1626. In 1622 he collected into one volume his three chief poems—Orchestra, or a Poeme of Dancing (1596); Noce Teipsum (1599), a long didactic piece on the soul's immortality; and Hymns to Astræa (1599), a collection of clever acrostics on the name

Elizabeth Regina. His complete works were collected by Dr Grosart (3 vols. 1869-76).—His widow, ELEANOR TOUCHET, daughter of Baron Audley, whom he had married in 1609, married again and survived till 1652. She was crazy enough to imagine herself a prophetess; but her exertations brought her nothing save fine imprisonment, and ridicule.

Davies, MARY, vocalist, was born in London, 27th February 1855, and in 1888 married Mr Cadwaladr Davies, of the Inner Temple.

Davila, ENRICO CATERINO (1576-1631), historian, was born near Padua, and entered the service of France, which he presently exchanged for that of Venice. He was shot near Verona by an assassin. His great work is the Storia delle Guerre civili di Francia, 1558-98 (1630; best ed. Milan, 1807; Eng. trans. 1847). [Dah'vee-la.]

Davis, EDWARD, a buccaneer and pirate who flourished from 1683 to 1702.

Davis, HENRY WILLIAM BANKS, landscape and animal painter, born at Finchley, August 26, 1833, became an A.R.A. in 1873, an R.A. in 1877.

Davis, JEFFERSON, president of the Confederate States, was born in Christian county, Kentucky, June 3, 1808, studied at West Point, and served in several frontier campaigns, but resigned his commission in 1835. He entered congress in 1845 for Mississippi, and served with distinction in the Mexican war (1846-47) as colonel of volunteers. He was sent to the senate in 1847, 1848, and 1850; and in 1853-57 was Secretary of War. Returning to the senate, he succeeded Calhoun as leader of the extreme State Rights party, and as such carried in the senate (May 1860) his seven resolutions asserting the inability of congress or the legislatures of the territories to prohibit slavery. The lower house of congress refused to concur; the failure of the Democratic National Convention at Charleston to adopt like resolutions caused the disruption of the Democratic party; and the election of Lincoln to the presidency was an immediate result. In January 1861 Mississippi seceded from the Union; a few weeks later Davis was chosen provisional president of the Confederate States, an appointment confirmed for six years in November. The history of his presidency is that of the war of 1861-65 (see the articles on Grant, Sherman, Lee, and Stonewall Jackson). In May 1865, after the collapse of his government, Davis was captured by Union cavalry, imprisoned for two years in Fortress Monroe on Hampton Roads, then released on bail. Though indicted for treason, he was never brought to trial; and he was included in the amnesty of 1868. After 1879 he resided on an estate bequeathed to him in Mississippi. In 1881 he published The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government. He died 6th December 1889; in 1893 his remains were translated from New Orleans to Richmond. See Lives by Alfriend (1868), Pollard (1869), and his widow (2 vols. 1891); also Craven's Prison-Life of Jefferson Davis (1866).

Davis, JOHN, navigator, was born at Sandridge, near Dartmouth, about 1550, and undertook in 1585-87 three Arctic voyages in search of a north-west passage. In the last voyage he sailed with a barque of apparently not over twenty tons as far as 73° N. lat., and discovered Davis Strait. He next made two ill-fated voyages towards the South Seas and as pilot of a Dutch vessel to the East Indies. In his last voyage as pilot of an English ship he was killed by Japanese pirates at Bintang, near Singapore, 30th December 1605. His World's Hydrographical Description (1595) and The Seaman's Secrets (1594) were edited by Captain A. H. Markham (Hakluyt Soc. 1878). See Life by Sir Clements R. Markham (1889).

Another JOHN DAVIS, of Limehouse, a navigator to the East Indies, died at Batavia in 1622, having published in 1618 A Ruler or Briefe Direction for Ready Sailings into the East India.

Davis, MOLL (fl. 1669), an actress and dancer, mother by Charles II. of Lady Mary Tudor, whose son was the Earl of Derwentwater (q. v.).

Davis, THOMAS OSBORNE, Irish poet and patriot, was born at Mallow, 14th October 1814, the son of an army surgeon. At Trinity College, Dublin, he read hard, and, after spending nearly three years in London and on the Continent, was called to the Irish bar in 1838. Next year, though a Protestant, he joined the Repeal Association, and in 1841 became joint-editor with John Dillon of the Dublin Morning Register. In 1842, with Dillon and Duffy, he founded the Nation newspaper, its chief aim 'to direct the popular mind to the great end of nationality.' But he died of fever, Sept. 16, 1845. His Poems were published in 1846; his Essays in 1847; his Prose Writings in 1890. See Memoirs of an Irish Patriot by Sir C. G. Duffy (1890), and Short Life by him (1896).

Davis, WILLIAM (1627-90), a Gloucestershire highwayman, known as the 'Golden Farmer' from his always paying in gold. He was hanged for shooting a pursuing butcher.

Davison, Mrs. See GODDARD, ARABELLA.

Davison, WILLIAM (c. 1541-1608), Queen Elizabeth's secretary in 1586-87, and her stalking-horse in the execution of Mary Stuart, after which he was imprisoned for two years in the Tower.

Davitt, MICHAEL, founder of the Irish Land League, was born, a peasant's son, at Straid, County Mayo, in 1846. Evicted from their small holding, the family emigrated to Hastingden in Lancashire (1851); and here in 1857 the boy lost his right arm through a machinery accident in a cotton-factory. In 1866 he joined the Fenian movement, and was sentenced in 1870 to fifteen years' penal servitude. He was released in 1877; and, supplied with funds from the States, began an anti-landlord crusade which culminated in the Land League (October 21, 1879). Davitt was thenceforward in frequent collision with the government, and from February 1881 to May 1882 was imprisoned in Portland for breaking his ticket-of-leave. His Leaves from a Prison Diary were published in 1885. A strong Home Ruler, but Socialistic on the question of land nationalisation, after the split in the party he opposed Mr Parnell (q. v.), and was returned to parliament in 1892 as an anti-Parnellite, but unseated on the ground of clerical intimidation. In 1895 he was returned unopposed by South Mayo, but resigned in 1899. He died 30th May 1906. [Dah'vitt.]

Davout (not DAVOUST), LOUIS NICOLAS, French marshal, was born 10th May 1770, at Anuoux, in Burgundy; was educated with Bonaparte at the military school of Brienne. As general he accompanied Bonaparte to the East, and mainly secured the victory at Aboukir. A marshal of the empire (1804), he acted a brilliant part at Austerlitz (1805) and Auerstädt, and was made Duke of Auerstädt (1808). At Eckmühl and at Wagram he checked the Austrians' attack, and in 1811 was created Prince of Eckmühl. As governor of Poland he ruled that country with the harshest despotism; in the Russian campaign of 1812 he gathered fresh laurels on the fields of Mohilev and Vitebsk. After the retreat from Moscow he became governor-general of the Hanse towns, and at Hamburg maintained a regime of repression till the first restoration of the Bourbons. On Bonaparte's return from Elba, Davout was appointed war minister; and after Waterloo he received the command of the remnant of the French army under the walls of Paris. In 1819 he was made a peer of France. He died June 1, 1823. See his Correspondance (5 vols. 1885-87), and Lives by Chénier (1886), his daughter, the Marquise Blocqueville (3 vols. 1879-80), and Montégut (1882). [Dah-voov.]

Davy, David Elisha (1769-1851), a Suffolk antiquary, who lived at Yoxford and Ufford.

Davy, Edward (1806-85), telegraphic inventor, born at Ottery St Mary, went out to Australia in 1839, and died at Malmesbury, Victoria.

Davy, Sir Humphry, chemist, was born 17th December 1778, at Penzance, where his father was a wood-carver. At the school there and at Truro he developed a taste for story-telling, poetry, and angling, and for experimental science. In 1795 he was apprenticed to a Penzance surgeon, wrote verses, made chemical experiments, entered on an encyclopædic course of study, and in 1797 seriously took up chemistry. Dr Beddoes (q.v.), who in 1798 established a Pneumatic Institute at Clifton, took him as his assistant. Here he met Coleridge and Southey, and experimented on the respiration of gases (more than once nearly losing his life), and discovered the effect of laughing-gas. The account in his Researches, Chemical and Philosophical (1799) led to his appointment as lecturer to the Royal Institution. He delivered his first lecture in 1801; and his eloquence and the novelty of his experiments soon attracted brilliant audiences. In 1803 he began researches in agriculture, on which he delivered his epoch-making lectures—Elements of Agricultural Chemistry (1813). His fame chiefly rests in the views originated in his Bakerian lecture On Some Chemical Agencies of Electricity (1806), followed up by the grand discovery that the alkalis and earths are compound substances formed by oxygen united with metallic bases. He first decomposed potash in 1807; when he saw the globules of the new metal, potassium, his delight was ecstasitic. He next decomposed soda and the alkaline earths, baryta, strontia, lime, and magnesia; and discovered the new metals, sodium, barium, strontium, calcium, and magnesium. The earths proper he proved to consist of metals united to oxygen. He lectured in Dublin in 1808-9, and received the LL.D. of Trinity College. In 1812 Davy was knighted, and married Mrs Apreece, née Jane Kerr (1780-1855), a lady of considerable wealth; in 1813 he resigned the chemical chair of the Royal Institution, when he was elected honorary professor of Chemistry. To investigate his new theory of volcanic action he visited the Continent with Faraday, and was received with the greatest distinction by the French savans, though England and France were at war. In 1815 he investigated fire-damp and invented his safety-lamp. He was created a baronet in 1818, and in 1820 succeeded Sir Joseph Banks as President of the Royal Society. In 1820-23 his researches on electro-magnetism were communicated to the society. In 1826 he had an apoplectic attack. He twice visited the Continent for the recovery of his health, and died at Geneva 29th May 1829. Among his writings were Elements of Chemical Philosophy (1812); On the Safety-lamp (1818); Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing (1828); and Consolations in Travel (1830)—all included in his Collected Works (9 vols. 1839-40). See Memoirs (1836) by his brother, John Davy, M.D. (1790-1868), who also wrote on Ceylon, physiology, the Ionian Islands, &c.; Sir Humphry's Fragmentary Remains (1858); and Lives by Dr Paris (1831) and Dr T.E. Thorpe (1896).

Davy, John (1763-1824), composer of 'The Bay of Biscay,' &c., was born, an illegitimate child, at Creech Bridge, near Exeter; was brought up by his uncle, an harmonious blacksmith; played and taught music at Exeter and London; and in London died penniless.

Davy's, John. See DAVIS.

Dawe, George, R.A. (1781-1829), a London mezzotinter and portrait-painter. His father, Philip Dawe, and a brother, Henry Edward (1790-1848), were both also mezzotinters.

Dawes, Richard (1708-66), Hellenist, was born near Market Bosworth, and became a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. From 1738 to 1749 he was a schoolmaster at Newcastle, and then retired to Heworth in Durham, where he solaced himself with rowing and campanology, and where he died. Cobet ranks him with Bentley and Porson as one of the 'three English Richards,' his own masters.

Dawes, Sophia (1790-1840), born at St Helens in the Isle of Wight, was a fisherman's daughter, an inmate in a workhouse, an officer's mistress, a servant in a brothel, mistress to the Duc de Bourbon (1756-1830), wife (1813) to his aide-de-camp, the Baron de Feuchères, and perhaps the Duc's murderess (1830).

Dawes, William Rutter (1799-1868), astronomer, was born at Christ's Hospital.

Dawkins, William Boyd, was born at Buttington vicarage, near Welshpool, 26th December 1838, and educated at Rossall School and Jesus College, Oxford. He joined the Geological Survey in 1862, became curator of Manchester Museum in 1869, and professor of Geology in Manchester in 1874. His books are Cave-hunting; or, Caves and the Early Inhabitants of Europe (1874); and Early Man in Britain (1880).

Dawson, George, preacher and lecturer, was born in London, 24th February 1821, taught for a time in his father's academy, and studied at Aberdeen and Glasgow. He became pastor of Rickmansworth Baptist Chapel in 1843, of Mount Zion, Birmingham, in 1844. But he could not be fettered by theological forms of belief, so resigned; and the 'Church of the Saviour' was built for him (1847), which borrowed its ritual from many sources. Since his sudden death at King's Norton, near Birmingham, 30th November 1876, have been published: Sermons (4 vols. 1878-82), Prayers (2 vols. 1878-83), Biographical Lectures (2 vols. 1886-87), and Every Day Counsels (1888). See Memoir by Crosskey (1876).

Dawson, Henry (1811-78), landscape-painter, was born at Hull, till 1835 was a Nottingham lace-maker, then took to art, and died at his house at Chiswick, the price of his pictures having risen from £5 or less to £800 or more. See Life by his son (1890).

Dawson, James (1717-46), the son of a Manchester apothecary, was bred for the church at St John's College, Cambridge, but having held a captaincy in Prince Charles Edward's army, was hanged on Kennington Green. His sweetheart died in her coach there simultaneously.

Dawson, Sir John William, LL.D., born at Pictou, Nova Scotia, October 1820, studied at Edinburgh, and afterwards devoted himself to the natural history and geology of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. He was appointed superintendent of education in Nova Scotia in 1850; and from 1855 to 1893 was principal of McGill University, Montreal. In 1882 he received the Lyell medal of the London Geological Society; in 1884 he was knighted; and in 1886 he was President of the British Association. A systematic anti-Darwinian, he died 19th November 1899. Among his works are Archaia (1858), Story of the Earth and Man (1872), Dawn of Life (1875), Origin of the World (1877), Fossil Men (1878), Egypt and Syria (1885), The Meeting-place of Geology and History (1894), and Relics of Primeval Life (1897).—His son, GEORGE M. DAWSON, LL.D. (1849-95), also a well-known geologist and naturalist, was born at Pictou, and died at Halifax.

Dawson, Matthew (1820-98), trainer, was born at Gullane, and died at Newmarket.

Dawson, Nancy (c. 1730-67), hornpipe dancer, was born and died in London.

Day, Daniel (1683-1767), a Wapping pump and block maker, the founder of Fairlop Fair.

Day, John (1522-84), a native of Dunwich, was an early London printer, his most celebrated production Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

Day, John, dramatist, studied at Caius College, Cambridge, is mentioned in Henslowe's Diary in 1598 as an active playwright, and collaborated freely with Chettle, Dekker, &c. His Works, privately printed by A. H. Bullen in 1881, include a graceful comedy, Humour out of Breath, and The Parliament of Bees, an allegorical masque.

Day, Thomas, author of Sandford and Merton, was born in London, 22d June 1748, and thirteen months later by his father's death became heir to £900 a year. From the Charterhouse he passed to Corpus, Oxford, where he formed a close friendship with Richard Lovell Edgeworth (q.v.). In 1765 he entered the Middle Temple, in 1775 was called to the bar, but never practised. A disciple of Rousseau, he brought up an orphan blonde and a foundling brunette, one of whom should become his wife. That scheme miscarried; and, admitted to the Lichfield coterie, he proposed first to Honora and next to Elizabeth Sneyd. She sent him to France to acquire the French graces; as acquired by him they but moved her to laughter. Finally in 1778 he married an appreciative heiress, Esther Milnes, and spent with her eleven happy years, farming on philanthropic and costly principles in Essex and Surrey, till on 28th September 1789 he was killed by a fall from a colt he was breaking in. His wife died broken-hearted two years afterwards, and both lie in Wargrave churchyard near Henley. Two only of Day's eleven works call for mention—The Dying Negro (1773) and the History of Sandford and Merton (3 vols. 1783-89). The poem struck the keynote of the anti-slavery movement; the child's book, like its author, is sometimes ridiculous but always excellent. See Lives by Keir (1791) and Blackman (1862).

Daye, Stephen (c. 1610-68), born in London, in 1639 set up at Harvard the first New England printing-press. He died at Cambridge, Mass.

D'Azara, Felix (1746-1811), naturalist, born in Aragon, wrote an important Natural History of the Quadrupeds of Paraguay (1801; Eng. trans. 1838), and Voyages dans l'Amérique Méridionale (4 vols. 1809). [Du-zah'ra.]

Deacon, Thomas (1697-1753), a Manchester nonjuring clergyman and medical practitioner, who in 1733 was consecrated a bishop, and three of whose sons engaged in the '45, the eldest being hanged and the second transported, whilst the third died before his trial.

Deák, Francis (1803-76), Hungarian statesman, practised as an advocate, entered the national diet in 1832, and played the part of a moderate in 1848 and 1866. [Day-ahk.]

Deakin, Alfred, born in 1857 in Melbourne, became minister of public works and water-supply, and solicitor-general of Victoria, and under the Commonwealth attorney-general (1901) and prime-minister (1903-4, 1905-8, 1909-10).

De Amicis, Edmondo (1846-1908), Italian author, born at Oneglia, wrote novels and stories, and books on Spain, London, Holland, Constantinople. [A-mee-cheess.]

Deane, Henry, was Archbishop of Canterbury from 1501 till his death in 1503, having previously been prior of Llanthony near Gloucester, chancellor and justiciary of Ireland, Bishop of Bangor (1496) and of Salisbury (1500).

Deane, Richard, born in 1610 at Temple Guiting in Gloucestershire, fought through the Great Rebellion for the Parliament, sat on Charles I.'s trial, commanded afterwards by sea and land, and fell in the great naval battle with the Dutch off the North Foreland, 2d June 1653.

De Bary, Heinrich Anton (1831-88), botanist, was born at Frankfort-on-Main, and died at Strasburg, first rector of its reorganised university. He studied the morphology and physiology of the fungi and the myxomycetes. [Bah'ree.] Debrett', John (d. 1822), a London publisher, known by his Peerage (1st ed. 1802).

De Bry, Theodor (1528-98), born at Liège, was a goldsmith and copperplate engraver who settled in Frankfort-on-Main about 1570, and established a printing-house there. [Bree.]

Debussy, Claude Achille, French impressionist composer, was born in 1862 at St Germain en Laye.

Decamps, Alexandre-Gabriel (1803-60), painter, born at Paris, studied in a desultory manner under Boucrot, David, and Ingres. In 1824 he was in Switzerland, in 1827-28 in Italy and the Levant. His 'Defeat of the Cimbri' (1834) had a great success. He was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1839, and in 1851 an officer. [Day-komp.]

De Candolle, Augustin Pyrame, botanist, was born at Geneva, 4th February 1778, and there and in Paris studied chemistry, physics, and botany. His earliest work, on lichens (1797), was followed by Astragalogia (1802) and Propriétés Médicales des Plantes (1804). He first lectured on botany in the Collège de France in 1804. His Flore Française appeared in 1805. For the government he traversed France and Italy in 1806-12, investigating their botany and agriculture. He was appointed in 1807 to a chair at Montpellier; in 1816 he retired to Geneva, where a professorship of Botany was founded for him. He died 9th September 1841. His greatest work, Regni Vegetabilis Systema Naturale (vols. i.-ii. 1818-21), was on a smaller scale continued in the Prodromus Systematis Naturalis Regni Vegetabilis (17 vols. 1824-73, the last ten by his son and others).—That son, Alphonse de Candolle (1806-93), published the great Géographie Botanique (2 vols. 1855) and L'Origine des Plantes Cultivées (1883); he also edited his father's Mémoires (1862). [D'Kon-dol.]

Decatur, STEPHEN, American naval commander, was born in Sinnewuxent, Maryland, 5th January 1779, of French descent, and became a midshipman in 1798. He served against the French, and in the war with Tripoli (1801-5) gained great distinction; his achievement of burning the captured Philadelphia off Tripoli, and then escaping under the fire of 141 guns, Nelson pronounced 'the most daring act of the age.' Promoted captain in 1804 and commodore in 1810, in the war with England in 1812 he captured the frigate Macedonian, but in 1814 surrendered, after a resistance that cost him a fourth of his crew, to four British frigates. In 1815 he chastised the Algerines for piracy, and compelled the dey to declare the American flag inviolable. He was killed in a duel by Commodore James Barron, near Bladensburg, 22d March 1820.

De Caus. See CAUS.

Decazes, ÉLIE, DUC (1780-1860), French statesman, was called as a French advocate and judge to the Hague by the king (1806), supported the Bourbon restoration, and after 1815 was the moderate liberal minister of Louis XVIII. (q.v.), who made him a duke. He was ambassador in London (1820-21), and held dignities under Louis Philippe. In his later years he developed the coalfields on his estates at Decazeville in Aveyron.—His eldest son, LOUIS CHARLES (1819-86), was French Minister of Foreign Affairs in 1873-77. [Deh-kahz'.]

De Charpentier, JEAN (1786-1855), the true author of the glacial theory, was born at Freiburg, and became professor of Geology at Lausanne.—His brother, TOUSSAINT DE CHARPENTIER (1779-1847), was an entomologist.

Decius, a Roman emperor, whose name in full was C. MESSIUS QUINTUS TRAJANUS DECIUS. He was born about 200 A.D. at Badulia, in Lower Pannonia, and was sent in 249 by the emperor Philippus to reduce the rebellious army of Moesia. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor against his will, and Philippus encountered him near Verona, but was defeated and slain. Decius' brief reign was one of warring with the Goths, and he was killed near Abricium in 251. Under him the Christians were persecuted with great severity.

Decken, KARL KLAUS VON DER, African traveller, was born 5th August 1833, at Kotzen, Brandenburg, served (1851-60) in the Hanoverian army, and then from Zanzibar started on a journey to Lake Nyasa, which failed through the treachery of his Arab guide. In 1862, with Kersten, he climbed Kilima-Njaro to the height of 13,780 feet. In 1863 he coasted East Africa; and after a visit to Europe was murdered on his next expedition by a Somali, 25th September 1865. See Kersten's Von der Decken's Reisen in Ostafrika (4 vols. 1869-79).

Decker, SIR MATTHEW (1679-1749), a political economist, born at Amsterdam, came to London in 1702, and having made a fortune in commerce, received a baronetcy in 1716, and sat in parliament. He published anonymously two pamphlets: one (1743) proposed to raise all the public supplies from a tax upon houses; the other (1744) contained many good arguments for free trade.

Decker, THOMAS. See DEKKER.

Decort, FRANS (1834-78), a Flemish lyrical poet, was born at Antwerp and died at Brussels.

Dee, DR JOHN, alchemist, was born in London, 13th July 1527, and educated there, at Chelmsford, and from 1542 to 1545 at St John's College, Cambridge, where he studied eighteen hours a day. One of the original fellows of Trinity (1546), he earned the reputation of a sorcerer by his mechanical beetle in a representation of Aristophanes' Peace, and next year he fetched from the Low Countries sundry astronomical instruments. This was the first of many foreign visits—to Louvain and Paris (1548-51), Venice and Presburg in Hungary (1563), Lorraine (1571), Frankfurt-on-Oder (1578), Bohemia (1583-89), and even, it is said, St Helena. He was imprisoned under Queen Mary on suspicion of compassing her death by magic (1555); but Edward VI. had conferred two church livings on him, and Elizabeth showed him considerable favour, twice visiting him at his Mortlake home, and in 1595 making him warden of Manchester College. He was constantly in difficulties, though he claimed to have found in the ruins of Glastonbury a quantity of the Elixir, one grain of which transmuted into gold a piece of a warming-pan. Indeed, he appears to have been as much dupe as deceiver, the dupe of his own assistant, Edward Kelly, during 1582-89. This knave, who had lost both ears in the pillory, professed to confer with angels by means of Dee's magic crystal, and talked him into consenting to a community of wives. Dr Dee died wretchedly poor, in December 1608, and was buried in Mortlake church.—His eldest son, ARTHUR (1579-1651), was likewise an alchemist, a friend of Sir Thomas Browne. Of Dr Dee's seventy-nine works, only thirteen have ever been printed: the rest are in MS. at Oxford, Cambridge, and the British Museum. They deal with logic, mathematics, astrology, alchemy, navigation, geography, and the reformation of the calendar (1583). See his Private Diary, edited by J. O. Halliwell (Halliwell-Phillipps) for the Camden Society (1842).

Deering, JOHN PETER, R.A., M.P. (1787-1850), an architect, in 1827 changed his surname from Gandy to Deering. He designed Exeter Hall.

Defand, MARIE DE VICHY-CHAMROND, MARQUISE DU (1697-1780), one of the most brilliant of letter-writers, was a member of a noble Burgundian house. She was educated in a Paris convent, and as a girl became famous for her wit, audacity, and beauty. In 1718 she married the Marquis du Defand, but they soon separated; and for a number of years she led a life of gallantry and became a conspicuous figure in Paris literary society. She was a correspondent of Voltaire, Montesquieu, and D'Alembert. In 1753 she became blind, and in 1754 invited Mademoiselle Lespinasse to live with her and help her to preside over her salon. The arrangement lasted for ten years, when a quarrel broke out, and Mademoiselle Lespinasse departed, taking away with her D'Alembert and others of the elder lady's former admirers. From 1766 Madame du Defand corresponded with Horace Walpole, who pressed his purse on her when she fell into pecuniary troubles. She died at Paris. See Correspondance de Madame du Defand (new ed. 5 vols. 1865-67); her Letters to Horace Walpole and Voltaire (4 vols. Lond. 1810); and works by Asse (1877) and Percy (1893). [Def-fond.]

Defoe, DANIEL, the author of Robinson Crusoe, was born in 1659 or 1660 in the parish of St Giles, Cripplegate, London, the son of James Foe, a butcher there—the change to De Foe or Defoe being made by Daniel about 1703. He had a good education at a dissenting academy, and was in business as a hose-factor about 1685. He was apparently out with Monmouth, was in King William's army in 1688, travelled in France and Spain, and became bankrupt about 1692; his debts he scrupulously paid up later. He next became accountant to the glass-duty commissioners and secretary to a tile factory. His Essay upon Projects appeared about 1698, and he became noted as an able pamphleteer in support of the king's policy—as in his vigorous poem, The True-born Englishman (1701). His restless pen was active throughout the bitter struggle under Anne between the High-Church party and the Dissenters; and his famous treatise, The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1703), first deceived and then infuriated his opponents. The House of Commons ordered the pamphlet to be burned; and, when tried at the Old Bailey in July, he was sentenced to pay a fine of 200 marks, to stand thrice in the pillory, and to be imprisoned during the queen's pleasure. On the first day he suffered appeared his vigorous Hymn to the Pillory. During his imprisonment in Newgate he continued an incessant literary activity upon 'occasional conformity' and other controversies, and started his Review (February 1704–June 1713), at first a weekly, then a bi-weekly, and finally a tri-weekly newspaper. This was his largest, if not his most important work, embracing in over five thousand pages essays on almost every branch of human knowledge. During the same nine years he published eighty distinct works, with 4727 pages. His 'Scandal Club' was the forerunner of the Tallers and Spectators.

In August 1704 Defoe was released from prison through Harley, who further procured him employment. Giving Alms no Charity (1704) was a masterly denunciation of indiscriminate charity and national workshops. In 1705 appeared The Consolidator, a political satire, which perhaps supplied a hint for Gulliver's Travels; and in 1706 The True Relation of the Apparition of one Mrs Veal, which Mr Aitken has proved to be founded on fact or supposed fact. Jure Divino was a tedious political satire in twelve books of poor verse. In 1705 Defoe was sent by Harley on a secret mission to the West of England; in 1706–8 he was in Scotland as a secret agent to promote the Union. His History of the Union appeared in 1709. After Harley's fall (1708) he found himself able to be a staunch Whig under Godolphin; but on Harley's return to power (1710) he once more supported a Tory ministry. In his Review he strove in vain to preserve the semblance of consistency; and, playing a dubious part in the intrigues that preceded the accession of the House of Hanover, he found himself in a general discredit which his Appeal to Honour and Justice (1715) did not remove. In 1718 he was in an equivocal government service, too ingeniously sub-editing Jacobite and High-Church organs. Defoe was not scrupulous in his point of honour, but it is certain he never was a Tory. In 1715 appeared the first volume of the Family Instructor, and on 25th April 1719 the first volume of the immortal Robinson Crusoe, which, founded on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk (q.v.), at once leaped into popularity. Perhaps no man in the whole history of literature ever devised at fifty-eight a more splendid masterpiece of creative imagination. The same year appeared the second volume, and in 1720 the greatly inferior sequel. In this his most prolific year he also gave to the world the Life and Adventures of Duncan Campbell; the famous Memoirs of a Cavalier; and Captain Singleton, a book of great brilliancy. In 1722 he issued Moll Flanders, a marvel of the novelistic art; The Journal of the Plague Year, better known by the title in the second edition, A History of the Plague, a fresh masterpiece of verisimilitude; and the History of Colonel Jack, which, unequal throughout and actually feeble towards its close, is in parts the most charming of all his books. Later works were Roxana (1724), a weaker Moll Flanders; A Tour through Great Britain (1724–26); A New Voyage round the World (1725); The Complete English Tradesman (1725–27), a glorification of money-getting; and The Political History of the Devil (1726), which may be grouped with his System of Magic (1726) and the Essay on the Reality of Apparitions (1727). Other works are his rather ignoble Religious Courtship (1722) and The Use and Abuse of the Marriage Bed (1727). Everybody's Business is Nobody's Business (1725) is an amusing diatribe upon the insolence of domestic servants.

Meantime Defoe had built himself 'a very handsome house' at Stoke-Newington, where he amused himself with gardening and the company of his three daughters; but in his last days his affairs seem to have fallen into confusion, one of his sons had behaved undutifully, and he was under apprehensions of trouble. He died in Ropemakers' Alley, Moorfields, 26th April 1731, and was buried in Bunhill Fields. Defoe remains one of our greatest English writers, a brilliant journalist, an incomparable realist in fiction, the master of a simple but subtle and artistic style. See the Lives by Chalmers (1786), Walter Wilson (1830), William Chadwick (1859), William Lee (1869), H. Morley (1889), and Thomas Wright (1894)—the latter of whom tries to prove that the story of Robinson Crusoe is a kind of allegory of Defoe's own life; the studies by Scott, Lamb, Hazlitt, Forster, Leslie Stephen, and Minto; and the editions of Defoe's works by Scott, Hazlitt, and Aitken (16 vols. 1895).

Defregger, FRANZ, Tyrolese painter, was born a peasant's son at Stronach, near Lienz, 80th April 1835, studied under Piloty at Munich, and became a professor in the Munich Academy.

Degas, HILAIRE-GERMAIN EDOARD, one of the greatest of the 'impressionist' painters, was born at Paris, 19th July 1834. [De-gah'.]

De Gérando, JOSEPH MARIE, BARON (1772–1842), author and philanthropist, was born of Italian ancestry at Lyons. In 1797 he went to Paris, but soon fled to Germany, where he entered the army of Massena as a private. While with his regiment he wrote a treatise which was 'crowned' by the Academy and published as Des Signes et de l'Art de Penser (1800). In 1802 appeared his De la Génération des Connaissances Humaines, a precursor of his Histoire de Philosophie (1803), which gained him admission to the Academy. Napoleon made him secretary-general to the Ministry of the Interior. His Visateur du Pauvre (1820) obtained the Montyon prize, as also did his Du Perfectionnement Moral (1824). He was created a peer in 1837, and died vice-president of the Council of State. [Day Zhay-ran-w'.]

Déjazet, PAULINE VIRGINIE (1797–1875), a great French actress, born at Paris. On the stage before she was five years old, she grew up playing children's and boys' rôles with marvellous precocity, but first awoke to a sense of her real greatness at Lyons, where her soubrette parts endeared her to the citizens. In 1821 she joined the Gynmnase, but her principal triumphs were won at the Théâtre du Palais-Royal (1834–44). She next played at the Variétés, in the provinces, and in London, till 1859, when she undertook the management of the Folies-Dramatiques. She left the boards in 1868, and next year received a pension of 2000 francs. See Lives by Duval (1876) and Leconte (1892). [Day-zha-zayf.]

Dekker, THOMAS, dramatist, was born in London about 1570. He was a very prolific writer, but only a few of his plays were printed. In 1600 he published two comedies, The Shoemaker's Holiday, or the Gentle Craft, and The Pleasant Comedy of Old Fortunatus. The first of these pieces is one of the pleasantest of old plays, and the second abounds in poetry of rare beauty. Dekker's next play was Satirornomastix (1602), which held up to ridicule Ben Jonson, with whom ere this he had collaborated, and who in 1619 told Drummond of Hawthornden that Dekker was a knave. In 1603 Dekker published a pamphlet, The Wonderful Year, which gives a heart-rending account of the plague. To the same date belongs the very amusing tract, The Bachelor's Banquet, in which he describes with gusto the ills of henpecked husbands. His most powerful writing is seen in The Honest Whore (1604; part ii., 1630). Middleton assisted him in the first part. In 1607 he published three plays written in conjunction with Webster, the Famous History of Sir Thomas Wyatt, Westward Ho, and Northward Ho. The Bellman of London (1608) pamphlet gives a lively account of London vagabonds; and Dekker pursued the subject in Lunthorn and Candlelight (1608). In The Gull's Hornbook (1609) the life of a town-gallant is racyly depicted. The excellent comedy, The Roaring Girl (1611), was written partly by Dekker, but chiefly by Middleton. From 1613 to 1616 Dekker was confined in the King's Bench prison for debt, as previously in the Counter prison. With Massinger he composed the Virgin Martyr; and Lamb was doubtless right in ascribing to Dekker the most beautiful scene (II. i.). The Sun's Darling, licensed in 1624, but not printed until 1656, was written in conjunction with Ford. A powerful tragedy, The Witch of Edmonton (posthumously published in 1658), was written by Dekker, Ford, and Rowley. We hear of Dekker in 1637, when he republished his Lunthorn and Candlelight as English Villainies, and then he drops out of notice. His plays were collected in 1873 (4 vols.), and his pamphlets were republished in 5 vols. in Dr Grosart's 'Huth Library' (1884-86).

De la Beche, SIR HENRY THOMAS (1796-1855), geologist, born near London, served a year in the army, and in 1817 became a fellow of the Geological Society, of which he was elected president in 1847. In 1820 he published a paper on the temperature and depth of the Lake of Geneva; in 1824 he visited Jamaica, and published one on its geology. Other works are a Manual of Geology (1831), Researches in Theoretical Geology (1834), and a Geological Observer (1853). He undertook to form a geological map of England; and government instituted the Geological Survey and placed him at its head (1832). He founded the Geological Museum in Jermyn Street and the School of Mines. In 1848 he was knighted, and in 1853 elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences in Paris. [Baysh.]

De la Borde, HENRY FRANÇOIS, COUNT (1774-1833), Napoleonic general, was born, a baker's son, at Dijon. [Bord.]

Delaborde, JEAN JOSEPH (1724-94), a French financier, born at Jacca in Spain.—His youngest son, ALEXANDRE LOUIS JOSEPH, MARQUIS (1774-1842), was a statesman and writer on art; and his son, LÉON, MARQUIS (1807-69), was a traveller in the East and an archaeologist.

Delacroix, EUGÈNE, painter, was born at Charonton Saint-Maurice, near Paris, 26th April 1790. At eighteen he entered the atelier of Guérin, a follower of David, and came under the influence of his fellow-pupil, Gérardault. In 1822 he exhibited 'Dante and Virgil,' in 1824 the 'Massacre of Scio.' In 1832 he made a voyage to Morocco, in 1857 was chosen by the Institute Delaroché's successor. He died August 13, 1863. See works by Moreau (1873), Dargenty (1885), Chesneau (1885), Tourneux (1886), Mrs Bussy (1907); his Correspondance (2d ed. 1880); and his Journal (1893).

Delambre, JEAN JOSEPH (1749-1822), astronomer, was born at Amiens, and, after a long struggle with difficulties, became a tutor in a wealthy family, and studied under Lalande. He first attracted attention by his tables of the motion of Uranus, discovered by Herschell in 1781; and in 1792-99 was engaged, with Méchain, in measuring the arc of the meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He was elected to the Academy, and in 1803 perpetual secretary of the mathematical section of the Institute. In 1807 he succeeded Lalande as professor of Astronomy at the Collège de France; in 1814 he was appointed a member of the Council of Public Instruction. [Day-low-br.]

De la Motte, WILLIAM (1775-1863), a water-colour landscape and marine painter, was born of Huguenot ancestry at Weymouth.

Deland, MARGARET WADE (née CAMPBELL), born at Alleghany, Pa., in 1857, was educated at New Rochelle, N.Y., and Cooper Union, taught industrial design in the Girls' Normal College (1878-79); and next year married Lorin F. Deland of Boston. She has published The Old Garden, and other Verses (1886), John Ward, Preacher (1888), Philip and his Wife (1894), &c.

Delane, JOHN THADEUS, was born in London, a barrister's son, 11th October 1817. Brought up at Easthampstead in Berkshire, and educated at private schools and King's College, London, he graduated in 1839 from Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he was more famous for horsemanship than reading. Mr Walter, however, his father's neighbour in Berkshire, had early marked his capable character; and in May 1841, not yet twenty-four, he became editor of the Times. For thirty-six years Delane held this post, aided, however, for twenty-five of them by George Dasant (q.v.). Under him the Times attained a circulation and an influence unparalleled in journalism. He wrote no articles, but contributed excellent reports and letters. His exposure of the railway mania, his attacks upon the management of the Crimean war, and his strong opposition to England's assisting Denmark in 1864, are his best-remembered acts. Having resigned in 1877, he died at Ascot, 22d November 1879.

Delany, Mrs (Mary Granville), was born at Coulston, Wiltshire, 14th May 1700. The niece of Lord Lansdowne, she married first, in 1718, 'fat, snuffy, sulky' Alexander Pendarves (1659-1724); and secondly, in 1743, the Rev. Patrick Delany (1685-1768), an Irish divine, Swift's friend, and the author of a dozen volumes. After his death she lived chiefly in London, till her own death at Windsor on 15th April 1788. Her much-admired 'paper-mosaics,' or flower-work, have long since faded; but she is remembered through her patronage of Miss Burney and by her Autobiography and Correspondence (6 vols. 1861-62).

De la Rive, AUGUSTE ARTHUR (1801-73), electrician, was born at Geneva, and from 1823 filled the chair of Physics there.

Delaroche, HIPPOLYTE, known as PAUL, painter, was born in Paris, 17th July 1797. He studied under Baron Gros, and excited admiration in 1824 by his 'Joan of Arc before Cardinal Beaufort,' followed by his 'Death of Queen Elizabeth' (1827). In 1831 he produced the 'Princes in the Tower;' in 1833, 'Cromwell contemplating the Corpse of Charles I.;' in 1834, 'Execution of Lady Jane Grey;' and in 1837, 'Charles I. insulted by the Parliamentary Soldiers,' and 'Strafford receiving Laud's Blessing on the Way to Execution.' From this period until 1841 he was engaged on his grandest work—the series of paintings in the École des Beaux Arts, in the execution of which he was aided by Armitage and other of his pupils. Later works were 'Marie Antoinette before the Tribunal' (1851), 'The Finding of Moses' (1852), 'Calvary' (1853), and 'The Floating Martyr.' He also executed striking portraits of Guizot (1838), Thiers (1856), &c. He died November 4, 1856, having been made a member of the Institute in 1832, and professor of Painting in the École des Beaux Arts in 1833. See Rees, Vernet and Delaroche (1880). [Del-la-rossi'.]

De la Rue, WARREN, astronomer and electrician, was born in Guernsey, January 18, 1815. He was educated at Paris, and early entered his father's business—the manufacture of paper-wares—for which his inventive genius devised many new processes. He took part in the Exhibitions of 1851 and 1862, and the Paris International Electrical Congress (1861); and was president of the Royal Astronomical Society, the Chemical Society, and the London Institution. In 1878 he became secretary of the Royal Institution, and in 1880 a corresponding member of the Académie des Sciences. He died in London, 19th April 1889.

Delaunay, LOUIS ARSÈNE (1826-1903), actor, was born in Paris, and made his début in 1846 at the Odeon. In 1848 he trod the boards of the Théâtre Français, and in 1850 became its secretary. One of the most accomplished actors until his retirement in 1887, he found some of his greatest parts in the plays of Hugo, Pailleur, De Musset, and Augiers. [Del-lo'noy.]

Delavigne, JEAN FRANÇOIS CASIMIR, dramatist, satirist, and lyricist, was born at Havre, April 4, 1793. He became popular through his Messéniennes (1813), satires upon the Restoration. Les Vêpres Siciliennes (1819), a tragic piece, was followed by the comedies L'École des Vieillards and Les Comédiens (1821). He was made an Academician in 1825. His Louis XI., partly founded on Quentin Durward, was brought out in 1833. Other dramas were Le Paria, Martino Faliéro, Les Enfants d'Edouard, Don Juan d'Autriche (1835), and La Fille du Cid (1839). He died at Lyons, December 11, 1843.—His brother, GERMAIN (1790-1868), wrote vaudevilles and libretti. [Del-la-veen-y'.]

Delaware, THOMAS WEST, LORD, the first governor of Virginia, arrived there from England in June 1610, but nine months later was prostrated by ill-health, and died in 1618.

Delbrück, MARTIN FRIEDRICH RUDOLF (1817-1903), Prussian statesman, born at Berlin, in 1864-66 reorganised the Zollverein, and was for years Bismarck's right-hand man.

Delescluze, LOUIS CHARLES (1800-71), French communist, was born at Dreux. His politics drove him from France to journalism in Belgium

(1835), but the February revolution (1848) brought him back in Paris, where his facile pen made him popular with the rabble but brought him imprisonment and a fine of 10,000 francs. He escaped to England, but venturing back to Paris, in 1853 was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and was next transported till 1859 to Cayenne. He described his sufferings in De Paris à Cayenne; Journal d'un Transporté (1867). In 1868 he started the Réveil, to promote the International; in the infamous history of the Paris Commune he played a prominent part, and on him rests largely the murder of the hostages and the burning of the public buildings. He died on the last barricade. [D'lay-kleez.]

Delibes, LÉON (1836-91), composer of comic operas, was born at St Germain du Val, Sarthe, and died in Paris, where in 1865 he had become second director at the Grand Opera, and in 1880 a Conservatoire professor. [Del-leeb.]

Delille, JACQUES, poet, born near Aignes-Perse in Auvergne, June 22, 1738, was illegitimate, and was brought up by charity. Educated at the Collège de Lisieux in Paris, he obtained a professorship in Amiens. His verse translation of the Georgics (1769) had an extraordinary vogue, and was betrayed by Voltaire. Its author was made an Academician in 1774, and, after holding a canonry at Moissac, was presented by the Comte d'Artois with the abbacy of Saint-Severin, worth 300,000 livres a year. Les Jardins (1782), a didactic poem, was generally accepted as a masterpiece. The Revolution compelling Delille to leave France, he travelled in Switzerland and Germany, and then in London occupied eighteen months in translating Paradise Lost. After his return to France in 1802 he produced a translation of the Æneid (1804), L'Imagination (1806), Les Trois Règnes (1809), and La Conversation (1812). Blind in his old age, he died May 1, 1813. During his life he was regarded by his countrymen as the greatest French poet of the day, and was even declared the equal of Virgil and Homer; but his fame suffered a rapid eclipse. See Sainte-Beuve's Portraits Littéraires, vol. ii. [Del-leil.]

De Lisle, AMBROSE LISLE MARCH PHILIPPS (1809-78), who was born and died at Garendon Park, Leicestershire, in 1824 became a convert to Catholicism, studied two years at Trinity College, Cambridge, and published ten works, chiefly in defence of Catholicism.

De Lisle. See ROUGET DE LISLE.

Delitzsch, FRANZ, theologian and Hebraist, born at Leipzig, February 23, 1813, died there March 3, 1890, having become professor of Theology at Rostock in 1846, at Erlangen in 1850, and at Leipzig in 1867. His vast learning and exegetical sagacity gave him a foremost place among conservative German theologians, while his great personal influence over a generation of Leipzig students, and a long series of profoundly learned books, extended a sound knowledge of Old Testament exegesis in Germany, England, and America. See Life by S. I. Curtiss (1891).—His son, FRIEDRICH, born September 3, 1850, in 1877 became professor of Assyriology at Leipzig, in 1893 at Breslau, in 1899 at Berlin. [Day-leetsh.]

Delius, NIKOLAUS, Shakespearian critic, was born at Bremen, 19th September 1813, and studied at Bonn and Berlin, and in England and France. He settled in 1846 at Bonn, where he became extraordinary professor in 1855, and professor in 1863, and where he died 18th November 1888. His early lectures were on Sanskrit and the Romance tongues, but he afterwards devoted himself to English and Shakespeare. His edition of Shakespeare (7 vols. 1854-61; 5th ed. 1882) is a masterpiece. [Day-lee-ooos.]

Della Robbia. See ROBBIA.

De Lolme, JOHN LOUIS (1740-1806), born at Geneva, was an advocate there, but about 1769 came to England, where, in spite of his literary activity, he lived in great poverty, always in debt and repeatedly in prison. Having inherited a small property, he returned to Geneva in 1775. His Constitution of England was first published in French (Amst. 1771); the English translation, by another hand seemingly, did not appear till 1775. The work, which flattered England, reached a tenth edition (with Life, 1853); its author was called by Isaac D'Israeli 'the English Montesquieu.' (The Parallel between England and Sweden, 1772, was an unauthorised translation of part of it.) He published also in 1782 his History of the Flagellants; and in 1796 Strictures on the Union. In 1816 Dr Thomas Busby tried to prove that De Lolme was Junius. [Deh-lol'm.]

De Long, GEORGE WASHINGTON (1844-81), a U.S. naval lieutenant who commanded the Jeanette in the unfortunate Arctic expedition sent out in 1879 by Gordon Bennett. He died in the delta of the Lena four months after his ship had been crushed by the ice.

Delorme, MARION, born at Blois, 3d October 1613, came early to Paris, where her beauty and wit gathered a group of high-born lovers round her—among them the Duke of Buckingham, the Prince de Condé, Saint-Evrémond, the Duc de Brissac, and the Comte de Grammont. Even Richelieu was not insensible to her charms, and revenged himself for her contempt by separating her from Cinq-Mars, her love for whom was the one ennobling passion of her life. During the early days of the Fronde her house was the rallying-point of its chiefs, and Mazarin was about to imprison her when she suddenly died 2d July 1650. See Mircourt's imaginative Confessions de Marion Delorme (1851). [Deh-lorm.]

Delorme, PHILIBERT (c. 1510-70), architect, was born at Lyons, and died in Paris. See monograph by Bachon (Par. 1887).

Delpit, ALBERT (1849-93), French novelist and playwright, born at New Orleans, died in Paris.

Deluc, JEAN ANDRÉ (1727-1817), geologist and meteorologist, was born at Geneva, and settling in England in 1773, was reader to Queen Charlotte till his death at Windsor. [Deh-leeek.]

Demades, an Athenian orator of great eloquence but of no principle. A bitter enemy to Demosthenes, he promoted the Macedonian interest, and was sent away in safety by Philip when taken prisoner at Charonea (338), but had not the grace to be honest even in his anti-patriotism, and was put to death for his treachery by Antipater in 318. [Deh-ma-deez.]

Dembinski, HENRY (1791-1864), was born near Cracow, entered the Polish army in 1809, and fought under Napoleon against Russia and at Leipzig. In the Polish revolution of 1830 he was commander-in-chief; in 1833 he entered the service of Mehemet Ali. On the outbreak of the Hungarian insurrection, Kossuth appointed him commander-in-chief. He was hampered by the jealousy of Görgei; and after the defeat of Kopolna (February 26-28, 1849) was forced to resign. On Kossuth's resignation he fled to Turkey, but in 1850 returned to Paris. He was author of Mémoires (1833) and four other works.

Demetrius, the name of several kings of Macedonia, of whom the one surnamed Poliorcetes, 'taker of cities,' was the son of Antigonus (q.v.), and obtained the crown in 294 B.C. He died the prisoner of Seleucus in 283. Several of the Seleucid kings of Syria were also called Demetrius.

Demetrius, or DMITRI (1583-91), youngest son of Czar Ivan the Terrible, was murdered by the regent Boris Godunoff, but in 1605 was personated by a runaway Moscow monk, Grigory Otrepieff, the 'false Demetrius,' who was crowned czar and killed next year in a rebellion. See Mérinée's Le Faux Démétrius (1853).

Demetrius Phalereus, orator and statesman, was so named from the Attic seaport of Phalerum, where he was humbly born about 345 B.C. Educated with Menander in the school of Theophrastus, he entered on public life about 325, in 317 was intrusted by Cassander with the government of Athens, and discharged its duties for ten years so well that the Athenians erected 360 statues to his honour. Latterly he became dissipated; and, when Demetrius Poliorcetes approached Athens with a besieging army in 307, Demetrius had to flee—first to Thebes and next to the court of Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria. On Ptolemy's death he retreated to Busiris in Upper Egypt, and died there of an asp-bite in 283.

Demetz, FRÉDÉRIC AUGUSTE (1796-1873), a French magistrate, the founder in 1839 of the great reformatory of Mettray, near Tours.

Demidoff, a Russian family descended from a blacksmith at Tula, who in the time of Peter the Great amassed an immense fortune as a manufacturer of arms. Prince Anatole (1813-70), educated in France, wrote Voyage dans la Russie Méridionale (4 vols. Paris, 1839-49).

Democritus, a Greek philosopher, born at Abdera in Thrace about 470 or 460 B.C., who is represented by untrustworthy tradition as continually laughing at the follies of mankind. He travelled in the East, showed ceaseless industry in collecting the works of other philosophers, and was by far the most learned thinker of his age. He lived to a great age, but the date of his death is uncertain. The few extant fragments of his numerous physical, mathematical, ethical, and musical works were collected by Mullah (Berlin, 1843). Democritus's atomic system assumes an infinite multitude of atoms, instinct with a primary motion derived from no higher principle; from their multitudinous combinations springs that vast and varying aggregate called nature, in which he recognises law but not design. His system, said to have been derived from Leucippus, was developed by Epicurus and Lucretius. See works by Liard (Par. 1873), Brieger (1884), Liepmann (1885), and Natorp (1893).

Demogeot, JACQUES CLAUDE, a French litterateur, born 5th July 1808 at Paris, lectured at Beauvais, Rennes, Bordeaux, and Lyons, was appointed in 1843 to the chair of Rhetoric at the Lycée St-Louis at Paris, and died there 9th January 1894. Among his works were Lettres et les Hommes de Lettres au XIX. Siècle (1856); Histoire de la Littérature française (1857), an admirable handbook; Tableau de la Littérature française au XVII. Siècle (1859); and Histoire des Littératures étrangères (2 vols. 1880). [Deh-mo-zhoh'.]

Demolivre, ABRAHAM, mathematician, was born at Vitry, in Champagne, 26th May 1667. A Protestant, he came to England in 1688, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and supported himself by teaching. Newton's Principia whetted his devotion to mathematical studies, and at last he ranked among the leading mathematicians of his time. In 1697 he was elected an F.R.S.; and he helped to decide the famous contest between Newton (q.v.) and Leibnitz for the merit of the invention of fluxions. Latterly deaf, blind, somnolent (he would sleep twenty hours on end), he died in London, 27th November 1754. Among his works are The Doctrine of Chances (1718), Annuities (1725), and Miscellanea Analytica de Seriebus et Quadraturis (1730). [Deh-m'wahvr.]

De Morgan, AUGUSTUS, son of Col. de Morgan of the Indian army, was born in 1806, at Madras, Madras Presidency, and was brought up at Worcester and Taunton. Educated at several private schools, he 'read algebra like a novel' (novels themselves he devoured insatiably); but after four years at Trinity, Cambridge, he came out only fourth wrangler (1827). As a result of his revolt from early evangelical training he did not take orders; law proved distasteful; and in 1828 he became first professor of Mathematics in University College, London. In 1831 he resigned this office, but resumed it 1836-66; and he was secretary of the Astronomical Society (1831-38 and 1848-54). A mathematician of the first order, he was minutely versed in the history of the mathematical and physical sciences; he also devoted himself to the development of the Aristotelian or 'Formal' Logic. His works include Elements of Arithmetic (1831); Algebra (1835); Numbers and Magnitude (1836); Trigonometry (1837); Essay on Probabilities (1838); Formal Logic (1847); Arithmetical Books (1847); Book of Almanacks (1850); and Budget of Paradoxes (1872), reprinted from the Athenaeum. He also contributed largely to the Penny Cyclopaedia (850 articles) and many scientific journals. He died 18th March 1871. See Memoir (1882) by his wife, Sophia Elizabeth Friend, whom he had married in 1837, and her own Reminiscences (1895).

Demosthenes, an Athenian general, who in 425 B.C. assisted Cleon to reduce Sphacteria, and who in 413, being sent to Sicily to the relief of Nicias, fell, fighting bravely, into the hands of the Syracusans, and was put to death.

Demosthenes, the greatest orator of antiquity, was born about 383 B.C. He lost his father at an early age. The fortune bequeathed to him was reduced by the neglect or fraud of his guardians; when he came of age he prosecuted them, and gained his cause, but most of his inheritance was irretrievably lost. This litigation compelled Demosthenes to the study of the law, and to the pursuit of it as a livelihood. Up to the age of thirty he confined himself to 'speech-writing,' and gained repute as a constitutional lawyer. His most famous constitutional law speech was delivered personally in support of Ctesippus against Leptines (354). He now made his first appearance as a politician; but continued to practise as a speech-writer until he was forty, by which time he had made a fortune that allowed him to devote himself exclusively to politics. At the beginning of his political career danger threatened Greece from Philip of Macedon; Demosthenes from the outset advocated a policy which might have saved Athens and Greece. Intelligent as was the Athenian democracy, it was only when events justified Demosthenes that his policy was adopted. Philip's attack on the state of Olynthus gave occasion to the Olynthiacs, which, with the orations against Philip, the Philippics, are Demosthenes' greatest speeches. Athens made war with Philip on behalf of Olynthus; but, having failed to save the city, found peace expedient. During 346-340 Demosthenes was engaged in forming an anti-Macedonian party and in indicting Æschines for betraying Athens. War broke out again in 340, and ended in the fatal battle of Chæronea (338). Athens did not withdraw her confidence from Demosthenes; but the Macedonian party seized on a proposal to present him with a public crown as an occasion for his political destruction. The trial was held in 330, when in the famous speech On the Crown Demosthenes gloriously vindicated himself against Æschines. In 324 Harpalus, the treasurer of Alexander the Great, absconded to Athens with an enormous sum of money. It was placed in the state treasury, under the care of Demosthenes and others, and when Alexander demanded it, half was missing. Demosthenes was accused and condemned, but escaped from prison into exile. In 323 Alexander died, and Demosthenes was recalled to head a fruitless attempt to throw off the Macedonian yoke. The battle of Crannon ended the revolt. Demosthenes fled to Calauria, and, being there captured by Macedonian troops, poisoned himself, 12th October 322 B.C. A. Schäfer's Demosthenes und seine Zeit (2d ed. 3 vols. 1885-87) eclipses all other works, good as are the handbooks of Brodribb (1877) and Butcher (1881). See too Blass's Attische Beredsamkeit (2d ed. 1893). The best texts are Blass's (1885-89) and Butcher's (1903-7). Kennedy's translation (1852-63) is brilliant. [De-mos'thee-neez.]

Dempster, THOMAS, born in Aberdeenshire, about or before 1579, was educated at Turriff, Aberdeen, Cambridge, Paris, Louvain, Rome, and Douay. A zealous Catholic, he held several provincial professorships, and at Paris was a professor for seven years; but a brawl drove him to England. He married a beautiful wife there, and then returning to the Continent, at Pisa in 1616 obtained a professorship. But his wife's infidelities marring his peace, he removed to Bologna, where he became professor of Humanities, and where he died, 6th September 1625. Dempster's not too veracious autobiography forms part of his Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Sotorum (Bologna, 1627)—an erudite work in which, however, his desire to magnify his country often led him to forge the names of persons and books that never existed, and to claim as Scotsmen writers whose birthplace was doubtful. It was edited by David Irving for the Bannatyne Club in 1820.

Denck, HANS, a Bavarian Anabaptist, educated at Basel, from 1524 preached something like Evangelical Quakerism at St Gall, Augsburg, Strasburg, and Worms. He died at Basel in 1528. See R. Heath in Contemporary (1892).

Denham, DIXON, MAJOR (1786-1828), an African traveller, the comrade of Clapperton (q.v.), was born in London and died at Sierra Leone.

Denham, SIR JAMES STEUART, BART. (1712-80), political economist, was born and died in Edinburgh, having returned thither in 1763, after seventeen years of exile for his share in the '45. He succeeded to a Lanarkshire property in 1773, and then took the surname Denham.—His only son, SIR JAMES (1744-1839), commanded against the Irish rebels in 1798.

Denham, SIR JOHN, a Caroline poet, was the only son of an Irish judge, himself of English birth, and was born at Dublin in 1615. He was educated in London and at Trinity College, Oxford, where Wood tells us he was 'a slow dreaming young man, and more addicted to gaming than study—a taste from which his own essay against gaming (1651) did not cure him. In 1634 he married and went to live with his father at Egham, an estate to which he succeeded four years later. At the outbreak of the Civil War he was high-sheriff of Surrey, and immediately joined the king. He fell into Waller's hands on the capture of Farnham Castle, and was sent prisoner to London, but soon permitted to repair to Oxford. In 1641 he produced The Sophy, a feeble tragedy which was acted with great applause at Blackfriars; in 1642 Cooper's Hill, a poetical description of the scenery around Egham, itself still read, but more famous in the merits of its greater successors, Pope's Windsor Forest, avowedly an imitation. In 1648, being discovered in the performance of secret services for Charles I., he fled to Holland and France. In 1650 he collected money for the young king from the Scots resident in Poland, and he several times visited England on secret service. At the Restoration he was appointed surveyor-general of works, and in 1661 created a Knight of the Bath. He was a better poet than architect, but he had Christopher Wren to his deputy. In 1665 he married a young girl, who soon showed open favour to the Duke of York. The poor poet for a few months went crazy. Soon after his recovery his wife died suddenly (January 1667), not without suspicion of poison. Dehau's last years were miserable betwixt poverty and the satires of Samuel Butler and others. He died early in 1669, and was buried near Chaucer in Westminster Abbey.

Denina, CARLO GIOVANNI MARIA (1731-1813), Italian historian, was born at Revello, Piedmont, studied at Turin, and in 1758 became professor of Rhetoric there. An anonymous attack on the monks (1777) cost him his chair, and in 1782 he was summoned to Berlin by Frederick the Great, in 1804 appointed by Napoleon imperial librarian at Paris, where he died. [Day-ne' na.]

Denis, Sr, the traditional apostle of France and first Bishop of Paris, who was sent from Rome about 250 to preach the gospel to the Gauls; in Paris he made numerous proselytes. The Roman governor ordered Denis and two other Christians to be brought before him. As they continued firm in their faith, they were cruelly tortured and beheaded in 272 or 290.

Denison, EDMUND BECKETT. See GRIMTHORPE.

Denison, JOHN EVELYN, born at Ossington, Notts, 27th January 1800, was educated at Eton and Christ Church College, Oxford, entered parliament in 1823, was a Lord of the Admiralty 1827-28, from 1857 to 1872 was Speaker of the House of Commons, was then created Viscount Ossington, and died at Ossington, 7th March 1873. It was on his suggestion that the Speaker's Commentary to the Bible was undertaken.—His brother, GEORGE ANTHONY DENISON, Archdeacon of Taunton, was born in 1805, educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1828 became a Fellow of Oriel, in 1843 vicar of East Brent, Somerset, and in 1851 archdeacon of Taunton. In 1854 he was deprived for heresy, contained in three sermons on the Real Presence; but on appeal this judgment was quashed. A leader of the High-Church party, a strenuous opponent of secular education, and an advocate of the restoration of the confessional, he died 21st March 1896. See his delightful Notes of my Life (2 vols. 1878-93).—Other brothers were EDWARD (1801-54), from 1837 Bishop of Salisbury; and SIR WILLIAM THOMAS (1804-71), Governor of Tasmania, New South Wales, and Madras.

Denman, THOMAS, BARON, born in London, 23d February 1779, was educated at Eton and St John's College, Cambridge, and entered Lincoln's Inn in 1806. With Brougham he defended Queen Caroline (1820), and shared his consequent popularity. He was Whig M.P. for Wareham and Nottingham, 1818-26; was attorney-general in Earl Grey's administration in 1830-32; became Lord Chief-justice in 1832, and was raised to the peerage in 1834. He retired from the bench in 1850, and died 22d September 1854. See Memoir by Sir Joseph Arnould (2 vols. 1873).—His seventh son, the RIGHT HON. GEORGE DENMAN (1819-96), was born in London, from Repton passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and entered Lincoln's Inn in 1846. He was Liberal M.P. for Tiverton in 1859-65 and 1866-72, from which last year to 1892 he was judge, being in 1893 made a privy-councillor.

D'Ennery, ADOLPHE PHILIPPE, born in Paris of Jewish extraction, June 17, 1811, was clerk to a notary, but from 1831 produced 133 dramas, vaudevilles, &c.—the most successful, Marie Jeanne (1845). He was the creator of the Norman watering-place, Cabourg. He died in Paris, 25th January 1899.

Dennis, JOHN, critic, was born in London in 1657, the son of a prosperous saddler. He passed from Harrow to Caius College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1679. After a tour through France and Italy, he took his place among the wits and men of fashion, and brought a rancorous pen to the assistance of the Whigs. His nine plays had little success. The two most famous were Liberty Asserted (1704) and Appius and Virginia (1709). Pope's Essay on Criticism (1711) contained a contemptuous allusion to the latter, answered by Dennis next month in Reflections, Critical and Satirical, which was the commencement of a long feud. Poor and blind during his last years, Dennis died 6th January 1734.

Dennistoun, JAMES (1803-55), historical writer, was born at Colgrain near Helensburgh, became an advocate, and died in Edinburgh.

Dens, PETER (1690-1775), Catholic theologian, born at Boom near Antwerp, spent most of his long life at Malines as reader in theology, parish priest, and president of the archiepiscopal college. His Theologia Moralis et Dogmatica, a catechetical exposition of ethics and doctrine, is largely the Catholic text-book of theology.

Dent, EDWARD JOHN (1790-1853), chronometer-maker, was born and died in London.

Dentatus, MANIUS CURIUS, a Roman general famed for his noble simplicity, who between 290 and 274 B.C. defeated the Samnites and Sabines, Pyrrhus, and the Lucanians. He died in 270.

D'Entrecasteaux, BRUNI (1739-93), a French admiral who in 1792 explored the D'Entrecasteaux Islands, near New Guinea.

D'Eon. See ÉON.

Depew, CHANCEY MITCHELL, lawyer, railway director, politician, orator, &c., was born at Peekskill, New York, 23d April 1834.

Deppe, LUDWIG (1823-90), German composer.

Depretis, AGOSTINO (1813-87), an Italian statesman, born near Stradella. [Deh-preh'tees.]

De Quincey, THOMAS, was born at Greenhay, Manchester, 15th August 1785. His father, Thomas Quincey, who died in 1792, leaving £1600 a year, was a linen merchant with a turn for literature; the mother was a woman of culture. An elder brother of imaginative temperament exercised much influence over him; and he was profoundly impressed in childhood by the death of an infant sister. Thomas was educated at Salford, Bath, Winkfield in Wiltshire, and Manchester grammar-school. He was an apt scholar; he could converse fluently in Greek at fifteen. In 1802 his health failed; and he ran away from school to wander and study in Wales. He was allowed a guinea a week; but restlessness impelled him to London, where, failing to raise money on his expectations, he underwent singular privations. Ultimately he was sent to Worcester College, Oxford, on only £100 a year; he disliked the university system, and left in 1807. It was in Oxford that De Quincey first resorted to opium to allay pain; the use of the drug became an overmastering and lifelong habit. His mother had now settled near Bath, and at Bristol De Quincey became acquainted with Coleridge's family; and through that connection visited Wordsworth and Southey at the Lakes. In 1808 he revisited Oxford; then went back to London, where he associated with Knight, Lamb, Hazlitt, &c. In 1809 he settled with an ample library to a literary career at Grasmere. Here, in 1816, he married Margaret Simpson, the daughter of a 'statesman.' They had eight children, three daughters and five sons, two of whom distinguished themselves as soldiers. For about a year (1819) he edited the Westmorland Gazette, and was an undistinguished contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, the Quarterly, and other periodicals, till, returning to London in 1821, his Confessions of an English Opium-eater appeared in the London Magazine, and at once made him famous. From London he returned to Grasmere, but finally left Westmorland in 1828, and settled in Edinburgh; there, or at Lasswade, with only an occasional visit to Glasgow, he lived and worked till his death, on 8th December 1859. Blackwood's, Tait's Magazine, and latterly Hogg's Instructor, were for upwards of twenty years the successive receptacles of his brilliant though often diffuse and discursive papers. The Logic of Political Economy (1844) and Klosterheim (1839)—his sole and not very successful effort in regular fiction—were issued as books; all his other writings appeared in magazines. The first collected edition of his works appeared in America (20 vols. 1852-55), the fifth was edited by Prof. Masson (14 vols. 1889-91). See Page's Life and Writings of De Quincey (1877); Masson's De Quincey ('English Men of Letters' series, 1881); Personal Recollections, by J. R. Findlay (1886); De Quincey Memorials (2 vols. 1891); and James Hogg, De Quincey and his Friends (1895).

Derby, EARL OF, a title conferred in 1485 on Thomas, second Lord Stanley, two months after Bosworth Field, where he had greatly contributed to Richmond's victory. The Stanleys were descended from Adam de Aldithley, who attended Duke William to England, and whose grandson, having married the heiress of Thomas Stanley, of Stafford, exchanged the manor of Thalk in that county, his wife's marriage portion, for Stoneley, in Derbyshire, and assumed the surname of Stanley. In 1405 Sir John Stanley, who had married the heiress of Lathom, got a grant of the Isle of Man, which he and his descendants ruled till 1736.—JAMES, seventh Earl of Derby (1606-51), fought on the royalist side throughout the Great Rebellion, and, taken prisoner after Worcester, was beheaded at Bolton; his countess, Charlotte de la Trémouille (d. 1663), is famous for her heroic defence of Lathom House (1644) and of the Isle of Man (1651).—EDWARD GEOFFREY SMITH STANLEY, fourteenth EARL OF DERBY, was born at Knowsley Hall, Lancashire, 29th March 1799. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where, in 1819, he gained the Latin Verse. He entered parliament for Stockbridge in 1820; and in 1830 became Chief-secretary for Ireland under the Grey administration. He supported the Reform Bill, and signalled his Irish administration by two bold measures—one for National Education and another abolishing ten Irish bishoprics. In 1833 he became Colonial Secretary, and carried the emancipation of West Indian slaves. In 1834, alarmed by a motion for secularising the surplus of the Irish Church temporalities, Mr Stanley seceded from the Whigs; in November he declined to join the Peel administration, and the Stanleyites maintained an independent position; but he held the colonial seals in 1841-44. In 1844 he resigned his seat for North Lancashire, for which he had sat since 1832, and was called to the Upper House in his father's barony of Stanley of Bickerstaffe, having for ten years borne the courtesy-title of Lord Stanley, through his father's succession to the earldom of Derby. In December 1845, when Peel determined to repeal the corn laws, he retired from the cabinet, and in 1846 headed the Protectionists in the Lords. He was now regarded as the Conservative leader. In 1851 he succeeded his father as Earl of Derby; in February 1852 he formed an administration, displaced in December following by a hostile vote against Disraeli's budget. In 1858 he again became premier, and in 1859 his government brought forward a measure of reform; a hostile amendment having been carried, he dissolved and appealed to the country. When the new House met in June 1859, he resigned on a vote of want of confidence. Returning to power in 1866, he passed the Reform measure of 1867 in conjunction with Disraeli, in whose favour he resigned the premiership in 1868. His last speech in parliament was made (1869) against the Irish Church disestablishment. He died at Knowsley Hall, October 23, 1869. Lord Derby was styled by Bulwer Lytton 'the Rupert of debate,' and stood in the very first rank of parliamentary speakers. An accomplished scholar, he translated the Iliad into blank verse (1864), and was also a keen sportsman and a popular landlord. He cared little for office (he refused in 1863 the crown of Greece), and more than once injured his party by declining to form a ministry, notably on the fall of Aberdeen in 1855. See Lives by Keibel (1890) and Saintsbury (1892).

His eldest son, EDWARD HENRY SMITH STANLEY, fifteenth EARL OF DERBY, K.G., D.C.L., I.L.D., F.R.S., was born at Knowsley Hall, 21st July 1826, and educated at Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a double first. In 1848 he became M.P. for Lynn, and in 1852 was appointed Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs in his father's first ministry. After declining to join Palmerston's ministry in 1855, he became Secretary for India in his father's second administration (1858-59), and carried the measure transferring the government of India to the Crown. He was Foreign Secretary in the third Derby and first Disraeli ministries (1866-68). In 1874 he again became Foreign Secretary under Disraeli; but resigned in March 1878 when the majority of the cabinet determined to support Turkey by calling out the reserves and occupying Cyprus. In 1880 he definitely joined the Liberal party, and was Secretary for the Colonies from 1882 to 1885. In 1886 he declined to follow Mr Gladstone on the question of Home Rule for Ireland. He was Lord Rector of Glasgow University 1868-71, and of Edinburgh University 1875-80. He died at Knowsley Hall, 21st April 1893. See Memoir by Lecky, prefixed to his Speeches and Addresses (1894).

De Ros, GEORGIANA, LADY (1795-1891), daughter of the Duke of Richmond, in 1824 married William, Lord de Ros (1797-1874). She was the friend of the Duke of Wellington, and knew nineteen prime ministers. See Life by her daughter (1893).

De Rossi, GIOVANNI BATTISTA. See ROSSI.

Derwentwater, JAMES RADCLYFFE, EARL OF, was born in London, 28th June 1689, and brought up at St Germain. He succeeded as third earl in 1705, on the death of his father, who had married Lady Mary Tudor, Charles II.'s daughter by Moll Davis. In 1715 warrants were issued against several gentlemen in the north, one of them against the young Catholic Earl; but he fled from Dilston, his seat in Northumberland, and soon placed himself at the head of a few retainers. From this point the history of the Earl becomes the history of the Rebellion which ended in the disastrous encounter at Preston. Derwentwater bore himself with heroism, but, with most of the rebel leaders, was taken prisoner, and conveyed to the Tower. At his trial for high treason at Westminster Hall he pleaded guilty, and threw himself on the king's mercy. Every effort for a pardon failed, and he was beheaded on Tower Hill, 24th February 1716. See W. S. Gibson's Dilston Hall (1850).

Derzhavin, GABRIEL ROMANOWICZ (1748-1816), Russian poet, was born at Kazan, and in 1762 entered the army as a private. His talents soon gained him promotion. In 1791 he became Secretary of State, in 1800 Imperial Treasurer, and in 1802 Minister of Justice. Grot has edited his poems (9 vols. St Pet. 1864-83). [Der-zhah'veen.]

Desaguliers, JOHN THEOPHILUS (1683-1744), was born at Rochelle, the son of a Huguenot pastor, and brought as an infant to England. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford, took orders, received three benefices, and from 1710 lectured in London on optics and mechanics. He published fourteen works.—His youngest son, THOMAS (c. 1725-80), entered the artillery, and rose to be general. [De-za-geel-yay; g hard.]

Desaix de Veygoux, LOUIS CHARLES ANTOINE (1768-1800), born of a good old family at St Hilaire-d'Ayat in Auvergne, entered the army at fifteen, and in 1796 covered himself with glory in Moreau's famous retreat through the Black Forest. Behind the ruinous fortress of Kehl Desaix resisted the Austrians for two months, only capitulating, in 1797, when his ammunition was spent. His greatest achievement was the conquest of Upper Egypt, after an eight months' campaign (1799). He was shot in the battle of Marengo. [Deh-zay/deh Vay-goo'.]

Desaugiers, MARC (1772-1827), writer of songs and vaudevilles, whom some have set above Béranger, was born at Fréjus, and died in Paris, his residence from 1797, after adventurous years in San Domingo and elsewhere. [De-zo-zhay'.]

Desbarres, JOSEPH FREDERICK WALLEY (1722-1824), born in England of Huguenot parentage, at the siege of Quebec (1759) was aide-de-camp to Wolfe. He surveyed the coast of Nova Scotia in 1763-73; was lieutenant-governor of Cape Breton and of Prince Edward Island; and died at Halifax, N.S., aged 102. [Day-barr'.]

Desbordes-Valmore, MARCELLE FÉLICITÉ JOSEPHE (1785-1859), opera-singer, poetess, and story-writer, born at Douai.

Descartes, RENÉ (Latinised Renatus Cartesius), the 'father of modern philosophy,' was born March 31, 1596, at La Haye near Tours, and trained in the Jesuit College at La Flèche, where, a brilliant pupil, he soon became dissatisfied with scholasticism. On leaving college he endeavoured to efface from his mind all he had been taught, that it might be free to receive new impressions of truth, and served as a soldier in Holland, Bohemia (against the Protestants), and Hungary. It was at Neuburg on the Danube (1619) that there first dawned upon him the principles of a new method in philosophy. So in 1621 he left the army, travelling, with occasional residences in Paris, till 1629, when he retired to Holland, where in great seclusion he meditated and wrote for twenty years. Vexatious controversies with the Dutch theologians probably induced him to accept an invitation to Sweden from Queen Christina (1648); and at Stockholm he died of inflammation of the lungs on February 11, 1650. In 1666 his body was translated to the church of Ste Geneviève-du-Mont at Paris, in 1819 to St Germain-des-Prés. Descartes' search after philosophical certainty is explained in Discours de la Méthode (1637), and more fully in Méditationes de Primâ Philosophiâ (1641) and Principia Philosophiæ (1644). Doubt, not scepticism, is the philosophic starting-point. Applying this test relentlessly he found only one proposition that could not possibly be doubted: Cogito, ergo sum: 'I think, therefore I exist.' Next, whatever is clearly and distinctly thought must be true. One of these clear and distinct thoughts is the idea of God as the absolutely Perfect Being—an idea which we could not form by ourselves, for the imperfect can never originate the perfect. Hence, from the existence of the idea of perfection, Descartes inferred the existence of God as the originator of it—what is known as the ontological argument. God the Perfect Being cannot deceive, and therefore whatever our consciousness clearly testifies may be implicitly believed. Mind or spirit is pure consciousness, and matter is mere extension; these attributes are mutually exclusive, and hence these two 'created substances' can be united (as in man) only through the intervention of God. Body and mind do not really affect each other, processes in the nerves and brain are merely the occasion of God's producing in us a corresponding mental result. So with volitions, &c. Animals (in which the rational soul is absent) are mere automata. Descartes' celebrated theory of vortices, devised to explain the motions of the heavenly bodies, held the field till it was superseded by the Newtonian theory of gravitation. It was in mathematics that Descartes achieved the most lasting results, specially in equations; he first introduced exponents, and was practically the founder of analytical geometry. Descartes' collected works were published in Latin in 1697 and 1713, and in French by Cousin in 1824-26; and his philosophical works were translated by Miss Haldane and G. T. Ross (1911). See monographs by Millet (Par. 1871) and Liard (1882), Kuno Fischer (Eng. trans. 1887), and Fouillée (1893); and English works by W. Cunningham (1877), Lowndes, Malaffy, Martineau, Miss Haldane (1906). [Day-kart'.]

Deschamps, EUSTACHE (c. 1328-1415), a French poet, born at Vertus in Champagne, was a soldier, a magistrate, a court favourite, and a traveller in Italy and Hungary. He held important posts in Champagne, but his possessions were ravaged by the English, and he seems to have died poor. He composed 1175 ballades, rondeaux, virelais, and other lyrics, besides the Miroir de Mariage, 13,000 lines long—his works in all exceeding 100,000 lines. The best edition is by the Marquis de Queux de Saint-Hilaire (8 vols. 1878-93). See monograph by Sarradin (1878). [Day-show.]

Desjardins, ERNEST (1823-86), archaeologist and historian, was born at Noisy-sur-Oise, and died in Paris. [Day-zhar-danz.]

Desmond, EARL OF, a title conferred in 1329 on Maurice Fitzgerald, along with county Kerry, and last borne by Gerald Fitzgerald, fifteenth Earl, who in 1579-80 rebelled against Elizabeth, sacked Youghal by night and was proclaimed a traitor. He escaped the fate of the garrison at Smerwick, but was driven at last from his strongholds, wandered about for over two years, and was killed (1583) in a cabin in the Kerry mountains.

Desmoulins, CAMILLE, born 2d March 1760 at Guise in Picardy, studied law along with Robespierre at the Collège Louis-le-Grand in Paris, but owing to a stutter never practised. His confused notions of classical republicanism found vent in his pamphlets, La Philosophie au Peuple Français (1788) and La France Libre (1789), the latter published the day after the destruction of the Bastille, where he played a dramatic part. His Discours de la Lanterne procured him the sinister title of 'Procureur-général de la lanterne.' In November 1789 he began the brilliantly witty, cruelly sarcastic Révolutions de France et de Brabant, which appeared weekly until July 1792. His Tribune des Patriotes, however, died in its fourth number. Camille had been a member of the Cordeliers' Club from its foundation, and early clung to Danton. Elected by Paris to the National Convention, he voted for the death of the king. In the struggle between the Girondists and the Mountain he took an active part, and in May 1793, urged on by Robespierre, published his truculent Histoire des Brissotins. On 5th December came out the Vieux Cordelier, an eloquent expression of Camille's and Danton's longing for clemency. Robespierre took fright at the reception of the third number, and soon became actively hostile. On 30th March 1794 Desmoulins was arrested with Danton; on 5th April he died by the guillotine, not too heroically. A fortnight later his loved wife, Lucile Duplessis (1771-94), whom he had married in 1790, followed him to the same doom, dying with the courage of a martyr. See Claretie's Desmoulins and his Wife (trans. by Mrs Cashel Hoey, 1876), and Life by Godard (Par. 1889). [Day-moo-lanz.]

Desnoyers, AUGUSTE BOUCHER, BARON (1779-1857), Paris engraver. [Day-vauch-yay.]

De Soto, FERNANDO (c. 1496-1542), born at Xerez de los Caballeros in Estremadura, accompanied Pedrarias Davila to Darien in 1519, served in Nicaragua in 1527, and assisted Pizarro in the conquest of Peru, returning to Spain with a fortune of 180,000 ducats. Charles V. gave him permission to conquer Florida, and appointed him governor of Cuba; in 1538 he sailed from San Lucar with 600 men. The fleet anchored in Tampa Bay on the west coast of Florida in May 1539; and the long search for gold was begun. For three years, harassed by hostile Indians, lured onward by reports of wealth, the ever-decreasing company continued their toilsome march. In 1541 the Mississippi was crossed, and the third winter was spent on Washita River. Returning to the Mississippi in the spring, De Soto died of a fever on its banks; and, to conceal his death from the Indians, his body was lowered at midnight into the great stream he had discovered. Hardly half of his followers finally reached Mexico. See Lives by R. B. Cunningham Graham (1903), Wilmer (Phila. 1858), Abbott (New York, 1874), and Shipp (Phila. 1881); also, the Discovery of Florida (ed. by W. B. Rye, Hakluyt Soc. 1851).

Despard, EDWARD MARCUS, conspirator, was born in Queen's County, Ireland, in 1751, and at fifteen obtained an ensigncy. From 1772 till 1790 he did good service in the West Indies, but was then recalled on frivolous charges, proved in 1792 to be baseless. His demands for compensation brought him two years' imprisonment (1798-1800), on his release from which he engaged in a crack-brained conspiracy to assassinate the king and to seize the Tower and Bank of England. For this, with six associates, he was drawn on a hurdle, hanged, and beheaded, 21st February 1803.—His brother, JOHN DESPARD (1745-1829), British general, was present at twenty-four engagements, mostly during the American War of Independence.

Despauterius, JOHANNES (c. 1460-1520), a Fleming, whose Latin grammar was much used in Scotland before the Reformation.

Despencer, LORD LE. See DASHWOOD.

Dispenser, HUGH LE, justiciary of England from 1260, fell at Evesham fighting on the side of the Barons (1265).—His son, HUGH (1262-1326), after Gaveston's death (1312) became head of the court party; was banished with his son, Hugh (1321), but recalled the next year by Edward II., and created Earl of Winchester; and, after Queen Isabella's landing, was taken and hanged at Bristol, as his son was at Hereford.

Des Périers, BONAVENTURE (c. 1500-44), born at Autun in Burgundy, was a member of the court of men of letters assembled by Margaret of Navarre (q.v.). In a dialogue, Cymbalum Mundi (1537), under the pretence of attacking the superstitions of the ancients, he satirised the religious beliefs of his own day. The book raised a storm of indignation, against which Margaret was powerless to shield him; and rather than fall into the hands of his persecutors he is said to have killed himself. His admirable Nouvelles Récréations et Joyeux Devis (1558) consist of 129 short stories, both comic and romantic. To Des Périers has often been assigned the chief authorship of Margaret's Heptameron. See Lacour's edition of his works (2 vols. 1866) and a monograph by Chenevix (1886). [Day-payr-yay.]

Despréaux. See BOILEAU.

Dessalines, JEAN JACQUES (c. 1758-1806), emperor of Hayti, was born in Guinea, and imported thence into Hayti as a slave. He was bought by a French planter, whose name he assumed, and in the insurrection (1791) was second only to Toussaint L'Ouverture. After the first compromise he became governor of the southern part of the island, but soon renewed the war, and after infamous cruelties compelled the French to evacuate Hayti in October 1803. He was created governor in January 1804, and on 8th October was crowned emperor as Jean Jacques I. But his cruelty and debauchery soon alienated even his firmest adherents, and while trying to repress a revolt he was cut down by Christophe (q.v.), who succeeded him. [Des-sah-leen.] Dessoles, JEAN JOSEPH, MARQUIS (1767-1828), a Napoleonic general, born at Auch.

De Staal. See STAAL.

Destouches, PHILIPPE (1680-1754), born at Tours, wrote seventeen comedies, two of them admirable—Le Philosophe Marié (1727) and Le Glorieux, his masterpiece (1732). [Day-toosh.]

De Tabley. See TABLEY.

Detaille, ÉDOUARD, a French battle-painter, born in Paris, 5th October 1848. [Deh-tal-ye.]

Deutsch, EMANUEL OSCAR MENAHEM, was born of Jewish parents at Neisse, in Silesia, October 28, 1829. Educated there and at Berlin, he came to London in 1853, in 1855 became an assistant-librarian at the British Museum, and died 12th May 1873 at Alexandria, whither he had gone to recover from overwork. He is best known by his brilliant article on the Talmud in the Quarterly Review (1867), for which he also wrote on Islam (1869). He wrote on the Targum and the Samaritan Pentateuch for Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, and to the first edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia contributed nearly two hundred articles. See sketch of his life by Lady Strangford prefixed to his Literary Remains (1874). [Doitch.]
